

A N

Universal HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earliest Account of Time to the Present:

COMPILED from

ORIGINAL AUTHORS:

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological and Other Tables.

---

VOL. I.

---

The SECOND EDITION.

---

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέχουσα μὴ καλάνου, ἐς αὐταῖς τῶ ἐπιήσους ἀκόπως, ἅπασιν ἑτέροις σωτήριον ἐγκόπως.
Bafil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

---

---

L O N D O N:

Printed for E. SYMON, in Cornhill; T. OSBORNE, in Gray's-Inn; J. WOOD, in Pater-noster Row; and J. CROKATT.

M.DCC.XL.

THE 1904

AN ACT TO AMEND THE ACT

OF 1904

2

IN THE SENATE

OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

TO HIS GRACE

The Duke of Marlborough.

THE Nature and Design of this Work, may, in some Degree, atone for the Liberty we take in prefixing to it the immortal Name of Marlborough. For whose Protection should we court in publishing an Universal History, wherein are displayed the Atchievements of all the Heroes of former Ages, if not Your GRACE's, who are Grandson to the greatest Heroe of our Age? Whoever impartially peruses the following History, and compares the so much exalted Heroes of Antiquity with the late Duke of Marlborough, will find that their mighty Acts now serve but as Foils to set off his more glorious Enterprises and Successes. Most of those great Conquerors were, we may say, but licensed Thieves, Subverters of States and Empires, Plunderers of the Substance, and Enemies to the Rights of Mankind; whereas the generous Duke of Marlborough drew his Sword in the noble Cause of Liberty, against the ambitious Attempts of a powerful and insulting Nation, defeated its best-concerted Measures, and delivered not Britain only, but all Europe from impending Slavery.

NOR have Arms alone reflected an extraordinary Lustre on Your GRACE's Family; Letters too have greatly contributed to its Splendor. The Earl of Sunderland, Your Father, tho' engaged in the most arduous Scenes of publick Life, has enriched this Nation with a Monument of his Love and Value for the liberal Arts, which other Nations may well envy, but few can equal. No wonder then that your GRACE, in whom the eminent Prerogatives of two such illustrious Families have centred, should be so much the Darling of this happy Nation. But it is not

not the Lustre alone, which is derived on You from Your noble Progenitors, that entitles You to the Love and Esteem of Mankind. The Excellency of Your own Virtues heightens the Glory which You received by Inheritance ; Among the many good Qualities, which we might here take Occasion to celebrate without risking the usual Censure incurred by Dedicators, we shall only single out that truly noble and generous Spirit which is so becoming Persons of Your eminent Station. Providence seems to have put Wealth into Your Hands merely that You might despise it, and shew by Your Example in these Times of Corruption, that the Value of Gold is to be measured only by the Opportunities it gives of exerting Good Nature. That Greatness of Mind, which You happily join to Greatness of Fortune, will make the Duke of Marlborough live, when mean Men, of the same Rank, are, in spite of their Treasures so carefully hoarded up, buried in Oblivion. The Humanity of Your Temper, Your obliging Affability and Condescension, might be a noble and just Subject of Panegyric : But it is not our Intent here to enter into a Detail of your GRACE's Virtues and Perfections. We are too conscious of our own Inabilities to attempt it. We shall therefore only add, that if Your GRACE's Patronage can recommend this our Performance to all who love and honour the Duke of Marlborough, its Reception will be Universal. What we lay before You has been hitherto kindly received by the Public, both at Home and Abroad ; which, we hope, will in some Measure excuse the Liberty we take in suing for Your GRACE's Protection. To have intirely depended on Your Good Nature, without any kind of Merit in the Work itself, would have been unpardonable.

BUT we have already trespassed too much upon Your GRACE's Patience ; wherefore we shall only beg Leave to assure You, that our greatest Ambition is, that this Address, and the following History, be acceptable to Your GRACE, and that we may be allowed the Honour of subscribing ourselves,

MY LORD,

Your Grace's

Most Obedient,

Most Devoted,

Humble Servants,

The Authors.

---

---

C O N T E N T S

O F

V O L U M E I.

T HE Cosmogony, or Creation of the World	Page 1
The Creation of Man, and the Situation of the Garden of Eden	53
Of the Fall of Man	59
The Chronology, from the Creation to the Deluge, stated	69
The present History before the Flood	86
Of the Deluge	95
Of the State of the Antediluvian World, and the Changes made in the Earth by the Deluge	107
An Enquiry concerning the Situation of Mount Ararat, and the various Opinions about it	108
The Chronology, from the Deluge to the Departure of Abraham from Haran, stated	110
The History of Noah after the Flood, and of his Descendants to Abraham	114
The History of Sanchoniatho after the Flood	133
Of the Removal of Mankind from about Mount Ararat to the Plain of Shinaar, and of the Building of Babel	141
Of the Confusion of Tongues	149
Of the Dispersion of Mankind, and the Planting of Nations in the two first general Migrations	156
Of the Origin of Civil Government, and the Establishment of the first Kingdoms	171
A Description of Egypt	174
Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade, of the antient Egyptians	198
Of the Egyptian Chronology to the Time of Alexander the Great	228
The History of Osiris, Isis, Typhon, and Orus	241
The Reigns of the Kings of Egypt	246
The Succession of the Kings of Egypt, according to the Oriental Historians	279
b	The

C O N T E N T S.

The History of Moab	Page 282
The History of Ammon	292
The History of Midian and Madian	299
The History of Edom	305
The History of Amalek	317
The History of Canaan	322
The History of the Philistines	338
A Description of Syria	360
Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade, of the antient Syrians	370
Of the Chronology of the antient Syrians	381
The Reigns of the Kings of the antient Syrians	383
The Description of Phœnice	391
Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade, of the antient Phœnicians	396
The Chronology of the Phœnicians	407
The Phœnician Kings from the antient fabulous History of the Greeks	408
The Reigns of the Kings of Phœnice	410
The Jewish History from Abraham to Moses	421
The History of the Jews from their Egyptian Bondage to their Entrance into the Land of Canaan	473
The History of the Jews under Joshua	551
A Description of the Land of Promise	556
The Religion, Government, Laws, Customs, Learning, Arts, and Commerce, of the Jews	564
The Jewish Chronology from Abraham's Vocation to the Babylonish Captivity	573
The History of the Jews under their monarchical Government	759
Concerning the Rise and Progress of Idolatry and Witchcraft	851
The Description of Assyria	857
Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade, of the Assyrians	859
Of the Assyrian Chronology to the Fall of the Empire	862
The History of Assyria according to Ctesias of Cnidos, and his Followers	871
The History of Assyria according to Scripture, and the more approved Authorities	888
The History of the Babylonians	905
The Chronology of the Babylonians, from the first Rise of the Monarchy to its Dissolution	934
The Explanation at large of Solomon's Temple according to the sacred Historians	In the Appendix 1
A Description of Jerusalem	In Ditto 15

T H E P R E F A C E.

HISTORY is, without all doubt, the most instructive and useful, as well as entertaining, Part of Literature ; more especially when it is not confined within the narrow Bounds of any particular Time or Place, but extends to the Transactions of all Times and Nations. Works of this Nature carry our Knowledge, as Tully observes, beyond the vast and devouring Space of numberless Years, triumph over Time, and make us, though living at an immense Distance, in a Manner Eye-witnesses to all the Events and Revolutions, which have occasioned astonishing Changes in the World. By these Records it is that we live, as it were, in the very Time when the World was created ; we behold how it was governed in its Infancy, how overflowed and destroyed in a Deluge of Water, and again re-peopled ; how Kings and Kingdoms have risen, flourished and declined, and by what Steps they brought upon themselves their final Ruin and Destruction. From these and other like Events occurring in History, every judicious Reader may form prudent and unerring Rules for the Conduct of his Life, both in a private and public Capacity. But as the eminent Advantages accruing to us from this valuable Branch of Learning, have been sufficiently displayed by many others, we shall not trouble our Readers with a minute Detail of them, but hasten to what is peculiar to the Work, which we now offer to the Publick.

WE promised in our first Number to prefix to this Volume, when it was compleated, a Preface, wherein, after some Account of the Method we have observed, and the Authors we have chiefly followed in the Work, we should examine the different Computations of Time, the Coins, Weights and Measures used by the several Nations whose Histories should be therein delivered, with such other Particulars as we should judge useful and necessary. This Promise is what we now intend to discharge, and to begin with a succinct Account of the Method we have pursued.

OUR Intent was to write a General History of Mankind, from the earliest Account of Time to the present. Pursuant to this Design, before we enter upon the History itself, we have thought it necessary to premise, by way of Introduction, an Account of the Cosmogony or Production of the Earth, as being the Theatre on which the Scenes of the ensuing History were to be acted. In this preludious Discourse, after having related, without omitting any thing that was really curious and entertaining, the various Opinions both of the antient and modern Philosophers, concerning the Formation of the animate and inanimate World, we proceed to the only authentick and genuine History of the Creation, that which has been left us by Moses. The Opinions of the Philosophers are, for the most Part, absurd, incoherent, and contradictory; whereas the Mosaick Account, if rightly understood, carries with it all the Marks of Truth and Probability, even though it be regarded only as a human Composition, abstracted from divine Authority. Having attended the Earth through its several Degrees of Formation, seen it perfected, cloathed with Trees and Plants, replenished with Animals, and at last Man, for whom the Whole was designed, and to whom the Dominion of it was expressly given by its Maker, introduced and placed in it; we take some Notice of the Opinion of those who think Mankind were in being before Adam, whom they suppose to have been the Progenitor of the Jews only; we touch upon several Enquiries that have been made concerning the Time and Season of the Creation, the Place where Adam was created, &c. and close the Introduction with some Account of the Creation of the Angels, of the Nature, Power, Employments, &c. of those spiritual Beings that so eminently concerned themselves in the Affairs of Mankind, at least in the first Ages of the World. The Introduction, we hope, will not be thought of a disproportionable Length; so copious a Subject as the Origin of the World and Mankind, could not well be reduced into a narrower Compass. If there should be some little Obscurities or Inconsistencies, where we have delivered or explained the Opinions of the old Philosophers, we need not say much to excuse ourselves to those who know in what Uncertainty and Confusion the History of those Philosophers and their Opinions have been left by the Antients.
have

FROM the Cosmogony or Formation of the Earth and Things that were made for the Use of Man, we proceed to the General History of the World till the Flood, but premise several curious Enquiries touching the Situation of the Garden of Eden, the State of Innocence, and its Continuance, the two Trees, the Prohibition laid on the first Pair, the Tempter and his Punishment, the Fall of Man, and the Effects it had on human Nature, and on the Earth, with the different Opinions touching the manner in which the Change in the Constitution of Man and of the Earth was effected. The Chronology from the Creation to the Deluge is what we likewise thought necessary to settle, before we entred upon the History of the Antediluvian World. As Moses has not set down the particular Time of any Transaction before the Flood, except only the Years of the Patriarchs, all we can do in this Period is to determine that Point, which might easily have been done, were there no Variations in the several Copies we now have of Moses's Writings. But as the Hebrew, the Samaritan, and Greek Version of the Septuagint vary very much from one another, and some Writers prefer one Copy and some another, we have exhibited these Variations in several Chronological Tables of the Years of the Patriarchs, adding to the Computation of the Hebrew, of the Septuagint, and of the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Numbers of the Years of the Patriarchs, as delivered by Josephus, and corrected by Dr. Willis and Mr. Whiston, the Numbers in the present Copies of that Historian being greatly corrupted. Having thus stated the Chronology before the Flood, we deliver the History of the Antediluvian Patriarchs, as transmitted to us in the Writings of Moses, which are the only to be depended upon in those early Times. However, we have thought it not amiss to collect the most material Pieces of History to be found in profane Authors, relating to the Times preceding the Flood; among which, though there be some which bear apparent Marks of Truth, yet we believe the greater Part will be judged to deserve little Credit: However, as every Thing which has the least Pretence to so great Antiquity cannot but be entertaining and curious, we hope our Labour in collecting them will not be condemned as useless.

From the History of the Antediluvian World, we pass to that of the Flood, where we produce profane Testimonies of that wonderful wonderful Catastrophe, relate various Conjectures of antient and modern Writers, as to the Manner in which that dreadful Devastation was brought on the Earth, give some Account of the Ark, whereby Noah and his Family, with such Kinds of living Creatures as he took in with him, were delivered from this Destruction; and lastly, before we dismiss the History of the old World, take a transient View of the Antediluvian State of Mankind, of their Religion, Policy, Arts and Sciences, of the Alterations which have been wrought in Nature by the Flood, of the Longevity of the Antediluvians, and the Causes of it, as well as of the prodigious Fertility of the first Earth. To these we add an Enquiry touching the Situation of Mount Ararat, and the various Opinions about it.

HAVING thus collected, in the best Manner we could, what we have found worth Notice, from Writers of various Times, Religions and Countries, relating to the Antediluvian World, we proceed to the General History from the Deluge to the Birth of Abraham; but first settle the Chronology from the Deluge to the Departure of Abraham from Haran. This is one of the most difficult Periods to settle in all Chronology, not only because we have no Assistance therein from profane History, but also on Account of the great Diversity between the several Mosaick Writings. However, it is no small Satisfaction, that the great Differences between the several Copies end here, and that being once got below the Birth of Abraham, we enter upon a more certain Series of Time, about which Chronologers do more generally agree; the Variety of the Copies making a Difference of but a few Years, not of several Ages, as we find before this Period: For the better exhibiting of which we have inserted Chronological Tables of the Years of the Postdiluvian Patriarchs to the Call of Abraham, according to the Computation of the Hebrew, of the Septuagint, and of the Samaritan Pentateuch. Having stated the Chronology, we come to the History of Noah after the Flood, and of his Descendants to Abraham, presenting the Reader with whatever we find curious or entertaining, not only in sacred, but profane Writers, namely in the small Remains which are left us of the Phœnician Antiquities, collected by Sanchoiatho, and which are supposed to relate to the earliest Times. As the planting of Nations in the two first general Migrations, the forming of Societies and Governments, the Rise of Arts and Sciences, the Beginning of States and Monarchies, fall within this Period, we give the Reader as distinct an Account of these important Facts, as the Records which have reached us will allow of.

FROM

FROM the general History of the Migrations of the Children of Noah, of the peopling the Earth by them, and the settling of the first Governments, we descend to the particular Histories of each Kingdom, beginning with that of Egypt, which is without doubt one of the most antient Nations of the World, having been peopled either by Ham, or his Son Mizraim, with his own Issue, which inhabited several Parts of it, under the Names of Mizraim, Pathrusim, Coslukim, and Caphthorim. This History we pursue from the first Original of the Egyptian Nation to its Conquest by the Persians, when the severe Prediction of the Prophet * was fulfilled, There shall be no more a Prince in the Land of Egypt. And here to acquaint the Reader, in a few Words, with the Method we have followed in delivering the particular Histories of each Nation; we begin with accounting, in the best Manner we can, for the Name or Names which each Nation bears; then we proceed to a Description of the Country, containing an Account of its Situation, Extent, Climate, Divisions, Fertility; of its animal and vegetable Productions, of the natural and artificial Curiosities it contains; of its Cities, Rivers, Mountains, Lakes, and whatever else worthy of Notice is to be found in each Province. Next we enquire into the Original and Antiquity of the Inhabitants, consider their Laws, Government, Religion, Customs, Institutions, Language, Commerce, Learning, Trade, Navigation, and also endeavour, as far as so intricate a Subject will allow, to settle the Chronology of each Nation. Lastly, we deliver the Series and History of their Kings, which comprizes the Wars, Treaties, Revolutions, and all the most remarkable Events of each Country. Thus we may say, without Vanity or Ostentation, that no History has hitherto appeared in any Language, which can with more Justice challenge the Title of an Universal History than the present, since it comprizes not only the History of all Nations and Countries, but of all Religions, and religious Ceremonies, of all Arts and sciences, of the Laws that have been any where observed, of Trade and Navigation, and, in short, of whatever has been invented for the Use and Convenience of human Race. But to return to the Sequel of our History:

AFTER delivering the Succession of the Kings of Egypt, according to the Greek and Latin Authors, we thought it might be deemed an Omission, if we should take no Notice of the Series of the Egyptian Kings given us by the oriental Writers. Wherefore we have set down their Names, and briefly mention their principal Actions as related by the Eastern Historians, leaving the Reader to judge what Credit ought to be given them.

* Ezek. xxx. 13.

NEXT to the History of the Egyptians we give that of those Nations with whom the Children of Israel waged War before or upon their settling in the Land of Canaan, namely the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Edomites, Amalekites, Canaanites, and Philistines. From these we proceed to the History of the antient Syrians, Phœnicians, and that of the Jews, from Abraham, Founder of the Jewish Nation, to the Babylonish Captivity. We have enlarged somewhat on the latter, giving a distinct Account of their Patriarchs from Abraham to Moses, of their Egyptian Bondage, Deliverance, and 40 Years wandering in the Wilderness, of their Wars with the Inhabitants of Canaan, and the neighbouring Nations; of their Religion, Government, Laws, Customs, Learning, Arts, Commerce, with an accurate Description of the Land of Promise, &c. We have also settled the Jewish Chronology, from the Call of Abraham to the Babylonish Captivity, and then proceeded first to the History of the Judges that governed Israel, from the Death of Joshua to Saul their first King, and thence to the Reign of Zedekiah, when the City of Jerusalem was burnt, and the whole Nation carried into Captivity by Nebuchadnezzar. Having thus delivered the Histories of the most antient Kingdoms, till they were severally subdued by the great Empires, and became Parts or Provinces of them, we enter upon the History of the said Empires, and close this Volume with the Histories of the Assyrian Empire to its Conquest by the Medes and Babylonians, and of the Babylonian Empire to its Destruction by Cyrus.

Now to say something of the Authors we have chiefly followed in the Work, for we have advanced nothing without quoting our Authors, that the Reader may, for his fuller Satisfaction, recur, if he pleases, to the Originals; Moses is the only authentick Writer of what happened before, and for several Ages after the Flood. He is by universal Consent allowed to be the most antient Historian now extant; for whether he was contemporary with Inachus, as Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Julius Africanus, Josephus, Tatian, Clemens of Alexandria, Porphyrius, and others suppose, or lived in the Time of Cecrops, the first King of Athens, as Eusebius affirms, it is certain that his History was composed, not only before all the Histories, but even before the Fables of the Greeks; since, according to the Calculation of the former, he wrote 675 Years before the Trojan jan War, and according to that of the latter 275 Years before that Æra. His History, as well as the Jewish Laws, whereof he was Author, are comprized in five Books, known under the Title of the Pentateuch, which is universally received both by the Jews and Christians, as penned by him, if we except Aben Ezra and Spinoza among the former, and some modern Criticks among the latter, if their avowed Principles can permit us to call them Christians, who denied him to be Author of it, and who have been learnedly confuted by a late Writer <sup>b</sup>. Besides the Pentateuch, there have been some other Works ascribed to Moses, though without any Certainty, such as the Book of Job, which some suppose to have been composed by him, during his 40 Years Abode in Midian, and have this Argument on their Side, that it appears to have been written before the Deliverance of the Israelites from the Egyptian Bondage; otherwise it were absurd to suppose, that either Job or his Friends, considering what Kindred and Country they were of, could be so ignorant of the Wonders which God had wrought in Favour of that oppressed People, or so forgetful of them, as not to have urged them in the strongest Terms, during their long and intricate Controversy about the various Dispensations of Providence. Moses is also supposed to have wrote eleven Psalms, viz. the 90th, 91st, and so on to the 100th. Origen <sup>c</sup> believes him to have translated the Book of Job out of the Syriack into Hebrew. Some few Fragments of other Books are likewise quoted by several of the Antients as wrote by him; such as, 1. his Apocalypse, out of which St. Paul is by them supposed to have taken those Words, For in Christ Jesus neither Circumcision availeth any thing <sup>d</sup>, &c. 2. his lesser Genesis; 3. his Ascension; 4. Assumption; 5. his Testament, and other mysterious Books. St. Jerom, who quotes a Passage or two out of his lesser Genesis, tells us, that they had it in Hebrew in his Time <sup>e</sup>. The Sethites, an antient Sect of Hereticks, quoted his Testament and his Mysterious Books or Discourses; but all these were so far from bearing any Authority in the Church, that they fell into Contempt and Oblivion, in Proportion as Christianity prevailed.

THOUGH the Writings of Moses be the only Records to be depended upon in the early Times, yet we have not omitted to give some further Accounts relating to the same Period, transmitted to us by profane Writers, namely by Sanhoniatho, Menetho, and Berosus. Sanhoniatho, a Tyrian, according to Athenæus and

<sup>b</sup> Abbadie. Verit. de la Relig. Chrétien. vi. 35.

<sup>c</sup> Epist. 127. ad Fabiol.

<sup>d</sup> Origen in Job.

<sup>e</sup> Gal.

Suidas, according to others of Berytus, is said by Porphyrus the Philosopher<sup>f</sup>, Eusebius<sup>g</sup>, and Theodore<sup>h</sup>, to have lived about the Time of the Trojan War; whence Bochart, Huetius, and others, suppose him to have been contemporary with Gedeon. But these Writers are certainly mistaken in their Chronology, and Sanchoniatho must be of a much later Date, since he speaks of Tyre, which was built but 91 Years before the Destruction of Troy, as a very antient City. He must therefore have lived, as Suidas thinks, some considerable Time after that War, but the Number of Years we cannot precisely determine. If what is said of Sanchoniatho be true, viz. that he dedicated his Book to Abibal King of Tyre, who was Hiram's Father, and Solomon's Ally, he must have been Contemporary with David, who did not begin his Reign till several Years after the Trojan War. He compiled the Phœnician History, according to Porphyrus, from the antient Monuments and Memoirs which were imparted to him by one Hierombalus a Priest, whom Bochart, Huetius, and some others take to be Gedeon, he being in the Book of Judges sometimes named Jerobaal. But this Conjecture is refuted by others<sup>i</sup>. He is said to have likewise made use of the Registers of the Cities of Phœnice, which he found lodged in the Temples, and to have carefully sought out, as Philo Biblius informs us, the Writings of Taaut, knowing him to have been the first Inventor of Letters, and the same whom the Egyptians call Thoth, the Greeks Hermes, and the Latins Mercury. He wrote also the History of Egypt, and another Book of the Cosmogony and Theogony of the Phœnicians. These Works were translated out of the Phœnician into the Greek Tongue by Philo Biblius, a famous Grammarian, who lived in the Reigns of Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, Trajan, and Adrian. Philo digested them into nine Books, though Porphyrus mentions but eight, perhaps not counting, as Bochart conjectures, his Cosmogony and Theogony. He begins his History with the Origin of the World, and of Mankind: But his Work being apparently written with a Design to apologize for idolatry, instead of deducing the History, as Moses has done, from Adam in the Line of Seth, the Worshipers of the true God, he has, according to the Hypothesis of Bishop Cumberland, given us that of the idolatrous Line of Cain, that the Religion which this Author, or those he transcribed, patronized, might appear to be introduced by the elder Branch, a Circumstance which they might think curat. Græcar. affect. p. 28.

<sup>f</sup> Lib. 4. adversus Christian.

<sup>g</sup> Lib. 1. Præparat. Evangel.
<sup>i</sup> Vandalen. Dissert. de Sanchoniath.

<sup>h</sup> Lib. 2. de gave it no small Lustre and Reputation. In the few Fragments of his Works that are remaining, we might be justly surprized to find not so much as the least mention of the Deluge, did we not consider that Destruction was a Judgment on the idolatrous World, with which the Professors of the true Religion probably reproached the Heathens, and which the latter were therefore desirous to conceal, and to bury, if possible, the very Memory of so extraordinary a Monument of Divine Vengeance, and their own Shame. Bishop Cumberland suspecting, with a great deal of Reason, the Phœnician Records, where they deliver the Pedigree of Cain's Line, to have been corrupted, proposes an Amendment of them; for which we refer the Reader to that learned Prelate's Book on Sanchoniatho, or to Page 133, Note C of the present History. We must not forget to acquaint the Reader, that some Writers have, upon very slight Grounds, endeavoured to prove all that has been said of Sanchoniatho to be an arrant Fable; and the Work, which goes under his Name, as well as the Name itself, to have been forged by Philo Biblius, in Opposition to the Books which Josephus had wrote not long before against Apion. But their Arguments are so frivolous, that they scarce deserve an Answer.

MANETHO, an Egyptian by Birth, High-Priest and Keeper of the sacred Records of that Nation, flourished in the Reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, by whose Order he undertook the History of Egypt, translating out of the Egyptian Language, into the Greek, the sacred Registers that were committed to his Care. This Work he divided into three Parts, whereof the First contained the History of the Gods; the Second, that of the Demi-gods; and the Third, the Dynasties; which ended in Nectanebus, the last king of Egypt, who was driven out by Ochus in the 107th Olympiad, a few Years before the Conquest of Persia by Alexander. Besides his History of Egypt, he wrote several other Books, viz. one of the Theology of the Egyptians, commonly stiled the holy Book: one of the antient and religious Ceremonies of the Egyptians, called by Porphry, the Book of Antiquity and Picty; one of Physick; and one concerning the Manner of preparing Incense to be used by the Egyptian Priests: The two latter Books are ascribed by Suidas to another Manetho, by Birth a Mendesian; but his Authority in Matters of this Nature is little to be depended upon. He likewise wrote six Books in Verse on the Influence and Power of the Stars, which he dedicated to Ptolemy Philadelphus. This Piece is still extant, and was published in the original Greek, with a Latin Explanation and Notes by Gronovius in 1698, from the only Manuscript that was remaining and lodged in the Medicean Library at Florence. To this Work Paulinus Nolanus alludes in the following Verses:

Nunc tria miremur texentem fata Platonem, Aut Arati numeros, aut picta Manæthonis astra.

He published also a Book of the Jews, which Josephus refutes in his first Book against Apion, as filled with fabulous Accounts. Of all his Works except his Astronomy, there are now but a few Fragments remaining in Africanus, Eusebius and Syncellus. The Credit of this Author has been called in question by several Writers, not only on account of the incredible Antiquity to which his History is supposed to have ascended, but from the Account which, it is said, he himself gave of the Records from whence he took it, pretending to have extracted it from certain Pillars in the Seriadic Land, on which Inscriptions had been made in the sacred Dialect and Letters by Thoth, the first Hermes, and were translated, after the Flood, out of the sacred Dialect into Greek, and laid up by Agathodæmon, the Son of the second Hermes, the Father of Tat, in the inner Recesses of the Egyptian Temples. Now it is impossible that the first Hermes, who lived in the earliest Years of the Egyptian Monarchy, could write a History of so many Generations, which came into the World after his Death; and if Manetho could assert this, it must necessarily have overthrown the Credit of his whole Work. But we do not think that Writer could mean any such thing; the Words cited from him, do not say he took his whole History from those Pillars; though he might probably quote those Records to support the antient History, which preceded the Time of Thoth; and such Pillars, or at least some Pillars of great Antiquity, and by the Priests attributed to Thoth, must have been extant in the Days of Manetho, or he could never have appealed to them in so public a Manner, especially in writing to his Prince. The stronger Prejudice against the Credit of this Writer, arises from his Chronology. The Egyptians, it is true, pretended to an excessive Antiquity, and to have certain Records for a prodigious Length of Time past. This appears not only from the old Egyptian Chronicle, but from the extravagant Numbers of Years their Priests imposed upon Herodotus, Plato, and Diodorus; but Manetho seems to have been much more modest, though the Sum of his 32 Dynasties, from Menes to fifteen Years before Alexander, (without taking the Reigns of the Gods and Demigods into the Account) if cast up, will amount to above 5300 Years, which will reach higher than the Creation of the World; and Joseph Scaliger has accordingly settled their Chronology in such manner, that by his own Way of reckoning, it exceeds the Epoch of the Creation 1336 Years. After Cambyſes had carried away the Egyptian Records, the Priests, in all Probability, to supply their Loss, and keep up their Pretences to Antiquity, began to write new Records, wherein they not only necessarily made great Mistakes, but added a good deal of their own Invention, especially as to distant Times. From these Materials, for want of better, Manetho collecting his History, must have intermixed a good deal of Fable, as there is indeed in the Antiquities of all Nations; since it cannot be expected that People could have begun to keep Records till some Ages after their Settlement. It is unjust therefore to lay the whole Blame of the Confusion and Uncertainty, we find in the Egyptian History, at the Door of Manetho: He collected, for ought we know, faithfully from the Records he had, and we have so little genuine Remains of him, and what we have, has been so mangled by Transcribers and Pretenders to correct him, that they scarcely bear any Resemblance of that antient and venerable Historian. Several antient Writers of good Judgment, as Plutarch, Porphyry, Eusebius, and Josephus, looked upon him as a Writer, whose Authority was to be depended on; and the curious Fragment transcribed from him by Josephus, before his Copies had been corrupted, seems to confirm this good Opinion, being the most valuable and authentic Piece of Egyptian History of so great Antiquity, that is extant, and the Series of Kings, which we have thence exhibited, p. 234, is a pretty exact one, connecting the Egyptian and Grecian Histories, by acquainting us, that Sethosis was Ægyptus, and his Brother Armais, Danaus.

gods

BEROSUS, by Birth a Chaldean, flourished under Antiochus Soter, or his Son Antiochus Theos, and not in the Time of Moses, as some, grossly mistaken, have imagined. For he dedicated his Work to Antiochus, the third King after Alexander, as Tatian informs us, that is, to Antiochus Theos; Alexander was succeeded by Seleucus Nicanor; Seleucus Nicanor by Antiochus Soter; and he by his Son Antiochus Theos. He tells us himself in his first Book of the History of Babylon, that he was born during the Minority of Alexander the Great. He wrote in Three Books the Chaldean and Babylonish History, which took in that also of the Medes. Pliny tells us<sup>a</sup>, that his History contains the Events of 480 Years. But of that Work we have now remaining only some few Fragments, quoted by Josephus in his Books against Apion, and by Alexander Polyhistor; for the Berosus published by Annius of Viterbo, is, without all Doubt, a spurious Piece. Josephus says, that he agreed with Moses in his Accounts of the Deluge, the Fall of Man, the Ark, in which the Restorer of Mankind was saved; and adds, that he mentions the Descendants of Noah, and their respective Ages, to Nabulassar, King of Babylon; and that relating the Actions of that Prince, he speaks of the taking and burning of Jerusalem by his Son Nebuchadonosor; on which Occasion, says he, the Jews were carried Captives to Babylon; whence ensued the Desolation of that City for 70 Years, till the Reign of Cyrus. He is quoted by Pliny, Tatian, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Vitruvius, and Eusebius, which shews him to have been a Writer of good Authority. In the Series he gives us of the ten Kings, whom he supposes to have reigned at Babylon before the Flood, there are some small Variations in the Authors, who have transcribed that Historian, which has induced us to exhibit them to the Reader's View, pag. 90 of the present History. As these ten Successions exactly answer the ten Generations from the Creation to the Flood, the first King, by Name Alorus, has been supposed to be the same with Adam, as Xisuthrus, the last in the Series, plainly appears to be Noah. The Reader will find his Account of the Chaldean and Babylonian Cosmogony, p. 14, and the Substance of the few Fragments that are still remaining and relate to the earliest Times, p. 90.

<sup>a</sup> Hist. Natur. l. 6. c. 55.

To Berosus we may add Abydenus, who flourished some time after him, and, in many Things, follows him. Abydenus wrote the History of the Chaldean Empire, whereof there are but a few Fragments remaining in Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Syncellus. In one of these Fragments he gives the Names and Reigns of the ten first Kings of Chaldea, copied with some small Variation from Berosus, as the Reader may see, p. 99. In another he speaks of the Tower of Babel, and the Confusion of Languages, agreeable to the Account we have in Holy Writ. These Fragments Scaliger has illustrated with learned Notes in his Book De emendatione temporum. Some confound this Abydenus with Palæphatus, called also Abydenus, from the City of Abydus, the Place of his Birth. Palæphatus was contemporary with Alexander, a favourite Disciple of Aristotle's, and wrote the Histories of Cyprus, Delos, and Arabia.

E R A-

ERATOSTHENES the Cyrenæan was a Man of eminent Learning, Keeper of the famous Library of Alexandria, and greatly in favour with Ptolemy Evergetes, by whose Order he wrote the History of the Theban Kings of Egypt, the Catalogue of which has met with a very favourable Reception among the Learned, not only as a Supplement to Manetho, who has entirely omitted that Succession, but as a certain Foundation for fixing the Egyptian Chronology. His Authority has been by several Writers preferred to that of Manetho, in regard he was not an Egyptian, and took his List from the sacred Records of Thebes, or had it from the sacred Scribes there. He has given, together with the Egyptian Names of the Kings, their Interpretation in Greek, which the Skilled in the Coptic Tongue allow to be just in some Instances; but several of them are corrupted and unintelligible. This Author wrote a great Number of Books, whereof the Catalogue may be seen in Fabricius, Galeus, Vossius, &c. but the only Piece now remaining entire, is his Description and fabulous Account of the Stars. He starved himself thro' Grief for the Dimness of his Sight in the 10th or 12th Year of Ptolemy Epiphanes, 196 Years before Christ.

IN the History of Egypt, besides Manetho, we have chiefly followed Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus. Herodotus, or, as others call him, Erodotus, is the most antient Writer among the Greeks, whose Works have reached us. There is no Room left to doubt of the Place of his Birth, he himself having inserted, at the Beginning of his History, both his Name and Country: This is, says he, the Book of Herodotus of Halicarnassus. He was also surnamed the Thurian, having accompanied a Colony, which was sent from Athens, to settle at Thurium, a City of Magna Græcia on the Tarentin Gulf. This happened the third Year of the 83d Olympiad, during the Prætorship of Callimachus. Here, if we believe Pliny<sup>1</sup>, he wrote his History, being then forty Years old, in the first Year of the 84th Olympiad, 310 Years after the Foundation of Rome, and 444 before Christ. Before he began his History, he travelled all over Greece, Italy, and Egypt, to enquire into the Origin, Traditions and Records of the Nations he was to write of. His main Design was, to write the Wars of the Persians against the Greeks, from the Reign of Cyrus to that of Xerxes; but he extended it to the History of other Nations, namely, of the Lydians, Egyptians, and Scythians. This History he divided into nine Books, giving to each of them the Name of one of the nine Muses ; wherein he has since been followed by Cephalion, Bion the Rhetorician, and P. Aurelius Opilius ; tho' some are of Opinion, that his Books were not by himself distinguished with those Titles, but by the Admirers of his Performance. He recited his History, as Lucian informs us, on the publick Theatre at Olympia to a crowded Auditory of the chief Men of all Greece, met to celebrate the Olympic Games, and was more admired even than those who carried the Prizes. Eusebius says, that this happened, not at Olympia, but at Athens, on the Festival of the Panathenæa. On this Occasion it was that Thucydides, tho' then eighty Years old, was so touched with Emulation, that he resolved to undertake the writing of an History, and strive to equal or excel Herodotus. The History of Herodotus has been proposed by Tully, Hortensius, Quintilian, and all the best Judges of Antiquity, as a Pattern to all Historians. As for the Truth of his Accounts, we must own that it has been called in question by Men of no mean Character. Ctesias doubts the Truth of what he writes concerning the Medes and Assyrians ; but we shall prove hereafter this Historian less worthy of Credit than Herodotus. Manetho censures him, for advancing many Falsties, with regard to the Egyptian History ; which Charge is not quite groundless, since he himself owns, that what he relates to have happened before the Reign of Psammitichus, and on the Credit of others, is far from certain. But none ever attacked with more Virulency, if we may be allowed the Expression, the Credit of Herodotus, than Plutarch, whose Judgment would be of great Weight, had he not himself declared, that the Reputation of his Country had engaged him in the Dispute. Herodotus relates, that in the Expedition of Xerxes, the Thebans, to consult their own Safety, abandoned the Common Cause, and joined the Persians. Tho' this was Matter of Fact, and Demosthenes afterwards reproached the Thebans with it, yet Plutarch, who was a Native of Charonæa, a Theban City, could not bear the base Behaviour of his Countrymen to be transmitted to Posterity, but vented his Resentment against the Publisher of their Cowardice in a Book wrote for that Purpose, and entituled, Of the Malignity of Herodotus. But his Exceptions are either trifling, or turn upon Facts, which Herodotus himself delivers as doubtful. Besides, he betrays throughout the whole Work a great deal of Passion, Prejudice and Ill-nature. On the other Side, all Greece, by their solemn Approbation, gave an ample Testimony of his Veracity, at a Time when most of the Transactions which he describes, were very well known.

<sup>1</sup> Lib. 12. c. 2.

In

In his whole Work there appears an Air of Sincerity, which even his Enemies have been forced to acknowledge: He examines the Truth of the Facts which he relates, and for the most part acquaints his Readers with what others have said on the same Subject. When he relates extraordinary Events, he tells us that he copied them from others, and declares which he believes, and which he suspects, adding, as it is said; as I have been told; this does not at all seem probable; those, who feign such Stories, relate, &c. He often repeats, that what he relates ought not to be depended on, any further than it appears probable; that the Character of an Historian obliges him to relate what he had heard, but that the Readers are not bound to believe whatever he has been told. As to the Lydian History, which some look upon as fabulous, it cannot be denied, but that he was acquainted with the Transactions of that Nation, which bordered on the Asiatic Greek Cities, in one of which Herodotus was born, not above 60 Years after the Destruction of the Lydian Empire. He seems very sincere in his Egyptian History; for he ingenuously owns, that all he relates before the Reign of Psammetichus, is uncertain, and that he reports the early Transactions of that Nation on the Credit of the Egyptian Priests, on which he did not much depend. His History of the Assyrians and Medes does not at all agree with that which the modern Chronologists have followed; but most of the Antients have preferred Herodotus to all others. In his History of Persia, he differs in many Particulars from Xenophon's Cyropædia; but we must observe with Tully, that the Cyropædia is rather an instructive Piece, than an History. The Chronology of Herodotus is far from being exact, especially with relation to the Egyptian Affairs, extravagant Numbers of Years having been imposed upon him, as well as upon Diodorus and Plato, by the Egyptian Priests, who piqued themselves mightily on the Antiquity of their Nation. Herodotus wrote other Books besides the History now extant; for Aristotle <sup>m</sup> finds fault with him for saying that an Eagle drank during the Siege of Nineveh, whereas no Bird with hooked Talons, as that Philosopher affirms, ever drinks. This Passage is not to be found in his Works now extant, which has made some Authors imagine, that Aristotle quoted it from the History of Assyria, which, in two Places of his first Book, he promised to write. But if he had ever published it, we can scarcely believe that none of the Antients would have so much as mentioned it. It is more likely, that his present History was more compleat in Aristotle's Time, than it is now; or even that Aristotle thro' Mistake quoted Herodotus instead of some other Author, whereof we have Instances in other antient Writers. Some ascribe to Herodotus the Life of Homer, which in most Editions is annexed to his History; but the Diversity of Stile, and the Disagreement between Herodotus and the Author of that Piece, plainly evince these two Works to have been penned by different Hands. We refer the Reader for further Particulars concerning Herodotus to Henry Stephens, Joachimus Camerarius, and Montfaucon in his Book on Judith.

<sup>m</sup> Lib. 8. de Anima, c. 18.

Diodorus Siculus was born at Argyrium or Agyrium, a Town of Sicily, and thence called Siculus, or the Sicilian. He flourished under Julius Cæsar and Augustus, and began his History after the Death of the former, as he himself informs us. He travelled with no small Danger over great Part of Europe, Asia, and all Egypt, to acquaint himself with the Geography of the Places, as well as the Customs and Manners of the Inhabitants. He wrote a General History from the earliest Times to the 180th Olympiad, that is, to Cæsar's War with the Gauls. This History he intituled the Bibliothèque or Library, having copied his Accounts from the Writers of different Nations, who flourished before. In his History of the Egyptians, Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Greeks, Carthaginians, Sicilians and Rhodians, he follows Herodotus, Ctesias, Berosus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Philistus, Calisthenes, Theopompus Cbicus, &c. in what relates to the Macedonians, he depends on Cardianus and Marsias; in his History of Crete he quotes Epimenides, Dosiadas, Sofocrates, and Laosthenides: Of the forty Books of his History, fifteen only are now remaining, viz. the five first, the eleventh, and the following to the twentieth. The four first Books comprehend the Theology and Histories preceding the Trojan War, of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Chaldeans, Indians, Scythians, Arabians, Ethiopians, Africans and Greeks. This Part is interwoven with many Fables, which however were believed by those Nations, whose Histories he writes. In the 5th Book he gives an Account of the Origin and Antiquities of the greater Islands. The five following Books contained the Antiquities of all the Eastern Nations, the Origins of the Greeks and Romans, and the most remarkable Transactions that happened in any Part of the World from the taking of Troy to the Expedition of Xerxes into Greece. The 11th Book begins with the Expedition of Xerxes into Greece, and ends in the Year which preceded the Expedition of the Athenians into Cyprus under the Conduct of Cimon. The five following Books continue the History of all Nations to the Time of Philip King of Macedon, whose Exploits are related in the 16th, as those of his Son Alexander in the 17th, and of his Successors to the Death of Antigonus in the three next. In the other twenty Books our Author pursued the History of all Nations, from the Death of Antigonus, which happened in the 119th Olympiad, to Cæsar's War with the Gauls, that is, to the 180th Olympiad. The 11th Book and the following were written in the Nature of Annals, with the Names of the Athenian Archons and Roman Consuls to each Year. But Diodorus is not so exact in his Computations, with regard to the Roman Affairs, as could be wished; for he places the Beginning of Xerxes's War in the first Year of the 75th Olympiad, which, according to him, concurred with the Consulship of Spurius Cassius and Proclus Virginus Tricostus; but these had been Consuls six Years before, and those of that Year were Cæso Fabius the second Time, and Spurius Furius Fusus, a Mistake which is continued through the whole Sequel of his Annals. In the Affairs of Egypt he was likewise greatly imposed upon, as to the Numbers of Years, by the Egyptian Priests.

IN the History of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, &c. we chiefly follow the Scripture and Josephus, from whom however we dissent, when he takes the Liberty, as he frequently does, to dissent from holy Writ. Josephus wrote his History of the Jewish War and Destruction of Jerusalem first in Hebrew, or, as some say °, in Syro-Chaldaic, for the Use of his own Nation, and afterwards translated it into Greek about the seventh Year of the Reign of the Emperor Vespasian, to whom he dedicated it. This Work was, by the Emperor's Order, placed in the publick Library at Rome, and the Author, as Eusebius and St. Jerom inform us †, distinguished with a Statue, an Honour conferred upon very few. Besides his History he wrote twenty Books of the Jewish Antiquities, which he dedicated to Epaphroditus his great Patron. In these Books he gives us the History of the Jews from their first Origin to the 12th Year of Nero, when they began to shake off the Roman Yoke. This Work, as Josephus himself informs us, was compleated in the 13th Year of Domitian, that is, in the 93d of Christ. In his Chronology he often disagrees both with the Septuagint, and the Writers of other Nations; nay, he is frequently inconsistent with himself, which we may impute to the Carelessness and Ignorance of his Transcribers, seeing there appears such a Disagreement between the antient Manuscripts of the ten last Books of his Antiquities, and the printed Copies, that some have imagined, <sup>q</sup> him to have left two different ones. The Veracity of this Writer, especially in the Books of his Antiquities, has been often called in question; and truly, his Accounts sometimes not only vary from holy Writ, but are diametrically opposite to what we read in the History of Moses and the Prophets, and this after having solemnly protested that his Design was to add nothing of his own, but faithfully to transcribe, without the least Alteration, what he found in the sacred Records of his Nation. He wrote also two Books against Apion, who, in the third and fourth Book of his Egyptian History, had defamed and traduced the Jews. In this Work he shews himself conversant not only in the History of his own, but of all other Nations, and to have perused, as St. Jerom expresses it <sup>r</sup>, all the Libraries of the Greeks. This Book likewise Josephus dedicated to Epaphroditus, whence it is manifest, that it was published before the 95th Year of Christ, for in that Year Epaphroditus was, by Order of Domitian, put to Death. Besides his History and Antiquities, he wrote the History of his own Life; and, according to some, a Discourse on the Empire of Reason, in Commendation of the seven Maccabees; a Book also against the Greeks, namely against Plato, is ascribed to him; but it is uncertain whether he was the Author of the two latter, some affirming, some denying him to have wrote them.

° Sam. Basnagius, Exercit. in Baronium.
Hieron, c. 13. catalog.

† Euseb. l. 3. Hist. Ecclesiast. &

IN our History of the antient Syrians, we have had always before our Eyes the Books of the Kings, the Chronicles, and the Prophets, and have left Josephus and the prophane Historians, where they seem to contradict holy Writ, but at the same time acquainting the Reader in our Notes with their various opinions, and the Reasons that are alledged to support them. The History of the Phœnicians we have taken chiefly from Diodorus Siculus, Justin, Curtius, Pausanias, Appian, Orosius, Plutarch, and from Dius, Menander, and Philostates, as quoted by Josephus. Dius and Menander wrote the History of Phœnice, and are both commended by Josephus as very exact in their Accounts, having compiled their Histories from the antient Records that were lodged in the Temples. Dius was by Birth a Phœnician, and Menander an Ephesian; the Accounts of both perfectly agreed, as Josephus often repeats, with Scripture. Besides the History of Phœnice, Menander wrote the Life of Ithobal King of Tyre, where he mentioned the Drought that happened in Abab's Reign. Philostrates likewise wrote the History of Phœnice, and, as Josephus informs us, gave an exact Account of the Siege of Tyre.

<sup>q</sup> Emericus Bigot. epistolæ Reinesii ad Bosium, p. 381.
Mag. Orator.

<sup>r</sup> Epist. 84. ad

THE Account we give of the Phœnician Kings from the ancient fabulous History of the Greeks, is chiefly extracted from Apollodorus. This Writer was by Birth an Athenian, by Profession a Grammarian, Disciple of Aristarchus the Grammarian, and Panætius a Rhodian Philosopher, who lived in the Reign of Ptolemy Euergetes. He wrote his History, which he intituled the Bibliothéque of the Gods, in the Reign of Attalus Philadelphus, King of Pergamus, who died in the third Year of the 160th Olympiad, that is, 138 Years before Christ. Of this Work there are now but three Books remaining, tho' there is no doubt but it contained several others; for Macrobius quotes the 14th, Hermolaus the 16th; and Photius tells us, that Sopater the Sophist, handling the same Subject, copied several Passages out of this Work from the first to the 24th Book. This Piece, in Scaliger's Opinion, is a very judicious Performance, and tho' mostly fabulous, yet such as may give us some Insight into ancient History, the Fables being founded on historical Truth, and the Persons such as have existed, tho' their Actions be exaggerated or disguised. The same Author adds, that we may extract from Apollodorus a more certain and better grounded Chronology, than from the Rhapsodies of Beroaldus; and Vossius is of Opinion, that by separating the fabulous Stories from real Events, we may form from his Writings a true History. He begins with Inachus, who is believed to have founded the Kingdom of the Argivi, in Abraham's Time, and brings his History down to the Time of Theseus Prince of Athens. The Books that are lost reached to the 1040th Year after the Trojan War, or to the 258th Olympiad.

IN the History of the Jews we have followed the Scripture and Josephus, where he agrees with the sacred History, not neglecting to acquaint the Reader in our Notes with the Traditions of the Rabbies.

THE History of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Babylonians we have likewise delivered agreeable to what we have found in Scripture relating thereto. We have rejected as an arrand Fable the Assyrian History of Ctesias; but as it has been, we may say, from all Antiquity admitted into the Body of History, we shall here give some Account of that Writer. Ctesias was a Native of Cnidos, and accompanied Cyrus in his Expedition against his Brother Artaxerxes, on which Occasion he was taken Prisoner; but having cured Artaxerxes of a Wound he received in the Battle, he became a great Favourite at the Court of Persia, where he continued practising Physic for the Space of 17 Years. Thus far Diodorus Siculus. Photius likewise informs us, that he flourished in the Time of Cyrus, the Son of Darius, and Brother of Artaxerxes, who possessed himself of the Kingdom of Persia. Strabo speaking of the great Men of Cnidos, mentions Ctesias, who, says he, cured Artaxerxes; and Xenophon, who was his Contemporary, tells us, that Ctesias of Cnidos was a Physician, and being taken Prisoner, dressed the Wound, which Artaxerxes received in the Engagement. He was employed, as he himself witnesses, by Artaxerxes in Negotiations with the King of Salamis, with Conon, and the Lacedemonian Embassadors; which shews what Credit he was in at the Court of that Prince. Ctesias wrote the History of Persia in 23 Books, whereof the first Six contain the History of the Assyrians and Medes, the other Seventeen the whole History of Persia from Cyrus to the Author's Death. He also wrote the History of the Indies. But these Works are lost, and all we have remaining of them is an Abridgment compiled by Photius, which is also imperfect, he having omitted the History of the Assyrians and Medes. However, we have that History too abridged in Diodorus, and the Names of the Kings, which Diodorus left out, carefully set down by Eusebius and Syncellus. Ctesias has always been looked upon by the most judicious among the Antients, as a fabulous Writer. Aristotle, who was almost his Contemporary, declares him a Writer unworthy of Credit. Antigonus Caristius, who lived in the Time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, says, that he frequently lyes, and relates what is altogether incredible. Plutarch, in his Life of Artaxerxes, calls him a vain Man, and a notorious Lyar. Lucian charges him with relating in his Indica what he had never seen or heard; and truly, whoever peruses that Work, must immediately conclude him to have been a Man of no Sort of Sincerity. His History of Assyria is most evidently calculated to astonish, amaze, and to strain Credulity beyond all possible Bounds. His List of the Assyrian Kings seems to be a gross Forgery, it being a Medley of Greek, Persian, Egyptian and other Names. Again, in all long Lists of Kings the same Names, or some bearing a near Resemblance to them, are observed often to recur. But the Names in Ctesias are not alone what may prompt us to pronounce him guilty of Forgery; the Length of the Reigns may be urged as another Argument against him; except cept it be answered, that in those very early Days, so nearly bordering on the Times of the Deluge, such Length is not to be wondered at. But this would be no Answer at all; for at least three fourths of them must have lived, when the Life of Man was reduced to its present Standard. But yet, several of the antient Historians, and, what is more surprizing, of the modern Christian Writers, have blindly followed him, in opposition to Scripture, Herodotus, and other more undoubted Authorities. Diodorus Siculus transcribed him; Cephaleon, Castor, Trogus and Velleius Paterculus have copied several Accounts from him. Julius Africanus, Eusebius and Syncellus have adopted, in part, his Chronology of the Assyrian Kings, wherein they have been followed by most of the modern Chronologers.
and

WE shall now give a succinct Account of several Authors quoted by us in this Volume, with whom perhaps every Reader may not be acquainted. These are,

Zoroaster, a Bactrian, whom some suppose to have been contemporary with Nimrod and King of the Bactrians. Cluverius takes him for Adam; Procopius, Gazeus and Epiphanius, for Abraham; Huetius, for Moses; Gregory of Tours, for Shem, &c. We are in no less Uncertainty as to the Time wherein he flourished; Epiphanius making him contemporary with Nimrod, Eusebius with Semiramis, and Apuleius with Cyrus and Cambyses. Plato calls him the most antient of all the Persian Sages: Eudoxus, Pliny and Hermippus tell us, that he lived five thousand Years before the Trojan War: Xanthus of Lydia, according to the Testimony of Laertius, reckons but 600 Years from Zoroaster to Xerxes. As to his Works, Hermippus says that he wrote two Millions of Verses. Suidas gives us the Titles of some of his Works, viz. Four Books of Nature; one of precious Stones, and five of Astronomical Predictions. Eusebius quotes a Passage from his sacred History of Persia, containing an excellent Description of the Divine Attributes. Theodorus of Mopsuestia, treating of the Magic of the Persians, produces Zoroaster's Hypothesis, admitting two Principles. Proclus collected the pretended Oracles of Zoroaster in 280 Hexameter Verses. He is said to have been the Inventor of Magic among the Eastern Nations; but by Magic nothing was meant in those Days besides Phyfic and Theology, as Naudæus proves with very convincing Arguments.

Mochus or Moschus, a Sidonian, lived before the Trojan War, as Strabo informs us, and wrote the History of Phœnice. He is quoted by Josephus in the first Book of his Antiquities, by Athe- næus and Tatian, who names two other Phœnician Writers, viz. Theodotus and Hisicrates. His History was translated into Greek by Chætus or Lætus; but we have now only a few Fragments of it remaining in the above-mentioned Writers.

ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR, a celebrated Writer in the Reign of Ptolemy Lathyrus, and by Sylla carried Captive to Rome, wrote a great many Histories, as his Name Witnesses, and among others that of India and Egypt. Clement of Alexandria quotes a Book of his, concerning the Jews, wherein were inserted Solomon's Letters to the Egyptian and Phœnician Kings, with their respective Answers. Eusebius also recites a Fragment of the same Author, relating to the Jews.*

ORPHEUS, surnamed the Librethian, was a Thracian, and is famous among the Antients, not only for Poetry and Music, but also for Theology. He is said to have been the first that taught the Greeks the Egyptian Mysteries. Clement of Alexandria says, that Homer borrowed several Passages from his Poems. The Antients mention many Pieces that went under his Name, some of which are still extant, viz. an Epic Poem, intitled, The Argonautics; 86 Hymns; a Poem on precious Stones and their Virtues, and several Fragments of other Works, ascribed to him by Proclus, Tzetzes, and other Writers. Plato mentions the Hymns of this Author in his eighth Book of Laws: Stobæus and Suidas ascribe the Hymns to Onomacritus, and others, with Clement of Alexandria, to Pythagoras. We also find several Verses cited by Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius and Theodoret, out of the Testament of Orpheus; but the bare reading of them will convince us that they are the Performance of a more modern Writer.

NEITHER have Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine, Africanus and Syncellus, been excluded from our History. In their Time the Libraries of Greece were furnished with excellent Manuscripts, which have been since lost. From them they made their Collections; and we may judge of their Sincerity by the Authors which remain, and which they have faithfully quoted; so that where other Writers were at a loss, they have often put us in the way in our Pursuit of Truth.

IN the Descriptions of Countries we have chiefly followed, among the Antients, Strabo, Ptolemy, and Dionysius Periegetes. Strabo flourished under Augustus and Tiberius, and visited most of the Places which he describes, whence his Descriptions are very exact, if we except those of Germany, wherein he depended on the Relations of others. He published several Works; but his XVII Books of Geography, are the only that have reached us. In these he not only describes the Situation of the Places, but often the Manners, Customs, Laws and Religions of the Inhabitants.

* Euseb. Præpar. Evang. l. 9.

PTOLEMY was of Pelufum in Egypt, and flourished in the Reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus. In his Geography he followed Marinus Tyrius who was almost his Contemporary. He is often mistaken as to the Degrees of Longitude and Latitude, and sometimes speaks of Cities which had been destroyed many Years, not to say Ages before his Time, as still extant. Most of his Mistakes have been carefully corrected by Ortelius and Ghe-rardus, Mercator, Cluverius, Velferius, and others. His Canon is so exactly agreeable to Scripture History, that if this latter could possibly stand in need of Confirmation, so far as it relates to the History of the great Empires of the Assyrians and Babylonians, nothing could be so effectual towards it as this Canon, which has given Birth to one of the most famous prophane Æra's, that of Nabonassar, the first King in it, and without which there would be the greatest Obscurity in the Affairs of these People. Nothing is more surprizing than that this most noble Monument should have been so little examined by the Light naturally reflected on it from the sacred Pen-men, as not to have extricated the whole Body of Chronologers and Historians from out of the Labyrinth they have almost all bewildered themselves in, misled by the Extravagances of Ctesias, a fabulous Writer, who has been blindly followed by the Antients, and most of the Moderns. This Canon takes Date from about the 23d Year of Pul's first Appearance on this Side the Euphrates, about the Year 2252 after the Flood, according to our Computation, and 747 Years before Christ; which shews the Kingdom of Babylon to have been immediately of Assyrian Origin, according to the Prophet<sup>f</sup>: Behold the Land of the CHALDE-ANS; this People was not till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the Wilderness; they set up the Towers thereof, they raised up the Palaces thereof.

DIONYSIUS PERIEGETES, born at Charax, a Town situated on the Gulph of Arabia, flourished in the Reign of Augustus, by whom he was sent, as Pliny informs us<sup>g</sup>, to survey the Eastern Countries, namely Armenia, Parthia and Arabia. His Geographical Description of the World was originally wrote in Greek Verse, and translated into Latin Verse by Rufus Festus, Avienus and Priscian. Eustathius Archbishop of Thessalonica wrote in Greek a learned Commentary on this Work.

<sup>f</sup> Isai. 23. 13.

<sup>g</sup> Lib. 5. c. 27.

THUS we have taken the Materials to compose this Volume from the purest Sources of Antiquity. However we must own, that as to the History of antient Times, and the Original of particular Nations, we have not been able to give such satisfactory Accounts as we could wish, not one of the Histories of those antient Nations, whom the Grecians called Barbarians, written by the Natives, or extracted immediately from their Records, having reached us. What Fragments of them have been preserved here and there in other Writers, we have connected together, filling up the Chasms of one Writer with the Testimony of another, and melting down together the most precious Metals of Antiquity, in order to form a new one, less precious indeed, but perhaps more serviceable.

BUT as the Authors that we have had occasion to follow, or even to transcribe in this Volume, are such as have transmitted to us Accounts of the earliest Times, we must here, in a few Words, remove the Prejudices which some Criticks have raised against the profane Writers in general, who have treated of the original and early Antiquities of Nations. In most Nations, say they, Poets were the first Historians, who of course interspersed their Accounts with a thousand Fables. From such infected Sources the Historians in After-ages, for want of better Materials, copied, and consequently deserve no more Credit than those they transcribed.

TO answer this Objection, we must with Varro divide the whole Series of Time into three Periods; the first, from the Beginning of the World to the Deluge; the second, from the Deluge to the first Olympiad; and the third, from the first Olympiad to the present. The first Period he calls an Age intirely unknown; and truly we find nothing in profane Historians, relating to that Time, which has any Appearance of Truth, if we except two or three, quoted by Josephus, whose Accounts of the Deluge, and the Times preceding it, agree, as he informs us, in many Particulars, with that of Moses. The second Period Varro stiles the fabulous Time, by reason of the many Fables with which the Accounts of it, that have been transmitted to Posterity, are interwoven: The last he calls the Historical Time. Diodorus Siculus extends the fabulous Age no farther than the Trojan War; and indeed from that Time the impenetrable Mist, which had overcast the preceding Ages, begins to clear up, and some

some Rays of Truth to break out. Now to answer the Objection, we do not pretend to give any tolerable Account of the first Ages, from profane Authors. In After-ages, when the Use of Letters was introduced, Poets, it is true, are said to have been the first Historians; but we must not suppose whatever they wrote to be a mere Fable; their Ground-work was often Truth, though embellished with various Fictions. Thus for instance, Homer's Poems ought not to be regarded only as an excellent poetical Performance, but as the most ancient History of Greece; insomuch that if we had no other Remains of Antiquity than Homer's Works to convince us of the Trojan War and the taking of that City, we could not call in question the Truth of that Event. Homer, tho' a Poet, discovers to us the State of Greece at that time; he gives us an Account of their Kings and Generals; describes their States, Cities and Government; shews us that Greece was divided into several small Dynasties, each of which had their respective Sovereigns, of which Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, Sycyon and Corinth was the most powerful, &c. These and a great many other Events are purely historical, and confirmed by creditable Historians; so that Homer's Work is both a Poem and a History. And what we have instanced in one Poet, may in the same manner be applied to others: For tho' their Works were interspersed with many fabulous Strokes, yet they might have furnished a judicious Historian, that could distinguish between Truth and Fiction, with good materials for a History: Besides, it is not to be doubted but that ever since the Use of Characters was first introduced, Men have left behind them Monuments of such Things as might concern their Posterity; Fathers, what regarded their domestic Affairs; Princes and Magistrates, what related to the Public. These were the first Histories of Mankind, and the most ancient Historians have done nothing else but digest them into a better Form. Thus Manetho compiled his History from the Memoirs of Jerombalus an Egyptian Priest; Berosus, from the Registers of the Babylonians; Sanchoniatho, from those of the Phœnicians, &c. And indeed there is Reason to suppose that most Cities and States had Registers, in which from Year to Year they wrote down the most remarkable Occurrences and Archives, wherein they lodged Letters, Treaties, and other Pieces, which might serve as Evidences to Posterity. They also transmitted the Memory of Things by the Institution of Festivals, the building of Cities, erecting of Stones, Pillars, Altars, Tombs and the like Monuments. The Custom of engraving on Stone is, without doubt, very antient, and the Number of these most faithful Monuments of Antiquity was almost infinite, as is plain from all the ancient Historians, who often appeal to them. From these, as well as from the Poets, it is reasonable to suppose that the first Historians extracted their Histories, and therefore they deserve the same Credit; nay, the Poets themselves often worked upon Materials already prepared, and only put into Verse what they found registred in the Annals of their Country. But who can warrant that the Priests, who in most Nations were the first Annalists, did not through Superstition insert many Fictions? Priests, zealous for the Worship of their Gods, and whose Interest it was by false Prodigies to deceive People, may have scatter'd such up and down in their Accounts, and made their Gods interpose in the principal Actions. And in this Point the best Historians have suffered themselves to be imposed on. But as to the Substance of the Narrations in Matters of War, Politicks, new Settlements, Treaties, Deaths of Princes, &c. what Motive could the Priests have to be guilty of Forgeries? The relating of Prodigies is an Abuse, which Superstition has brought into all the Histories of the World. Has not Credulity inserted even into the modern Histories a thousand Prodigies? and are these Histories less true with respect to the great Events?

'Tis true that most of the Monuments of Antiquity are now lost; but they were in great part extant, when those Historians wrote whose Works have reached us. Besides tho' many of the public Monuments have been destroyed by Wars, Time, misguided Zeal, and other Casualties; yet they are not all lost. What few facts we have still remaining in the most ancient Writers, furnish a Stock of Materials, which, with the help of Criticism, whose Province it is to distinguish between Truth and Fiction, may be made use of, without Danger of our being imposed upon. The Fragments of those venerable Historians, preserved here and there in other Writers, are like so many Rays, which in the midst of the Darkness thrown over the early Times, serve to discover a Way through the Ruins.

NEITHER is the Disagreement of Authors among themselves any certain Proof that they deserve no Credit. Oftentimes, with respect to Things that have happened in our Days, and almost in our Sight, we find a Difference in the Accounts given by those who were Eye-witnesses to what they relate. The Particulars of a Battle are not always told the same way by those who distinguished themselves in it. The nearest Objects appear differently according to the different Views of the Spectators. Imagination, Prejudice and Partiality often set a Bias on Mens Understandings, and and hence arise all those Variations we find in the Writings, which have served as Memoirs to the first Historians of particular Nations. This Disagreement among Authors has very much encreased the Labour of collecting them into one Body : We have often been in Suspense about the Choice and Preference, and always taking care to relate, at least in the Notes, the Variations we found among different Authors, it not being reasonable to confine the Reader to our own Sentiments.

AN exact Distribution of Time is, as it were, the Light of History: Without this it would be only a Chaos of Facts, heap'd together. An exact Chronology is like Ariadne's Clue, which conducts our Steps through all the Windings of the Labyrinth. By the means of certain fixed Epochas we perceive the Progress of States, the Variations of their Fortunes, and the changes made in their Government. For this Reason we have thought it necessary to settle the Chronology, and refer the Facts we have collected, to their proper Dates. Our general Æra's are, the Creation, the Flood, and the Years before or after Christ. The Mind being thus conducted, the Ideas we retain from reading, are more distinct, and more easily fixed in the Memory.

GEOGRAPHY is another essential part of History. Every Historian that neglects it, must of necessity be confused in his Relations. We have therefore endeavoured to be exact in the Situation of the Towns, Rivers, Forests, Lakes, and Mountains, whither the Course of Events has led us. Our Guides in this were not only the Historians, who are not always very exact, but also the most eminent Geographers of Antiquity, whom we have mentioned above; and in doubtful Cases we have had Recourse to the Moderns, particularly to Cluverius, Ortelius, Cellarius, and such of the modern Travellers as have surveyed the Places, and are generally look'd upon as exact and faithful in their Accounts. From all these together we have got Maps drawn by a skilful Hand, where we thought them necessary. Thus the Reader will be able with one Cast of an Eye to run over the several Countries which he reads of. There are many Nations, which have not the same Limits at this Day that they had formerly; neither are all Towns, which have ancient Names, unquestionably situated in the very Places, where the Towns of the same Name stood heretofore. We have therefore chose rather to describe most of the Places mentioned in our History, by their ancient Names; but at the same time we have constantly taken care to reconcile the ancient Geography with the modern modern in our Notes, and to mark the different Limits of the new Nations and the old.

IT is not usual to publish Histories with Notes, or at least to crowd them with so great a Number: But tho' no other History perhaps has need of them, yet they are necessary to this which we have undertaken. The Manners, Customs, Religions, Arms, Dress, Government, &c. of the various Nations we describe, are not only so different among themselves, but from any thing we now see or are acquainted with, that it would have been hardly possible to give just Ideas of them without Explications, which could not have well been brought into the Text. The Thread of the most beautiful Story would have been often broke, and no Point of History would have been brought to its Conclusion but in a languid manner. It was necessary therefore to throw into Notes the great Number of instructive Observations, without which the History would have been imperfect. Besides, abundance of Disputes have been raised by learned Men upon several Events, which we are obliged to inform the Public of, in order to make our Work more complete. But this could not have been, if we had not taken notice of the Variations of the several Authors who have transmitted to us the same Facts. Historians often disagree as to the Circumstances, and on the other hand, the Thread of the History will not admit but of one way of relating the Event. We have therefore placed in the Body of the History what seemed to us most probable, and the Rest in the Notes, lest those Readers who peruse but one Author, should charge us with Falshood, if we differed from his Historian. The Length of some of our Notes ought not to frighten the Reader: Every judicious Person will perceive that we have taken pains to be as concise as the Subject would allow us, having often brought within the Compass of a few Lines, Dissertations with which learned Men have filled large Volumes.

THE Knowledge of the Coins, Weights and Measures of the Antients, is necessary for the right understanding of their Writings, as well as of the present History, where we could not avoid using now and then their Terms and Phraseology. But as it cannot be expected that we should enter here into a minute Discussion of a Subject which has supplied Matter to whole Volumes, we shall only exhibit some Tables, wherein the Value of the ancient Coins, Weights and Measures is with great Care and Exactness reduced by Dr. Arbuthnot, to the English Standard. Several Writers of great Abilities, namely Bishop Cumberland, Mr. Greaves, and
Dr.

3.

ROMAN MEASURES of LENGTH.

										Engl. Paces. Feet. Inch. Dec.
Digitus transversus . . . . .										0—0—	0,725	$\frac{1}{2}$
$1\frac{1}{7}$	Uncia . . . . .									0—0—	0,967
4	3	Palms minor . . . . .								0—0—	2,901
16	12	4	Pes . . . . .							0—0—	11,604
20	15	5	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Palmipes . . . . .						0—1—	2,505
24	18	6	$1\frac{1}{2}$	$1\frac{1}{7}$	Cubitus . . . . .					0—1—	5,406
40	30	10	$2\frac{1}{2}$	2	$1\frac{1}{7}$	Gradus . . . . .				0—2—	5,01
80	60	20	5	4	$3\frac{1}{2}$	2	Passus . . . . .			0—4—	10,02
10000	7500	2500	625	500	$416\frac{2}{3}$	250	125	Stadium		120—4—	4,5
80000	60000	20000	5000	4000	$3333\frac{1}{3}$	2000	1000	8	Milliare	967—0—	0

4.

SCRIPTURE MEASURES of LENGTH.

										Engl. Feet. Inch. Dec.
Digit . . . . .										0—	0,912
4	Palm . . . . .									0—	3,648
12	3	Span . . . . .								0—	10,944
24	6	2	Cubit . . . . .							1—	9,888
96	24	8	4	Fathom . . . . .						7—	3,552
144	36	12	6	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Ezekiel's Reed . . . . .					10—	11,328
192	48	16	8	2	$1\frac{1}{7}$	Arabian Pole . . . . .				14—	7,104
1920	480	160	80	20	$13\frac{1}{4}$	10	Schoenus measuring line			145—	11,4

5.

The LONGER SCRIPTURE MEASURES.

Note. The East used another Span, equal to  $\frac{1}{7}$  of a Cubit.

										Engl. Miles. Paces. Feet. Dec.
Cubit . . . . .										0—	0—	1,824
400	Stadium . . . . .									0—	145—	4,6
2000	5	Sab. days Journey . . . . .								0—	729—	3,0
4000	10	2	Eastern Mile . . . . .							1—	403—	1,0
12000	30	6	3	Parasang . . . . .						4—	153—	3,0
96000	240	48	24	8	a Day's Journey : . . . . .					33—	172—	4,0

6. ENGLISH

6.

ENGLISH SQUARE MEASURES.

Inches
144	Feet
1296	9	Yards
3600	25	2 $\frac{7}{8}$	Paces
39204	272 $\frac{1}{4}$	30 $\frac{1}{4}$	10,89	Poles
1568160	10890	1210	435,6	40	Rood
6272640	43560	4840	1743,6	160	4	Acres

7.

ENGLISH MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

Wine Measure.

Solid Inches
28 $\frac{7}{8}$	Pint
231	8	Gallon
4158	144	18	Rundlet
7276 $\frac{1}{2}$	252	31 $\frac{1}{2}$	1 $\frac{1}{2}$	Barrel
9702	336	42	2 $\frac{1}{2}$	1 $\frac{1}{2}$	Tierce
14553	504	63	3 $\frac{1}{2}$	2	1 $\frac{1}{2}$	Hoghead
19279	672	84	4 $\frac{3}{4}$	2 $\frac{3}{4}$	2	1 $\frac{1}{2}$	Punchion
29106	1008	126	7	4	3	2	1 $\frac{1}{2}$	Butt
58212	2016	252	14	8	6	4	3	2	Tun

8.

ENGLISH CORN MEASURES.

Are raised from a Winchester Gallon, which contains 272  $\frac{1}{2}$  Solid Inches, and as far as serves our purpose, are,

Solid Inches
34 71	Pints
27 2 1	8	Gallon
544 1	16	2	Peck
2178	64	8	4	Bushel
17424	512	64	32	8 Quarter

9. GRECIAN

9.

GRECIAN SQUARE MEASURE.

PLETHRON, by some said to contain 1444, others, 10000 Square Feet;
ARURA, the Half of the PLETHRON.

The ÆGYPTIAN ARURA was the Square of 100 Cubits.

ROMAN SQUARE MEASURE.

The ROMANS divided their As, LIBRA, or any INTEGER, after the following Manner; so the JUGERUM was reckoned the INTEGER.

JUGERUM contained

	Uncia:		Sq. Feet.	Scruples.	Engl. Roods.	Sq. Poles.	Sq. Feet.
1	As	—12	As	—28800	—288	2	—18	—250,05
$\frac{1}{2}$	Deunx	—11	Deunx	—26400	—264	2	—10	—183,85
$\frac{3}{8}$	Dextans	—10	Dextans	—24000	—240	2	—2	—117,64
$\frac{3}{4}$	Dodrans	—9	Dodrans	—21600	—216	1	—34	—51,42
$\frac{5}{8}$	Bes	—8	Bes	—19200	—192	1	—25	—257,46
$\frac{7}{8}$	Septunx	—7	Septunx	—16800	—168	1	—17	—191,25
$\frac{1}{2}$	Semis	—6	Semis	—14400	—144	1	—9	—125,03
$\frac{3}{4}$	Quincunx	—5	Quincunx	—12000	—120	1	—1	—58,82
$\frac{1}{2}$	Triens	—4	Triens	—9600	—96	0	—32	—264,85
$\frac{1}{4}$	Quadrans	—3	Quadrans	—7200	—72	0	—24	—198,64
$\frac{1}{8}$	Sextans	—2	Sextans	—4800	—48	0	—16	—132,43
$\frac{1}{12}$	Uncia	—1	Uncia	—2400	—24	0	—8	—66,21

NOTE. Actus Major was 14400 Square Feet, equal to a Semis-Clima 3600 Square Feet, equal to a Sescuncia.

Actus Minimus was equal to a Sextans.

10.

ATTICK MEASURES of CAPACITY for Things LIQUID.

ENGLISH Wine Measure.

									Gall.	Pints.	Sol.	Inch.	Dec.
Kolliarion	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{128}$	—	0,356	$\frac{1}{128}$
2	Cheme	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{64}$	—	0,712	$\frac{1}{64}$
$2\frac{1}{2}$	$1\frac{1}{2}$ Myfron	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{32}$	—	0,089	$\frac{1}{32}$
5	$2\frac{1}{2}$ 2 Konche	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{16}$	—	0,178	$\frac{1}{16}$
10	5 4 2 Kyathos	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{8}$	—	0,356	$\frac{1}{8}$
15	$7\frac{1}{2}$ 6 3 $1\frac{1}{2}$ Oxybaphon	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{4}$	—	0,535	$\frac{1}{4}$
60	30 24 12 6 4 Kotyle	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	$\frac{1}{2}$	—	2,141	$\frac{1}{2}$
120	60 48 24 12 8 2 Xestes	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	1	—	4,283
720	360 288 144 72 48 12 6 Chus	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0—	6	—	25,698
8640	4320 3456 1728 864 576 144 72 12 Metretres	10—	2	—	19,626

11. ATTICK

II.

ATTICK MEASURES of CAPACITY for Things DRY.

English Corn Measure.

Kochliarion						Pecks.	Gall.	Pints.	Sol.	Inch.
10	Kyathos					0—0—0—	0	276	$\frac{2}{3}$
15	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Oxybaphon				0—0—0—	1	763	$\frac{1}{2}$
60	6	4	Kotyle			0—0—0—	1	444	$\frac{1}{2}$
120	12	8	2	Xestes		0—0—0—	16	579
180	18	12	3	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Choinix	0—0—0—	33	158
8640	864	576	144	72	48	0—0—1—	15	705	$\frac{1}{2}$
					Medimnos	4—0—6—	3	501

Note, 1. Besides this Medimnos, which is the Medicus, there was a Medimnos Georgicus, equal to six Roman Modii.

Note, 2. There are some other measures (mentioned by Authors) of uncertain Value, easily reducible to those of the Tables.

12.

ROMAN MEASURES of CAPACITY for Things LIQUID.

English Wine Measure.

Ligula										Gall.	Pints.	Sol.	In.	Dec.
4	Cyathus									0—Q—	1	117	$\frac{1}{2}$
6	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Acetabulum								0—Q—	1	469	$\frac{1}{2}$
12	3	2	Quartarius							0—O—	1	704	$\frac{1}{2}$
24	6	4	2	Hemina						0—O—	1	409
48	12	8	4	2	Sextarius					0—O—	1	818
288	72	48	24	12	6	Congius				0—1—	5	636
1152	288	192	96	48	24	4	Urna			0—7—	4	942
2304	576	384	192	96	48	8	2	Amphora		3—4—	5	33
46080	11520	7680	3840	1920	960	160	40	20	Culeus	7—1—	10	66
Note. 1 Quadrantarius										143—3—	11	95

Note, 1. Quadrantal is the same with the Amphora, Cadus, Congiarius and Doli-um, and denotes no certain Measure.

Note, 2. The Romans divided the Sextarius, as the Libra, into twelve equal Parts, called Cyathi; and therefore they denominated their Calices, Sextantes, Quadrantes, Trientes, according to the Number of Cyathi which they contained.

[ k ]

13. ROMAN

13.

ROMAN MEASURES of CAPACITY, for Things DRY.

						English Corn Measure.
Ligula						Pecks.	Gall.	Pints.	Sol. In. Dec.
4	Cyathus					0—0—0	$\frac{1}{4}$	0,01
6	$1\frac{1}{4}$	Acetabulum				0—0—0	$\frac{1}{2}$	0,06
24	6	4	Hemina			0—0—0	$\frac{1}{2}$	0,24
48	12	8	2	Sextarius		0—0—1		0,48
384	96	64	16	8	Semimod	0—1—0		3,84
768	192	128	32	16	2	Modius	1—0—0	7,68

14.

JEWISH MEASURES of CAPACITY, for Things LIQUID.

						English Wine Measure.
Caph						Gall.	Pints.	Sol. Inch.
$1\frac{1}{4}$	Log					0—0—0	$\frac{1}{4}$	0,177
$5\frac{1}{4}$	4	Cab				0—0—3	$\frac{1}{4}$	0,844
16	12	3	Hin			1—2		2,533
32	24	6	2	Seah		2—4		5,67
96	72	18	6	3	Bath Epha	7—4		15,2
960	720	180	60	30	10	Coron, Chomer	75—5	7,625

15.

JEWISH MEASURES of CAPACITY, for Things DRY.

						English Corn Measure.
Gachal						Pecks.	Gall.	Pints.	Sol. In. Dec.
20	Cab					0—0—0	$\frac{1}{4}$	$\frac{1}{2}$	0,031
36	$1\frac{1}{4}$	Gomor				0—0—2	$\frac{1}{2}$	0,073
120	6	$3\frac{1}{4}$	Seah			1—0—1		4,036
360	18	10	3	Epha		3—0—3		12,107
1800	90	50	15	5	Leteah	16—0—0		26,500
3600	180	100	30	10	2	Chomer, Coron	32—0—1	18,969

16. ENGLISH

16.

ENGLISH TROY WEIGHT.

Grains
24	Penny-weight
480	20	Ounce
5760	240	12	Pound

17.

The Most Antient GRECIAN WEIGHTS, reduced to TROY WEIGHT.

Drachma		Pounds.	Oun.	Penwt.	Grains.
100	Mna	00	00	06	$2\frac{2}{3}$
6000	60 Talanton	01	01	60	$4\frac{2}{3}$
		65	00	12	$5\frac{2}{3}$

18.

The Less Antient GRECIAN and ROMAN WEIGHTS, reduced to English TROY WEIGHT.

Lentes										Pounds.	Oun.	Penwt.	Grains.
4	Siliquæ									0	0	00	$0\frac{1}{12}$
12	3	Obolus								0	0	00	$3\frac{1}{4}$
24	6	2	Scriptulum							0	0	00	$9\frac{1}{8}$
72	18	6	3	Drachma						0	0	00	$18\frac{1}{2}$
96	24	8	4	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Sextula					0	0	02	$6\frac{3}{4}$
144	36	12	6	2	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Sicilicus				0	0	03	$0\frac{9}{7}$
192	48	16	8	$2\frac{1}{2}$	2	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Duella			0	0	04	$13\frac{3}{7}$
576	144	48	24	8	6	4	3	Uncia		0	0	06	$1\frac{5}{7}$
6912	1728	576	288	96	72	48	36	12	Libra	0	0	18	$5\frac{1}{7}$
										0	10	18	$13\frac{1}{7}$

The Roman Ounce is the English Avoirdupois Ounce, which they divided into seven Denarii, as well as eight Drachms; and since they reckon'd their Denarius equal to the Attick Drachm, this will make the Attick Weights  $\frac{1}{7}$  heavier than the correspondent Roman Weights.

Note. The Grecians divided their Obolus into Chalci and Lepta. Some, as Diodorus and Suidas, divided the Obolus into six Chalci, and every Chalcus into seven Lepta: Others divided the Obolus into eight Chalci, and every Chalcus into eight Lepta or Minuta.

19. The

19.

The GREATER WEIGHTS, reduced to English TROY WEIGHT.

				Pounds.	Ounces.	Penwt.	Grains.
Libra	.	.	.	0	10	18	13 $\frac{1}{2}$
$1\frac{1}{2}$	Mina Attica communis	.	.	0	11	07	16 $\frac{1}{2}$
$1\frac{1}{2}$	$1\frac{1}{2}$	Mina Attica Medica	.	1	02	11	10 $\frac{1}{2}$
$62\frac{1}{2}$	60	$46\frac{1}{2}$	Talentum Atticum comm.	56	11	00	17 $\frac{1}{2}$

Note. There was another Attick Talent, by some said to consist of 80, by others of 100 Minæ.

Note. Every Mina contains 100 Drachmæ, and every Talent 60 Minæ; but the Talents differ in Weight, according to the different Standard of the Drachmæ and Minæ, of which they are composed. The Value of some different Minæ and Talents in Attick Drachmæ, Minæ, and English Troy Weight, is exhibited in the following Table.

20.

				Pounds.	Oun.	Penwt.	Grains.
MINA
Ægyptiaca	.	.	.	133 $\frac{1}{2}$	01	05	06 : 22 $\frac{1}{2}$
Antiochica	.	.	.	133 $\frac{1}{2}$	01	05	06 : 22 $\frac{1}{2}$
Cleopatrar Ptolemaica	.	.	.	144	01	06	14 : 16 $\frac{1}{2}$
Alexandrina Dioscoridis	.	.	.	160	01	08	16 : 07 $\frac{1}{2}$
				est Drachm. Atticar.
TALENTUM
Ægyptiacum	.	.	.	80	86	03	16 : 08
Antiochicum	.	.	.	80	86	03	16 : 08
Ptolemaicum Cleop.	.	.	.	86 $\frac{1}{2}$	93	11	11 : 00
Alexandriæ	.	.	.	96	104	00	19 : 14
Insulanum	.	.	.	120	130	01	04 : 12
Antiochiæ	.	.	.	360	390	03	13 : 11
				est Minarum Atticar.

21.

JEWISH WEIGHTS, reduced to English TROY WEIGHT.

				Pounds.	Oun.	Penwt.	Grains.
Shekel	.	.	.	00	00	09	02 $\frac{1}{2}$
60	Maneh	.	.	02	03	06	10 $\frac{1}{2}$
3000	50	Talent	.	113	10	01	10 $\frac{1}{2}$

Note. In reckoning Money, 50 Shekels made a Maneh; but in Weight, 160 Shekels.

22.

The Value and Proportion of the GRECIAN COINS.

										l. s. d. q.
Lepton	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$\frac{1}{4}$ $\frac{1}{16}$
7	Chalcos	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$\frac{1}{4}$ $\frac{1}{16}$
14	2	Dichalcos	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$1\frac{1}{4}$ $\frac{1}{8}$
28	4	2	Hemiobolion	.	.	.	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$2\frac{1}{4}$ $\frac{1}{4}$
56	8	4	2	Obolos	.	.	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$1\frac{1}{2}$
112	16	8	4	2	Diobolon	.	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$2\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$
224	32	16	8	4	2	Tetrobolon	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$5\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$
336	48	24	12	6	3	$1\frac{1}{2}$ Drachme	.	.	.	0	0	0	0	$7\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$
662	96	48	24	12	6	3	2	Didrachmon [Stater		0	1	3	2
1324	112	96	48	24	12	6	4	2	Tetradrachmon	0	2	7	0
1660	384	120	60	30	15	$7\frac{1}{2}$	5	$2\frac{1}{2}$	$1\frac{1}{2}$ Pentadrachm.	0	3	2	3

Note 1. Of these the Drachma, Didrachm, &c. were of Silver, the rest, for the most part, of Brass; the other Parts, as Tridrachm, Triobolus, &c. were sometimes Coined.

Note 2. I have supposed, with the Generality of Authors, that the Drachma and Denarius were equal, tho' there is Reason to believe the Drachma was somewhat the weightier.

23.

The GRECIAN GOLD COIN was

		l. s. d.
The Stater Aureus, weighing two Attick Drachms, or half of the Stater Argenteus, and exchanging usually for 25 Attick Drachms of Silver, in our Money	}	00	16	1 $\frac{1}{2}$
According to our Proportion of Gold to Silver		01	00	9
There were likewise the Stater Cyzicenus, exchanging for 28 Attick Drachms, or	}	00	18	1
Stater Philippicus, and Stater Alexandrinus, of the same Value
Stater Darius, according to Josephus, worth 50 Attick Drachms, or		01	12	3 $\frac{1}{4}$
Stater Cræsius, of the same Value

24.

The GRECIAN Manner of reckoning Sums of Money, was by

		l. s. d.
DRACHMÆ.	{	1 . . . . .	0	: 00	: 07 <sup>1</sup> / <sub>4</sub>
		10 . . . . .	0	: 06	: 05 <sup>1</sup> / <sub>2</sub>
		100 equal to a Mina . . . . .	3	: 04	: 07
MINÆ.	{	1 . . . . .	3	: 04	: 07
		10 . . . . .	32	: 05	: 00
		60 equal to a Talentum . . . . .	193	: 15	: 10
TALENTA.	{	1 . . . . .	193	: 15	: 00
		10 . . . . .	1937	: 10	: 00
		100 . . . . .	19375	: 00	: 00

27.

The ROMAN GOLD COIN was the AUREUS, which weighed generally double the DENARIUS.

The Aureus, according to the first Proportion of Coinage, mentioned by Pliny, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. III. was worth	l. s. d.
According to the Proportion that obtains now amongst us, worth	1—04—3 $\frac{1}{2}$
According to the Decuple Proportion, mentioned by Livy and Julius Pollux, worth	1—00—9
According to the Proportion mentioned by Tacitus, and which afterwards obtained, whereby the Aureus exchanged for 25 Denarii, its Value	0—12—11
	0—16—1 $\frac{1}{2}$

28.

Some Alterations of the Value of the ROMAN COIN, mentioned by Pliny.

In the Reign of Servius
A. Urb. 490	} the As weighed of Brals			1	Pound
A. Urb. 537				2	Ounces
A. Urb. 586				1	Ounce
A. Urb. 485				$\frac{1}{2}$	Ounce
A. Urb. 537	} Denarius exchang'd for			10	Asses
A. Urb. 547				16	Asses
Scruple of Gold worth				20	Sestertii
Coin'd afterwards of the Pound of Gold				20	Denarii
In Nero's Time of the Pound of Gold				45	Denarii
					} Aurei

29.

The ROMAN Manner of reckoning Sums of Money, reduc'd to the ENGLISH STANDARD.

SESTERTII NUMMI.					l. s. d. q.
Sestertius	.	.	.	.	0—00—01—3 $\frac{1}{4}$
Decem	.	.	.	.	0—01—07—1 $\frac{1}{2}$
Centum	.	.	.	.	0—16—01—3
Mille equal to a Sestertium	.	.	.	.	8—01—05—2
SESTERTIA.
Sestertium	.	.	.	.	8—01—05 $\frac{1}{2}$
Decem	.	.	.	.	80—14—07
Centum.	} This Sum the Romans express'd thus, Debet mihi centum, debet mihi centum Sestertia; vel debet centum millia Sestertium				807—05—10
Sestertium
Mille					8072—18—04
DECIES SESTERTIUM, &c. The Adverb Centies being understood.
Decies Sestertium, vel Decies centena millia nummum	.	.	.	.	8072—18—04
Centies, vel Centies H. S.	.	.	.	.	80729—03—04
Millies H. S.	.	.	.	.	807291—13—04
Millies Centies H. S.	.	.	.	.	888020—16—08

30.

The ROMAN Manner of reckoning INTEREST of MONEY.

Asses usuræ vel Centesimæ usuræ	1	} per Cent. a Month.	12	} p. Cent. a Year.
Semisses usuræ	$\frac{1}{2}$		6
Trientes usuræ	$\frac{1}{3}$		4
Quadrantes usuræ	$\frac{1}{4}$		3
Sextantes usuræ	$\frac{1}{6}$		2
Unciæ usuræ	$\frac{1}{12}$		1
Quincunces usuræ	$\frac{1}{5}$		5
Septunces usuræ	$\frac{1}{7}$		7
Besses usuræ	$\frac{1}{8}$		8
Dodrantes usuræ	$\frac{1}{3}$		9
Dextantes usuræ	$\frac{1}{6}$		10
Deunces usuræ	$\frac{1}{11}$		11

31.

JEWISH MONEY reduced to the English Standard.

Gerah				l. s. d. q.
				0—00—1, $\frac{1}{16}$
10	Bekah			0—01—1, $\frac{1}{8}$
20	2	Shekel		0—02—3, $\frac{1}{4}$
1200	120	50	Maneh, Mina Hebraica	5—14—0, $\frac{1}{2}$
60000	6000	3000	60 Talent	342—03—9
Solidus Aureus or Sextula, worth				0—12—0, $\frac{1}{2}$
Siclus Aureus, worth				1—16—6
A Talent of Gold, worth				5475—00—0

Note. In all the Tables of Money, I reckon Silver at 5 Shillings, and Gold at 4 Pounds the Ounce.

Now to say something of the Different Computations of Time; Berosus wrote his Chronology by the Computation of Sari, Neri, and Sofi; which being antient Measures of Time, and well known when the original Records were written, could not then have wanted Explanation. But Berosus, or some later Writer, has either out of Ignorance or Design magnified these Measures beyond all Imagination, and tells us, that Sarus contained the Interval of three thousand six hundred Years; the Nerus, of six hundred, and the Sofus of sixty. But other Authors have have taken those Years for Days only<sup>a</sup>; and indeed with a great deal of Reason; for not to insist on the incredible Length of the Reigns of the Chaldean Princes in the first Hypothesis, which no Writer of common Sense could offer to impose on the World, it plainly appears that they were no more than Days, from the Reign of the sixth King of Chaldea, which is expressed in the first Table of those Kings exhibited p. 90. to be ninety nine Years, but in others by the round Number of ten Sari, or 100 Years. The Word Sarus, throwing away the Termination, is no other than the Chaldee or Syriac Sar, ben. The Sarus therefore contained three thousand six hundred Days, or just ten old Chaldean Years, of three hundred and sixty Days each; and that before the Deluge, not only the Civil, but also the Tropical, Solar and Lunar Year consisted of twelve Months, of thirty Days a piece, or three hundred and sixty Days in the whole, has been fully proved by a modern Writer<sup>w</sup>.

THE Egyptians, who addicted themselves to the Study of Astronomy in the earliest Ages, and were well acquainted with the Motions, Periods, and Stations of the Planets, were the first that adjusted the Length of the Year to the annual Revolution of the Sun, by adding to their twelve Months of 30 Days a-piece five additional Days and six Hours, while the Greeks and Romans used the more rude and inconvenient Form of Lunar Years, intercalating a Month every third Year. However, the five additional Days, as Synellus<sup>x</sup> informs us, were not introduced till a thousand Years after the Deluge, and never were look'd upon as proper Parts either of the Year, or of any of its Months, but as Days belonging to the Nativity of five several Egyptian Deities, who, as it is observed in a famous Tradition related by Plutarch<sup>y</sup>, were to be born neither in any Year, nor in any Month.

THE Jewish Year, as is plain from the Calculations which Moses gives us of the Days of the Flood and elsewhere, consisted of 365 Days, and consequently of 12 Solar Months, the last of which had 35 Days. As Moses had been brought up in Egypt, it is very likely he learned that way of reckoning there; and besides, it must have been the most known and easy Method to the Jews, who had been accustomed to it during their long Abode in Egypt. Scaliger<sup>z</sup>, and others after him, have indeed supposed that they had an intercalary Month, once every 120 Years; but it is plain that the Scripture hints nothing like such an Inter-

<sup>a</sup> Synellus, p. 17.
 ory, Book 11. p. 144.
 ger, de emend. temp. l. 2.

<sup>w</sup> Allin's Disc. on the antient Year, in Mr. Whiston's Theory, p. 123.    <sup>y</sup> Plut. de Isid. & Osirid.    <sup>z</sup> Scaliger.

calation or Year of 13 Months; tho' it is not easy to guess how they disposed of the six additional Hours of the Egyptians, without some such Supposition. However, Moses, by express Command of God, did afterwards compute the Years by Moons.

THE antient Year of Greece, Lydia, and the Grecian Colonies in Asia, as well as the first Roman Year, before the Correction of Numa Pompilius, consisted likewise of 360 Days, as the learned Writer we have quoted above, fully proves<sup>a</sup>.

BESIDES the Computation of Months and Years, the Greeks reckoned their Time by Olympiads, each Olympiad containing the Space of four Years. This Method of Computation had its Rise from the Olympic Games, which were celebrated every 4th Year, and became so considerable, that the Greeks made them their Epoch. They commenced, according to some, the Year of the World 3208, 776 Years before Christ, and 22 before the Founding of Rome; according to others, in the Year of the World 3251.

THE Romans computed by Lustrums, or purifying Sacrifices, which were instituted by Servius Tullus, about the Year 180 of Rome, and were to be renewed every five Years, immediately after the Census; whence the Lustrum contained the Space of five Years. But they must have been for some time disused, as appears from the Fasti Capitolini, where the 50th Lustrum is said to have been made in the 574th Year of Rome.

AS to the Chronology of the Antients, there is no depending upon it. That of the Eastern Nations has been strangely depraved by Contentions arising among them about their Antiquity, each claiming the Preference in that Point. Thus Herodotus tells us<sup>b</sup>, that the Priests of Egypt reckoned from the Reign of Menes to that of Sethon, who put Sennacherib to Flight, 341 Generations, as many Priests of Vulcan, and an equal Number of Kings of Egypt. He adds, that three Generations make an hundred Years; so that, according to this Computation, the whole Time from the Reign of Menes to that of Sethon, was eleven thousand three hundred and forty Years. The Chaldeans also piqued themselves on their Antiquity, and pretended to have observed the Stars 473,000 Years; and Callisthenes, the Disciple of Aristotle, sent Astronomical Observations from Babylon to Greece, said to be of 1903 Years standing. The Chronology of the antient Greek Authors is no less uncertain. Those who wrote of Antiquities, as Pherecydas, Epimenides, Hellanicus, Hippias the Elvan, Ephorus, &c. digested their Works by Genealogies, or the Ages and Successions of the Priestesses of Juno Argiva, of the Ephors, of the Kings of Sparta, and the Archons of Athens, &c. nor did they begin to set down the Generations, Reigns and Successions in Numbers of Years, till some time after the Death of Alexander, which makes their Chronology very uncertain. And such it was reputed by the Greeks themselves, as is manifest from several Passages in Plutarch. The Chronology of the Latins is still more uncertain. Plutarch and Servius represent great Uncertainties in the Original of Rome. The old Records of the Latins were burnt by the Gauls, about 64 Years before the Death of Alexander; and Quintus Fabius Pictor, the most antient Latin Historian, lived 200 Years after that King, and copied the greatest Part of his History from Diocles Peparethus a Greek. Not one of the European Nations had any Chronology at all before the Time of the Persian Empire, and whatever Chronology they now have of antient Times, has been formed since by Reasoning and Conjecture: So that on a strict View and due Examination of the Antiquities of Nations, and the Records which have been left us, those of the Jews, exclusive of their Divine Authority, will evidently appear to be the most certain and authentic, and consequently the surest Foundation to build our Chronology upon.

<sup>a</sup> Mr. Allin, ubi supra,

<sup>b</sup> Herod. l. 2.

HOWEVER, it must be confessed, that there is no certain Uniformity in the Jewish Computation, and that the several Copies of their Records, viz. the Hebrew, Samaritan, Pentateuch, and Septuagint, differ very much from one another. Which Disagreement hath arisen from two Things; 1. Corruption, or Errors of frequent transcribing; and 2. The Want of computing from some fixed Æra, and digesting the History as it was written, into a chronological Method: For besides the great Disagreement among the various Copies, with regard particularly to the Ages of the Patriarchs, there is a seeming Difference at least betwixt the whole Numbers of several Intervals. Thus, for instance, the Interval from the Exodus to the building of Solomon's Temple, is expressly mentioned<sup>d</sup> to be four hundred and eighty Years; whereas the Sum of all the Patriarchs given in the Book of Judges, &c. amount to about five hundred and ninety two Years. Which Particulars not being adjusted by the Years of some certain Æra, we are at a loss for the true Distance of Time, not knowing by what Standard the Measure of the Intervals is to be taken.

THIS Variety of Computations hath left room for Chronologers to enlarge, or contract the Space of Time betwixt the

<sup>c</sup> Plut. in Vit. Lycurg. & Solon;

<sup>d</sup> 1 Kings vi. 1;

Flood and the Birth of Christ, by adhering to one Copy rather than another; or by rejecting, or retaining the whole Numbers, or the Particulars, just as it suited their Humour of making the Sacred History agree with the Prophane; or otherwise of reducing the Prophane to the Sacred. And as the Disagreement among the Heathen Writers is great also, and every Author hath followed the Historian he liked best, hence a wide Difference hath arisen amongst modern Chronologers, as appears by the various Computations several of them have made of the Years of the World to the Birth of Christ, which we here give, as collected by Strauchius<sup>e</sup>, Chevreau<sup>f</sup>, and others.

A TABLE of the Years of the World to the Birth of CHRIST, according to the Computation of several Chronologers.

	Years.	Mon.		Years.	Mon.
Alphonfus King of Castile (in Muller's Tables )	6984		Ado, Archbishop of Vienna	4832
The same (in Strauchius )	6484	9	Josephus corrected	4698
Onuphrius Parvinius	6310		Odiato, or Ebwico	4320
Suidas	6000		Marianus Scotus	4192	9
Lactantius, Philastrius	5801		Laurentius Codomannus	4141	9
Nicephorus	5700		The same (L. Godomeau in Chevreau )	4140
Clemens Alexandrinus	5624		Ribera	4095
The Author of the Fasti Siculi	5608	9	Genebrard	4090
Isaac Vossius, and the Greeks	5598		Arnold de Pontac	4088
The same (in Chevreau )	5590		Michael Mæstlinus	4079	3
Theophilus Antiochenus	5515		J. Baptist Riccius	4062	3
The Constantinopolitans and Grabe's Septuagint	5508	3	R. Moses Maimonides	4058
Cedrenus (in Chevreau)	5506		Jacobus Saliarius (in Strauchius)	4053	9
Julius Africanus, Theophanes, Eutychius, &amp;c.	5500		The same (in Chevreau )	4052
The Ethiopians	5499	9	Henr. Spondanus	4051	9
Cedrenus (in Strauchius)	5493	9	Torniellus	4051
Panodorus	5493		Gul. Langius (in Strauchius)	4041	9
Maximus Monachus	5491	9	The same (in Chevreau )	4040
Sulpitius Severus	5469		Erasmus Rbeinold	4021	3
Victor Gisellius, in his Remarks on Sulpitius	5419		Jacobus Capellus	4005	9
St. Austin (in Genebrard)	5351		John Wickman	4004	9
Isidorus Pelusiota	5336		Thomas Lydiat, and Laurence Eichstadt	4004
Abunazar	5328		Edward Simpson, and Archbishop Usher	4003	9
Rabanus Maurus	5296		M. Ant. Capellus, and Archbishop Usher (in Chevreau)	4000
Isidor. Hispalensis (in Strauchius)	5210		Diomsfus, Petavius, Decker, Kepler, &amp;c. (in Chevreau)	3984
Paulus de Fossembrona	5201		Petavius (in Strauchius)	3983	3
Eusebius	5200	9	Krentzheim	3971	9
Beda (in Strauchius)	5199		Abraham Bucholtzer (in Strauchius)	3970	9
Philippus Bergamensis, Orsius, &amp;c.	5198		The same, J. Cluverius (in Chevreau) Pantaleon, Boxbornius, Jansenius, M. Dresser,	3970
Philo the Jew, Sigebert	5096
Epiphanius	5049
Metrodorus	5000

<sup>e</sup> Breviarum Chronologicum, lib. 4. cap. 1.

<sup>f</sup> Hist. du Monde, l. 1. c. 1.

	Years. Mon.		Years. Mon.
Christ. Matthias, and J. Clu-		Origen, Argoli, John Seybor	3949
verius (in Strauchius)	3968 9	Christianus Scotanus	3948 3
Henry Bunting (in Strauchius)	3967 9	Johannes Micrælius	3948
The same (in Chevreau) and		Scaliger, Calvisius, Helvicus,
Andrew Soelmatter	3967	(in Chevreau) Alsted, &amp;c.	3947
Christ. Longomontanus	3966 3	Hermannus Contractus (in
Peter Opemmer	3966	Strauchius)	3945 9
Christ. Longomontanus, in his		John Carrion	3944
Hypothesis in Astronomiam		St. Jerom in his Hebraic Que-
Danicam, Iostatus, Philip.	3964	stions	3941
Melancthon, Funccius and o-		Gerard Mercator	3928
thers (in Strauchius)		Matthæus Beroaldus	3927 3
Melancthon, Funccius, &amp;c. (in		B. Arias Montanus	3849
Chevreau)	3963	Andreas Helvigius	3836
Jacobus Haynlinus	3963 3	Some Talmudists	3784
Sixtus Senensis	3962	R. David Ganz (in Cbe-
Job. Lucidus, Sculter, John		vreau)	3761
Lighfoot, and several others	3960	The Jewish vulgar Computa-
Alph. Salmeron (in Chevreau)		tion	3760 3
John Picus Count of Mi-		R. David Ganz (in Strau-
randola, and others	3959	chius)	3760
Lamberg, and Salmeron (in		Hieron. à Sancta Fide, Paulus
Strauchius)	3958	de S. Maria, Galatinus, Geor-
J. G. Herwart ab Hohenburg	3955	gius Venetus	3760
Beda, Hermannus Contractus,		R. Habson, in his Treatise of
George Herwart (in Cbe-		the Cycles of Passover	3740
vreau)	3952	R. Jason Nosen	3734
Cornelius a Lapide	3951	R. Abraham Zaccutb	3671
Scaliger, Calvisius, Ubbo Em-		The lesser Chronicon of the
mius, Bechmius, and Helvi-		Jews	3670
cus (in Strauchius)	3949 3	R. Lippoman.	3616

It would be endless, as well as unnecessary, here to examine into the particular Causes of this great Difference among Authors, every one still pretending to ground his System on the Authority of the Scripture: It will be sufficient, after we have stated the Times from the Creation to the Birth of CHRIST, according to the Computation observed in the three several Copies of the Scripture before-mentioned, to subjoin one or two Schemes of the same Intervals, according to the different Computations of the best modern Chronologers, which, besides illustrating our Subject, will be of use to the Reader in perusing the Historians, who make use of one or other of those Computations.

TABLE I. formed out of the whole Numbers of the Intervals.

	Hebrew.				Samaritan, according to EUSEB. and the present Copies.				Septuagint, Common Copies.
	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals
1. The Creation ———	0		3944		0		4305		0		5270
2. The Deluge ———	1656		2288	1656	1307		2998	1307	2242		3028	2242
3. The Vocation of Abraham ———	2023	367	1921	367	2384	1077	1921	1017	3389	1147	1881	1147
4. The Exodus ———	2453	797	1491	430	2814	1507	1491	430	3819	1577	1451	430
5. The founding of the temple ——— Captivity ———	2933	1277	1011	480	3294	1987	1011	480	4259	2017	1011	440
6. The burning of the temple ——— the first of Cyrus ———	3357	1701	587	424½	3718	2411	587½	424½	4683	2441	587½	424½
——— the second of Darius Hyf. ———	3409	1753	535		[3770	2463	535		[4735	2493	535
7. The Birth of Christ ———	3427	1771	517	[70	3788	2481	517	[70	[4753	2511	517	70
	3944	2288	0	587	4305	2998	0	587½	5270	3028	0	587½

TABLE II. formed out of the Particulars.

	Hebrew.				Samaritan.				Septuagint, according to Dr. GRAE'S Edition, and the Constan- tinopolitans.
	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals
1. The Creation ———	0		4111		0		4424		0		5508
2. The Deluge ———	1656		2455	1656	1307		3117	1307	2262		3446	2262
3. The Vocation of Abraham ———	2083	427	2040	427	2384	1077	2040	1077	3469	1207	2039	1207
4. The Exodus ———	2513	857	1610	430	2814	1507	1610	430	3894	1629	1610	425
5. The founding of the temple ——— Captivity ———	3033	1437	1018	592	3406	2099	1018	592	4495	2230	1012	601
6. The burning of the temple ——— the first of Cyrus ———	3523	1867	588	430	3836	2403	588	430	4919	2654	589	424
——— the second of Darius Hyf. ———	[3575	1919							[4995
7. the Birth of Christ ———	[3583	1937							[5008
	4111	2455	0	588	4424	3117	0	588	5508	3246	0	589

TABLE III. according to the Supputation of certain Authors.

	Hebrew. USHER.				JOSEPHUS.				Septuagint, PEZZON.
	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals	1 Year of the World	2 Year of the Flood	3 Year before Christ	4 Years of the In- tervals
1. The Creation ———	0		4004		0		4658		1		5872
2. The Deluge ———	1656		2348	1656	1356		3102	1356	2256		3617	2256
3. The Vocation of Abraham ———	2083	427	1921	427	2523	967	2135	967	2513	1257	2360	1257
4. The Exodus ———	2513	857	1491	430	2953	1397	1705	430	3943	1687	1930	430
——— Moses's Death ———	[2553				[2993
5. The founding of the temple ——— Captivity ———	2992	1336	1012	479	3545	1989	1113	592	4816	2560	1057	873
6. The burning of the temple ——— the first of Cyrus ———	3397	1741	607	424	4015	2459	643	470	[5268	3012	605	452
——— the second of Darius Hyf. ———	3416	1760	588		4085			[70	[5287	3031	586	[19
7. The Birth of Christ ———	3468			[70					[5337	3081	536	69
	3486								[5351	3095	520
	4004	2348	0	588	4658	3102	0	643	5873	3617	1

The

THE Reader may perceive at one View of the preceding Tables, what Room the several Copies of the Scriptures we now have, give for varying the Chronology of the whole, and how many different Systems may be grounded on them. By the Calculation made use of in the first Table, which consists of the Intervals, inserted in the fourth, or right-hand Column of each Division, from the Creation to the Birth of CHRIST, according to the whole Numbers mentioned in the Text of the respective Copies, the Samaritan Account exceeds the Hebrew by three hundred and one Years, while the Septuagint exceeds the Samaritan by one thousand and twenty-five Years. Which Difference still becomes greater in the second Table, made out of the particular Numbers, which compose the Intervals, by an Addition of one hundred and nineteen Years to the Samaritan, and two hundred and thirty eight to the Septuagint Computation; which therefore exceeds the Hebrew Computation in the first Table, by no less than one thousand five hundred and sixty four Years.

THE third Table exhibits three other Forms, the first of which, being that of the great Primate Usher, is grounded on the Hebrew whole Numbers, and differs from that in the first Table but sixty Years, which are added to the Interval from the Deluge to the Call of Abraham. The second is composed from the Chronology of Josephus as cleared up by Dr. Wills, and Mr. Whiston<sup>b</sup>; who, reckoning according to the Particulars, observes somewhat of a Mean between the Samaritan and the Septuagint, and is thought, in most respects, to have given us the true Hebrew Numbers, which, it is to be feared, the Jews, since his Time, have corrupted. And the third is that of P. Pexron, being an Enlargement of the Septuagint and Greek Computation, in order to accommodate the Sacred to the Prophane History.

OF these three different Copies of Scripture, the Samaritan Computation seems not only best to suit the Nature and Circumstances of the History of antient Times recorded in the Old Testament, as well as to be confirmed by the Concurrence of genuine prophane History, which by no means ought to be thrown out of the Question; but also appears to be the old and authentic Hebrew Computation, preserved by the Samaritans in their Character, while the Hebrew Copy has evidently been corrupted, in all Probability, to obviate the Prophecies concerning the Messiah, and on other Accounts; as Pexron<sup>i</sup>, Dr. Wills<sup>k</sup>, Mr. Whiston<sup>l</sup>, and others have sufficiently proved.

<sup>a</sup> Pref. to L'Estrange's Edition of Josephus.
Test. and his Essay for restoring the true Text, &c.

<sup>b</sup> Chronol. of the Old and New

FOR these Reasons therefore, and many others, which will frequently occur in the Course of this Work, we have found ourselves obliged to depart from the Example of the Generality of our modern Chronologers, who follow the Hebrew Chronology, and to adhere to that of the Samaritan, which preserves a Mean between the Defect of the Hebrew on the one hand, and the Excess of the Septuagint on the other. In adjusting our Periods, we have strained nothing to favour any Hypothesis of our own, or to force the Sacred History to agree with any Part of the Prophane, as too many unreasonably have done; of which our constant confining ourselves to the whole Numbers, which are always the shortest, is a Demonstration.

THE Reader may observe, that the whole Difference betwixt the Hebrew and the Samaritan Computation (for we have no more than the Pentateuch in that Character) lies in the Interval between the Creation and the Calling of Abraham, and arises from the different Ages assigned the Patriarchs at the Birth of their sons mentioned in Genesis. The Septuagint Copy carries this Difference down to the founding of the Temple, which, according to that Text<sup>m</sup>, happened in the four hundred and fortieth Year of the Exodus, forty Years short of the Hebrew; but we have chosen to follow the whole Number, as it stands in the Hebrew<sup>n</sup>, (for we have no Samaritan Copy here to guide us) thinking the Text too express to admit of any Alteration. The Length of the Interval from the Founding to the Burning of the Temple, is limited within the four hundred and thirty Years<sup>o</sup> of God's Patience towards the Jews; and is collected out of the Years of the Reigns of the Kings of Israel and Judah, as they have been collated and adjusted by judicious Chronologers<sup>p</sup>: So that there is no room for allowing more than forty Years to the Reign of Solomon, as assigned him in all the Copies extant, the Scripture affording Means for reconciling the seeming Inconsistencies with regard to the Ages of him and his Son Rehoboam, at their respective Accessions to the Throne. But here we should be at a great Loss (the Babylonish Captivity interrupting the

<sup>i</sup> Vid. l'Antiquité des tems retablié & defendué. English Josephus.

<sup>k</sup> In his Preface to L'Estrange's

<sup>l</sup> Essay for restoring the true Text, &c. Prop. 12. p. 220.

<sup>m</sup> Vid. Septuag. 1 Kings, vi. 1.

<sup>n</sup> 1 Kings, vi. 1.

<sup>o</sup> Ezek. iv. 4, 5, 6.

<sup>p</sup> See Usher's Chronologia Sacra, Pars posterior; and Whiston's short View of the Chronol. of the Old Test. p. 83, and in the Tables at the End.

Course of the Jewish History) if it was not for the Opportunity we have of connecting this Period with the Nabonnassar or Babylonian Æra, by means of the famous Astronomical Canon of Ptolemy; whereby we are enabled with Certainty to carry the Account of Time down to the Birth of Christ, which, according to our Supputation, falls in the Year of the World Four thousand three hundred and five, and of the Flood two thousand nine hundred and ninety eight, according to the Samaritan Computation in the first Table.

WE have also taken the Liberty to depart from the general Method observed hitherto by Chronologers in another Point, and instead of carrying down our Computation from the Creation, through the several Ages, to the Birth of Christ, to discontinue it at the Flood, and begin a new Reckoning from thence; and this we have been induced to do for several Reasons.

1. BECAUSE the Period between the Creation and the Flood contains little memorable besides the Age and Death of each Patriarch. 2. Because it is a particular Period, cut off, as it were, from the rest of Time, and hath little or no Connection with the Ages succeeding the Deluge. 3. Because at the Deluge the old World was destroyed; and from thence a new Origination of Mankind began, whose Affairs have little or no Dependance on those of the Antediluvians. 4. Because it will help to give the Reader a more distinct Notion of the Distance of Time, as derived from a Period with which we are more immediately concerned, and beyond which no genuine History of any Nation reaches. 5. Because it will bring the several Scriptural Computations nearer to an Agreement among themselves; the great Disproportion among them arising chiefly from the Difference this Period creates. Thus in the whole Space of Time, from the Creation to the Birth of Christ, the Septuagint, according to the first Table, differs from the Hebrew, one thousand three hundred and twenty six Years, and but seven hundred and forty, reckoning from the Flood. The Difference also between the Septuagint and the Samaritan, reckoning from the Creation, is no less than nine hundred and sixty five Years; and no more than thirty, if you compute from the Flood. The Septuagint Chronology exceeds that of Josephus six hundred and twelve Years, taking in the Times preceding the Deluge; but in the Space betwixt the Deluge and Christ, it is exceeded by that of Josephus by seventy four Years, as will appear more clearly by the following Table.

P R E F A C E.

According to the First T A B L E.		According to the 2d T A B L E.
Years from the Creation to Christ.	Years from the Flood to Christ.	Years from the Creation to Christ.	Years from the Flood to Christ.
Sam. 4305	2998	4424	3117
Heb. 3944	2288	4111	2456
361	710	311	662
Sept. 5270	3028	5508	3246
Heb. 3944	2288	4111	2455
1326	740	1397	791
Sept. 5270	3028	5508	3246
Sam. 4305	2998	4424	3117
965	30	1084	129
Jos. 4658	3102	4658	3102
Heb. 3944	2288	4111	2455
714	814	547	647
Jos. 4658	3102	Jos. 4658	Sam. 3117
Sam. 4305	2998	Sam. 4424	Jos. 3102
353	104	294	15
Sept. 5270	Jos. 3102	Sept. 5508	3246
Jos. 4658	Sept. 3028	Jos. 4658	3102
612	74	850	144

Indeed, if we compare the Hebrew and the Samaritan, the Case is otherwise ; for the Difference betwixt those two Computations is greater in the Interval from the Flood to Christ than from the Creation, the Samaritan falling short of the Hebrew in the Interval between the Creation and the Flood, at the same time that it exceeds it in that betwixt the Flood and the Vocation of Abraham.

Upon these Considerations, we have thought fit, throughout the Course of our History, to make use of the Year of the Flood, instead of that of the World, in our marginal Synchronisms, and hope the Reader will consider it rather as an Improvement, than an Innovation in Chronology. However, in our Tables at the End of each Volume, we shall add the Year of the World, to serve instead of a Julian Period ; a Contrivance, which how useful soever it may be in the Technical Chronology, is, as we conceive, of no manner of use at all in the Historical.

To the Year of the Flood we have always added that before Christ, which, considering the Variety of Systems that are abroad (every Author almost having one of his own) is the more necessary, as it always carries the Chronology of the Author along with it ; for the two Sums being added together, shew the Year before the

the Christian Æra, according to that Computation, whether Hebrew, Samaritan or Septuagint, which the Author follows. For Instance, according to the Samaritan Account in the first Table, which we follow, Solomon began to build the Temple in the Year of the Flood 1987, and before Christ 1011; these two Sums added make two thousand nine hundred ninety eight; which is the Year before the Christian Æra by that Reckoning; and two thousand nine hundred ninety eight being added to one thousand three hundred and seven, the Number of Years betwixt the Creation and the Flood, the Sum, four thousand three hundred and five, gives the Year of the World in which the Birth of Christ happened, according to the vulgar Computation. Indeed, was our Chronology upon as fixed a Footing as it is among the Greeks, the Russians, and some other Nations, who begin their Computation from the Creation, and never change their Opinions; to discover the Distance of any Transaction backwards from the present Time, there would be no need of knowing more than the Year of the World in which it fell out. For Instance, the Temple was begun, according to the Russians, who follow the Greek, and Septuagint Computation in the second Table, in the Year of the World 4495. Now the present Year of our Lord 1730, being the seven thousand two hundred and thirty eighth according to their Account, it is only deducting four thousand four hundred ninety five, from seven thousand two hundred thirty eight, and you have two thousand seven hundred forty three, which is the Number of Years since the Founding of Solomon's Temple to this Time, differing but two Years in Excess from our Reckoning: Whereas, before we could be able to discover it by that single Character, we should be obliged, perhaps, to search a good while to find out the System which the Author goes upon; and when we had met with it, should be at the Trouble of using Substraction as well as Addition. So that the joining the Year before Christ to that of the World, or of the Flood, is one of the greatest Improvements in Chronology; and as necessary for ascertaining the true Time of every Event, as the Longitude and Latitude are in Geography to determine the exact Situation of a Place. In a Word, these two Sorts of Reckonings ought to be made inseparable; and whoever gives only one of them without the other, can afford his Reader no satisfactory Idea of Things; and indeed must write in Confusion himself.

HAVING given the Reader this general Account of our Chronology, and stated the several Periods of it from the Creation, and the Flood, to the Birth of Christ; we shall hereafter give the Analysis lysis of each Period, as we proceed, to shew the Authority upon which our System is grounded.

IN the History itself we have endeavoured to execute our Proposals in the best Manner we could; and hope we have made no Slips therein but such as are excusable. Some no doubt there are; for we have not the Vanity to think ourselves able to write a perfectly complete History, which, as a modern Author <sup>P</sup> expresses it, is not to appear, but in that Year which discovers the perpetual Motion, and the Philosopher's Stone.

IN composing the following Work, we have all along taken the Liberty (to use the Words of an ingenious Gentleman, whom we have followed in this respect) "To translate, to imitate, or " even literally to introduce any Parts of the Authors from whom " we have made our Collections, if we found them really con-
" ducing to the Use or Ornament of the Design, not being able " to discover any Merit, or Cunning, in varying the Style and " Sense of an Author, for no other Purpose than to conceal the " Ignorance of the Transcriber, or to destroy an Obligation of " Gratitude which ought to be confessed to all Mankind." <sup>q</sup>

WE have added to this, as we shall do to each Volume, a complete and copious Index, giving the Reader a View of the whole Work in Epitome, and referring him to all the Parts of it with great Exactness.

WE shall take leave of our Reader for this time, after informing him, that as the Demand there has been for the Sheets of this Volume, not only at home, but abroad, where they have been already translated into several Languages, leaves no room to doubt of our Undertaking's being approved of: So the Numbers of the other Volumes shall be published in a more regular Manner, all the Obstacles that have hitherto retarded the Work being entirely removed, and the Sheets that are to compose the Second Volume, at this time ready for the Press.

<sup>P</sup> Le Moyne.      <sup>q</sup> Mr. Lewis, in his Preface to his Origines Hebrææ.

The Binder is desired to take Notice, that the two Plates of the Ruins of Palermo, must be pasted in one.

A N

U N I V E R S A L H I S T O R Y,

FROM THE Earliest Account of Time to the Present.

---

T H E

I N T R O D U C T I O N,

C O N T A I N I N G
The Cosmogony, or Creation of the World.

OUR design is to write a General History of mankind, from their original to our own time. An undertaking of vast extent, and which would perhaps be scarce practicable, were the histories of all nations now extant, and their series complete. But as many nations entirely neglected their history, at least for several ages : so the histories of many others, who kept some records of past actions, have been either totally, or in part, destroyed by wars, time, misguided zeal, and other casualties. Besides, few nations have been able to give a tolerable account of their original, or early antiquities ; the first memory of persons, and facts, having been preserved by the institution of festivals, the building of cities, erecting of stones, pillars, altars, tombs, and the like monuments, from whence a true series of history could not be accurately deduced and collected, any more than from the oral tradition which accompanied them.

The design of the work, and the difficulties which attend it.

BUT if the want of records has, on the one hand, reduced history into a closer compass, it has, on the other, occasioned great confusion and uncertainty. For the frequent interruptions and defects, which occur in the antiquities of nations, drive the historian so often to precarious conjectures, and oblige him to have recourse to so many shifts, to connect and supply them, that his labour seems to be encreased by the scarcity of materials ; and he is unable, after all, to give his reader satisfaction.

MANY other difficulties there are, which attend the execution of this undertaking, especially as to the history of ancient times : such as the numbers of forged and spurious books ; the fictions of poets, who were the first historians ; the contradictions and partiality of authors ; the different computations of time in use among the same, as well as different nations ; the want of æra's to compute from in some nations, and the multiplicity of them in others ; the variety of proper names of the same person and place, and the corruption of them through ignorance, negligence, or design. What adds to the misfortune is, that if we except the Jews, not one of the histories of those ancient nations whom the Grecians called Barbarians, written by the natives, or extracted immediately from their records, have come to our hands ; nothing remaining of them, besides some few fragments, preserved here and there in other writers, which serve only to make us lament their loss, and to shew the inaccuracy of the Greek historians, with regard to foreign nations.

A

and

WE have thought proper briefly to premise thus much, with regard to the state of ancient history, in order to intitle ourselves to the reader's candor in passing his judgment upon a performance, wherein there are so many difficulties to struggle with. But before we enter upon the history itself, we shall give some account of the cosmogony, or the production and formation of this earth; which seems to demand our first attention, as being the place from whence mankind derive their original, and the theatre whereon the scenes of the ensuing history are to be acted.

*Could the author of the world, be shewn to mis-
ser and form.*

THAT the universe was created, or produced out of nothing, by an infinitely <sup>a</sup> powerful, wise, and good God, who being self-existent is the original cause of all things, is not only certain from revelation, but deducible, and has been clearly proved from reason<sup>a</sup>. And tho' all atheists, both ancient and modern, have constantly denied that even infinite power can create matter, and the affirmative has been thought to be embarrassed with several considerable difficulties, as our having no idea how a nothing from all eternity can be made to exist, and the seeming contradiction in supposing the world to be created in time, because then it would be separated from eternity only by an indivisible point, which cannot sufficiently distinguish an eternal Being from a temporary production<sup>b</sup>; yet these are rather difficulties arising from our own imperfect and finite reason and conception, whereby we are <sup>b</sup> not able to form a distinct idea of creation or eternity, than any real impossibility in the thing itself: for it is no contradiction to affirm that something which once was not, may since have begun to exist; the true notion of creation being not <sup>a</sup> forming of something out of nothing, as out of a material cause, but only a bringing something into being, which before had no being at all, and which without some cause, would not have existed; and this no man can reduce to a contradiction, any more than the formation of any thing into a shape which it had not before, can be reduced to a contradiction<sup>c</sup>. And they who deny God's power to create matter, must fly to one of these suppositions, either that matter existed from eternity, as a passive subject of all the operations of God, and as a collateral principle, or else <sup>c</sup> that matter is the only self-existent being; either of which involves us in the most impious absurdities. The first supposition necessarily implies two self-existent principles, which is a direct contradiction; and the other, that it is impossible to conceive matter not to be, or to be in any respect otherwise than it now is without a contradiction; than which nothing is more easy. For whether we consider the form of the world, with the disposition and motion of its parts, or whether we consider the matter of it, as such, without respect to its present form; every thing in it, both the whole and every one of its parts, their situation and motion, the form and also the matter, are the most arbitrary and dependent things, and the farthest removed from necessity, that can possibly be imagined<sup>d</sup>.

*The arguments used to prove the non-existence of matter
of small force.*

As for those who deny the actual existence of matter and motion, (if there be any <sup>d</sup> who do so in earnest) it might be sufficient to say, that there is in effect no difference in respect to us, whether they be actually existent, or no more than appearances; for if God immediately communicate all sensible perceptions to our mind, as he must do if there be no such thing as sensible substance, he is still the author of those appearances, which have the same consequences and effects, to our conception, as if they were real: not to urge the indecency of suspecting God to have made the world a mere scene of delusion. The impossibility of extension is attempted to be proved from the inextricable difficulties which follow, if matter be infinitely divisible, as it necessarily must, and is easily demonstrated<sup>e</sup>. And if there be no extension, the unavoidable consequence is, that there can be no motion; which is also argued from <sup>c</sup> the perplexing objections raised on the supposition of a vacuum; and yet a vacuum must be admitted, or else no motion can be conceived<sup>f</sup>. But these difficulties though unanswerable, as great masters of reason have confessed, evince no more than that human understanding is finite and imperfect; and being only raised from our want of having an adequate idea either of extension or space<sup>g</sup>, ought not therefore to be esteemed real difficulties<sup>h</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Dr. CLARKE, in his Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God. <sup>b</sup> Mr. BAYLE, dans les Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Tom. IV. p. 7301. <sup>c</sup> Dr. CLARKE, ubi sup. p. 83, 84. See also Dr. NICHOLLS's Conference with a Theist, Vol. I. Part 1. p. 26. <sup>d</sup> Dr. CLARKE, ubi sup. p. 23, &c. <sup>e</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Zenon, Remarq. G. <sup>f</sup> Vid. ibid. Rem. F. I. <sup>g</sup> Vid. ibid. Rem. I. and LOCKE on Human Understanding, B. 2. c. 13. <sup>h</sup> Vid. CLARKE's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God, p. 11, 12.

THE several opinions which have been held by the ancients or moderns, as to the origin of the universe, may be comprehended under one or other of the following three; viz. The several opinions concerning the origin of the world.

- I. THAT the world is eternal both as to matter and form, and had neither any origin, nor will be subject to any corruption<sup>1</sup>.
- II. THAT the matter of the world is eternal, but not the form. Or,
- III. THAT the world had a beginning, and will suffer a dissolution, being of its own nature perishable.

AND to begin with the first of these opinions: None of the ancients openly maintained it, except some Pseudo-Pythagoreans, and Aristotle<sup>a</sup>; to whom we may add several of Plato's followers. But few, if any, of them intended thereby to assert, as some moderns have done, that the material world was God, or the original, self-existing, and independent Being, in opposition to the belief of a supreme all-governing Mind; but either barely that something must needs be eternal, which is all Ocellus Lucanus proves; or else that the world is an eternal and necessary effect, flowing from the immutable energy of the divine nature, which seems to have been Aristotle's opinion; or else that the world is an eternal voluntary emanation from the all-wise and supreme Cause, which was the opinion of many Platonists<sup>1</sup>. The opinion of Aristotle who held it: that all exists in matter and form.

OCCELLUS LUCANUS, whose antiquity and authority have been opposed to those of Moses<sup>m</sup>, though he lived not long before Plato, was one of the the most ancient asserters of the world's eternity; wherein he deviated from the true doctrine of his master Pythagoras. We have a short treatise under his name, concerning the nature of the universe, wherein he affirms it to be utterly incapable either of generation or corruption, of beginning or end<sup>n</sup>; that it is of itself eternal and perfect, and permanent for ever<sup>o</sup>; and that the frame and parts of the world must needs be eternal, as well as the substance and matter of the whole<sup>p</sup>, and mankind also<sup>q</sup>. But his arguments for this opinion are either very absurd and ridiculous; as when he attempts to prove that the world must needs be eternal, without beginning or end, because both its figure and motion are circular, and therefore without beginning or ending<sup>r</sup>; or else they are such arguments as tend to prove that something must needs be eternal, because it is impossible for every thing to arise out of nothing, or to fall into nothing; as when he says, that the world must have been eternal, because it is a contradiction for the universe to have had a beginning; since, if it had a beginning, it must have been caused by some other thing, and then it is not the universe: to which one argument all he says in his whole book is plainly reducible. And to say the truth, he himself seems persuaded, that however eternal and necessary every thing in the world be imagined to be, yet even that necessary must flow from an eternal and intelligent Mind, the necessary perfections of whose nature are the cause of that harmony which keeps the universe together, and prevents its falling into disorder<sup>t</sup>. He allows God to have given men faculties, organs of sense, and appetites, not for the sake of pleasure, but fitted for final causes<sup>u</sup>; and expressly asserts, that the ever active Being governs, and the ever passive is governed; that the one is first in power, the other posterior; that the one is divine, rational, and intelligent, and the other generated, irrational, and liable to change<sup>v</sup>. The opinion of Ocellus Lucanus.

ARISTOTLE also held this opinion, as is sufficiently known; and, if he be to be believed, was the first, at least of the Greeks, who asserted it; for he says that before his time the temporary production of the world was universally entertained, though it was a question whether it should ever perish or not<sup>w</sup>. His doctrine was, that not only the matter of the heavens and earth were ingenerate and eternal; but that even mankind, and all the species of animals, male and female, have subsisted from everlasting by a perpetual course of generation, without any original beginning or production; and that the earth hath for ever been adorned with trees, plants, flowers, minerals, and other productions, as we now see it to be<sup>x</sup>. But how this is reconcileable with what he elsewhere delivers of the natural gravity and levity of different elements, seems hard to shew: for if those elements were ever in their natural places and dispositions,

<sup>1</sup> DIONYS. SIC. l. 1. p. 6. <sup>a</sup> BURNET. Archæol. l. 2. cap. 1. <sup>1</sup> Dr. CLARKE, ubi sup. p. 32.
<sup>m</sup> Vid. Oracles of Reason, p. 115. <sup>n</sup> OCCELL. LUCAN. de Univ. p. 506. Inter opulc. Myrthoi. edit. p. 7
T. Gale, 1688. <sup>o</sup> Ib. 510. <sup>p</sup> Ib. 528. <sup>q</sup> Ib. 530. <sup>r</sup> Ib. 514. Vid. also Oracles of Reason, ubi sup. <sup>s</sup> OCCELL. ibid. 506, 508. <sup>t</sup> OCCELL. de Legibus Fragm. ibid. p. 537. <sup>u</sup> Idem de Univ.
531. Vid. Dr. CLARKE's Demonstration &c. p. 33, &c. <sup>v</sup> OCCELL. de Legibus Fragm. ubi sup. p. 528
<sup>w</sup> ARISTOT. de Cælo, lib. 1. cap. 10. <sup>x</sup> Ibid. cap. 12. Vid. PHILON. Jud. de Incongruitate Mundi,
p. 940. BURNET's Archæol. l. 1. p. 180. CUDWORTH's Intellectual System, p. 250

according to their respective gravity, which nothing but some external violence could have hindered; it follows necessarily, that the earth once was in a very different form from what it now is, and could not possibly be inhabited from eternity<sup>a</sup>. The great reason which induced Aristotle to assert the world to be eternal<sup>b</sup>, was, because he thought such an effect must needs eternally proceed from such an eternal cause as the divine Mind, which being all act and energy, could not rest in a state of inactivity. He acknowledges that the first principle is neither fire, earth, nor water, nor any thing which is the object of sense; but that a spiritual substance is the cause of the universe, and the source of all the order and beauty, as well as of the motions and forms, which we so much admire in it<sup>c</sup>. And he expressly describes God to be an intelligent Being<sup>d</sup>, incorporeal, the first mover of all things, himself immoveable<sup>e</sup>, eternal, indivisible, and void of all quantity<sup>f</sup>; and affirms, that if there were nothing but matter in the world, there would be no original cause, but an infinite progression of causes<sup>g</sup>; which is absurd<sup>h</sup>. So that the true notion of this great philosopher was, that though the world had no temporary generation, yet it was produced from one supreme Deity, after some other manner<sup>i</sup>.

THESE sentiments of Aristotle, as to the eternity of the world, have been embraced by many of his followers, and among the rest by several learned Mohammedans, who were thence named Dabrians, or Eternalists. Of this opinion al Farabi, al Kendi, Ebn Roshd, and Ebn Sina (which two last we usually call Averroes and Avicenna) were suspected; and therefore their philosophy was publicly, and even in the pulpit, inveighed against by the more orthodox, and themselves branded with the invidious appellations of atheists and infidels<sup>k</sup>.

Of Plato's followers.

THOUGH Plato, as we shall see hereafter, did himself plainly acknowledge the world to be made by God, yet having used some expressions, as if he thought the time of its formation to be indefinite; as when he says, that the world must needs be an eternal resemblance of the eternal idea<sup>l</sup>; his followers, or the greatest part of them, who adhered to Aristotle's opinion in this matter, took advantage of these expressions, and explained them so, as if by the creation of the world was not to be understood a creation in time, but only in order of nature, causality, and dependance<sup>m</sup>: that is, that the will of God, and his power of acting, being necessarily as eternal as his essence, the effects of that will and power must be supposed coeval to the will and power themselves; in the same manner as light would eternally proceed from the sun<sup>n</sup>, or a shadow from the interposed body, or an impression from an imposed seal, if the respective causes of these effects were supposed eternal<sup>o</sup>. Existence from eternity, and being caused or produced by another, were not therefore by these philosophers apprehended to be contradictory or inconsistent. And as they were led into this opinion no otherwise than from the sole consideration of the deity; viz. its benevolent will, and generative power<sup>p</sup>; so they allowed that the world, notwithstanding its being from eternity, might in some sense be said to be made, as being produced from another cause, and not self-originated. And the generation of the inferior gods, and world, in this sense, Proclus himself, that grand champion for the world's eternity, plainly acknowledges, when he says, that they called it the generations of the gods; meaning thereby, not any temporary production, but their ineffable procession from a superior first cause<sup>q</sup>.

THE latter Platonists were so fond of this notion of the world's eternity, that being on the one hand unwilling to abandon it, and on the other desirous to save appearances, they endeavoured, by forced constructions, to wrest their master's words, especially his Timæus, to their purpose; and, as has been long since observed, turned themselves every way, using all manner of violence to the text, as conceiving they ought by all possible means to conceal and deny the generation of the world, and of its soul, as if it were some horrid thing, and not to be spoken of<sup>r</sup>. It is well known that Platonism was very early introduced into the church; and even this dogm favourably received by some, and Origen in particular<sup>s</sup>, and as zealously opposed by others. It may however be worth observing, that this doctrine of the world's co-eternity with God was in the sixth century suffered to be publickly taught in Alexandria by Ammonius the scholar of Proclus<sup>a</sup>, and not without success.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. BURNET's Archæol. l. 1. p. 181, and his Theory of the Earth, Vol. I. p. 51. <sup>b</sup> Several other Reasons were given by his Followers, nearly agreeing with those of OCELLUS, which may be read in PHILO JUD. ubi sup. p. 943, &c. <sup>c</sup> ARISTOT. Metaph. l. 1. cap. 2, 3. <sup>d</sup> N<sup>o</sup>g. <sup>e</sup> DIOGENES LAERT. in vita ARISTOT. p. 286. Ed. Amst. 1692. <sup>f</sup> In Phys. l. 7. c. 1. &c. <sup>g</sup> In Metaph. <sup>h</sup> Vid. CLARKE's Demonstration, &c. p. 35, and also CUDWORTH, p. 253. <sup>i</sup> SIMPLICIUS in ARISTOT. Phys. l. 8. & l. 1. c. 1. <sup>j</sup> Vid. D'HERBELOT, Biblioth. Orientale, p. 303. & ELENCH. Scriptorum præfix. Epist. Has Ebn Yokdhan. <sup>k</sup> PLATO in Timæo, & apud CICER. de Univ. <sup>l</sup> PLOTINUS En. 3. l. 2. c. 1. & En. 2. l. 9. c. 3. <sup>m</sup> Idem, En. 5. l. 8. c. 12. SALLUST. de Diis & Mundo, cap. 7. PROCLUS in Timæum, l. 2. p. 111. <sup>n</sup> Dr. CLARKE's Demonstration, &c. p. 37. See also the Authors there cited, & PHILO JUD. de Incorrumpibilitate Mundi. <sup>o</sup> PROCL. in Tim. p. 116. <sup>p</sup> PROCL. in Tim. p. 85. Vid. etiam SALLUST. c. 13. CUDWORTH, p. 253. <sup>q</sup> PLUTARCH. de Psychog. Plat. p. 1013. <sup>r</sup> Vid. METHIDIUM de creatis, apud Photium, p. 932.

To the argument made use of by the Platonists for the eternity of the world, drawn from the nature and attributes of God, it has been answered; that though God be essentially and necessarily good, yet the communications of his goodness are the effects of his will, and not merely of his nature. For God, being a free agent, could have refrained from making the world, or could have made it otherwise; and therefore those who make the expressions of the divine bounty necessary, in order to settle the world's eternity, and that he might always have an object whereon to exercise his goodness, take as much from his self-sufficiency as they would seem to flatter his goodness. For God cannot be himself without his goodness; and therefore, if his goodness cannot be without some creature to shew and display itself upon, God cannot be perfect or happy without his creatures; because these are the necessary issues of his goodness, and consequently the being of the creature becomes necessary to the being of God, which is the highest derogation imaginable from the absolute perfection of the divine nature<sup>b</sup>. All which is very true, and we do not see what reply a Platonist could make, if it were the real doctrine of the sect, that the world was an involuntary effect of his mere nature. But they plainly taught otherwise, and expressly declared, that one of the reasons why they maintained the world not to be a temporary production was, the consideration of his beneficent will<sup>c</sup>, as well as his productive power; both which being supposed, the effect may necessarily follow, without any derogation from God's absolute perfections. It is not therefore without due consideration that very able disputants have acknowledged, that the time when the world was created, or whether its creation was, properly speaking, in time, is not so easy to demonstrate strictly by bare reason, but the proof of it can be taken only from revelation; and therefore they who, wanting that light, have denied the world to have had a beginning, are somewhat excusable<sup>d</sup>.

But, on a nicer discussion, this controversy about the eternity of the world will appear to be, in a great measure, a dispute about words only. All christians in general (except those who believe the eternity of matter, and therefore deserve not that name) agree that God alone hath always existed; but several maintain that he might have actually created the world, as soon as he formed the decree of producing it; whence they conclude, that the world might have existed eternally, since there is no doubt but that the decree to produce it is eternal. On the other hand several maintain, that it is impossible for a creature to be eternal<sup>e</sup>. But when they come to argue, the strength of each party lies rather in making objections, than solving them. This dispute, which is rendred so tedious and perplexing, would end presently, if they would but explain themselves clearly on each side, and forego the equivocal acceptation of eternity; and then the question should be thus stated: Is it possible that God and his creatures may have always existed together? The negative would not so readily be taken; for the expression of the eternity of the world, that expression, I say, which shocks so many people, would not strike the mind. To remove this stumbling-block still more effectually, it should be declared, that a creature which should have always co-existed with God, would not be eternal, for this reason; because the duration of creatures is successive, and that eternity is a simple duration, which essentially excludes both past and future. By this essential distinction between the duration of God, and that of creatures, the whole contest almost would cease, and each side find their account. It would be granted to those who deny the possibility of the creature's being eternal, that they are in the right; and it would not be denied to be possible that God and his creature might have always existed together; since it is certain, that the cause includes not in its idea a priority of time, with respect to its effect, and that this is more nicely true as to an almighty cause, which needs only will to produce actually whatever it pleases. Again, they who say that the creatures have not always co-existed with God, must grant that God existed before they did. There was then a before, when God existed alone; therefore it is not true that God's duration is an indivisible point; whence it follows, that time preceded the existence of creatures: which consequences drive those who argue in this manner to contradict themselves; for if the duration of God be indivisible, without past or future, time and creatures must have began together;

An answer to the Platonic argument for the world's eternity, as yet denied.

This controversy is set in a clearer light.

<sup>a</sup> ZACHARIAS MITYLENESE, in Biblioth. patrum, Vol. II. p. 331. Ed. Paris, 1644. <sup>b</sup> Vid. Bishop STIL-LINGFLEET's Origines Sacre, p. 275, &c. <sup>c</sup> Ἀγαθὸν ἔστιν ἑαυτῷ. PROCL. in Timæum, p. 116. which Words Dr. CUDWORTH has translated, somewhat freely, Essential Goodness. Intell. System. p. 253. <sup>d</sup> Dr.
CLARKE's Demonstr. &c. p. 39. & POIRRET, Cogitationes rationales de Deo anima & mundo, lib. 3. c. 16.
NUM. 9. p. 439. Ed. 1685. <sup>e</sup> Vid. JOH. PHILOPON. contra Proclum, p. 3. & CUDWORTH, p. 887.

and if so, how can it be said that God existed before the existence of his creatures ?

THE two seemingly insuperable arguments then for the eternity of the world, are drawn from the eternity of God's decree for its creation, and the indivisibility of the real duration of God : which yet have been answered in this manner ; It is supposed, that among the possible beings which God knew before he made the decrees of creation, one was a successive duration, which hath neither beginning nor end, and whose parts are as distinct from one another as those of possible extension, which God likewise knew before his decrees, as infinite according to the three dimensions. He has left in the state of possible things one part of this infinite duration, and has decreed the existence of the other. He chose such moment as he pleased, in this ideal <sup>a</sup> duration, for the first which should exist, and annexed thereto the act by which he decreed the creation of the world : so that the eternity of that act does not prove the eternity of the world ; nor does the indivisibility of God's real duration prove the world had no beginning <sup>b</sup>.

BUT after all, the distinction of the schoolmen between the manner of the duration of God, and that of his creatures, whereon the preceding argumentation is built, though it has been generally received by the best pagan, as well as christian philosophers, and is at least as old as Parmenides <sup>c</sup>, has yet been rejected and opposed by many men of great learning and judgment, as inconsistent and unintelligible ; it being very hard to conceive eternity to be an instant, or how that can be together, or at once, which <sup>b</sup> must necessarily be imagined to be co-existent to successions <sup>d</sup>. And whatever force the above-mentioned arguments may be supposed to carry for the eternity of the world, understanding thereby the universe, with its several changes and vicissitudes ; they are far from proving that the disposition of the solar system, much less the form of the earth, has been for ever the same as we now see it : the imagining of which seems to have been the great error of the old Eternalists, and has been strongly opposed by several arguments, as well from reason as human testimony, separate from the evidence of divine revelation, as will be seen hereafter.

The opinion of those who held the universe to be God. SOME modern asserters of the world's eternity have gone on very different principles from these ancients, and ventured to affirm the material universe to be self-existent, <sup>c</sup> and the supream Deity itself. This is the doctrine of Spinoza, the first, as is supposed, who reduced atheism into a system, by regular deductions, after the method of the mathematicians. But as the fundamental opinion whereon he erected that system was not new, it may be proper, before we speak of him, to say something of those who led him the way, though he has departed from them in some respects.

The opinion of Xenophanes, and his followers ; THAT the universe is but one substance, and that God and the world are but one and the same thing, hath been an opinion of some standing, and is supposed to have been first taught by Xenophanes, the founder of the sect afterwards called the Eleatic. He is said to have held not only the eternity and immutability of the world <sup>e</sup>, but also that whatever existed was one being ; that there was neither any generation nor corruption ; that this one being was immoveable, and remained always the same <sup>f</sup>, and was the true God <sup>g</sup> : which doctrine was not only defended by his successors, Parmenides, Melissus, and Zeno of Elea, but by Stilpo and the Megarian philosophers also. And to obviate the objection which might be brought against the unchangeable nature of the universe from the continual alterations made therein by new generations and corruptions, they maintained, that whatever changes it seemed to suffer, were no more than illusions of our senses, and mere appearances. Which last retreat they are easily beaten from : for since they cannot deny but there are changes in the world in appearance at least, it even thence follows, that nature is not immutable, but must necessarily be changed in the subject which produces or receives our sensations ; and those sensations, being passions, imply both an efficient cause, and a passive principle, which overthrows at once their pretended unity of all things <sup>h</sup>.

NEVERTHELESS this opinion of Xenophanes and his followers, that all things are one, which seems so impious and absurd, has been so explained by several learned men <sup>i</sup>, and themselves defended, as if by the universe or all, they meant not the material principle of which all things are composed, but that one simple principle from whence all things had

<sup>a</sup> BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Zabarella, Jaques, Rem. H. See also Epist. Abi Jazfar Ebn Tofail de Hai Ebn Yokdhan Edit. à Pocock. p. 105, 106. and Mr. OCKLEY's English Translation, p. 83. <sup>b</sup> BAYLE, ubi supra.

<sup>c</sup> See CUDWORTH, Intell. System, p. 388. <sup>d</sup> GASSEND, Physic. l. 1. Archbishop TILLOTSON, Vol. 7. Sermon. 13. See also Dr. CLARKE's Demonstr. &c. p. 45. and CUDWORTH's Intell. System, p. 644.

<sup>e</sup> PLUTARCH. apud Euseb. de Preparat. Evang. l. 1. cap. 8. & l. 15. cap. 35. <sup>f</sup> ARISTOCLES de Philosoph. apud Eund. l. 14. cap. 17. Vid. etiam ARISTOT. de Xenophane, Zenone, & Gorgia, in initio, & CICER. in Lucullo.

<sup>g</sup> CICER. Quest. Acad. lib. 2. Vid. etiam SEXTUM EMPIRIC. in Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. l. 1. <sup>h</sup> Vid. ARISTOCLES, ubi supra. <sup>i</sup> LESCLOPIER in Cicero de Nat. Deor. l. 1. p. 44. Art de penser, part III. cap. 18. & CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 377. & 383, &c.

their

their original, that is, the true God, whom they expressly affirm to be incorporeal<sup>k</sup>, and therefore could not possibly be in their opinion the material world. But the writings of these philosophers being not without obscurity, some of the ancients, who were less acquainted with metaphysical speculations, understood them physically; as if they had asserted the whole corporeal world to be all but one thing, and that immoveable; thereby destroying, together with the diversity of things, all motion, mutation and action; which was plainly to make them not to have been philosophers, but madmen. Simplicius<sup>l</sup>, a man well acquainted with the opinions of ancient philosophers, assures us, that Xenophanes and Parmenides herein wrote not as naturalists, but as metaphysicians,

- a not concerning a physical element or principle, but concerning the true Being, or the divine transcendence; adding, that though some of those ancient philosophers did not distinguish natural things from supernatural, yet the Pythagoreans, and Xenophanes, and Parmenides, and Empedocles, and Anaxagoras, did all handle these two distinctly, however by reason of their obscurity it were not perceived by many; for which cause they have been most of them misrepresented, not only by pagans, but also by christians<sup>m</sup>. And in fact, when these Eleatics come to treat of natural things, they plainly acknowledge them to be compounded of different principles. Xenophanes supposed that the earth consisted of air and fire<sup>n</sup>, and that all things were produced out of the earth, and the sun and stars out of clouds<sup>o</sup>: he also held, that there were four elements<sup>p</sup>. Parmenides made a professed distinction between the doctrine concerning theological and metaphysical things, called by him truth, and that concerning physical and corporeal things, which he called opinion. In the former of which doctrines he asserted one immoveable principle, but in the latter two moveable ones, fire and earth, or heat and cold, the first being the workman, and the other the matter<sup>q</sup>; he taught that the earth was formed of a denser air, which subsided<sup>r</sup>, and that mankind was first produced out of mud<sup>s</sup>. Which notions concerning the origin of things, he seems to have received from Archelaus the Ionic, whose auditor he is said to have been. And with them Zeno also agreed, holding that the nature of all things arose from a mixture of heat and cold, dryness and moisture; and that man was generated of the earth, being equally compounded of the aforesaid principles, so that neither predominated<sup>t</sup>.

- c WHETHER Strato of Lampsacus held the unity of all things or no, is a doubt; for though he made nature inanimate, and acknowledged no God but nature<sup>u</sup>, yet it is not certain that he taught the universe, or nature, to be one simple being. From his ridiculing the atoms of Democritus<sup>v</sup>, it has been thought reasonable to imagine, that he admitted no difference between the parts of the universe; but this is allowed to be no necessary consequence. It may be only concluded, that his opinion approaches infinitely nearer to Spinozism than the corpuscular system. There is likewise some room to believe, that he did not teach, as the Atomists did, that the world was a new work, and produced by chance; but, as the Spinozists do, that nature produced it necessarily and from all eternity<sup>w</sup>. Plutarch indeed tells us, that he held that which was natural to follow that which was fortuitous<sup>x</sup>, as if he allowed something to chance, a first motion or impression at least, which was afterwards perfected by nature, or the plastic life supposed by him to be in every part of matter; making the mundane system to depend upon a certain mixture of chance, and plastic or orderly nature, both together<sup>y</sup>. But as his opinion is represented by Lactantius<sup>z</sup>, he rejected all chance, which was the great difference between him and the Epicureans, and affirmed that nature had in itself a generative and vital power, but had neither sense nor figure; so that all things were, as he imagined, generated of their own accord, without the assistance of any former or author.

- d BUT whatever was the real notion of this greatest of the peripatetic philosophers<sup>aa</sup>, it is certain that Alexander the Epicurean, who is supposed to have been contemporary with Plutarch<sup>ab</sup>, maintained that God is matter, or not distinct from it; that all things are essentially God, and that forms are imaginary accidents, which have no real

Of Strato Lampiacenus.

Of Alexander the Epicurean, and some heretical
christians.

<sup>k</sup> CUDWORTH, p. 378, 383, &c. <sup>l</sup> SIMPLIC. in Phys. ARISTOT. p. 5, 6, &c. <sup>m</sup> CUDWORTH, p. 383. See BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Xenophanes, Remarq. L. <sup>n</sup> PLUTARCH. apud Euseb. de Prep. Ev. l. 15. cap. 55. <sup>o</sup> Idem, in Strom. apud Eund. l. 1. cap. 8. <sup>p</sup> DIOGEN. LAERT. in Vita Xenoph. p. 558. <sup>q</sup> SIMPLIC. ubi supra, & DIOG. LAERT. in Vita Parmenidis, p. 560. <sup>r</sup> PLUTARCH. apud Euseb. ubi sup. l. 1. cap. 8. <sup>s</sup> DIOG. LAERT. loco citato. CICERO, in Lucullo. SIMPLIC. & THEMIST. in lib. 1. Physic. Arist. <sup>t</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Vita Zenon. p. 566. <sup>u</sup> CICERO, de Nat. Deor. l. 1. & Quest. Acad. l. 2. LACTANTIUS, de Ira Dei, cap. 10. <sup>v</sup> CICERO, Quest. Acad. ubi supra. <sup>w</sup> BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Spinoza, Rem. A. <sup>x</sup> PLUTARCH. Adv. Colotem, p. 115. <sup>y</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH's Intell. System, p. 108. and BAYLE's Dict. loco citato. <sup>z</sup> LACTANTIUS, de Ira Dei, loco citato. <sup>aa</sup> So PLUTARCH calls him in the passage above quoted. <sup>ab</sup> THOMASIVS, Dissertat. xiv. ad Philosph. Stoic. p. 199.

existence: and therefore he held all things to be substantially the same<sup>c</sup>. Some heretical christians have also embraced this extravagant opinion; as one Amalric in particular, whose dead body was taken up and burnt the beginning of the thirteenth century<sup>f</sup>, for having in his life-time taught that all things were God, and God was all things, and the essence of all creatures; so that the creator and the creature were the same; and that God was therefore called the end of all things, because all returned into him<sup>g</sup>. Which sentiments of his were followed by his scholar David of Dinant, and several others<sup>h</sup>; the learned Peter Abelard having also been accused of holding the same opinion<sup>i</sup>.

Of certain sects among the Japanese, and Mohammedans,

NOR has this notion been confined to Europe only, it having also made no small <sup>a</sup> progress in the east. A considerable sect among the Japanese teach, that there is but one principle of all things; that this principle is simple, clear, luminous, incapable of encrease or diminution, without figure, perfect in the highest degree, wise, but void of reason or understanding, leading a life of perfect inaction, ease, and tranquillity, like a man whose attention is strongly fixed on one thing, regardless of all other. They hold that this principle is in all particular beings, and communicates his essence to them in such a manner, that they are the same thing with him, and are resolved into him when they are destroyed<sup>k</sup>. The sect called by the Mohammedans al Zenâdika (the singular of which is Zendik) do also maintain, that whatsoever we see, or is in the world, is God<sup>l</sup>. And the famous Abu Moslem, by whose conduct and success the Khalifat was translated from the family of Omeya to that of Abbâs, is said to have held the same opinion, and that all things returned at last into one common principle, or God; which opinion, some have supposed to be what the Arabian authors call the Metempsychosis of resolution<sup>m</sup>, and differs little, if any thing, from that of a later sect, who sprang up among the Mohammedans about 300 years ago, and call themselves Ahl al tahkik, or people of certainty: they believe that there is no other God than the four elements, which together with the world, and all its changes and vicissitudes, they assert to be eternal; and that mankind, as well as other beings, are a compound of those elements, of which they are formed, and into which they return and are dissipated. Of this sect there are great numbers in the province of Lar in Persia<sup>n</sup>. <sup>b</sup>

The dogm of the soul of the
world.

THE dogm of the soul of the world, which is not only common at this time in the east, but was so among the ancients, and made the chief part of the Stoic system, is at the bottom the same with that of Spinoza<sup>o</sup>: but as he differed from the Stoics not only in contracting God's knowledge, which they allowed to be universal, and in denying his providence; but also in asserting the present disposition of the world to have been necessary and eternal, and consequently subject to no decay, contrary to their express doctrine, it will be more proper to consider that opinion under the next head. We shall only observe here, that some heterodox Stoics, as Boëthius in particular, did not only deny the world to be an animal, or intelligent being<sup>p</sup>, substituting in the room of its mind or soul a plastic nature; but also asserted the world's eternity <sup>d</sup> and incorruptibility, or one constant and invariable course or tenor of things<sup>q</sup>. The elder Pliny seems also to have been of this opinion; for he declares, that the world, and that which by another name is called heaven, by whose circular motion all things are governed, ought to be believed to be an eternal and immense deity, such as was neither made, nor shall ever be destroyed<sup>r</sup>.

The opinion of
Spinoza,

SPINOZA taught that there is no difference of substances, but that the whole and every part of the material world is a necessarily existent being, and consequently infinite<sup>s</sup>; that there is no other God but the universe<sup>t</sup>, and that extension is one of his attributes<sup>u</sup>: that since it is absolutely impossible for any thing to be created or produced by another, and also absolutely impossible for God to have caused any thing to be in any respect different from what it now is<sup>v</sup>; every thing that exists must needs be so a part of the divine substance, not as a modification caused in it by any will, or good pleasure, or wisdom in the whole (for he expressly denies God to act by any freedom <sup>e</sup>

<sup>c</sup> ALBERTUS MAGNUS, in 1 Physic. Tract. 3. c. 13. <sup>f</sup> V. PRATEOLUM, in Elencho Hæres. Voce Amalricus, p. 23. He adds, that, according to some authors, this heretic and his adherents were burnt alive.

<sup>g</sup> THOMASUS, loco citato, ex GERSON. Tractat. de Concordia Metaphys. cum Logic. <sup>h</sup> See the authors just cited, and BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Spinoza, Rem. A. <sup>i</sup> BAYLE, ibid. <sup>k</sup> POSSEVIN. Biblioth. Select.

Tom. I. lib. x. cap. 11. p. 411, &c. See also BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Japon, Rem. D. <sup>l</sup> Viaggi di

PIETRO DELLA VALLE, Tom. III. p. 394. <sup>m</sup> ابن زيدون BEN AL AMID, in vita Khalifæ al Mansûr.

See a more precise account of this opinion in Mr. Sale's preliminary discourse to his translation of the Korân, p. 176, and 181. <sup>n</sup> DELLA VALLE, Tom. III. p. 392. <sup>o</sup> V. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Spinoza, Rem. A.

<sup>p</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Vita Zenonis Cit. p. 455. <sup>q</sup> PHILO JUD. de Incorruptibilitate Mundi, p. 947. Posidonius and Panætius also maintained the world to be eternal. Ibid. <sup>r</sup> PLIN. Nat. Hist. lib. 2. c. 5.

<sup>s</sup> SPINOZA, in Ethic. Part I. Prop. 6, 7, and 8. <sup>t</sup> Ibid. Prop. 14. <sup>u</sup> Ibid. in Schol. ad Prop. 15, & Part II. Prop. 2. <sup>v</sup> Ibid. Part I. Prop. 6, & 33.

of will, or for the sake of final causes<sup>7</sup>) but as of absolute necessity in itself, with respect to the manner of the existence of each part; no less than with respect to the self-existence of the whole. So that the opinion of Spinoza evidently comes to this; that the universe or material world is God, or the self-existent being; and that all particular beings, corporeal extension, the sun, moon, plants, animals; men, their motions, ideas, imaginations and appetites, are all necessary modifications of him<sup>8</sup>.

THIS monstrous system, tho' it has met with some patrons, has yet been sufficiently Confuted exposed and confuted by even the weakest of its adversaries<sup>9</sup>, and indeed carries its antidote along with it. For Spinoza, to avoid the abovementioned insuperable objection made to the Eleatics, who held the universe to be immutable, falls into a worse extremity, and attributes a continual change and corruption to the divine nature, in respect of its various modifications: which doctrine shocks common sense, it being horrible to suppose the Deity both the cause and subject of all the moral and physical evils which are so frequent in the world; and what can be more absurd, than to imagine matter, the vilest of all things, the theatre of all changes, and the field of battle of contrary causes, to be that supreme, perfect being, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning<sup>10</sup>? The very foundations of this hypothesis are in a moment overturned, if we admit either a vacuum, or the divisibility of matter, the one destroying the infinity, and the other the unity of God<sup>11</sup>; and therefore the Spinozists constantly deny both, ridiculously pretending that there can be no division of matter, unless one part be separated from the other by empty space. It seems also impossible, according to this system, that the Deity can be an intelligent being: for perception and intelligence being really a distinct quality or perfection, and not a mere effect or composition of unintelligent figure and motion, as has been well proved<sup>12</sup>; it follows, that God could not possibly be possessed even of that imperfect understanding allowed him by Spinoza, which however being wholly separate from any power of will or choice, is, in any respect of any excellency, or indeed to any common sense, the very same thing as no understanding at all<sup>13</sup>. Mr. Hobbes, who also held that there was no substance distinct from matter, being pressed in his own mind with the difficulty arising from the impossibility of sense or consciousness being merely the effect of figure and motion, is forced to recur to that prodigiously absurd supposition of the ancient Hylozoics, that all matter, as matter, is indued not only with figure and a capacity of motion, but also with an actual sense or perception; and wants only the organs and memory of animals to express its sensation<sup>14</sup>.

THE second opinion, that the substance of the universe is eternal, tho' the form be not, was generally embraced by the ancients, who from that established axiom, That nothing can be produced from nothing<sup>15</sup>, concluded the creation of matter to be an absolute impossibility; but at the same time thought they had good reason to believe the world had not always been in its present state and disposition. They who held this opinion may be divided into two classes. The first endeavoured to account for the generation of the world, or its reduction into the present form, from mechanical principles only, and the activity of matter, without having recourse to the assistance of any divine power; the other introduced an intelligent mind, as the architect and disposer of all things. But before we produce their several systems and notions, it may be proper to examine the principles they proceed upon more nearly.

THERE is no doubt but that the creation of matter, on due weighing the arguments for and against it, will appear to be so far from impossible<sup>16</sup>, that it must necessarily be admitted<sup>17</sup>. For if it be absurd to imagine matter to be the only substance, as has been sufficiently shewn, it is much more so to suppose two or more eternal beings; which yet was not by the ancients thought to be contradictory. But this impious position, that God is not the creator of matter, being once laid down for truth, those philosophers who made God the former, preserver, and director of the world, notwithstanding their seeming orthodoxy, argued much more inconsistently than those who denied him to have any concern with it. For if matter was an eternal uncreated being, and distinct from God, it owed its existence to its own nature only, depending on no other cause, either in respect of its essence or its properties. And it is contrary to all rules of reason, that another being should exercise so great a power over matter as entirely to change it, and form a world out of that which had been self-existent from all eternity without being a world. If God's right to act in this manner be founded on his superior power, the same title would authorize all usurpations, and confound all notions of right and wrong. If it be said, that God dealt thus arbitrarily with matter out of a principle of goodness, on a supposition of its insensibility and precedent imperfection; the answer which has been given is, that such a work would not be so much an instance of God's goodness, as an effect of superfluous diligence, in endeavouring to put in order what he had not created, as if any order or perfection could be wanting in a being which had eternally subsisted of itself; for all accessions to such a being must be foreign to its nature, and consequently a defect. God therefore must in such a case have begun his work by an ill action, in going about to a de-vest of its natural state a substance uncreated as well as himself, and his own sister <sup>1</sup>.

The opinion of those who held the matter of the world to be eternal, but not the form.

The absurdity of supposing matter to be uncreated.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid. Prop. 32. Coroll. 1.    <sup>8</sup> Ibid. in Append. ad Prop. 36.    <sup>9</sup> See Dr. CLARKE's Demonstr. &c. p. 28, Sec. & BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Spinoza, Rem. DD.    <sup>10</sup> Vid. BAYLE, ibid. Rem. M. & P. <sup>11</sup> Jam. i. 17. See BAYLE, Dict. Hist. ubi sup. Rem. N.    <sup>12</sup> Tho' Spinoza allows God to be one, yet he asserts that God cannot be said to be one, or a simple Being, in Propriety of Speech. Opera Posthuma, Ep. 50. p. 557.    <sup>13</sup> Dr. CLARKE's Demonstr. &c. p. 61, &c.    <sup>14</sup> Ibid. 55.    <sup>15</sup> HOBBS Physic. cap. 25. Sect. 9. See Dr. CLARKE, ubi supra, p. 63.    <sup>16</sup> Ex nihilo nihil.    <sup>17</sup> See before, p. 2.    <sup>18</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Anaxagoras, Rem. G. p. 272. & Art. Hierocles Philosophus, Rem. A.

On the other hand, they who attribute the formation of the universe to mere matter and motion, without the intervention of a Deity, tho' they avoid the abovementioned absurdities, yet fall into other difficulties as inextricable, by supposing the eternal motion of matter; which they are obliged to do, if they will not contradict their own maxim, and admit motion at least to be produced out of nothing. But if motion be eternal, it was either eternally caused by some eternal intelligent being, which would again introduce the Deity whom they had excluded: or it must be of itself necessary and self-existent; whence it would follow, that it must be a contradiction in terms to suppose any matter to be at rest, or to suppose that there might possibly have been originally more or less motion in the universe than there actually was; both which are consequences too absurd and ridiculous for any to admit: or else, without any necessity in its own nature, and without any external necessary cause, it must have existed from eternity by an endless successive communication; which is also a plain contradiction: for an infinite succession of merely dependent beings, without any original cause, is a series of beings, which has neither necessity nor cause, nor any reason at all of its existence, neither within itself, nor from without; that is, 'tis an express impossibility. A late author <sup>2</sup> indeed has ventured to assert, and pretended to prove, that motion, that is the conatus, or endeavour to move, is essential to all matter: but how philosophically, may appear from this one consideration. The conatus to motion in any one particle of matter, must be either a conatus to move some one determinate way at once, or to move every way at once: a conatus to move some one determinate way, cannot be essential to any particle of matter, but must arise from some external cause; because there is nothing in the pretended necessary nature of any particle to determine its motion necessarily and essentially one way rather than another: and a conatus equally to move every way at once, is either an absolute contradiction, or at least can produce nothing in matter but an eternal rest of all and every one of its parts <sup>3</sup>.

Objections to the state of matter before the formation of the world, according to this opinion.

THE state wherein these philosophers conceived matter to have eternally been before the formation of the world, is also liable to several objections. They generally supposed the original of the earth to have been from a chaos, or dark, confused, fluid mass, without distinction of elements, and made up of all variety of parts <sup>4</sup>, but without order, or any determinate form. To this chaos they attributed a certain motion, arising from the action and reaction of the first four qualities, and the different tending of the particles of earth and water downwards, and the air and fire upwards. This motion they absurdly enough imagined to have been irregular and disorderly <sup>5</sup>, till it was stopped, or changed into a regular and natural motion, either by chance, or divine power. But Aristotle has long ago observed, that the supposition of such an irregular motion destroys itself; for it is impossible that what is infinite and eternal should be moved in a disorderly manner, but must necessarily have a regular and natural motion; whence it follows that the production of the world would rather have been an overturning, than introducing the true natural state: for which reason he says Anaxagoras seemed to have been in the right, when he began his formation of the world from matter entirely at rest <sup>6</sup>. So that if we admit the motion of the chaotic particles to have been natural, and according to their several qualities and properties, the very possibility of matter's having continued in that state from eternity is destroyed, because we then introduce a principle, which will necessarily separate the p. 66, 14, and 25. <sup>4</sup> Mr. BAYLE supposes Ovid took the chaos to have been entirely homogeneous, because in his fine description of it, in the first book of his Metamorphosis, he says, that there was then but one face of nature in the world: which is inconsistent with what he presently adds of the disagreeing principles of which the chaos consisted. But that expression may rather be understood of the uniformity of the whole, as being equally, in every part, a promiscuous compound of all the elements. Vid. Dict. Hist. Art. Ovide, Rem. G. <sup>5</sup> PLATO in Timæo, apud ARISTOT. de Cælo, lib. III. cap. 2. p. 370. OVID. Metam. l. 1. <sup>6</sup> ARISTOT. de Cælo, loco citato.

<sup>1</sup> Hierocles, apud Photium in Biblioth. Cod. eccl. p. 1380. See BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Epicure, Rem. S. & Art. Hierocles, ubi supra. <sup>2</sup> Mr. TOLAND, Lett. 3. <sup>3</sup> See Dr. CLARKE's Demonstr.

several kinds of bodies one from the other, and that in a certain limited space of time. This principle also renders the assistance of a Deity unnecessary; for if the chaos be acknowledged to have in itself all the internal power that is requisite for the separation of its parts, and the placing of every element in its proper situation, there can be no occasion for the intervention of any external cause.

To reason well therefore concerning the production of the world, we must consider God as the author of matter, and as the first and sole principle of motion. If we cannot raise our minds so high as to conceive a creation properly so called, which way ever we turn we shall find ourselves driven to assertions and suppositions directly contrary to reason, and be involved in an endless labyrinth of absurdities and contradictions.

But however they who held this opinion were mistaken in accounting for the origin of the world, they had great reason to assert that it had a beginning, and was once formed out of a confused chaos. For though the precise time of this formation could not have been exactly known, without revelation; yet even at this day, there are remaining many considerable and very strong rational proofs, which make it exceeding probable, that this present frame and constitution of the earth, at least, has been of no very ancient date. The changes which must necessarily fall out naturally in the earth in a vast length of time, by petrification, the sinking and washing down of mountains, the daily encroaching of the land upon the sea, the consumption of water by plants, and innumerable other accidents; the universal tradition of the most ancient nations, both learned and barbarous; the number of men with which the earth is at present inhabited; the late original and invention of all useful arts and sciences; the shortness of the history of the world, which reaches up but to a very few ages; the manifest absurdities and contradictions of those few accounts which pretend to a greater antiquity; the impossibility that universal deluges, or other accidents, should at certain long periods have oftentimes destroyed far the greatest part of mankind, with the memory of all former actions and inventions, and yet never have happened to destroy them all; these and many more arguments drawn from nature, reason, and observation, make it exceeding probable that the formation of the earth was novel, and of no great antiquity. And it is not to be doubted, but that the doctrine of those ancient poets and philosophers, who taught that the world had a beginning, was founded on still more ancient traditions, which were so many authorities to them, as their testimonies are at this day to us.

These philosophers right in supposing the world had a beginning.

HAVING observed thus much, it is time to take a view of the different hypotheses, which may be ranged under this head; and we shall begin with those who excluding all divine interposition, accounted for the formation of the universe from the properties and action of matter only.

AND with this doctrine the most ancient profane accounts we have now remaining of the original of the world, viz. the Phœnician, Egyptian, and Babylonian, have been charged; but whether justly or no, must be left to the judgment of the reader, after we shall have laid before him, first the accounts themselves, and then the observations which have been made on them.

THE first of them is that of the Phœnicians, which has been transmitted to us by Sanchoniatho, one of their own writers, and was originally taken, as he assures us, from the cosmogony of Taautus, who was the same with the Egyptian Thoth, or Hermes. He wrote, that the first principle of the universe was a dark and spiritual (or windy) air, or a spirit of dark air, and a turbid obscure chaos; and that these things were infinite, and for many ages had no bounds. But when the spirit was affected with love towards its own principles, and a mixture followed, that conjunction was called desire. This was the beginning of the formation of all things: but the spirit did not know (or acknowledge) its own production. From this conjunction of the spirit was begotten Môt, which some call mud, others a corruption of a watry mixture; and of this came the seed of all creatures, and the generation of the universe. That there were certain animals which had no sense, from which proceeded intelligent animals called Zophasemin<sup>a</sup>, that is, the contemplators of heaven, being formed alike in the shape of an egg: immediately Môl, with the sun, moon, stars, and larger constellations, shone forth. That the air being intensely enlightened by the violent degree of heat communicated to the sea and earth, winds were generated, and clouds, and great descents and defluxions of the heavenly waters; and when they were separated, and drawn from their proper place by the heat of the sun, and then met all again in the air, and dashed the one against the other, thunders and lightnings were engendered; and at the noise of the thunders the before-mentioned intelligent animals awoke, and were terrified with the sound, and male and female moved in the earth and in the sea <sup>2</sup>.

The Phœnician cosmogony.

* See BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Ovide, Rem. G. * See Dr. NICHOLLS's Conf. with a Theist, Vol. I. Part I. p. 26, &c. Dr. BURNET's Theory of the Earth, Book I. c. 4. p. 49. Dr. CLARKE's Discourse concerning the evidences of natural and revealed Religion, p. 252. SANCHONIATHO, apud EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. i. c. 10. Môt. BOCHART derives this Word from the Arabic Maiah, which signifies, as he says, the first Matter of Things. But as SANCHONIATHO makes the Chaos, and not Môt, to be the first material Principle, Bishop CUMBERLAND thinks it may better be accounted for from another Arabic Word, which needs no such Changes as he is forced to presume: and that is Matha, which signifies to steep, or macerate in Water; Math, the Noun, denotes such a Communion, or Solution, as is thereby made; a Mixture, as Physicians speak. CUMBERLAND, Remarks on the Cosmogony of Sanchon. p. 4. By what is afterwards said of Môt's shining forth with the Sun, Moon, and Stars, it seems THOTH considered the Earth as a Planet. Vid. ib. p. 18.

Remarks
thereon.

EUSEBIUS of Cæsarea, to whom we are obliged for preserving this fragment, observes, that this cosmogony of the Phœnicians directly brings in atheism<sup>a</sup>, Sanchoniatho having therein delivered no divinity or theology concerning the supreme God, nor concerning the inhabitants of heaven<sup>a</sup>, or angels. Which animadversion has been approved and pursued by a late very learned man<sup>b</sup>, who, with great reason, looked on this account of the origin of things as a professed apology for the idolatrous worship paid to dead men, and the several parts of the universe; Thoyth having led his transcriber into the foulest sink of heathenism, which is neglect of the sovereign and only true God, in the making, and consequently of the governing of the world; and endeavoured to establish the vain and foolish religion of the Phœnicians and Egyptians, who worshipped the creature more than the creator<sup>c</sup>, by pretending to give a generation of the world without any help from God, and supposing that the heathen deities, the Zophasemin, which were the planets and fixed stars, passed gradually from the life of plants, which have no sense (and yet some of them were worshipped) through the state of sensible animals, which were more solemnly served, till at length they came to be perfect intelligences<sup>d</sup>, and so worthy to challenge the highest worship which they gave to them, in which their state-religion rested. <sup>b</sup>

ON the other hand it has been remarked, that it is well known Eusebius took all advantages possible to represent the pagans to the worst, and render their theology ridiculous and absurd<sup>e</sup>; and that if the best interpretation be put on the words of Sanchoniatho, it is not improbable that the Phœnicians supposed two principles, of which one was a turbid dark chaos, and the other a spirit<sup>f</sup>, or an understanding prolific goodness, forming and hatching the corporeal world into perfection<sup>g</sup>, the eternity of which spirit seems also to be asserted, by what follows, that it knew not its own generation, that is, had no original at all. But this Phœnician cosmogony being confessedly taken from that of Thoyth, and consequently agreeing in substance with the Egyptian, which is therefore under the same imputation of atheism, judgment may be suspended till that be considered also. <sup>c</sup>

The Egyptian
cosmogony.

THE account of the origin of the universe, given us by Diodorus Siculus, is generally supposed to be the cosmogony of the Egyptians<sup>h</sup>, though Diodorus himself does not say so much; and is as follows: When the universe first coalesced, heaven and earth were of one form, their nature being blended together; but afterwards, as bodies separated, the world took on it the entire disposition wherein we now behold it, and the air began to have a constant motion; upon which its fiery parts flew to the upper regions, being naturally carried upwards by their own levity; and hence proceeded the rapid circular motion of the sun and other stars. The muddy and turbid matter, after it had been incorporated with the humid, subsided in one place by its own weight, and being agitated with continual internal volutations, of the watry parts the sea became formed, and of the more solid the earth, which was slimy and very soft at first, but stiffening by the rays of the sun, the surface began to ferment, by reason of the heat; and some of the humid parts swelled, and rose by degrees into putrid pustules, covered with thin membranes. The humid matter being thus fecundated by the genial heat, by night received nutriment from the mist falling from the ambient air, and by day grew more and more solid by the sun's warmth, <sup>d</sup>

<sup>a</sup> ZOPHASEMIN. דְּוִשְׁמִין Sophe Shamaim in Hebrew, or Phœnician, signifies the Spies or Observers of Heaven. These Animals were not the Angels, as BOCHART imagines, but the Celestial Bodies, which SANCHON. supposes to be intelligent, and therefore were adored as Gods. Vid. ib. p. 21. <sup>b</sup> SANCHON. apud Euseb. ubi supra. <sup>c</sup> EUSEB. ibid. p. 33. <sup>d</sup> Idem, l. 1. cap. 9. p. 31. <sup>e</sup> Bishop CUMBERLAND, in his Remarks on the Cosmogony of Sanchoniatho. <sup>f</sup> Vid. Rom. i. 19, &c. <sup>g</sup> Noëp. <sup>h</sup> CUDWORTH'S Intellectual System, p. 319. <sup>i</sup> Πνεύμα; which Bishop CUMBERLAND translates Wind. <sup>j</sup> CUDWORTH, p. 21. <sup>k</sup> EUSEBIUS seems to be of the same Opinion, though he entitles the Chapter wherein he transcribes this Passage from Diodorus (being the 7th of his 1st Book de Præp. Ev.) Of the Cosmogony according to the Greeks, in regard of their Agreement in general with it, the Grecian Philosophers having, as is notorious, received their Physiology from the Egyptians.

till

till at length the inclosed brood being arrived at perfect maturity, and the membranes burnt up and burst, all kinds of creatures were produced. Of which those which had obtained the greater degree of heat, became volatiles, and flew upwards; those in which the earthy concretion prevailed, were placed in the rank of reptiles, and other terrestrial animals; and the creatures which chiefly consisted of a watry nature, repaired to a congenial element, and were called fish. At length the earth continually hardening more and more by the heat of the sun, and by the winds, could no longer produce any of the larger animals; but they began to propagate their several species by generation. And to obviate any objection against the possibility of the earth's producing living creatures, our author instances in the vast number of mice, which are said to be bred in the upper Egypt out of the putrified mud, after the overflowing of the Nile.

• THIS cosmogony, as has been observed<sup>k</sup>, agrees in substance with the former, but is more large (as later commentaries use to be) in particulars, and nice attempts to a mechanic explication of the generation of the world without any help from God<sup>l</sup>: which content is an argument that they took their notions from the same fountain, Thoyto. And Eusebius makes the same animadversion on this latter, as he does on the former; that the name of God is not so much as mentioned therein, but a kind of fortuitous and spontaneous formation of the universe introduced<sup>m</sup>. To confirm which judgment he in another place recites a passage of Porphyrus, who in his epistle to Anebo an Egyptian priest, writes, that Charemon and others thought there was nothing prior to the visible worlds, and began their discourses with the Egyptian gods, which were no other than the planets and stars which fill the zodiac, or those which rise with them; forasmuch as they who made the sun the Demiurgus, or architect of the world, interpreted their stories of Isis and Osiris, and the rest of their sacred fables, altogether into the stars and planets, and the river Nile; and explained all things universally into natural or inanimate, and nothing into incorporeal and living substances. From whence Eusebius infers, that even the secret theology of the Egyptians desired no other than the stars and planets, and acknowledged no incorporeal principle of the universe, nor any demiurgic reason, God or gods, or intelligent and invisible powers, but the visible sun only, referring the production of all things to the material, senseless, and perishable elements<sup>n</sup>. Herewith agrees also that concise account of the Egyptian philosophy given us by Diogenes Laertius<sup>o</sup> from Manetho and Hecataeus; that matter was the first principle, out of which the four elements were afterwards separated, and all kinds of animals perfectly formed; and that the sun and moon were their gods, the one being called Osiris, and the other Isis.

FROM this imputation of acknowledging no Deity besides stupid matter, the Egyptians have been strenuously defended by a very able man<sup>p</sup>, who thinks what Eusebius urges against them to be of the less weight, because he plainly contradicts it elsewhere, by declaring that that nation professed the belief of a demiurgic reason and intellectual architect of the world, whom, he tells us, from the same Porphyrus, they called Cneph, and symbolically represented in the shape of a man of a dark blue complexion, holding a girdle and a sceptre, with a royal plume on his head, and thrusting forth an egg out of his mouth, from whence proceeded another god, whom they named Phtha, and the Greeks Vulcan. The reason of which hieroglyphic is thus given: because this intellectual being is difficult to be found out, hidden and invisible, and because he is the giver of life, and king of all things, and because he is moved in an intellectual or spiritual manner, which is signified by the feathers on his head. The egg which proceeds from the mouth of this god, is interpreted to be the world<sup>q</sup>. The first most divine Being was also sometimes described as a serpent with a hawk's head, beautiful to look on; who if he opens his eyes, fills the universe with light in his first born region; but if he winks, darkness is made<sup>r</sup>. And as for that passage in Porphyrus's epistle concerning Charemon, where he only propounds doubts to Anebo, as desiring further information from him concerning them, Iamblichus has given an answer to it, under the person of Abammo, another Egyptian priest, who says, that Charemon, and those others who pretend to write of the first causes of the world, declare only the last, and lowest principles, as likewise those who treat of the planets, zodiac, and other astronomical matters: for the Egyptians did not resolve all things into nature, but distinguished both the life of the thereon.

Remarks

<sup>l</sup> Dion. Sic. lib. 1. p. 7, 8. The account of the cosmogony given in a spurious book, attributed to Hermes, entitled Divine Sermons, is purposely omitted, as of no authority or credit. <sup>k</sup> Vid. GROTIUM de veritate Rel. Christ. l. 1. sect. 16. in notis. <sup>m</sup> CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 9. <sup>n</sup> EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. 1. c. 7. p. 21. <sup>o</sup> Idem, ibid. l. 3. c. 4. <sup>p</sup> In Proemio, p. 8. <sup>q</sup> Dr. CUDWORTH, in his Intel. System, p. 317, &c. <sup>r</sup> EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. 3. c. 11. p. 115. <sup>s</sup> Idem. ibid. l. 3. cap. 10. p. 41.

soul, and the intellectual life, from that of nature, not in the universe only, but in man also; acknowledging an intellectual mind and reason first to have existed of themselves, and so this whole world to have been made<sup>1</sup>. From which testimony of Iamblichus, who was but little junior to Porphyry, and contemporary with Eusebius, and who had made it his business to inform himself thoroughly of the Egyptian theology, it plainly appears that the Egyptians did not generally suppose (as Chærenon pretended concerning some of them) a senseless inanimate nature to be the first original of all things, but that as well in the world, as in ourselves, they acknowledged soul superior to nature, and mind or intellect superior to soul, this being the maker of the world<sup>2</sup>. And many passages to the same purpose might be produced from the same writer, and from the Hermaic books now extant, among which tho' much is forged and spurious, yet it seems very probable, that they contain some remains and tincture of the old Egyptian and Hermetic doctrine. But we cannot omit observing, that it was thought to be so notorious and confessed a thing, that the Egyptians held the world not only to have had a beginning, but also to have been made by God; that Simplicius, a zealous contender for the world's eternity, affirms the Mosaic history of the creation of the world by God, to have been nothing else but a fabulous tradition, and wholly drawn from Egyptian fables<sup>3</sup>.

BUT these different authorities may be perhaps reconciled, by distinguishing between the religion of the Lower Egypt, whose inhabitants were gross idolaters, and that of Thebais, where the worship of Cnepb, the immortal and supreme God, so much prevailed, that they were not taxed towards the charge of maintaining the sacred animals worshipped by the others<sup>4</sup>.

BEFORE we dismiss the Egyptians, it may not be amiss to observe, that their priests also taught, that the earth had certain periods or revolutions, being destroyed alternately by water and fire, and renewed again<sup>5</sup>.

The Babylonian cosmogony.

As to the Chaldeans or Babylonians, Diodorus says, they held the nature of the world to be eternal, and that it had neither any original generation, nor is subject to any future corruption; yet that the order and beautiful disposition of all things were caused by a divine providence, and that whatever are now in the heavens were not casual, or spontaneous, but perfected by the determinate and established decree of the gods<sup>6</sup>. But Berosus, who ought to challenge the greater authority, both in respect to his antiquity and his being himself of that nation, has left us the following account of their cosmogony, taken from what Oannes (of whom more hereafter) wrote concerning the origin of things. There was, says he, a time when the universe was darkness and water, wherein frightful animals of compounded forms were generated. That some men were born with two wings, others with four, and two faces: some having but one body and two heads, one of a man, the other of a woman, and double privities, of the male and of the female. That of other men, some had the legs and horns of goats, some horses feet, others the hinder parts of horses and the fore parts of men, being in the form of Hippocentaurs. That bulls were generated having the heads of men; and dogs with four bodies, having in their hinder parts the tails of fish; and horses with dogs heads: that there were also men and other animals, which had the heads and bodies of horses, but the tails of fishes; and other living creatures having the shapes of all kinds of beasts. Besides these, there were also generated fishes, and creeping things, and serpents, and many other animals very wonderful, and having the mixed shapes of one another; whose pictures are also kept in the temple of Belus. The governess of all these was a woman named Omorôca<sup>7</sup>, which in the Chaldee tongue is Thalath<sup>8</sup>, but in Greek signifies the sea, and with equal propriety the moon. This being the constitution of the universe, Belus came and divided the woman in the midst, and the one half of her made the earth, and the other half the heaven, and the animals which were in her perished. But he says, that these things are delivered concerning the nature of the world in an allegorical manner. For the world being humid, and animals generated therein, the aforesaid god took away the woman's head, and the other gods mixed her body which fell down with the earth, and formed men, for which

<sup>1</sup> IAMBlichus apud CUDWORTH, Intell. System, p. 318, &c.    <sup>2</sup> CUDWORTH, ibid.    <sup>3</sup> SIMPLIC. in Aristot. Phys. l. 8. p. 168.

<sup>4</sup> PLUT. de Iside & Osirid. p. 359. See also CUMBERL. on the Cosmog. of Sanchon. p. 11, &c.    <sup>5</sup> PLATO, in TIM. ORIGEN. contra Celsum, l. 5.    <sup>6</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 2. p. 116.

<sup>7</sup> In Scaliger's edition Omerca. Our author having translated this name into Chaldee, it must be derived from some other language; but as he does not tell us what that language is, we shall not offer at an etymology of it.

<sup>8</sup> This word is so near in sound to the Greek word Thalassa, the sea, that one would suspect it to be forged, at least much corrupted. Perhaps it may have been written for the Chaldee or Syriac ܬܠܬܬܐ Thalitha, which signifies moisture, or humectation, and answers to the explication afterwards given. The sea and the moon were reckoned the two sources of moisture.

reason they are intelligent, and partake of divine wisdom. That Belus, whom they interpret Jupiter, cutting the darkness in the milt, divided the earth and the heaven from each other, and reduced the world into order; whereupon the animals, not bearing the force of the light, became extinct. But Belus seeing the country desert, tho' fertile, commanded one of the gods to cut off his own head, and to mix the earth with the blood which issued thence, and to form men and beasts that could endure the air: and that Belus perfected the stars, and the sun, and the moon, and the five planets<sup>e</sup>.

FROM this passage we learn, that the old Babylonians expressly attributed the orderly disposition of the world, the perfecting the heavenly bodies, and the formation of men and animals to their supreme god, Bel; tho' they seem to have held the pre-existence of matter. It must therefore be some theology of the later Babylonians, which could with justice be charged, as it has been, with passing over in silence the one principle of the universe<sup>d</sup>; wherein they must have departed from the tradition of their ancestors, the ancient Chaldeans, who were celebrated for their acknowledging one sovereign deity, or maker of the world, as appears from that oracle of Apollo cited by Eusebius<sup>e</sup> from Porphry, where the Chaldeans and Hebrews are alone declared to be possessed of the true wisdom, as worshipping God, the self-begotten king, in a holy manner.

Remarks
thereon.

WE have indeed another account of the cosmogony in the Chaldaic or Magic oracles of Zoroastres; but they have so little pretence to genuineness or antiquity, are so confused a medley of ill-digested notions taken chiefly from the Platonics and Gnostics, very unsatisfactory as to the origin of the universe, and talk so much of unknown matter, the orders of invisible things, mystical numbers, inyges<sup>f</sup>, and other unintelligible jargon, that we might be excused taking any notice of them; but as a very learned man has thought it worth his while to extract the substance of what is most intelligible in them<sup>g</sup>, we shall subjoin it in his own words: The Chaldeans, says he, believe that the first of all things is eternal, the supreme God. That God, who is an intellectual light, or fire, did not shut up his fire within his intellectual power, but communicated it to all creatures: first, and immediately, to the first Mind, and to all other eternal and incorporeal beings, under which notion are comprehended a multitude of gods, angels, good dæmons, and the souls of men. The next emanation is the supramundane light, an incorporeal, infinite, luminous space, in which the intellectual beings reside. The supramundane light kindles the first corporeal world, the empyreum or fiery heaven, which being immediately beneath the incorporeal light, is the highest, brightest, and rarest of bodies. The empyreum diffuses itself thro' the æther, which is the next body below it, and its fire less refined than the empyreum: but that it is fire, the more condensed parts thereof, the sun and stars, sufficiently evince. From the æther, this fire is transmitted to the material and sublunary world; for tho' the matter whereof it consists be not light, but darkness, (as are also the material or bad dæmons) yet this vivificative fire actuates and gives life to all its parts, insinuating, diffusing itself, and penetrating even to the very center, passing from above to the opposite part, thro' the center of the earth.

The account of the cosmogony
in the Chaldaic oracles.

THE old pagan poets, who greatly contributed to the depravation of theology in general, have more particularly countenanced this opinion of the world's being produced from a chaos, without the influence of God. For tho' they make love to preside, as it were, at the ranging of the confused matter, by which some would have us understand the Deity, or the active principle of the universe distinct from matter<sup>h</sup>, yet it is most probable they thereby meant no more than the agreement, or harmony, which ensued on the cessation of that intestine war of the elements: their love having his original from the chaos as well as all the rest of their gods, which were really no other than the heavenly bodies, elements, and other parts of nature, personated and deified. For which reason the cosmogony of the poets was the same with their theology or generation of the gods<sup>i</sup>.

The opinion of the ancient pagan poets.

ORPHEUS, who was the great introducer of the rites of the heathen worship among the Greeks, being charged with having invented the very names of the gods, and declaring their generations, and their several actions, wherein he was for the most part followed by Homer<sup>k</sup>, is yet said to have been perfectly silent in his theology, as to

And of Orpheus in particular.

<sup>a</sup> ALEXANDER POLYHIST. ex Beroso, apud SYNCHELL. Chronogr. p. 29, & EUSEB. Chronic. Græc. Scaligeri, p. 6. <sup>d</sup> DAMASCIUS in fragment. MS. οὐκ ἀρχὴν. apud CUMBERL. Review of the Cosmog. of Sanchon, p. 280. <sup>e</sup> EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. i. 9. cap. 10. <sup>f</sup> See BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 21, 22.

<sup>g</sup> Mr. STANLEY, in his Hist. of the Chald. Philos. Book I. Sect. 1. c. 2. p. 8. <sup>h</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH. Intell. System, p. 212. <sup>i</sup> Vid. eund. p. 334, &c. <sup>k</sup> ATMENAGOR. & JUSTIN. MARTYR, apud eundem, p. 298.

any thing intellectual, as unspeakable and unknown; and to have made one of his principles to be a dragon, having the heads both of a bull and a lion, and in the midst, the face of a god, with golden wings on his shoulders<sup>1</sup>. But notwithstanding the extravagancy of Orpheus's fancy, the generality of the Greek pagans, looking on the man not as a mere poet, but a holy and profound philosopher, supposed all his fables of the gods to be deep mysteries and allegories, which had some hidden and secret sense under them, and therefore had a high veneration for him, as one divinely inspired; inasmuch, that Celsus would have had the Christians rather take Orpheus for a god than CHRIST, as being a man unquestionably endued with a holy spirit, and one who also died a violent death<sup>m</sup>. And tho' he were the great propagator of polytheism, yet it has been thought that he acknowledged one supreme unmade Deity, as the original of all things, not only from the great esteem he was in with those two most religious philosophic sects, the Pythagoreans and Platonists, he being commonly called by them the Theologer, but also because they were supposed, in great measure, to have owed their theology and philosophy to him, as deriving the same from his principles and traditions<sup>n</sup>.

THIS favourable opinion of Orpheus will yet be better founded, if we allow the epitome of the Orphic cosmogony, made long ago by Timotheus the chronographer, to contain the true doctrine of that poet: for he writes, that Orpheus gave an account of the generation of the gods, the creation of the world, and the formation of man, professing that he delivered nothing from his own invention, but as he was informed, on enquiry, by Phæbus, Titan, or the sun. Which account in brief is, that in the beginning the æther or heaven was formed by God, and that on each side of the æther was chaos and dark night, which covered whatsoever was under the æther, thereby signifying that night was prior. He declared also, that there was a certain incomprehensible Being, which was the highest and most ancient of all things, and the maker of the universe, both of the æther itself, and of all things under the æther. That the earth was invisible, by reason of the darkness which was upon it; but the light breaking forth thro' the æther, illuminated the whole creation; this light, which so brake forth, being said by him to be that highest of all beings before mentioned, whose name, as revealed by the oracle, was counsel, light, and the giver of life. That these three names manifest one and the same power and might of that invisible and incomprehensible God, who is the maker of all things, and who bringeth that which is not, into a state of existence. By which power were produced all incorporeal principles, and the sun, and the moon, and the stars, the earth and the sea, and all things therein, both visible and invisible. He likewise declared, that mankind was formed out of the earth by the same Deity, and received from him a rational soul, agreeably to what Moses has recorded. Timotheus adds, that the same Orpheus also wrote, that all things were made by one godhead of three names, and that this God is all things<sup>o</sup>.

If this testimony be admitted, we need not appeal to the Orphic verses, which are very full as to the assertion of a supreme Deity. It is true, many of those verses are supposititious, and manifestly forged either by Christians or Jews; but all of them cannot be proved to be so; several being cited by pagan authors, as written, if not by Orpheus himself, yet by persons of great antiquity and well acquainted with his doctrine and traditions; and therefore, by men of good learning and judgment, thought genuine and worthy of some regard<sup>p</sup>. However, Orpheus's theology has been preferred to that of the other heathens by the christian fathers<sup>q</sup>; and a late ingenious writer has surmized, that his establishing of polytheism was owing rather to the necessity he was under of complying with the stupidity of the barbarous people whom he first civilized, than his own approbation; being obliged to give them, not the religion which himself best approved, but such a one as they were capable of receiving<sup>r</sup>.

BUT to return to the Orphic cosmogony, Syrianus says that Orpheus held two principles, æther, and chaos<sup>s</sup>; to which Simplicius adds a third, as prior to the other two, viz. time, the measure of the fabulous generation of the gods; after which, according to Orpheus, the æther and chaos were produced<sup>t</sup>. By which it should seem he thought the æther and chaos were co-eval: but it has been observed, that the ancients, or the later authors who have handed their opinions down to us, do frequently confound the universe with this sublunary world, and apply what relates distinctly to one of the two, to the other, or both promiscuously; and that of the æther here mentioned, the celestial or first fabric of things was made; and of the chaos, the sublunary world, or our earth, and others like it, at several distant intervals. Which things ought to have been separately treated, as well with regard to the matter, as to the time; though unskilful authors have often neglected that necessary distinction.

<sup>1</sup> DAMASCIUS de i. ap. ar. MS. apud CUMBERL. Review of the Cosmog. of Sanchon. p. 280. & CUDWORTH, ubi supra. <sup>m</sup> CORN. CELS. l. 7. p. 367. apud CUDWORTH, ibid. <sup>n</sup> CUDWORTH, ibid. <sup>o</sup> TIMOTH. Chronogr. apud EUSEB. Chron. GRÆC. p. 4. & CEDREN. p. 57. Vid. etiam SUIDAM, in voce, Orpheus, & PROCL. in Tim. l. 2. p. 117. <sup>p</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH, ubi sup. p. 295, & 300, &c. & BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 125. <sup>q</sup> BURNET, ibid. p. 127. <sup>r</sup> Idem, ibid. p. 120, &c. <sup>s</sup> SYRIAN. in ARIST. Metaph. c. 2. <sup>t</sup> SIMPLIC. in ARIST. de Auscult. Physic. l. 4.

It is proper here to observe, that Orpheus, among other eastern learning, seems to have first introduced among the Greeks the doctrine of the mundane egg, which in all probability he learned from the Egyptians, who represented the world by that symbol<sup>a</sup>, as many other ancient nations did. The Phœnicians, as we have seen, made their Zophasemin, which were the celestial bodies, oviform; and worshipped an egg, in the Orgia of Bacchus, as an image of the world<sup>b</sup>. And the same comparison or resemblance was made use of by the Chaldeans, Persians, Indians, and Chinese, as will be observed hereafter: and this not only for its external figure, but also for the inward composition of it; the shell representing the heaven, the white the air, and the yolk the earth<sup>c</sup>; tho' others make out this resemblance in a different manner<sup>d</sup>. Hence Plutarch<sup>e</sup> observes, that the question which was the elder, the egg or the hen, was not a trivial enquiry; but, according to the Orphic doctrine, comprehended the ancient generation of all things: and the author of the hymns attributed to Orpheus, makes the first-born god, named by the Greeks Phanes, to be produced from an egg<sup>f</sup>. This was the first-begotten god, mentioned by Athenagoras to have been hatched from the egg, as the followers of Orpheus taught<sup>g</sup>.

ANOTHER opinion of the Orphic theologers, which must not be forgotten, was, that God was all things; but this is not to be understood in a gross sense, so as to take away all distinction between God and the creature; for they taught this doctrine chiefly on the two following accounts: First, Because all things coming from God, they inferred, that therefore they were all contained in him, and consequently were, in a certain sense, himself. The second is, Because the world, produced by God, and really existing without him, is not therefore quite cut off from him, nor subsists alone by itself as a dead thing, but is still livingly united to him, essentially dependent on him, always supported, quickened, and pervaded by him. In the latter of which senses, some christian divines also have made God to be all; as when they affirm the whole world to be nothing else but God expanded, and when they call the creatures, as Sr. Jerom and others often do, the rays of the Deity. But tho' the scripture itself may seem to give some countenance to these expressions, yet they ought to be used with great caution, being easily liable to mistake and abuse; and the mistake and abuse of this one thing, might possibly have been a chief ground of the both seeming and real polytheism, not only of the Greek and European, but also of the Egyptian and other pagans: they concluding, that because God was all things, and consequently all things God, therefore God ought to be worshipped in all things, that is, in the several parts of nature<sup>h</sup>.

WHETHER the preceding opinions as to the original of the world be acquitted of the charge of atheism, or not, it is certain that the philosophy which derives all things from senseless matter, in the way of forms and qualities, without the assistance of a God, was of great antiquity, and as old as any records of time among the Greeks; the ancient physiologists generally making the ocean, or water, to have been the original of all things: for which reason the oath of the gods is said to be by water, called by the poets Styx, which being most ancient, deserved the greatest reverence, and was consequently most proper to swear by<sup>i</sup>. And hence the ocean is by Homer called the progenitor of the gods, and source of all things<sup>j</sup>: and Thales, the prince of the Ionian philosophers, held water to be the first principle, whereof all things consisted<sup>k</sup>; and they also supposed, that at last all things should be dissolved, and return into water again<sup>l</sup>. But it seems that those ancients, when they made water to have been the first principle, did not thereby mean the elementary water, but the chaos, which was a fluid substance, as the Greek word signifies. For which reason Zeno and Platarch took the chaos of Hesiod to have been water <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> BURNET, ubi sup. p. 1. o.    <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 13. d.    <sup>c</sup> PLUT. in Sympoſ. l. 2. quæſt. 3. Vid. MACRUB. SAT. l. 7. c. 16.    <sup>d</sup> VARRO, apud PROB. GRAM. in Ecl. 6. Virgil.    <sup>e</sup> Vid. ACHILLEM TATIUM in ARRI PHAENOM. cap. 4. & BURNET. THEOR. SACR. TEILUR. l. 2. c. 10. and Theory of the Earth. Book I. c. 5. p. 86.    <sup>f</sup> In Sympoſ. l. 2. quæſt. 3.    <sup>g</sup> Hymn. Πρωτογεν. Vid. LACTANT. de falsâ Rel. l. 1. c. 5.    <sup>h</sup> ATHENAG. Legat. pro Christ.    <sup>i</sup> CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 307.    <sup>j</sup> Vid. ARISTOT. Metaph. l. 1. c. 3.    <sup>k</sup> HOMER. apud Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſ. l. 1. c. 3.    <sup>l</sup> PLUTARCH. de placit. Philoſ. l. 1. c. 3. DIOG. LAERT. in vita Thaletis, p. 17. CICERO. in Lucilio, & de Nat. Deor. l. 1. This also agrees with a paſſage in scripture, the genuine sense of which (according to the judgment of the best interpreters) is, that the material heavens, as well as earth, were made out of water. 2 Pet. iii. 5. Vid. CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 21. & BURNET, Archæol. l. 1. p. 138, and Theory of the Earth, Book I. c. 4. p. 63, &c.    <sup>m</sup> HOMER. Il. H. PLUT. in Stromat. apud EUSEB. de P. xp. Ev. l. 1. c. 8.

The cosmogony
of Hesiod,

THE theogony of this last mentioned poet, which, as has been observed, is also his cosmogony, is somewhat confused, beginning twice from the chaos, and relating things rather in a poetical than philosophical order. The substance of what he delivers is; That in the beginning the chaos first existed, then the wide-extended earth, and next love, the fairest of the immortal gods: that the chaos produced Erebus and night, from the conjunction of which two proceeded Æther and day. After which he proceeds to give an account of the separation of the heaven and stars from the earth, the railing of mountains, and sinking of caves; and of the production of the sea from the heaven and earth together <sup>l</sup>.

and Aristophanes.

BUT there is a much more methodical and compleat description of this ancient cosmogony given by Aristophanes <sup>m</sup>, whence soever he had it: He writes, that first were chaos, black Erebus, and wide Tartarus, but neither earth, nor air, nor heaven: that night, with subtle wings, laid the first egg of wind in the vast bosom of Erebus; from whence, in process of time, issued amiable love, shining with wings of gold, like to impetuous whirl-winds; that love coupling with the obscure chaos, engendred animals and men; but that there were no gods before love mingled all things, from which mixture of things one with another, the heaven and the earth were generated, and the whole race of immortal gods.

THIS passage, notwithstanding it is ludicrously introduced in a comedy, is conceived, not without reason, to have been really a piece of the old atheistic system, and may be thus explained; that chaos, or matter confusedly moved, being the original of all, things did from thence rise up gradually from lesser to greater perfection; first inanimate things, as the elements, heaven, earth and seas, then brute animals, afterwards men, and last of all gods. As if not only the substance of matter, and those inanimate bodies of the elements, fire, water, air and earth, were first in order of nature before God, as being themselves also gods <sup>n</sup>, but also irrational animals at least, if not men too. And this is the atheistic creation of the world, gods and all, out of senseless and stupid matter, or dark chaos, as the only original deity <sup>o</sup>.

The opinion of Thales,

WHETHER Thales, who was a Phœnician by extraction, acknowledged any divine or intelligent being, as assisting in the formation of the world, is a great question. Cicero indeed tells us, that he was the first who searched after such things, and affirmed God to be that Mind which created all things out of water <sup>p</sup>. And Laertius reports, that he used to say God was the oldest of all things, and that the world was the workmanship of God <sup>q</sup>. But on the other side, there are a cloud of witnesses <sup>r</sup>, among whom are Cicero and Laertius themselves <sup>s</sup>, who with joint consent give Anaxagoras, one of his successors, the honour of having first rejected all chance in the disposition of the universe, and introduced a pure intelligent mind, to separate and compose the several parts of it. So that all the philosophers of the Ionic sect who preceded Anaxagoras, being mere materialists, or Hylopathian atheists, Aristotle seems justly to have called Thales the prince or leader of that philosophy <sup>t</sup>. The occasion of his being thus differently represented may possibly have been, because he left no philosophic writings or monuments of his own behind him (Anaxagoras being the first of all the philosophic writers <sup>u</sup>) whence probably it came to pass, that in after-times some interpreted his opinions one way, and some another, and that he is sometimes represented as a theist, and sometimes as an atheist <sup>v</sup>.

Of Anaximander,

BUT if Thales be acquitted, yet his next successor, Anaximander, can by no means be excused from this imputation; for he supposed a certain infinite first matter, which he did not define to be either air, or water, or earth, to be the sole principle of the universe <sup>w</sup>; that the celestial bodies, and infinite worlds, were made of it by secretion, and that generation and corruption proceeded from their moving circularly

<sup>k</sup> ZENO, apud Scholiast. Apollon. Argon. 4. & PLUT. in Tract. Aquane an ignis sit utilior, p. 955.

<sup>l</sup> HESIOD. Theog. vers. 116.

<sup>m</sup> In avib.

<sup>n</sup> Vid. ARIST. de gener. & corrupt. l. 2. c. 6.

<sup>o</sup> CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 121.

<sup>p</sup> CICERO, de Nat. Deor. l. 1. p. 36.

<sup>q</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Thalet. p. 21.

<sup>r</sup> PLATO in Phæd. p. 72. PLUT. in Pericle, p. 154. ARIST. Metaph. lib. 1. cap. 3.

<sup>s</sup> TERTULLIAN. de Anima. CLEMENS ALEX. Stromat. lib. 2. p. 364. EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. 4. c. 14. p. 750.

<sup>t</sup> THEMIST. Orat. XV. AUGUSTIN. de Civit. Dei, l. 8. c. 2. PROCLUS in Timæum. SIMPLIC. in ARIST. de

Phytic. auct. THEODOR. de Græc. affect. Sermon. II. p. 489.

<sup>u</sup> CICERO, de Natura Deor. l. 1.

<sup>v</sup> p. 38, 39. LAERT. in Anaxagorâ, p. 82.

<sup>w</sup> More concerning this Question may be read in BAYLE's

Dict. Hist. Art. Anaxagor. Rem. D. Art. Thales, Rein. A. Dr. CUDWORTH's Intell. System, p. 21, 124.

<sup>x</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Anaxagor. p. 86. THEMIST. (Orat. XX.) says Anaximander was the first who published a Book of Natural Philosophy. But THEOPOMPUS (apud Laert. in Pherecyd. p. 74.) asserts Phere-cydes Syrus to have first written of Nature and the Gods to the Greeks, whose Treatise of the Beginning of Things was extant in the Time of Laertius, ib. 76.

<sup>y</sup> CUDWORTH, ibid. 124.

<sup>z</sup> PLUT. de Placitis Philo. l. 1. c. 3. DIOG. LAERT. in Anaximandro, p. 78. SIMPLIC. in ARISTOT. Phys. l. 1. c. 6.

together from eternity. He also asserted, that the generative principles of heat and cold being separated, when this world was made, a certain sphere of fire first arose, and encompassed the air which surrounds the earth, as the bark doth a tree; this being afterwards broken and divided into smaller spherical bodies, formed the sun, moon and stars<sup>a</sup>. He held also, that the first animals were generated in moisture, and encompassed with certain thorny barks, by which they were defended; which, after further growth, becoming more dry, and cracking, they issued forth, but lived only a short time<sup>b</sup>. That men were at first generated in the bellies of fishes, and being there nourished till they grew strong, and were able to support themselves, they were afterwards cast out upon dry land. And the reason of this strange opinion, as to the original of mankind, was, because other animals soon after their birth betake themselves to their food; but man alone in his infancy needs to be nursed up for a considerable time, and therefore could not be preserved at first in any other manner<sup>b</sup>.

FROM Anaximander's making this universal principle of his infinite, some late writers, and even Clemens Alexandrinus<sup>c</sup> among the ancients, have groundlessly inferred that he thereby meant God, according to the true notion of him, or an infinite mind, the efficient cause of the universe, and not stupid matter<sup>d</sup>. But it is plain that the gods he acknowledged owed their original also to that infinite matter, from which he supposed all things to be secreted, and into which they would return; for he held the gods to be generated, rising and vanishing again in long periods of time, and that these gods were innumerable worlds<sup>e</sup>.

THE physiology of Anaximenes differed but little from that of his master Anaximander; for he held air to be the first principle, and infinite<sup>f</sup>, but that the things which arose there-out were finite, and should at last be resolved into it again. He supposed that all things were generated by a successive condensation and rarefaction of this air; the earth, water, and fire being first produced there-out, and then the other parts of the universe: he held also that motion was from all eternity; that the sun gained its heat from the swiftness of its course; and that air held the world together in the same manner as the soul, which he took to be air also, did the humane frame<sup>g</sup>. He did not, it seems, deny there were any gods, but was so far from allowing them to have formed the world, that he believed them likewise to have their rise from the air<sup>h</sup>. Plutarch, after delivering the opinions of these two philosophers, observes, that they were both of them in the wrong, in supposing the world to have been generated from matter only, without any efficient cause; matter of itself being able to produce nothing, no more than a vessel can be made out of a mass of silver, without the help of an artificer<sup>i</sup>.

ANAXAGORAS and Diogenes of Apollonia, two scholars of Anaximenes, attempted to remedy this grand defect in the Ionic philosophy, by amending their master's hypothesis. The first, by admitting an intelligent being distinct from matter, as has been, and will be more fully observed; and the other, by supposing the air, the first principle of the universe, to be endued with a divine reason, without which he conceived nothing could be produced from it<sup>k</sup>. So that this opinion differed very little from Spinozism.

THE manner in which this latter philosophizes, as to the production of the world, has so near a conformity with the Cartesian hypothesis, that it would be wrong to omit it: All things, says he, being in motion, some became condensed, and others rarified; in those places where condensation prevailed, a whirling motion, or vortex was formed, which by its revolution drew in the rest, and the lighter parts flying upwards, formed the sun<sup>l</sup>.

THE next atheistic system of philosophy is the atomic, which is generally supposed to have been invented by Democritus, who was elder than Aristotle and Plato; but Laertius attributes it to Leucippus<sup>m</sup>, who was somewhat senior to Democritus, though he wrote not so much concerning it as Democritus did. Others make this physiology much more ancient: Posidonius<sup>n</sup> avouched it for an old tradition, that the first inventor of it was Moschus a Phœnician, who lived before the Trojan war<sup>o</sup>, and is supposed to have been the same with Mochus, the Phœnician physiologer mentioned by Iamblichus<sup>p</sup>, with whose successors, priests and prophets, he affirms that Pythagoras,

<sup>a</sup> PLUT. in Strom. apud EUSEB. de Præp. Ev. l. 1. c. 8.

<sup>b</sup> Idem, apud EUSEB. ubi sup. & in Sympof. l. 8. Quæst. 8.

CUDWORTH's Intell. Syst. p. 124.

<sup>c</sup> CICERO de Nat. Deor. lib. 1.

<sup>d</sup> P. 80. ARISTOT. de Auscult. Phys. CICERO Quæst. Acad. l. 2.

<sup>e</sup> PLUT. Ev. l. 1. c. 8. & de placitis Philosoph. l. 1. c. 3.

<sup>f</sup> PLUTARCH. de placitis Philosoph. loco citato.

<sup>g</sup> CICERO de Nat. Deor. l. 1. & ARISTOT. l. 1. de anima, c. 2.

<sup>h</sup> Ev. l. 1. c. 8. <sup>i</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Leucippo, p. 567.

<sup>j</sup> P. 367. & STRABON. lib. 16. p. 512.

<sup>k</sup> STRABO, ibid.

<sup>l</sup> Idem de placitis Phil. l. 5. c. 19.

<sup>m</sup> In protrept. p. 43.

<sup>n</sup> Vid.

<sup>o</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Anaximen.

<sup>p</sup> PLUT. in Strom. apud EUSEB. de

<sup>q</sup> AUGUST. de Civit. Dei, l. 8. cap. 2.

<sup>r</sup> PLUT. in Strom. apud EUSEB. de Præp.

<sup>s</sup> Apud SECT. EMPIRIC. adv. Mathem.

<sup>t</sup> De vita Pythag. c. 3.

while

while he was at Sidon, had conversed. But as Cicero, though Posidonius's scholar, scruples not to question his veracity in some things, and expressly affirms Leucippus, or Democritus, to have been the author of this philosophy<sup>1</sup>, we think his authority of little weight; much less can we approve, as Mr. Selden does<sup>2</sup>, of the conjecture of Archerius, the editor of Iamblichus, that this Mochus was no other than Moses, the celebrated prophet of the Jews. However, it is probable from some other considerations, that Pythagoras was not unacquainted with the atomical physiology; for Democritus himself was of the Italic or Pythagoric succession, and is reported to have taken all his philosophy from them<sup>3</sup>: and the famous monads of Pythagoras are by some supposed to have been nothing else but corporeal atoms<sup>4</sup>. That Empedocles, who<sup>a</sup> was also a Pythagorean, took the world to be compounded of minute particles, is expressly asserted<sup>5</sup>, and will appear more plainly, when we come to give an account of his physiology: and the natural principles of Ecphantus the Syracusan, another of that sect, were indivisible bodies, and vacuum. Nor were they the only ancient philosophers who went that way; Xenocrates, Heraclides, Aclepiades, Diodorus, Metodorus Cibus, and the generality of the old physiologers, having also supposed indivisible particles to be the first principles of bodies. Notwithstanding which, Leucippus and Democritus are reputed the first inventors of the atomic philosophy, either because they brought it to greater perfection, or else, because they first made it a compleat and entire system by itself, so as to derive the original of all things in the whole universe<sup>b</sup> from senseless atoms, which had figure and motion only, and space; from whence it would follow, that there could be no God, not so much as a corporeal one: for before them, the doctrine of atoms made not an entire philosophy by itself, but was looked upon as a part, or member of the whole philosophic system, and that the meanest and lowest part too; it being only used to explain that which was purely corporeal in the world; besides which they acknowledged something else, which was not mere bulk and mechanism, but life and self-activity, that is, immaterial substance; the head whereof is a Deity distinct from the world. So that there have been two sorts of atomists; the first, holding incorporeal substance, used that physiology in a way of subordination to theology: the other, allowing no other substance but body, made<sup>c</sup> senseless atoms, without any mind or understanding, that is, without any God, to be the original of all things; which latter system is that vulgarly known by the name of the atomic philosophy, which was founded by Leucippus and Democritus<sup>6</sup>, and afterwards, with some alteration, taught by Epicurus, though he would not acknowledge that he had borrowed his hypothesis from any<sup>7</sup>.

Occasioned a stricter method of philosophizing.

BUT whoever first introduced it, this hypothesis occasioned a more and strict and accurate method of philosophizing than had formerly been used. For the atomists neglecting numbers, proportions, harmonies, ideas, qualities, and elementary forms, immediately proceeded to examine the bodies themselves, and their physical and mechanical properties, their motion, figure, situation of parts, size, and the like; <sup>d</sup> from whence they very rationally ascertained their several powers, determined their actions, and explained their effects; though the notions they entertained of the indivisibility of their atoms, their innate power of motion, inclinations to certain places, and the like, be not only without any foundation, but repugnant to reason<sup>8</sup>.

The doctrine of Leucippus and Democritus;

THE doctrine of Leucippus and Democritus, as to the origin of the world, was, that the first principles were an infinite number of atoms, or indivisible particles of different sizes and figures, which moving fortuitously, or without design, from all eternity in infinite space, and encountering one another, became variously implicated and entangled, and produced first a confused chaos of all kinds of particles, which afterwards by continual agitation, striking and repelling each other, disposed themselves<sup>e</sup> into a vortex, or vortices, where after many convolutions and evolutions, molitions and essays, in which all imaginable shapes and combinations were tried, they chanced at length to settle into this present form and system of things<sup>9</sup>.

Of Epicurus.

THIS hypothesis, as to the formation of the principal parts of the world, agrees with that of Epicurus, as it is represented by Lucretius<sup>10</sup>, excepting that no mention is made of those vortices, which yet were an essential part of the former. To the two properties attributed to atoms by Democritus, magnitude and figure, Epicurus added a third, weight; without which he did not conceive they could move at all<sup>11</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Cicer. de fato, & de Nat. Deor. l. 1.      <sup>2</sup> SELDEN. de jure nat. & gent. juxta discipl. Hebr. lib. 1. cap. 2. See also La Vie de Pythagore, par Mr. DACIER, p. xxi.      <sup>3</sup> Diog. LAERT. in Democr. p. 570.
<sup>4</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH's Intel. System, p. 13.      <sup>5</sup> PLUT. de placitis Philos. l. 1. cap. 24.      <sup>6</sup> CUDWORTH, p. 16, &c.      <sup>7</sup> Cic. de Nat. Deor. l. 1.      <sup>8</sup> BURNET, Archæol. l. 1. p. 167.      <sup>9</sup> Vid. Diog. LAERT. in Leucippo, p. 567. & in Democrit. p. 573. PLUTARCH. de placitis Phil. l. 1. c. 4. & PLAT. de legibus, l. 10.      <sup>10</sup> Vid. LUCRET. de Res. Nat. l. 5. VIRGIL. Eclog. 6. PLUT. de placitis Phil. l. 1. c. 4. and STANLEY's History of Philosophy, part 13. p. 572, &c.      <sup>11</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. c. 3.

And one of the inevitable consequences of the Democritic system being absolute fatal necessity (for when they maintained that the world was made by a fortuitous concourse of atoms, it was not their meaning to deny the world to have been necessarily made according to the eternal laws of motion of those atoms, but only to exclude the direction of an intelligent cause) and such necessity, in the opinion of Epicurus, overturning all morality, and reducing the humane soul to be a mere machine; in order to account for freedom of will, besides the twofold motion of atoms allowed by those before him, perpendicular and reflexive, he introduced a third; supposing that the atoms could of themselves decline from the right line, and move obliquely, even in a void space, and without any collision at all<sup>a</sup>; from which, as he strangely inferred; proceeded natural liberty. And this declination served also another purpose, that is; to explain the meeting of the atoms; which, if they all moved one way, would have been impossible<sup>c</sup>. But the most material difference between the two hypotheses, though not often taken notice of, was that Epicurus admitted no principle at all but the atoms themselves; whereas Democritus believed them to be animated<sup>f</sup>; a supposition not a whit more absurd than that of their existence and spontaneous motion, and which would yet be of great use in obviating several objections to the atomic system, otherwise unanswerable<sup>g</sup>.

As to the production of animals and mankind, the Epicurean philosophy accounted for it in this manner: It was supposed that the new formed earth containing in it the seeds of all things, the sun, acting by its heat on the moiister parts, raised small bladders like little wombs, in which the embryo's, at first imperfect, were conceived, and through which they broke their way when arrived at maturity; and that for their nourishment nature provided bags, like small breasts, furnished with a milky juice. And it is pretended, that this fecundity cannot seem strange, in that juvenile vigour of nature, if we consider what numbers of smaller creatures and insects are at this day bred in the same way. But at length, the seeds of the earth being exhausted, she, like a woman past child-bearing, of course left off this way of producing the more perfect animals; whence it is that every species is now propagated by copulation<sup>h</sup>.

THIS atomic system, which had been superseded by Plato and Aristotle, who brought in ideas, forms, and qualities, instead of the mechanical properties of matter, was raised by Epicurus to a high degree of reputation, and continued to flourish after his death beyond any other philosophy<sup>i</sup>; though it was justly decried by the other sects, on account of the atheism which naturally flowed from its principles. Had Democritus only supposed God to be a mind or intelligence placed in a sphere of fire, and the soul of the world<sup>k</sup>, he would have been much more excusable than in teaching, as he did, that the images of objects, which on every side present themselves to us, and the nature which scatters round, or emits such images, and even our own knowledge and understanding, were to be reckoned among the gods<sup>l</sup>. So that what Democritus called God, had neither the unity, nor eternity, nor immutability, nor other attributes which are essential to the divine nature: and yet an opinion very like this was not long ago advanced<sup>m</sup>, on the supposition that our ideas are in God, and that they cannot be a modification of a created mind; from which it seems to follow that our ideas are God himself<sup>n</sup>. As to Epicurus, he acknowledged indeed that there were gods, and that they deserved to be worshipped on account of the excellence of their nature, tho' no benefit was to be expected from them, nor any harm to be feared<sup>o</sup>: for he allowed them to be neither the makers, nor the governors of the world. And yet a very learned man has lately undertaken the defence of Epicurus, as to this latter point, and maintained that he did not deny a divine providence<sup>p</sup>. He supposed the gods were immortal, and supremely happy, leading a life of perfect inaction and tranquillity; that they were of human form, yet had not real bodies and blood, but something analogous to them<sup>q</sup>; and lest he should at once destroy their immortality, and subject them to destruction, he taught that they were not composed of atoms, like other beings<sup>r</sup>, though some have, by mistake, affirmed the contrary<sup>s</sup>. It is well known, that this corpuscular philosophy has been revived by some moderns, who rejecting the eternity of the atoms, and their tortuous motion, but following, in almost all other respects, the old hypothesis of Leucippus, have made a very fine system of it. This is what Gassendi has done, who differs from Des Cartes, as to the principles of bodies, in nothing but the retaining a vacuum. The scholastic divines among the Mohammedans, who are very orthodox as to the creation of the world by God, do also admit both atoms and a vacuum: but their atoms are different from those of Leucippus, for they have no magnitude, and are all like one another; and they suppose, as that philosopher ought to have done, that every atom of a living body is alive, that every atom of a sensitive body is endued with sense, and that the understanding resides in an atom; though they differ as to the soul, and knowledge, whether they consist in a single atom, or a collection of several <sup>a</sup>.

Reflections on this system.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. LUCRET. l. 2. v. 216, &c.    <sup>b</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Epicure, Rem. U.    <sup>c</sup> AUGUST. Epist. 66.    <sup>d</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Art. Leucippe, Rem. E. & Art. Epicure, Rem. F. As to the other Differences between the Doctrines of Democritus and Epicurus, consult CICER. de Finib. l. 1.    <sup>e</sup> Vid. LUCRET. ubi supra.    <sup>f</sup> LACTANT. Divin. Instit. l. III. cap. 17.    <sup>g</sup> PLUTARCH. de placitis Philos. l. 3. cap. 7.    <sup>h</sup> CICER. de Nat. Deor. l. 1.    <sup>i</sup> F. MALLEBRANCHE's Notion of seeing all things in God.    <sup>j</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Democrite, Rem. P.    <sup>k</sup> Vid. CICER. de Nat. Deor. l. 1.    <sup>l</sup> SENEC. de beneficiis, l. 5. c. 19. & GASSEND. de vitæ & moribus Epicuri, l. 4. c. 3.    <sup>m</sup> Mons. du RONDEL, de vitæ & moribus Epicuri. Amst. 1693. in 12°.    <sup>n</sup> CICER. ubi supra.    <sup>o</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Epicuro, p. 614, 655, 661.    <sup>p</sup> PLUT. de placitis Philos. l. 1. c. 7.    <sup>q</sup> SECT. EMPIRIC. contra Math. p. 312.    <sup>r</sup> CICER. ubi supra.    <sup>s</sup> LACTANT. de ira Dei, cap. 10.    <sup>t</sup> TERTULLIAN. adv. Gentem, cap. xvii.    <sup>u</sup> AUGUST. Epist. lvi.

The opinion of those who, holding the eternity of matter, admit an intelligent mind as the disposer thereof, and, 1. Of those who supposed matter to be the only substance, and endued with understanding.

THOSE who allowing the eternity of matter, introduce an intelligent mind as the disposer thereof into the form the world now bears, may be again subdivided into two classes: one who allowing no substance but matter, supposed it to be endued with understanding and life, and consequently to be God; and another who held God and matter to be two distinct and independent beings.

The first opinion, which, as has been said, differs but little from Spinozism, seems to have been that of Diogenes of Apollonia, and was certainly maintained by Hippasus of Metapontus, Heracitus, and the Stoics. <sup>b</sup>

HIPPASUS and Heracitus held fire to be the first principle, of which all things were made, and into which, after the revolution of certain periods, they will be again resolved, and that this fire was God <sup>a</sup>; whom Heracitus described to be that most subtle and most swift substance which permeates or passes through the whole universe <sup>c</sup>.

The opinion of Hippasus, Heracitus,

The notions of Heracitus seem to have been very confused, at least as they are now represented to us, which is no wonder at all, since he so much affected obscurity in what he wrote concerning natural philosophy, that he was thence surnamed the obscure <sup>a</sup>. He is said to have denied the world to have been made either by gods or men <sup>b</sup>; by which it is supposed he meant that the world was not made by any whatsoever, after such a manner as an artificer makes an house, by machines and engines, acting from without upon the matter; but by a certain inward plastic nature of its own <sup>c</sup>. He asserted the fatal necessity of all things, but taught that they were in a perpetual flux, nothing remaining at a stand. His account of the formation of the world was, that the fire being extinguished, the grossest parts of it coalescing, made the earth, which being loosened by the fire, produced water, and from the exhalation of water, the air was generated <sup>c</sup>. As the opinions of Heracitus concerning the origin of things were adopted by the Stoics, of whom immediately, we shall not enlarge here, but only observe, that the great physician Hippocrates had the same notion of the deity with Heracitus, declaring his belief to be, that heat or fire was immortal and omniscient, and that it saw, heard, and knew all things, both present and future <sup>d</sup>.

and Hippocrates.

The opinion of the Stoics.

THE Stoics held two first principles, God, and matter void of all quality, the one active, and the other passive, and that they were both corporeal <sup>a</sup>; for they did not acknowledge any such thing as incorporeal substance <sup>b</sup>: by which means they strangely confounded themselves, and reduced their two principles, in effect, to one and the same. They affirmed God to be an immortal, rational, and perfect animal, conscious of his own happiness, subject to no evil, governing the world, and all things in it, by his providence; and the architect, and, as it were, the father of the universe <sup>c</sup>. But they more usually described him to be a fiery spirit, void of all figure, yet changing himself into all things; or an artificial fire methodically proceeding to the generation of the world, and containing within himself all seminal reasons or models, according to which every thing is formed pursuant to fate <sup>b</sup>; which is also their description of nature <sup>c</sup>. This spirit, they say, quickens, sustains, and pervades the whole world, and every part of it, as the soul does the humane body, being called by several names, according to the different form of the matter which it animates. For which reason they hold the world itself to be God, and every part of it a member of him <sup>k</sup>. So that this sect, in appearance, have confounded God and nature together, tho' their genuine doctrine seems to have been, that there was not only an intellectual conscious soul presiding over the whole world, yet lodged more immediately in the fiery matter of it; but also a certain plastic or spermatic nature, contained under, or within the former, and which was properly the fate of all things <sup>l</sup>. And the admitting of such a subordinate plastic nature or life, which acts in order to certain ends, tho' without any sense or consciousness, has been thought very reasonable by some, tho' exploded by others, and that for the avoiding of these two consequences; either that in the formation and organization of natural and animal bodies, every thing comes to pass fortuitously, for the sake of no final causes, and without the guidance and direction of any mind or understanding; to assert which seems irrational and atheistical: or else that God himself doth immediately form every the minutest thing, as it were with his own hands, which is very indecent to suppose <sup>m</sup>. There were some Stoics, it is true, who rejecting all animality or consciousness in the world, made it to be governed by a vegetable or plastic nature only, as Boethius, whom we have already mentioned, in particular did; but their opinion ought by no means to be imputed to the whole sect.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. MAIMONID. in More Nevochim, cap. 73. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 19. <sup>c</sup> PLUT. de placit. Phil. l. 1. c. 3. CLEM. ALEXANDR. in protrept. Vid. etiam CICERON. Acad. Quæst. l. 4. & de Nat. Deor. l. 3. <sup>d</sup> PLAT. in Cratyl. p. 413. <sup>e</sup> ZENONIS. Vid. CICERON. de finib. l. 2. CLEM. ALEX. Stromat. 5. <sup>f</sup> PLUT. de Animæ Procr. p. 3014. <sup>g</sup> CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 152, &c. <sup>h</sup> PLUT. de placit. Phil. l. 1. c. 3. Vid. etiam DIOG. LAERT. in Heracit. p. 551, &c. <sup>i</sup> HIPPOCRAT. de princip. aut carnib. Sect. 1. <sup>j</sup> ARISTOCLES, de Philof. apud EUSEB. de Præp. Ev. l. 15. cap. 14. <sup>k</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Zenon. Citrico, p. 449. <sup>l</sup> SENECA. Ep. 65. Cic. de Nat. Deor. l. 2. <sup>m</sup> Vid. LIPSIUM de Physiol. Stoic. l. 2. cap. 4. & 5. <sup>n</sup> DIOG. LAERT. ubi supra, p. 458. <sup>o</sup> PLUT. de plac. Philol. l. 1. cap. 6, & 7. <sup>p</sup> DIOG. LAERT. ubi sup. p. 465. Cic. ubi sup.

As to the constitution of the world, the peculiar dogm of the Stoics, which Zeno, their master, seems to have borrowed from Heracitus, was, that in certain periods, or alternate vicissitudes of time, the universe is dissolved by fire, and re-produced out of it; God withdrawing, or absorbing all things into himself, by a general conflagration, and afterwards producing them out of himself again <sup>n</sup>. In which successive conflagrations, they held, that not only the world, but all the inferior gods also are melted down into their supreme Deity, the intellectual fiery soul, or principle of the universe <sup>o</sup>; who, during that interval, reits in himself, considering his providence, and entertained with thoughts becoming himself <sup>p</sup>, till he again emits and brings the world into being; the manner of which renovation Zeno thus describes: God, being alone, changes all substance from fire, first into air, and then into water; and as the seed is contained in the plant, so God, being the seminal reason of the world, left such a seed in the moisture, as might afford proper matter for the generation of those things which were to be produced; that the grosser parts of this watry matter subsiding, made the earth, the finer the air, and those still more subtilized, the fire. The four elements being thus generated, from the mixture of them proceeded plants and animals, and all other species <sup>q</sup>.

WITH these notions of the Stoics agrees the doctrine which is said to be almost universal among the Pendets <sup>r</sup> (who are Indian gentiles) and secretly entertained by the Sisfis and learned men of Persia, being the same in substance with the philosophy of Flud, which Gassendi has taken the pains to refute. These Cabalists pretend that God, or the supreme, immoveable, unchangeable Being, has not only produced the souls of creatures out of his own substance, but whatever is material or corporeal in the universe also; and that this production is not made simply in the way of efficient causes, but by an actual extraction or extension of his own substance, which is creation, as destruction is nothing else but the resuming that divine substance into himself; which they illustrate by the following symbol. They feign, that a certain immense spider was the first cause of all things; which drawing the matter from its own bowels, wove the webb of this universe, and disposed it with wonderful art: she, in the mean time, sitting in the center of her work, feels and directs the motion of every part; till at length, when she has pleased herself sufficiently in ordering and contemplating this web, she draws all the threads she had spun out, again into herself, and having absorbed them, the universal nature of all creatures vanishes into nothing <sup>s</sup>. Another comparison made use of by them is, that God is like an immense ocean, wherein several phials full of water are swimming; that these phials, whithersoever they go, are always in the same ocean, and in the same water, and when they break, the water contained in them will be united to their whole, that is, to the ocean, of which they are portions <sup>t</sup>. But this last is by no means a strict parallel; for the matter of the

Of the Pendets
in India.

<sup>k</sup> Vid. Eosd. & PLUT. ubi supr. c. 7. SENEC. Quest. Nat. l. 2. c. 45. & Epist. 92. LUCAN. Pharsal. l. 9. v. 578. DIDYMUS, apud EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. 15. c. 15, &c. VIRGIL. Georg. l. 4. vers. 221. & Æneid. l. 6. vers. 724. <sup>l</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 133, &c. 423, &c. <sup>m</sup> Vid. eund. p. 148, &c. <sup>n</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Zenon. p. 451. NUMENIUS, apud EUSEB. Prep. Ev. l. 15. c. 18, 19. <sup>o</sup> Vid. PLUT. adv. Stoicos, p. 1075. & de defectu Oracul. p. 420. <sup>p</sup> Idem, adv. Stoicos, p. 1077. SENEC. Epist. 6. ARRIAN. in Epictet. lib. III. cap. 13. <sup>q</sup> DIOG. LAERT. ubi supr. p. 450, 454. Vid. STOBÆI Ecl. Phys. c. 20. <sup>r</sup> We take this word to be the Malayan فنديت Pandit, which signifies a man of letters. <sup>s</sup> BERNIER,

suite des Memoires sur l'Empire du Grand Mogol. p. 202, &c. BURNET. in Append. ad Archæol. p. 354. KIRCHER, China illustr. p. 155. <sup>t</sup> BERNIER, ibid.

phials is a second substance, which, by its interposition, separates the water inclosed in those phials, from the ocean: but if there was such a thing as a soul of the world, it would be expanded through all parts of the universe, nothing could hinder the union of every particular soul with its whole, nor would death be a means of their re-union.

Of certain sects
among the Chinese.

THERE is also a sect among the Chinese, who acknowledge nature to be the sole deity, thereby understanding that natural power or operation, which being the efficient cause of motion and rest, produces, maintains, and preserves all things. They take her to be the soul which universally informs matter, and call her a principle, independent of all others; but as they separate this principle from all corporeal and sensible matter, its imperfections and definitions, they do in this particular differ something from the Stoics; tho' they who incline to this sect do believe, as they did, that the world hath had a beginning, and shall have an end, but shall afterwards begin and end again as before, and so perpetually be renewed and perish. And according to this opinion, numerous worlds have already existed, and others, to an infinite number, will hereafter successively make room for one another <sup>a</sup>.

BUT the opinion more commonly embraced at this time by the Chinese, and wherein the atheism, which has so generally infected them, consists, comes rather nearer to the Stoic doctrine, tho' not without some considerable differences; and it is this: That God is the material soul of the whole world, or rather only of its most excellent part, the heaven; and that his providence and power are finite and limited, tho' much exceeding the prudence and power of man. That there are distinct spirits in the four parts of the world, the sun, stars, mountains, rivers, plants, cities, houses, and in a word, in all things: some of which spirits they suppose to be evil, making them the immediate cause of all the mischiefs and disasters to which humane life is subject. By this distribution of souls throughout all nature, they are not at a loss to account for its whole oeconomy, and to supply the want of an almighty power and infinite providence, which they allow to no one spirit, not so much as to that of the heaven. They suppose, indeed, that the soul of the heaven acts on nature with a power and prudence incomparably greater than what man is endued with; but at the same time, acknowledge in the soul of every other thing an inward power, naturally independent on that of the heaven, and which sometimes acts even in contradiction to the designs of heaven. So that, according to them, the heaven governs nature as a mighty king, the other souls owe him obedience, which he almost always forces them to pay; yet there are some which now and then dispense with their duty in that respect, and refuse to obey <sup>b</sup>.

THIS last opinion differs widely from another entertained by a sect of the same nation, and established by royal authority in the year of Christ 65. Its founder was son of the king In san vang, who was first named She, or She Kia <sup>c</sup>, and afterwards, when he arrived at the age of thirty, Foe, that is, not a man <sup>d</sup>. The secret doctrine of this sect, which is never discovered to the simple or vulgar, is: that a void or emptiness <sup>e</sup> is the principle and end of all things; that our first parents sprang from thence, and on their death returned into it; and that all men are likewise resolved into that principle by death; that mankind, and the elements, and all creatures make a part of this void: so that there is but one substance in the universe, which is diversified in particular beings only by figures and qualities, or interior configurations; in a manner as water, which is always essentially water, though it be in the shape of snow, hail, rain, or ice <sup>f</sup>. They describe this original being as a pure, limpid, subtil, infinite substance, which can neither be generated nor corrupted, but is both perfect itself, and the perfection of all things, remaining in perpetual repose, but without heart, virtue, understanding, or power, the great property of its essence being neither to act, understand, nor will any thing <sup>g</sup>. This opinion is the fountain from whence that which we have mentioned to obtain among the Japoneſe <sup>h</sup> is derived; and differs from Spinozism, in allowing an emersion of the world from a very different state possible, if not actually to have been; as it does both from that and the Stoic doctrine, in divesting their first principle of activity and understanding. A follower of Confucius has refuted the extravagancies of this sect, by that established maxim, that nothing can be produced from nothing; by which he must have supposed that they taught the first principle of all

<sup>a</sup> Descript. of China, at the end of Ives's Travels, p. 171, 172. <sup>b</sup> LA LOUBERE, Descript. de Siam, Tom. I. p. 396, &c.

<sup>c</sup> So we chuse to express what other authors, following the Portuguese spelling and pronunciation, write Xe, or Xe Kia, intending throughout this work, to reduce the orthography of the Chinese and Japoneſe words, as near as possible, to the English pronunciation; of which the reader will be more particularly informed in the preface.

<sup>d</sup> See the Acta Eruditor. Lipsæ, 1688, pag. 257, in the Extract of the Philos. of Confucius, printed at Paris 1687.

<sup>e</sup> The Chinese words are Cung hu, the Latin translation, Vacuum, & inane. <sup>f</sup> Biblioth. Univ. Tom. VII. pag. 406. <sup>g</sup> Acta Eruditor. Lipsæ, 1688, pag. 258.

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 8. a.

things to be nothing<sup>c</sup>, and, consequently, that the world had a beginning, without either an efficient cause, or matter. But it is more probable that by the words void and emptiness, they intended only to express that which has not the properties of sensible matter, and understand thereby what the moderns understand by space, which is conceived to be distinct from body, and whose indivisible, impalpable, penetrable, immoveable, and infinite extension is something real. It is easy to perceive, that such a being could not be the first principle, if it were inactive, as these Chinese philosophers pretend: Spinoza has not been so absurd; the abstract idea which he gives of the first principle, is no more, properly speaking, than the idea of space; but then he endues it with motion, from whence all the varieties of matter may proceed<sup>d</sup>.

THE Siamese have also some agreement with the Stoics, in their notion of the alternate destruction and renovation of the universe. Their Talapains teach, that the figure or model of the world is eternal, but that the visible world is not; for whatever we see in it, lives, in their opinion, and must die; and there will at the same time be re-produced other beings of the same kind, another heaven, another earth, and other stars; and in this manner, they say, nature has perished and been renewed several times<sup>e</sup>.

NOR was this doctrine unknown to the latter Jews, whose cabalists are supposed to account for the origin of things, by making them emanations from a first cause, and

- therefore pre-existent, though perhaps under another form. They speak also of the resuming or withdrawing of things into the first Being, by a revolution and restitution of them to their first state; as if they believed their En Soph<sup>h</sup>, or first infinite Being, to contain all things, and that there is always the same quantity of being in the universe, whether in the created, or uncreated state. When it is in its uncreated or antemundane state, God is simply all things; but when it becomes the world, the degree or quantity of being or entity is not encreased, but God expands and unfolds himself by emanations and effluxes from the superior to the lower parts, whereby the different forms and orders of created beings are constituted. For which reason they often speak of greater and smaller vessels, as it were to receive those effluxes; and of effluent rays; and of canals, through which they flow and are propagated; in a word, when God retracts those rays, the external world perishes, and all things again become God<sup>i</sup>: he sends forth his spirit, and they are created, and he reneweth the face of the earth; he bideth his face, and they are troubled, he taketh away their breath, they die and return to their dust<sup>k</sup>.

WE come now to speak of those who held two distinct and independent principles, co-existent from eternity, God and matter; which is supposed to have been the opinion of Pythagoras and Plato; and was certainly that of Anaxagoras, Archelaus, and several others.

- WHAT was the opinion of Pythagoras's master, Pherecydes of Syros, as to the origin of the world, is somewhat uncertain; from the first words of a treatise of his, extant in the time of Diogenes Laertius, which are indeed somewhat corrupted and obscure, it seems he believed three eternal beings, Jupiter or God, time, and the earth<sup>l</sup>. But Pythagoras himself is said to have asserted two substantial self-existent principles, a Monad, or unity, and a Dyad, or duality; by the former of which God, or an active principle or mind, is generally allowed to be meant (though some imagine the Pythagoric monads were atoms<sup>m</sup>;) but what the latter signified is uncertain, it being sometimes interpreted to be a dæmon, or evil principle informing matter, or the visible world<sup>n</sup>, and at other times to be a passive principle, or matter itself<sup>o</sup>; the number two being used as a type, to shew the variety, inequality, divisibility, and continual changes of matter, as one was to express the unity, identity, indivisibility and unchangeableness of the divine nature<sup>p</sup>. Yet it may be questioned whether Pythagoras by his Dyad meant matter or no: for Porphyry thus interprets the two Pythagoric principles. The cause, says he, of that sympathy, harmony, and agreement which is in things, and of the conservation of the whole, which is always the same, and like itself, was by Pythagoras called Unity, that unity which is in the things themselves being but a participation of the first cause; but the reason of difference, inequality, and constant irregularity in things, was by him called a Dyad<sup>q</sup>. Thus, according to Porphyry, by the Pythagoric dyad, is not so much meant matter, as the infinite and indeterminate nature,

<sup>c</sup> Aëtæ Erudit. Lipsiz, ubi supra.

<sup>d</sup> LOUBERE, Descrip. de Siam, Tom. I. p. 361.

<sup>e</sup> &c. <sup>h</sup> Psalm civ. 29, 30.

<sup>f</sup> PLUTARCH. de placitis Philos. l. 1. cap. 7.

<sup>g</sup> PRÆP. EV. & CUDWORTH, Intell. System, p. 374, &c.

<sup>h</sup> PORPHYR. in Vita Pythag. p. 203.

<sup>i</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Spinoza, Rem. B.

<sup>j</sup> חַי וְקַיָּא

<sup>k</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 63.

<sup>l</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Pherecyde, p. 76.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 20. a.

<sup>n</sup> Idem, ibid. cap. 3. Vid. NUMEN. apud Euseb. de

<sup>o</sup> Vid. DACIER, Vie de Pythagore, p. 17.

and passive capability of things. So that the monad and dyad of Pythagoras seem to have been the same with Plato's finite and infinite<sup>r</sup>; the former of which two only is substantial, that first most simple being, the cause of all unity, and the measure of all things.

HOWEVER, if Pythagoras's dyad be to be understood of a substantial matter, there seems good reason to believe, that he did not suppose matter to be self-existent and independent upon the Deity; since, according to the best and most ancient writers, his dyad was no primary, but a secondary being only, and derived from his monad, the sole original of all things, as matter for the monad or active principle, which in the beginning was alone, to work upon<sup>t</sup>. For whatever Ocellus Lucanus, Philolaus<sup>u</sup>, and some other Pythagoreans imagined of the world's eternity, Pythagoras himself really believed it to have had a beginning, and to have been made by God<sup>v</sup>; which is confirmed by its being given as one reason of his superstitious abstinence from beans; that at the beginning things being confounded, mingled, and putrified together in the earth, the generation and secretion of them afterwards proceeded by degrees, animals being produced, and plants shooting forth; at which time, from the same putrified matter, sprang up both men and beans<sup>w</sup>. But his acknowledging the creation of the world by God, is still more express, in those verses cited for his by Justin<sup>x</sup>. We shall content ourselves to add here the testimony of St. Cyril, who assures us, that he held one God of the whole universe, the principle and cause of all things, illuminating and quickening the whole, and the original of motion; from whom all things were derived, and brought out of non-existence into being<sup>y</sup>.

BUT Pythagoras, it seems, did not only call the supreme Deity a monad, but also a tetrad, or tetractys, the explication of which has tortured the wits of several ages<sup>b</sup>. It is, in the golden verses, said to be the fountain of the eternal nature<sup>c</sup>; and, by Hierocles, the maker of all things, the intelligent god, the cause of the heavenly and sensible god, that is, of the animated world or heaven<sup>d</sup>. The latter Pythagoreans endeavour to give reasons why God should be called Tetractys, from certain mysteries in the number four<sup>e</sup>; but the late conjecture of some learned men<sup>f</sup> seems to be much more probable, that this name was really nothing else but the Tetragrammaton, or that proper name of the supreme God amongst the Hebrews, consisting of four letters<sup>g</sup>; nor is it strange Pythagoras should be so well acquainted with the name JEHOVAH, since, besides his travelling into other parts of the east, he is affirmed by Josephus, Porphyrus, and others, to have conversed with the Hebrews also. The worst of Pythagoras's theology was, that representing God as the mover of the universe and the soul of the world, he taught that our souls were portions of the divine substance<sup>h</sup>.

THAT Pythagoras held numbers to be the principles of all things, is testified by all antiquity, and he thence accounted for the production of the world in this manner. He supposed, that the monad and dyad were the two sources of numbers, from whence proceeded points; from points lines; from lines plane figures; from planes solids; from solids sensible bodies, the elements of which are four, fire, water, earth, and air; and these are in perpetual change; from them the world was formed, being animated, intelligent, and spherical, containing in the midst the earth, a globose body, and inhabited<sup>i</sup>. He taught that the world began from fire, and the fifth element; and that there being five figures of solid bodies, called mathematical or regular, the earth was made of the cube; fire of the pyramid, or tetrahedron; the air of the octahedron; water of the icosahedron; and the sphere of the universe of the dodecahedron<sup>k</sup>.

THIS method of philosophizing, which was also adopted by Plato, if understood in the literal acceptation, has no manner of foundation in nature, nothing being more certain than that numbers, if ever so variously combined, can generate nothing but numbers<sup>l</sup>. It is therefore more probable that Pythagoras made use of them no otherwise than as emblems, or symbols: for supposing mathematical sciences to possess a thereon.

Reflections

<sup>r</sup> Or rather determinate and indeterminate, Πέρας ὁ ἀόριστος. PLAT. in Philebo. * CUDWORTH, ubi sup. 371.

<sup>t</sup> ALEXAND. de Success. Philos. apud DIOG. LAERT. in Pythagora, p. 507. HERMIAS, in Irtitione Philosoph. gent. THEODORIT. Therap. II. THEARIDAS Pythagoreus, apud Clement. Alex. Strom. 5. p. 611, & in Admonit. ad Gentes, p. 47. SUIDAS, in voce Pythagoras. <sup>u</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH, ubi sup. 393.

<sup>v</sup> PLUT. de placitis Philos. l. 2. cap. 4. <sup>w</sup> PORPHYR. de Vita Pythag. <sup>x</sup> De Monarchia, p. 167. <sup>y</sup> CYRILL. cont. Julian. lib. 1. <sup>b</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 154.

<sup>c</sup> Vers. 47, 48. <sup>d</sup> HIEROCLES, in Aug. Cirm. <sup>e</sup> See CUDWORTH, p. 376. <sup>f</sup> PIGUS MIRAND. SELDEN. & GOTTF. WENDELIN. See also PHILO in Vita Mosis, p. 519. <sup>g</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH, ubi sup. & DACIER, Vie de Pythagore, p. lvii. <sup>h</sup> CICER. de Nat. Deor. l. 1. MINUT. FELIX, p. 151. LACTANT. l. 1. c. 5.

<sup>i</sup> SUIDAS, in voce Pythagoras. DIOG. LAERT. in Pythag. p. 508. <sup>j</sup> PLUTARCH. de placitis Phil. l. 2. c. 6. But the fifth figure, according to CLAVIUS and others, was added by some of Plato's followers. <sup>k</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 158.

middle distance between corporeals and incorporeals, he began with them ; thereby to wean the mind gradually from sensible things, and raise it to the contemplation of intelligible beings. And this is the reason why he had recourse chiefly to numbers ; for not being able sufficiently to explain by words the first principles, he represented them by numbers<sup>a</sup> : which seems to be all Pythagoras designed, though his followers have sought mysteries in his doctrine, which himself never dreamt of ; yet it is not to be denied, that the great defect of that philosopher, and of Plato also, was, that they resolved natural things into mathematical reasons, numbers, and proportions ; as Aristotle afterwards did into logical reasons.

- a THE monad, dyad, and tetrad we have already spoken of. As to the regular bodies, it is conjectured that Pythagoras intended only to represent the elements under their forms, in imitation of other natural bodies. Thus he represented the fire by the figure of a pyramid or tetrahedron, from its aspiring to a point, or the acuteness of its flame ; the air, being next in order to the fire, by an octahedron, which bears the nearest resemblance to the tetrahedron, being composed of two pyramids joined by a square base ; the water, because of its fluidity, was represented by an icosaedron ; and the earth by a cube, to denote its stability ; the cube being, of all the regular bodies, the least adapted to motion<sup>b</sup>. Or if they were to be considered physically, perhaps Pythagoras supposed the constituent parts of the four elements to consist of such figures, according to their several specific gravities : that the mole or primary particles of the earth were cubes ; for as the earth is the most ponderous of all the elements, so is the cube the heaviest of all the regular bodies ; that the particles of fire were tetrahedra, or triangular pyramids, fire being the lightest and most volatile element, as the tetrahedron is the lightest of the same bodies ; that the particles of the air had the form of an octahedron, which is the next lightest body of the five, as air is the next lightest to fire ; and that the particles of water had the shape of an icosaedron, which figure is a sort of mean proportion between the cube and the octahedron, as the weight of water is between the weight of air and that of earth. As to the fifth body, the dodecahedron, which represents the heaven, or spherere of the universe, it must be entirely emblematical (if it be not rather a later addition to the pythagoric physiology, and no genuine part of it) the four faces of that figure being fancied to allude to the twelve signs of the zodiac<sup>c</sup>, or else the four elements, seven heavens, and the firmament<sup>d</sup>.

- TIMÆUS LOCURUS, who was a Pythagorean, seems to have held the pre-existence of matter, as if it were a self-existent principle together with GOD ; for he affirms it to be eternal<sup>e</sup> : yet, in another place, he asserts the eternal GOD, who is visible to the understanding only, to be the author and parent of all things, and that the world, which is visible to our eyes, is the generated god<sup>f</sup> ; and he distinguishes between the eternal duration of GOD, which had no beginning ; and time, which was made together with the world, as an imitation of eternity<sup>g</sup>. He taught more particularly, that there were two principles of all things ; Mind, of those things which are made according to reason ; and Necessity, of those which are produced by force, according to the powers of bodies ; by which second principle, he plainly means matter<sup>h</sup>. That before the making of the world, there were, besides GOD, idea or form, and rude matter ; one being the intelligible pattern or exemplar of all things, and the other the subject, which being itself without figure, yet capable of all figures, was reduced by GOD into the determinate form of the visible world ; which, being the best production, is not corruptible by any other cause than the same GOD who composed it, if it shall at any time please him to dissolve it<sup>i</sup>. So that Timæus seems really to have held two subordinate principles, matter and form ; wherein Archytas the Tarentine, who was also a Pythagorean, agreed with him, as supposing GOD to be the artificer and mover, matter that which is moved, and form the art introduced into the matter<sup>j</sup> ; which was also the notion of Plato. We the rather take notice of the opinion of Archytas in this place, because he and Pythagoras are joined by Censorinus with Ocellus Lucanus, as believing mankind to have been from eternity<sup>k</sup>.

PLATO, who, as well as his master Socrates, embraced the Pythagoric notions as to the origin of the universe, held the three principles we have just mentioned, GOD, Plato, <sup>a</sup> DACIER, Vie de Pythagore, p. lv.      <sup>b</sup> SACROBIUS, apud Casim. Simenowicz, lib. 4. p. 267.

<sup>c</sup> Idem, ibid.      <sup>d</sup> Vid. DACIER, Vie de Pythagore, p. cxxxi. Vid. etiam TIMÆUM LOCURUM de Anima Mundi, Inter opusc. Mythol. &c. Edit. a T. Gale, 1688, p. 553, &c.      <sup>e</sup> TIMÆUS, ibid. p. 544.
<sup>f</sup> Idem, ibid. p. 549.      <sup>g</sup> Ibid. p. 552. See also CLEM. ALEXAND. Strom. 5. p. 604.      <sup>h</sup> Vid. MER. CASAB. in Diog. Laert. in vita Plat. p. 207.      <sup>i</sup> TIMÆUS, ibid. p. 542, &c. See STANLEY's Hist. of Philos. part IX. p. 419, 420.      <sup>j</sup> STROMÆUS, Eriog. Phys.      <sup>k</sup> CENSORINUS de die natali, esp. 3. where, instead of Ocellus, the common editions have Cereius.

matter,

matter, and idea<sup>a</sup>; which are by Laertius reduced to two, God and matter<sup>b</sup>; the ideas, or original patterns of things conceived in the divine mind, being really no distinct principle from him, but the very mind of God, with whom they are often confounded, both by Timæus and several of the Platonics<sup>c</sup>. It seems therefore certain, that Plato supposed matter to have been uncreated and eternal, as he often asserts it to be. But he has been defended in this respect by Hierocles<sup>d</sup>, who being himself convinced by the arguments on the other side, was willing to have it thought, for the honour of his sect, that its founder believed God capable of producing the world by a simple act of volition, though there was no pre-existent matter; and therefore maintained, that he really held an absolute creation out of nothing. Wherein Hierocles<sup>e</sup> is thought to have been very singular<sup>f</sup>; and yet some moderns have followed him in that particular, supposing, that when Plato asserted matter to be eternal, he did not mean that it subsisted visibly from all eternity, but only that it subsisted intellectually in the eternal idea of God<sup>g</sup>. And several passages have been cited from the works of that philosopher<sup>h</sup>, which would give some grounds to suspect he really believed that God created or produced matter itself, as well as made and formed the world thereout, had he not so explicitly declared the contrary. Another opinion imputed to Plato by Plutarch, viz. the supposing two intelligent and independent principles, a good and an evil one, will be considered by and by.

As to the formation of the world, Plato taught, that matter being at first unform-<sup>b</sup> ed, and without any determinate figure, and being moved in an irregular and disorderly manner, God, who prefers order to confusion, gathered it together; and converting this substance into the four elements, of them made the world and all things therein, fashioning it according to the archetypal idea, or model thereof, which he had conceived in himself; and that he gave it a spherical figure, as the most perfect, and that which contains the rest; and endued it with an intelligent soul, because an animated being is more excellent than an inanimate, which soul of the world Plato supposed to be formed before its material body<sup>c</sup>. He also asserted the world to be incorruptible, not by its nature, but because it is supported by divine providence<sup>d</sup>; and held not only the animated universe itself, but the several parts of nature, which he like-<sup>c</sup> wise supposed animated, to be gods, inferior indeed to the supreme God, but superior to men, and justly challenging honour and worship from them. These gods of Plato were for the most part fiery, being the celestial bodies, though he supposed the earth also to be a god, affirming it to be the oldest of all the gods within the heaven<sup>e</sup>; and he for this reason found fault with the Anaxagorean doctrine, which made the planets and stars nothing but inanimate stones and earth<sup>f</sup>.

The opinion of
ANAXAGORAS.

ANAXAGORAS, who was not more conspicuous for his wealth and nobility of birth, than the greatness of his mind<sup>g</sup>, did indisputably hold two co-eternal principles, God and matter; being the first (of the Ionic philosophers at least) who, as has been observed, introduced an intelligent being to move, separate, and put in order the chaotic<sup>d</sup> matter: whence he obtained the honourable surname of Nous, or Mind<sup>e</sup>. He admitted as many sorts of principles as of compounded bodies: for he supposed that every kind of body was formed of a great number of small similar particles; that a bone, for example, was nothing but a composition of many invisible bones, and that the blood which we see, was made up of many minute drops, every one of which was blood<sup>f</sup>; from the similitude of which principles he called them Homœomeriæ. But this obliged him to allow, that the seeds or principles of all kinds are found in every body, which throws his system into a strange confusion; not to mention several other inconveniencies and contradictions therein<sup>g</sup>. As to the formation of the world, his doctrine seems to have been, that the mind or intelligence who presided thereat, and<sup>e</sup> whom he allows to be the original of motion<sup>h</sup>, finding in the infinite matter a vast number of particles which were like one another, but promiscuously mixed with, and surrounded by others which were unlike, separated the one from the other, and joining

<sup>a</sup> PLUTARCH. de placitis Philos. l. 1. c. 3. CHALCIDIUS in Timæum. APULEIUS, de Doctrina Platonis, l. 1.

<sup>b</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Platon. p. 206, 212, &c.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. MENAO. in Laert. p. 163.

<sup>d</sup> & MER. CASAUBON. in eundem, loco jam citato.

<sup>e</sup> HIEROCL. apud Photium, Biblioth. Cod. CCLI.

pag. 1380.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Hierocles, Philos.

<sup>g</sup> DACIER, Vie de Platon, p. 123.

<sup>h</sup> Vid. ibid. & CUDWORTH'S Intell. System, p. 404, 570, &c.

<sup>i</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Platon.

p. 206, &c. PLATO, in Timæo. See also STANLEY'S Hist. of Philos. Part V. p. 186. & BURNET. Archæol.

l. 1. p. 176.

<sup>j</sup> PLUT. de placitis Philos. l. 1. c. 4.

<sup>k</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Platon. p. 211.

<sup>l</sup> PLATO de Legib. l. 10.

<sup>m</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Anaxag. p. 83.

<sup>n</sup> Idem, ibid. PLUTARCH. in Pe-

ricle. <sup>o</sup> Vid. LUCRET. de rer. Nat. l. 1. v. 830, &c. PLUT. de placitis Philos. l. 1. c. 3. DIOG.

LAERT. in Anaxag. p. 84. ARIST. Physic. l. 1. c. 4.

<sup>p</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Anaxagoras, Rem.

C & G. <sup>q</sup> DIOG. LAERT. ubi supra.

together the corpuscles of the same kind, formed of some a star, of others a stone, &c. Notwithstanding which, he has been severely censured by several, as allowing too much to material necessity, and endeavouring to account for things, as far as possible, from the inherent forms and qualities of matter only, or any way, rather than bring in the Deity, to whom he never has recourse but when he is absolutely at a loss, and without whose interposition, or knowledge, he admitted some revolutions in nature happened. As to the formation of animals, he taught, that they proceeded from the earth, being first generated of moisture and heat, and after by mixture of the sexes.

ARCHELAUS, the successor of Anaxagoras, most probably held the same principles with his master, namely, an infinite number of similar particles, as St. Austin and Simplicius testify; though others tell us, that he supposed infinite air, its rarefaction and condensation, the one being fire, and the other water, to be the principles of all things. He also thought men and animals were produced by the heat of the earth, which yielded a slimy substance like milk, serving for food.

EMPEDOCLES, who was an auditor both of Pythagoras and Anaxagoras, is said to have followed the physiology of the latter. He held two causes of all things, contention and friendship, meaning thereby secretion and concretion, or the separation and mixture of the primary matter, from which the elements were formed, and all things that have been, are, or shall be, plants, animals, men, and gods derived their origin; yet he supposed that contention and friendship did both depend on one supreme Deity as their author. For Empedocles, it seems, believed, that were it not for discord or contention, all things would be one; so that, according to him, all things whatsoever proceeded from contention, together with a mixture of friendship, save only the supreme God, who hath no contention at all in him, because he is essentially unity itself. He taught, that the elements were composed out of smaller corpuscles, which were most minute, and as it were the elements of the elements. Agreeably to other atomists, he acknowledged no generation or corruption, properly so called, but ascribed all to secretion and concretion. He imagined the elements to have been produced in this order; first, that the æther was secreted, afterwards the fire, and then the earth, which being too closely pressed by violence of the circumvolution, there issued thence water, from the evaporation of which proceeded the air. That the heaven was made of the æther, the sun of the fire, and the things about the earth from the other elements: so that the physiology of Empedocles was, at the bottom, the same with that of Democritus and Epicurus; only that he differed from them in some particulars, as in excluding a vacuum, and denying such physical corpuscles as were indivisible, but chiefly in admitting an intelligent principle, by whose wisdom the world was put into this order, as the best and most convenient for the good of the whole; though he sometimes indulged too much to fortuitous mechanism, especially in the structure of animals. We shall only observe further, that he held, according to the Pythagorean doctrine, that there were two worlds, the one intellectual, and the other sensible; the former of them being the model, or archetype of the latter.

THAT Plutarch maintained the eternity of matter is past all question; he expressly asserting, that the substance, or matter, out of which the world was made, was not itself made, but always ready at hand, and subject to the artificer, to be ordered and disposed by him. For, in his opinion, the making of the world was not the production of it out of nothing, but out of an antecedent bad and disorderly state, like the making of a house, garment, or statue.

IT is also well known that Hermogenes, and other ancient pretenders to christianity, did in like manner assert the self-existence and improdution of matter, for which reason they were commonly called Materians; endeavouring by this means to give an account (as the Stoics had done before them) of the original of evils, and to free God from the imputation thereof. And they argued in this manner; God made all things either out of himself, or out of nothing, or out of pre-existent matter: he could not make all things out of himself, because himself being always unmade, he should then really have been the maker of nothing; and he did not make all out of nothing,

* ARISTOT. Metaph. l. 1. c. 4.

* CLEM. ALEX. Strom. lib. 2. p. 364. EUSEB. de Prep.

Ev. l. 14. c. 14. p. 750.

* DIOG. LAERT. in Anaxag. p. 85.

* AUGUSTIN. de civit. Dei,

l. 8. c. 2. SIMPLIC. in Arist. Phys. lib. 1. Vid. etiam CLEM. ALEXANDR. in Protrept. p. 43.

* PLUTARCH. de placitis Philosoph. l. 1. c. 3. JUSTIN. Martyr, admonit. ad Græcos, p. 4. * DIOG.

LAERT. in Archelo. p. 89. * DIOG. LAERT. in Emped. p. 538. CICERO de Amicitia.

CLEMENS ALEX. in admon. ad Gentes. ARIST. Phys. l. 8. SUIDAS, in voce Manes, &c.

* ARISTOT. in Metaph. l. 3. c. 4. & de Mundo, p. 26. * CUDWORTH'S Intell. Syst. p. 392.

* PLUTARCH. de placitis Phil. l. 1. c. 13. STOBÆUS, in Eclog. Physic. * PLUT. ubi sup.

l. 1. c. 24. & 30. * Idem, ibid. l. 2. c. 6. * Vid. CUDWORTH, p. 24. 25. * SIMPLIC.

in Phys. Arist. Vid. PLUT. ubi sup. l. 1. c. 20. * PLUT. de psychog. Platon. p. 1014, 1015, &c.

because being essentially good, he would have made every thing in the best manner, and so there could have been no evil in the world: but since there are evils, and these could not proceed from the will of God, they must needs arise from the fault of something, and therefore of the matter out of which things were made<sup>b</sup>. Some modern sects of the christian profession do also, at this day, assert the uncreatedness of matter; but these suppose, as the Stoics did, body to be the only substance<sup>c</sup>.

BUT some went still farther, and maintained that the chaos, or original matter, was animated by an evil or maleficent soul, thereby constituting a third self-existent principle. And this was the opinion of Plutarch, whom we have just mentioned, and of Numenius and Atticus<sup>k</sup>. The first not only expressly asserts, that a mad irrational soul, <sup>a</sup> and an unformed disorderly body did co-exist with one another from eternity, neither of them having any generation or beginning<sup>l</sup>; but discovers no small fondness for this notion in several parts of his works<sup>m</sup>, and professedly endeavours to establish it by the best arguments he could; pretending that otherwise it would be impossible to account, in a satisfactory manner, for the original of evil. For as evil could not be produced without some positive cause, it being ridiculous to imagine it came into the world by accident; and as neither God, who is essentially good, nor mere inactive matter, void of all form and quality, could be the cause of evil; he therefore concluded, that it must proceed from a certain irrational and maleficent soul or dæmon, unmade, and co-existing with God and matter from eternity. So that whatever is good in the <sup>b</sup> soul and body of the universe, and likewise in the souls of men and dæmons, is to be ascribed to God, as its only original; and whatever is evil, irregular, and disorderly in them, ought to be imputed to that other substantial evil principle. And to support this opinion by authority, as well as reason, he would persuade us that it was the constant belief of all the pagan nations, and of the wisest men and philosophers that ever were among them<sup>n</sup>; imputing it to the Egyptians, who, as he imagines, represented the evil principle under the name of Typhon; to Zoroastres and the Persian Mages, who are also by Laertius affirmed to have maintained two principles, a good dæmon and an evil one<sup>o</sup> (though it has been questioned whether they really believed the evil principle to be eternal or not; ) to the Chaldeans, because their astrologers supposed two of <sup>c</sup> the planets to be beneficent, two maleficent, and three of a middle nature; and to the ancient Greeks, because they sacrificed not only to Jupiter Olympus, but also to Hades, or Pluto, who was sometimes called by them the infernal Jupiter: supposing also the monad and dyad of Pythagoras, the contention and friendship of Empedocles, the mind and infinite matter of Anaxagoras, to be no other than a good and evil God. But above all, he endeavours to prove that Plato was an undoubted champion for this opinion, and that chiefly for these reasons: first, because that philosopher speaks of a necessary and innate appetite, which may sometimes turn the heavens a contrary way, and by that means cause disorder and confusion<sup>p</sup>; secondly, because he speaks of two kinds of souls, whereof one is beneficent, but the other contrary<sup>q</sup>; and lastly, because <sup>d</sup> he supposes the matter to have been moved disorderly before the world was made, which implies there was a disorderly and irrational soul existing with it, as the mover of it, matter being unable to move itself. But as to the first of these allegations, it has been observed, that Plato, as if it had been purposely to prevent such an interpretation of his meaning in the passage there quoted as this of Plutarch's, adds, that it must not be supposed there are two gods of contrary minds, turning the heavens sometimes one way and sometimes another. Which might also serve for an answer to what is afterwards urged, as if Plato had affirmed that there were two souls, the one beneficent, and the other contrary, because this would be all one as to introduce two gods: but in that place, it is conceived, that Plato did only distribute souls in general into <sup>e</sup> good and evil; those moral differences properly belonging to that rank of beings called by him souls, and arising from them, according to his premised doctrine, that soul is the cause of good and evil, just and unjust: but then afterwards making enquiry concerning the soul of the world or heaven, he positively concludes, that it was no other than a soul endued with all virtue<sup>r</sup>. As to the last reason, that matter is said by Plato to have been moved disorderly, it is supposed that he did therein only adhere to that vulgarly received tradition, that the world was formed from a chaos, or matter confusedly moved, and afterwards brought into order<sup>s</sup>. And as to the origin of evil, Plato is conceived neither to have imputed it to God himself, nor derived it from unqualified

<sup>b</sup> TERTULLIAN. adv. Hermog. p. 282.

<sup>c</sup> CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. v. 197.

<sup>k</sup> PROCL. in

Tim. p. 116.

<sup>l</sup> PLUT. in quest. Platon. p. 1003.

<sup>m</sup> Idem, de Psychog. Plat. & de Hæd. &

Olinde, &c.

<sup>n</sup> Idem, de Hæd. & Olinde. p. 369, &c.

<sup>o</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Proem.

<sup>p</sup> PLAT.

in Politic.

<sup>q</sup> Idem, de Legib. l. 10.

<sup>r</sup> Idem, ibid.

<sup>s</sup> CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 218, &c.

Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art, Zoroastre, Rem. E.

matter, nor yet from an irrational and maleficent soul, but the necessity of imperfect beings<sup>1</sup>.

HOWEVER, some mongrel christians, as the Marcionites, Manichæans, and Paulicians, did really maintain this opinion of two self-existent gods, a good and an evil one, which latter Manes called Hyle, or matter<sup>2</sup>.

HAVING now done with the second of those opinions, under which we comprehended the several notions which have been entertained concerning the origin of the universe, we come to speak of the last, and only true one; that the world had a beginning, being absolutely produced by God out of a state of non-existence, and consequently, that it is of its own nature liable to dissolution.

The opinion of those who held the world to be absolutely created, and liable to dissolution.

AND besides such of the nations and philosophers already mentioned, who most probably believed this creation of the world, though suspected of contrary opinions, there were several among the heathens who unquestionably did so.

WE shall first instance in the ancient Tuscans, or Etrurians, whose tradition we have from one of their own writers. He says, that God, the author of the universe, employed twelve thousand years in all his creations, and distributed them into twelve houses. That in the first chiliad, or thousand years, he made the heaven and earth; in the next, the firmament which appears to us, calling it heaven; in the third, the sea and all the waters that are in the earth; in the fourth, the great lights, the sun, and moon, and also the stars; in the fifth, every volatile, reptile, and four-footed animal, in the air, earth, and water; in the sixth, man. It seems therefore, according to them, that the first six thousand years were passed before the formation of man, and that mankind are to continue for the other six thousand years, the whole time of consummation being twelve thousand years<sup>3</sup>. For they held that the world was subject to certain revolutions, wherein it became transformed, and a new age and generation began: of such generations there were in all, according to them, eight, differing from one another in customs and way of life; each having a duration of a certain number of years assigned them by God, and determined by the period which they called the great year. The approach of such a change in the world was judged, by the Tuscan diviners, to be portended by a prodigy which happened in the time of C. Marius, when the air being perfectly clear and serene, there was heard a shrill and mournful sound of a trumpet, to the astonishment and terror of every body<sup>4</sup>. And these are all the remains we now have of the old Etrurian physiology; which may be supposed to have been well worth our knowledge, that nation being particularly curious and diligent in their enquiries into nature<sup>5</sup>. Besides those we have already mentioned, who entertained this opinion of the mundane revolutions, the Druids also taught the alternate dissolution of the world by water and fire, and its successive renovation<sup>6</sup>.

The opinion of the ancient Tuscans,

and of the Druids.

THE Mages, among the ancient Persians, did also acknowledge the world to have been created by God, as their successors most certainly do at this day<sup>7</sup>; but being at a loss otherwise to account for the original of evil, they held two principles, a good dæmon, or God, and an evil one<sup>8</sup>; the first the author of all good, and the other of all evil; the former they supposed to be represented by light, and the latter by darkness, as their truest symbols; and that of the composition of those two, all things in the world are made. The good principle, or God, they named Yezad, or Yezdân, and Ormazd, or Hormizda, which the Greeks wrote Oromazes; and the evil dæmon they called Abârîman, or Abrîman, and the Greeks Arimanius<sup>9</sup>. Intending in the proper place to give a more particular detail of the ancient religion of the Magi, and their several tenets, true or supposed; we shall only observe here, that though one sect of them held, as the Manichæans and some other heretics did, both these principles to have been from all eternity, yet they are reputed heterodox; the original doctrine being, that the good principle, or God, only was eternal, and the other created: which appears not only from the unanimous testimony of the eastern writers, but from what genuine remains we have of Zoroastres in the Greek, particularly the following description of the supreme Deity, taken from the very words of Zoroastres himself; God, says he, has the head of a hawk (which must be a symbolical expression) and is the first of all things, incorruptible, eternal, unmade, without parts, unlike any other being, the promoter of all good, impartial, the best of the good, the most prudent of the prudent; he is the father of equity and justice, self-instructed, natural, perfect, and

The opinion of the Persian Magi.

<sup>1</sup> CUDWORTH, p. 220.

<sup>2</sup> AUGUST. CONTR. FAUST. l. 20. c. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Anonym. apud SUID. in

voce Tyrrheni.

<sup>4</sup> PLUTARCH. in Sylla, p. 456.

<sup>5</sup> DIODOR. SIC. l. 5. p. 316.

<sup>6</sup> STRABO,

lib. 4.

<sup>7</sup> See LORD'S account of the religion of the Persians, p. 5.

<sup>8</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in

Protem. p. 6.

<sup>9</sup> Vid. HYDE, de Relig. veter. Persar. cap. 9.

wife, and the sole inventor of what is holy in nature<sup>e</sup>. And, indeed, that the evil dæmon was not believed to be self-existent, appears from what Plutarch himself, though he so confidently affirms the contrary, says of his future destruction, it being impossible that what is uncreated should ever be destroyed<sup>f</sup>.

THAT writer gives the following account of the Magian traditions in relation to their gods, and the introduction of evil into the world, viz. That Oromazes consisted of most pure light, and Arimanius of darkness; and that they were at war with each other: that Oromazes created six gods; the first the author of benevolence, the second of truth, the third of justice, the others of wisdom, riches, and the pleasure which attends good actions; and that Arimanius made as many, who were the authors of the opposite evils or vices: that then Oromazes, triplicating himself, removed as far from the sun, as the sun is from the earth, and adorned the heaven with stars, appointing the dog-star for their guardian and leader: that he also created twenty-four other gods, and inclosed them in an egg; but Arimanius having also made an equal number, these last perforated the egg, by which means evil and good became mixed together. However, the fatal time will come, when Arimanius, the introducer of plagues and famine, must be of necessity utterly destroyed by the former, and annihilated; then the earth being made plain and even, mankind shall live in a happy state, in the same manner, in the same political society, and using one and the same language. Theopompus writes that, according to the Magians, the said two gods, during the space of three thousand years, alternately conquer, and are conquered; that for other three thousand years, they will wage mutual war, fight, and destroy the works of each other, till at last Ilades (or the evil spirit) shall perish, and men become perfectly happy, their bodies needing no food, nor casting any shadow: that God, who contrives this scene of things, rests and reposes himself for a certain season, which is not long to him, but like the intermission of sleep to men<sup>g</sup>.

A Tradition of the modern Persians.

THE modern Persians have a peculiar tradition, which they pretend to have received from Zoroastres, that God created the world, not in six natural days, but in six times, or spaces of different length, called in their tongue Gābanbārba, and making in all three hundred and sixty five days, or a year compleat: as to the several names of which, their order, number of days, and the several parts of the creation performed therein respectively, all authors agree; though they differ as to the particular part of the year from which they begin. Their names and order are as follow:

THE first time is called Mid-yūzeram, and contains the space of fifty five days; in which the heavens were created.

THE second is Mid-yūsbam, or Mid-yūsbabam, of sixty days; in this the waters were created<sup>h</sup>.

THE third, Pūtīsbabim, or Pūtīsbabim-gāb, consists of seventy five days; wherein the earth was created.

THE fourth is Iyūseram, or Iyūsbabam, of thirty days; in which the trees and plants were created.

THE fifth is Midiyārūm, containing eighty days; in which space the animals were created.

THE sixth, Hamešpātamidim, was that wherein man was created, being seventy five days<sup>i</sup>.

The opinion of the old Brach-mans, and modern Bramins.

THE old Indian philosophers, called by the Greeks Brachmanes, held that the world was generated, or made, and also perishable, being subject to successive dissolutions and renovations: that the principles of all things were different, but the formation of the world commenced from water<sup>k</sup>; and that the cause of God's making all things was his essential goodness<sup>l</sup>. And these are also the sentiments of the modern Bramins, their successors: but the particulars of their doctrine are related, by different authors, with a variety not easy to reconcile; the occasion of which has been partly the reservedness of the Bramins, who are extremely shy of conversing with strangers, or making them the least discoveries, but more the relators want of skill in their language.

THEIR tradition, as delivered by one writer<sup>m</sup>, is, that the great God being alone, and intending to manifest his goodness and power, consulted with himself about the creation of the universe, and, as the ground-work of this mighty frame, made four elements, which were at first confusedly mingled together, but the Almighty separated them in the following manner. First, by some great cane, or like instrument, he blew upon the waters, which arose into a bubble, of a round form, like an egg, which spreading itself farther and farther, made the clear and transparent firmament that encompasses the world. After this, of the remaining water, and its sediment, God made a round ball, which he called the lower world; the solid part whereof became the earth, and the more fluid the sea, both making one globe, which, by a great noise, or humming sound, he placed in the midst of the firmament. Then he created the sun and moon in the firmament, to distinguish times and seasons. And thus the elements became separated, and assigned to their proper places, and began to perform their offices, the air filling up all interstices, the fire nourishing by its heat, and the earth and sea bringing forth the living creatures proper to each. And to these God imparted a seminal virtue, that they might be fruitful; and thus was the world created.

<sup>e</sup> ZOROASTRES, in Særa collectione rituum Pers. apud EUSEB. de Præp. Ev. l. 1. cap. 10. pag. 42. OSTHANES the Mage also wrote in the same manner of the Deity, ibid. <sup>f</sup> Vid. CUNWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 222. <sup>g</sup> PLUTARCH. de Iside & Osiride, p. 369. <sup>h</sup> Mr. LORD, in his account of the religion of the Perses, p. 6, & 41, makes the work of this second space to be the creation of hell.

<sup>i</sup> HYDE, Hist. Rel. veter. Persar. p. 164, &c. <sup>k</sup> MEGASTHENES, apud Strab. l. 15. p. 713. <sup>l</sup> Vid. PHILOSTR. in vita Apollonii, p. 142. <sup>m</sup> LORD's Discovery of the Bamian Religion, extracted from their sacred book called Shaster.

a God having thus made the world, he then created man, as a creature more worthy than the rest; whom the earth, at God's command, produced from its bowels, his head first appearing, and afterwards the other parts of his body, into which God infused life, and afterwards made him a companion, which was woman, resembling him more in mind and disposition, than outward shape. The first man's name b was Pourous, and the woman's Parcoulee; whose descendants being, for their wickedness, destroyed by a deluge, God afterwards created three persons of greater perfection, called Bramaw, Vysney, and Ruddery; to each of whom he gave a different office and power; to the first, that of creating, or producing men and other animals; to the second, that of preserving and feeding them; and to the last, that of destroying them; which charges they severally executed in the manner that shall be related in a more proper place.

ANOTHER <sup>a</sup> tells us that the Bramins acknowledge one sole and supreme God, but are not perfectly agreed which of their gods he is; one sect affirming him to be Wistnou, another, Eswara; and a third holding Wistnou and Eswara to be one and the same: that they all teach, however, that his first and most ancient production c was a secondary god, named Bramma, whom the supreme God formed out of a flower, which floated on the great deep, before the creation of the world; and that God afterwards, on account of Bramma's virtue, gratitude, and fidelity, gave him power to create the universe.

BUT the protestant missionaries lately sent to the coast of Coromandel, have given accounts somewhat different from the preceding, and which yet may, perhaps, deserve more regard, as written by men who were not unacquainted with the Malabarian tongue. In one of their letters it is said, that the Malabarians (who are one of those nations which follow the religion of the Bramins) own but one divine Being, the spring and original d source of all other gods and things, called by them Isparatta, which, in their language, imports as much as a Deity. This Isparatta, they say, before any thing was created, transformed himself into an egg; out of which the whole system of heaven and earth, and all things contained therein were afterwards produced. From this divinity, as their tradition runs, did originally spring something, which they call Kiwelinga, and which they worship in their temples as a god. From this Kiwelinga three other great gods took their rise; Bramma, Wishnum, and Ispara. Bramma is said to create and make all things; Wishnum, to rule over things created; and Ispara to destroy them again.

IN another letter we are told, the supreme Being is called Barabara Waslu, who, as the Indians believe, does not concern himself immediately about things of small moment; but having created some other great gods as his vicegerents, he by them e moves and influences the world, and all creatures contained therein. These gods have again their subordinate gods, who have their particular station and government of things assigned them. The theogony, or gradual production of which gods is described in the following series. 1. The Being of all beings, or the supreme God, created eternity. 2. Eternity brought forth Tshiwien. 3. By this Tshiwien the goddess Tshaddy was created. 4. The goddess Tshaddy produced Putadi, or the elementary and sensitive world. 5. By Putadi a sound, or ringing, was generated. 6. The sound's off-spring was nature. 7. Nature afterwards begot the great god Tshatatshiwien. 8. Which last again produced another great god, called Magesburn. 9. From Magesburn sprang Ruddiren, or Ispuren. 10. From Ruddiren, the great god Wishnum. 11. This last created Bruma. 12. Bruma was the productive principle of the soul. 13. The soul at length created the heaven, or that vast expansion between heaven and earth, which makes up the fifth element, according to their philosophy, or rather the receptacle of the other four elements. 14. The heaven begat the air. 15. The air begat the fire. 16. The fire begat the water. 17. And the water the earth. Besides a tedious genealogy of other gods and prophets carried to a great length. They acknowledge their inferior gods to be subject to various changes, as well as the creatures themselves; and that each of them has his fixed term of life and government allotted him: after the expiration of all which determined times, every thing shall return into the Being of all beings, and there shall follow a new creation. As to the creation of man, they say, that sixty thousand men were created at first, but that half of them turned devils soon after, and the other half remained men; both of them being, in process of time, multiplied to infinite numbers <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ABR. ROGER, of the Religion of the Bramins (said to be taken from one of the sacred Books called Vidam) Part 1. c. 3. and Part 2. c. 1.      * Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part 1. Letter 3.

The opinion of
some among the Chinese,

THOUGH the Chinese have for some time past been generally infected with the impious opinions which have been taken notice of, it is however certain, that before idolatry prevailed in China, they acknowledged one God, or supreme, eternal, omnipotent spirit, the lord of heaven and earth, and the governor and director of all things, whom they worshipped under the name of Sbang ti. But this opinion now obtains with very few, and those of the better sort <sup>a</sup>. These hold, that a chaos was the beginning of things, from which God produced and formed whatsoever is material in the universe. But this they distinguish into two principles, which they call Yn and Yang; Yn signifies hidden or imperfect; Yang revealed or perfect; which two principles by combination produce four images or signs, which seem to represent the four elements; whence proceed eight forms, or symbols; and these represent certain general things, whereon the generation and corruption of all things depend, being the heaven, the earth, thunder, mountains, fire, clouds, waters, and wind; which again mutually combined, produce sixty-four symbols, compleating, as it were, the number of the universe; concerning which they have much mysterious learning. They say, the heaven was first perfected, then the earth, after which genii or spirits were produced, and then mankind; and that the first man, whom they call Puoncu, was generated from the chaos, as from an egg; the shell of which became the heaven, the white the air, and the yolk the earth: others say, he came out of a certain desert, but that his original is unknown <sup>c</sup>.

THEY divide the period wherein the world was created, and will be destroyed, as they do their natural day, into twelve hours or times, consisting each of ten thousand eight hundred years. The twelfth hour, or at midnight, the heaven was made; the earth, the first hour after midnight; and man the second. Their emperor Na was created the sixth hour, or at noon; and the age wherein we now live is the seventh hour (though some count a much larger number of years from the beginning of the world.) The ninth hour, they say, there will be a great disorder and confusion of all things, cruel wars, commotions in kingdoms, and public calamities, till all things return to the chaos whence they first proceeded <sup>d</sup>.

and Japanese;

THERE are also some, even among the Japanese, who acknowledge this truth of the creation of the world, and entertain a much more noble idea of their god Amida, than the generality of them do. For they say, he is invisible, distinct from the nature of the elements, and existing before the creation of heaven and earth, without beginning or end; that by him all things were created, his essence passing through heaven and earth, and beyond them; being limited to no place, and governing and preserving all things; that he is immovable, incorporeal, without any visible accident whereby he may be seen by the bodily eyes; and this god they hold in great reverence, as the perpetual fountain of all good <sup>e</sup>.

and of several American nations.

SEVERAL nations in America also entertained the same belief of a creation; of which some instances might be given: but their opinions containing little curious, as to the original of things, we have, to avoid prolixity, chosen to omit them.

A general reflection.

SOME of the accounts we have given above, will, no doubt, be taken by the generality of readers to be very absurd and ridiculous: but, before they pass an absolute judgment, they are desired to consider the imperfection of philosophy in those early times, and that the ancients, as well Greeks as Barbarians, wrapped up and concealed their true doctrines, particularly those concerning the origin of things, under the veils of symbols, ænigma's, and mystical allegories <sup>a</sup>; for which reason many things in the preceding accounts, which may seem strange and fabulous, will not, perhaps, deserve to be treated with all the contempt they must needs meet with from those who understand them in the obvious and literal sense : nor perhaps is it possible for us, at this distance of time, to give any tolerable explications of them ; and therefore omitting such disquisitions, we have confined ourselves to the bare historical narration.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. Part 2. Letter 3. See also KIRCHER. China illustr. p. 154. &c. <sup>b</sup> MARTINI Hist. Sinic. l. 1. p. 11. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. p. 13, 14. <sup>d</sup> Ex Libro Sinico de Natura, ibid. p. 13. <sup>e</sup> LUD. FRORS, apud Kircher. Chin. illustr. p. 142. <sup>f</sup> Vid. PHORNUZ. de Nat. Deor. c. ult. CLEM. ALEXANDR. Strom. 5. p. 556. & BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 89. &c.

AND now we come to the only authentic and genuine history of the creation ; The Mosaic account of the creation. which has been left us by Moses, and carries with it all the marks of truth and probability, even though it be regarded only as a humane composition, and separate from divine authority : And it is to this purpose.

IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth<sup>a</sup>. The earth, after its immediate creation, was for some time a promiscuous, dark, fluid and unformed chaos, or mass of matter<sup>y</sup>, which God, in the space of six days, disposed and reduced into the present form of the world ; his spirit moving or brooding over the surface of the water, or fluid matter, to influence and actuate the same.

THE first thing that appeared was light ; the separation of which from the darkness, was the work of the first day<sup>z</sup>.

THEN God made an expansion<sup>1</sup> in the midst of the waters, to divide the waters above from the waters below ; which expansion Moses calls heaven : and this was the second day's work<sup>b</sup>.

ON the third day, God caused the earth to be drained, and the waters to be gathered together chiefly into one great receptacle, or the ocean ; whereupon the dry land appeared : after which the earth produced all sorts of plants, herbs, and trees, bearing their several seeds and fruits, according to their various kinds<sup>c</sup>.

THE fourth day God made the sun and moon, and placed them in the heaven to illuminate the earth ; to distinguish between day and night, and divide the several seasons of the year ; the stars were also made this day<sup>d</sup>.

THE fifth day God created all the fishes, and inhabitants of the waters ; and also the fowls of the air, which were likewise produced out of the water<sup>e</sup>.

ON the sixth day God made all the terrestrial animals, the cattle, creeping things, and beasts of the field. And last of all, he created man, forming his body of the dust of the earth, and animating him with a living soul<sup>f</sup> ; and out of the man he made the woman, taking her out of his side, having first cast him into a profound sleep<sup>g</sup>.

THIS is the substance of what Moses has delivered concerning the creation of the world ; which being short, and rather suited to the capacities of the people he designed to instruct, than written for the satisfaction of a philosophic enquirer, has left room for various explications, and the setting up of several very different hypotheses.

IT may be expected we should say something of the hypothesis of Mr. Des Cartes, The Cartesian hypothesis. though he has endeavoured rather to form a fine system of his own, than to explain the Mosaic description, and reconcile it with philosophy. He agrees with Epicurus, in making matter and motion the principles of nature ; supposing, however, the being of a God, who both created the matter, and impressed the first motion upon it ; but then after this motion once begun, and the wheels set a going, he leaves this vast machine to the laws of mechanism, which affect all things, both celestial and terrestrial, without any farther assistance from the first impressor<sup>h</sup>, after the following manner.

He supposes, 1. That the matter of which the world is composed, being at first of one uniform nature, and infinitely divisible, was actually divided into many particles of a moderate size, which had all such a motion as is now found in the world. 2. That all these particles were not at first spherical, because many such little globes, joined together, will not fill up a continued space ; but that, of whatever figure they were at first, by their continual motion and frequent occurrences against each other, their angles would be cut off, and they become spherical. 3. He asserts, that there is no space left empty, and therefore when these round particles, by being joined together, leave some intervals between them, he supposes that there are other lesser particles, arising from those angles that were cut off, which by the force and celerity of their motion, will be divided into innumerable still less fragments, proper to fill up all the interstices. 4. He supposes, that some of these fragments, taken from the angles of the spherical particles, will necessarily have very angular figures, and, upon that account, being not so fit for motion, will be apt to stick together, and transfer a great part of

<sup>a</sup> Genes. i. 1.    <sup>y</sup> Ib vers. 2.    <sup>z</sup> Vers. 3, 4, 5.    <sup>1</sup> This is the true signification of the Hebrew

רָקִיעַ and not Firmament, which was taken from the Greek interpreters.    <sup>b</sup> Ibid. vers. 6, &c.

<sup>c</sup> Vers. 9, &c.    <sup>d</sup> Vers. 14, &c.    <sup>e</sup> Vers. 20, &c.    <sup>f</sup> Vers. 26.    <sup>g</sup> Cap. ii. vers. 21, &c.

<sup>h</sup> BAKER'S Reflections on Learning, cap. 7.

their motion to such particles as are less, and consequently move swifter. These things being supposed, he proceeds to the formation of the world from his three elements, which consist of the three sorts of particles abovementioned. The first element, which is the subtle matter cut off from the angles of the greater particles, is that of the sun and fixed stars, and susceptible of a much quicker motion than the other two: the second element consists of the spherical particles themselves, of which the heavens were made: the third element consists of those angular particles which are less adapted to motion, and thence proceeded the earth, planets, comets, and other appearances of nature<sup>1</sup>.

He supposes that the solar system is a vortex continually whirling round, whose matter (excepting the earth and planets) is very liquid and transparent, consisting altogether of the first and second elements, and containing a greater quantity of the first, than is sufficient to fill up the spaces between the particles of the second. And since all bodies which move circularly, endeavour to recede from the center of their motion, and the more thick and solid parts, such as the particles of the second element, are obliged to fly off with a greater force than the rest; the particles of the second element must necessarily recede from the common center, and approach one another, as much as their figure and motion will permit. After their interstices therefore are filled up, the remaining matter of the first element takes the place left by the second; by which means a mass, or heap of the matter of the first element, settles, and is formed in the midst of the vortex, which mass we call the sun<sup>k</sup>. Every of the fixed stars he supposes likewise to be a sun, and the center of a vortex; and that the earth was originally such a star, whose vortex was adjoining to that of the sun; but by degrees it was covered over, or incruited with spots, arising on its surface like the scum on a boiling pot, which still increasing and growing thicker and thicker, the star losing its light and activity, and consequently, the motion of the celestial vortex about it growing more weak, languid, and unable to resist the vigorous incroachments of the neighbouring vortex of the sun; it was at last drawn in, and wholly absorbed by it, and forced to comply with its motion, and make one in the choir of the sun's satellites<sup>l</sup>.

Objections
therein.

BUT this hypothesis is liable to several objections, and some which absolutely ruin it. The three elements of Des Cartes, and particularly the subtle matter of the first, have been shewn to be imaginary, and his vortices fictitious and repugnant to the nature of things; his supposition of a plenum is also evidently false, not to mention the absurdities which follow his making of matter and space, or extension, to be the same<sup>m</sup>. However, we cannot but think the essay of that philosopher, who endeavoured to account for the formation of the world in a certain time from a rude matter, by the sole continuation of a motion once impressed, and reduced to a few simple and general laws; or of others, who have since attempted the same, with more applause, from the original properties of matter, with which it was indued at its creation, is so far from being criminal, or injurious to God, as some have imagined, that it is rather giving a more sublime idea of his infinite wisdom.

WE cannot therefore excuse ourselves from representing the theories of two very learned men of our age and nation; one of whom has excelled in the richness of his stile and fancy, and the other in the strength of parts and contrivance.

The Theory of
Dr. Burnet.

THE former of them, Dr. Burnet, omitting to speak of the original of the universe, or even of the solar system, as made long before the Mosaic creation<sup>n</sup>, confines himself to the formation of the earth only, which he supposes to be done from a chaos, or confused mass, consisting of the principles of all terrestrial bodies, in this manner. He supposes, that the first change that would happen would be, that the heaviest and grossest parts would sink downwards towards the middle of the mass (for there he supposes the center of its gravity) and being more and more compressed, would harden by degrees, and constitute the interior parts of the earth. That the rest of the mass, which swam above, would also be divided, by the same principle of gravity, into two orders of bodies, the one liquid, like water, the other volatile, like air: for the more fine and active parts disintangling themselves by degrees from the rest, would mount above them; and having motion enough to keep them upon the wing, would play in those open places, where they constitute that body we call air: that the other parts being grosser than these, and having a more languid motion, could not fly up separate from one another, but settled in a mass together under the air, upon the body of the earth, composing not only water, strictly so called, but the whole mass of liquid bodies belonging to the earth. That there being two chief kinds of terrestrial liquors, those that are oily and light, and those that are lean and more earthy, like common water, which naturally separate from one another when they come to settle; the more oily and light part of this mass would consequently get above the other, and swim upon it. He proceeds to suppose, that the air was, as yet, thick, gross, and dark, there being abundance of terrestrial particles swimming in it, after the grossest were sunk down; which by their weight made their way more speedily: that the lesser and lighter, which remained, would sink too, but more slowly, and in a longer time; so as in their descent they would meet with that oily liquor upon the face of the deep, or upon the watry mass, which would entangle, and stop them from passing any further; whereupon, mixing there with that unctuous substance, they composed a certain slime, or fat, soft, and light earth, spread upon the face of the waters. That this thin and tender orb of earth increased still more and more, as the little earthy parts that were detained in the air could make their way to it, some having a long journey from the upper regions, and others being very light, would float up and down a long while before they could disengage themselves and descend: but at length being all got thither, and mingling more and more with that oily liquor, they sucked it all up, and were wholly incorporate together, and so began to grow more stiff and firm, making both but one substance, which was the first concretion, or firm and consistent substance that rose upon the face of the chaos, and became at last an habitable earth, such as nature designed it. And such a body as this, he doubts not, would answer all the purposes of a rising world; for what can be a more proper seminary for plants and animals, than a soil of this temper and composition? a finer and lighter sort of earth, mixed with a benign juice, easy and obedient to the action of the sun, or what other causes were employed by the author of nature for the production of things in the new made earth, and perfectly answering the ancient descriptions of the primigenial soil or slime.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. STILLINGFLEET, Orig. SACTE. RAY on the Creation. CARTESII Princip. Philos. part 3. §. 52. ROHAULT. Phys. part 1. c. 21. <sup>k</sup> ROHAULT. ibid. part. 2. c. 25. <sup>l</sup> RAY's Physico-Theol. Discourses, Disc. 3. c. 5. &c. 3. Vid. DES CARTES, Princip. Philos. part 4. §. 2. <sup>m</sup> Vid. NEWTON. Princip. l. 1. prop. 38, 40, 53, &c. Ejusdem, Optic. p. 311, 342, &c. & NOTES S. CLARKE ad ROHAULTI Phys. part 1. c. 8, & part. 2. c. 25, &c. <sup>n</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 2. c. 8.

THE form of this first earth, both external and internal, is easily conceived from the manner of its formation. As to the external form, it would be smooth, regular, and uniform, without mountains, and without a sea. The internal form would consist of several regions involving one another, like orbs about the same center, or the several elements cast circularly about each other; the water being entirely contained under the upper crust of the earth, which formed a wonderful vault, hanging above the deep, sustained by nothing but its own measures and manner of construction.

To confirm so new and surprizing a representation of the form of the first earth, and to prove it must have been different from the present, he endeavours to shew, that if the earth had been always in the form it now bears, it would not have been capable of a deluge, which could not have been effected without such an infinite mass of water, as could neither be brought upon the earth, nor afterwards any way removed from it: and that the chaos, as a fluid body, would naturally and necessarily settle and cast itself into a smooth surface, every where equidistant from its center, and not into a surface broken into so many irregularities as our earth is; nor could it possibly imitate the cavities, dens, and broken holes within it. And these reasons he backs by authority of scripture, which plainly intimates a difference between the form or constitution of the old world and of the present, by reason of which difference, that was subject to perish by a deluge, as this is subject to perish by a conflagration; besides several passages which seem to describe the structure of the antediluvian earth, as founded and established on the waters, and set as an orb over the face of the deep; conformably to which, on the renovation, or restitution of nature to its primeval state, the new earth will appear without a sea. To which he adds the testimony of ancient tradition that the world was oviform, which was true of that original earth, not only in respect to its outward figure, but also to the inward composition of it; the central parts being represented by the yolk of the egg, the exterior region of the earth by the shell, and the abyss of water by the white that lies under the shell. The manner wherein he supposes this earth was supplied with water, will be taken notice of when we come to consider more particularly the state of the antediluvian earth.

SEVERAL objections have been made to the philosophy of this gentleman's hypothesis, as that his laws of gravitation ruin the whole contrivance; because if every thing subsided according to its specific gravity, the earth being heavier than the water, must necessarily place itself nearer the center, and so leave the waters to cover the face thereto.*

*Objections

* BURNET'S Theory of the Earth, l. 1. c. 5. & Archæol. l. 2. c. 3.

* Idem, Theory, l. 1. c. 2.

† Ibid. c. 4.

‡ 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6, 7.

§ Psal. xxiv. 2. & cxxxvi. 6.

¶ Prov. viii. 27.

|| Revel. xxi. 1.

|| BURNET, Theor. l. 2. esp. 5. & Tellur. Theor. fact. l. 2. c. 10.

of the whole orb : that his fat or oily liquid to catch the terrene particles as they descended, is but a weak expedient, because it is impossible that oil, or any other liquor, should sustain such an immense heavy orb : that he has, without any reason, deprived the old world of the benefit and advantages of a sea, mountains, and minerals : but the great misfortune is, that so coherent and surprizing a scheme does not in several particulars accord with the letter of the scripture, with which he has in many places taken great liberty, supposing that the sacred books were not always to be so literally and naturally understood, as was generally believed hitherto. For considering the mean capacities of the Jews, which were not capable of such points of philosophic truths ; considering the most ancient ways of conveying (or rather concealing) sublime theorems by parables, fables, and hieroglyphics ; considering the scripture stile in some other cases, very different from the present plain way of discourse ; considering the main end of those writings, the benefit of the moral world, seemed not to require a strict adherence to truth in every circumstance relating to the natural ; and considering, lastly, that all ages had endeavoured in vain to clear these points according to the strictness of the most obvious sense, and that the greater improvements in philosophy seemed only to render them still more unaccountable ; all these considerations induced him to suppose, that the holy writers only secured the fundamental and general verities ; involving the rest under, and explaining the whole by a way of speaking, which was mystical and mythological, rather popular than true ; and fitted more to the needs of men than the reality of things <sup>a</sup>.

Mr. Whiston's
Theory.

THE other theorist, Mr. Whiston, not only shews a greater regard to scripture, and has avoided many difficulties that were chargeable on the former ; but proceeds on more philosophical principles : He first lays down this proposition, that the Mosaic creation is not a nice and philosophical account of the origin of all things, but an historical and true representation of the formation of our single earth, out of a confused chaos, and of the successive and visible changes thereof each day, till it became the habitation of mankind <sup>a</sup> : which he proves from the first words of Moses, In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth, which plainly imply that the creation of the universe out of nothing, which we usually stile creation, was precedaneous to the six days work ; the historian immediately descending thence to the chaos of our earth, to which he afterwards confines himself ; mentioning, indeed, the making of the sun and other celestial bodies, to accommodate his narrative to vulgar apprehension, and make it complete ; but chiefly to secure the Jews from the worship of the host of heaven <sup>b</sup>. He therefore supposes that the sun, moon, and stars were created before, and only made visible and conspicuous to the earth on the fourth day <sup>c</sup> : that the ancient chaos, the origin of the earth, was the atmosphere of a comet <sup>d</sup>, which is no other than a planet unformed, or in its primæval state, placed in a very excentric orbit ; to support which proposition he endeavours to shew, that the atmosphere of a comet has those several properties which are recorded of the ancient chaos ; that it has such peculiar properties besides, as lay a rational foundation for some of those phenomena of our earth, which can scarce otherwise be philosophically explained, and that no other body, or mass of bodies, now known, or ever heard of in the world, can stand in competition, or pretend to the same character. He proceeds to suppose, that the six days of the creation were equal to six years ; a day and a year being one and the same thing <sup>e</sup> before the fall of man, when the diurnal rotation of the earth about its axis, as he thinks, first began <sup>f</sup> : which supposition agrees with the letter of Moses, and the stile of scripture elsewhere, wherein a day often denotes a year ; and allows a convenient space for the works of creation, which appear to have been leisurely, regular, and gradual, without any precipitancy, or acceleration by a miraculous hand on every occasion ; not to mention other arguments drawn from the peculiar characters of the state of nature before the fall, which will be observed hereafter.

ON these foundations, Mr. Whiston proceeds to account for the formation of the earth in this manner : That such formation was not a mere result from any necessary laws of mechanism independently on the divine power ; but the proper effect of the influence and interposition, and all along under the peculiar care of God, who not only created the matter of which the universe, and particularly the earth, was to consist, out of a non-existent state, and endued it with its several properties and powers, but interposed more particularly in the formation of the earth, by changing the course and orbit of the chaos into that of a planet; by immediately forming the seeds of all animals and vegetables; by ordering every distinct day's work to be completed in its proper period, that every thing should follow in its own order and place; and principally in the creation of our first parents. That at the time immediately preceding the six days creation, the face of the abyfs, or superior regions of the chaos, were involved in a thick darkness; agreeably to the nature of a comet, which is represented as containing a central, solid, hot body, of many hundred, or thousand miles in diameter, and besides that, a vastly large, fluid, heterogeneous mass, or congeries of bodies, in a very rare, separate, and expanded condition, whose diameter were ten or eleven times as long as that of the central solid, which is the atmosphere, or chaos itself. But on the change of the comet's orbit, from a very excentrical, to a moderately elliptical one, the commencing of the Mosaic creation, and the influence of the divine spirit, all things would begin to take their own places, and each species of bodies rank themselves according to the law of specific gravity. By which method the mass of dense fluids, which composed one part of the entire chaos, being heavier than the masses of earth and water and air, would sink downwards with the greatest velocity, and elevate those masses enclosed among them upwards, which must distinguish the chaos into two very different and distinct regions; the lower and larger whereof would be a collection of dense and heavy fluids, or a vast abyfs immediately encompassing the central solid; the higher and lesser would be a collection of earthy, watery, and airy parts confusedly mixed, and encompassing the said abyfs. And this he takes to be the state of darkness; for the crowding together all those opaque corpuscles, which before roved about the immense regions of the atmosphere, must, by consequence, exclude the rays of the sun much more than before <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. KEILL's Examinat. of Dr. Burnet's Theory. <sup>b</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 2. c. 8. <sup>c</sup> WHISTON's new Theory of the Earth. Disc. of the Mosaic Creation, p. 3. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. p. 4. &c. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 24. &c. <sup>f</sup> WHISTON's Theory, B. II. p. 73. <sup>g</sup> EMPEDOCLES taught, that when mankind sprang originally from the earth, the length of the day, by reason of the slowness of the sun's motion, was equal to ten of our present months. PLUT. de placitis Philof. l. 5. c. 18. a surprizing testimony to this purpose. <sup>h</sup> WHISTON's Theory, B. II. p. 85, &c.

Things being in this state, the visible part of the first day's work was the production of light, or its successive appearance to all the parts of the earth; with the consequent distinction of darkness and light, night and day, upon the face of it. And this was effected by the separation of the upper and elementary chaos of earthy, watery, and airy corpuscles into two somewhat different regions; the one a solid orb of earth, with considerable quantities of water in its pores; the other an atmosphere in a peculiar sense, or mass of the lightest earthy, with the rest of the watery and airy particles, still somewhat confusedly mixed together. So that on this first day or year of the creation, the earthy, or denser parts, would take their places lowest on the surface of the great abyfs, would settle in part into the same, and compose an orb of earth; and in its interstices, and little cavities, all such watery particles as were already in this region, or descended upon it before its consolidation, would be enclosed; and that as far above the surface of the abyfs as their quantity would enable them to reach. On this first day also, the upper regions of the chaos, now in some measure freed from those earthy and opaque masses which before excluded the same, and caused the above-mentioned thick darkness, would, in some degree, admit the rays of the sun. Now therefore that glorious emanation, light, would begin to appear on the face of the earth; and by the annual motion, successively illuminate the several parts of it, and consequently occasion the vicissitude of night and day <sup>c</sup>.

The visible part of the second day's work was the elevation of the air, with all its contained vapours; the spreading it for an expansum above the earth; the distinction thence arising of superior and inferior waters; the former consisting of those vapours raised and sustained by the air; the latter of such as either were enclosed in the pores, interstices, and bowels of the earth, or lay upon the surface thereof. The heat of the sun, at the conclusion of the former day, beginning considerably to penetrate the superior regions of the chaos, and the lower earthy strata continuing to settle somewhat closer together, the watery parts would subside, and where they could get entrance, saturate their inward pores and vacuities, and the atmosphere would free itself more and more from the heaviest and most opaque corpuscles, and thereby become much more tenuous and clear than before. Whereupon, by the time the night, or first part of this second day was over, and the sun arose, the light and heat of that luminary would more freely and deeply penetrate the atmosphere, and become very sensible in these upper, or airy regions; and consequently vast quantities of vapours would be elevated and sustained there, and so increase the quantities which were there already; while in the mean time all the earthy corpuscles incapable of rarefaction, and with them all such watery particles as were so near the earth that the sun's power could not sufficiently reach them, were still sinking downwards, and the former increasing the crassitude and bulk of the solid earth, and the latter, if the earth was too solid to admit them, as by this time it would probably be, flowing down apace, and covering all its surface with water. So that the expansum, or firmament, which was this day spread out above the earth, was plainly the air; the superior waters, all those fresh ones, which, in the form of vapour, a nine or ten months heat of the sun, with the assistance of the central heat, could elevate, and the air sustain, besides those vast quantities of salt ones, which had never yet left those regions: the inferior waters were those which were not elevated, but remained below in the bowels, or on the surface of the earth <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. Book IV. p. 291, &c.<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 307, &c.<sup>c</sup> Ibid. p. 311.

THE visible parts of the third day's work were two; the former, the collection of the inferior waters, or such as were now under the heaven, into the seas, with the consequent appearance of the dry land; the latter, the production of vegetables out of that ground so lately become dry. In order to apprehend which it must be considered, that the orb of the earth had been settling and fixing itself on the surface of the abyss from the very beginning of the creation; and was by the cohesion of its parts grown solid some time before all the lighter and remoter earthy parts were descended upon it, suppose by the end of the first day: by which means, and by reason of the different density and specific gravity of its columns, it was settled into the abyss in different degrees, and thereby became of an unequal surface, distinguished into mountains, plains, and vallies; which things being supposed, at the conclusion of the preceding day, the air being crowded with vapours to a prodigious degree, in the night, or former part of this third day, the said vapours must needs descend on the earth in vast quantities, leaving the air by degrees pretty free, and becoming of celestial, terrestrial waters: these waters being descended, by reason of the inequality of the earth's surface, and its solidity, must in some time have run down from the higher parts by the declivities and hollows, into the lowest vallies, and most depressed regions of all, and there composed the seas and lakes; so that in the morning, the entire face of the globe, which was before covered with the descending waters, must be distinguished into overflowed vallies, and extant continents. The dry land being now distinguished from the seas, and just become moist and juicy, like the primitive slime; on the sun rising, it was of all other the most fit season for the germination of the seeds of vegetables, and the growth of trees, herbs, and plants; for which purpose, nine or ten months continual presence of the sun was a time very proper and natural <sup>l</sup>.

THE fourth day's work was the placing the heavenly bodies, sun, moon, and stars in the expansum or firmament; that is, the rendring them visible and conspicuous on the face of the earth: together with their several assignations to their respective offices there. For though the light of the sun penetrated the atmosphere in some sort the first day, and in the succeeding ones had very considerable influence upon it, yet it is by no means to be supposed that his body was visible all that while; the air, even at this day, being not at all times so clear, as to render it discernible by us, though we are at the same time sufficiently sensible of his force and influence in the constant productions of nature. But on the coming on of this fourth day, and the sun's abode below the horizon for two or three months, those vapours which were raised the day before, must fall downwards, and so before the approach of the morning, leave the air in the greatest clearness and purity imaginable, and permit the moon first, and then the sun, most plainly to appear, and be conspicuous to the earth. This fourth day therefore is the time, when both these heavenly bodies, though in being before, yet so as to be wholly strangers to a spectator on earth, were rendred visible: the whole inanimate world, with its vegetable productions, being now complete, according to the tradition of the Chinese inhabiting Formosa and other islands, who hold that the world, when first created, was without form or shape; but, by one of their deities, was brought to its full perfection in four years <sup>n</sup>.

THE production of the fish and fowl out of the waters, with the benediction bestowed on them, in order to their propagation, was the work of the fifth day, which was a very proper time for their introduction. The terraqueous globe being now become habitable, both to the swimming and volatile animals; and the air clear, and so penetrable by that complete heat of the sun, which was requisite to the generation of such creatures; those seeds, or little bodies of fish and fowl, which were contained in the water (or moist fruitful slime of kin to it) were now exposed to the kindly warmth of the sun, and the constant supply of a most gentle and equal heat from beneath; being neither disturbed by any sudden alteration of the air from winds, nor by the agitations of tides, which in those small seas, and in the absence of the diurnal rotation were

* Ibid. p. 317, &c.
Theor. ubi sup. p. 325.

† Ibid. p. 320, &c.

‡ Atlas Chines. part 2. p. 46.

§ WHISTON'S

imperceptible and gradual : which seeds being invigorated with the divine benediction, became now prolific ; and a numerous off-spring of the swimming and volatile kind arose, whereby the two fluid elements, air and water, became replenished with those first pairs, which were enabled to propagate their species °,

THE sixth day's work was the production of all the terrestrial, or dry-land animals. The brute beasts were produced out of the earth ; after which the body of Adam was formed of the dust of the ground ; and by the breath of life, breathed into him in a peculiar manner, he became a living soul : and some time after, on the same day, he was cast into a deep sleep, and Eve was formed of a rib taken from his side. The earth being now grown more solid and dry, and the air fully clear and fit for respiration, and the other disposition of external nature being subservient, it was a proper season for the generation of the land animals, and the introduction of the noblest of them, man P.

THIS is the substance of the latter theory, wherein, among many ingenious and probable solutions, there are some suppositions which have been thought too bold and precarious. Objections to Mr. Whiston's theory.

IT has been objected, that he is probably mistaken as to the extent of the Mosaic creation ; it being pretty certain that the moon was formed at that time, or at least placed in its orbit, and made to turn round the earth ; for no comets have any secondary planets : so that something more must be intended by Moses, than the bare rendring the moon visible ; and the word made, being equally applied both to sun and moon, it is supposed it ought in both places to be taken in the same, that is, a literal sense.

THE atmosphere of a comet could not, it has been thought, have been the primitive chaos, being not an obscure, but a bright pellucid fluid, which is a consequence of the intense heat of the central solid ; and because the greatest part of the bodies which compose the upper stratum of the earth, would have been vitrified on the comets near approach to the sun, and so very improper for the formation of the earth.

THAT the diurnal rotation of the earth did not commence till after the fall, so that till that time days and years were exactly the same, has been held a paradox ; considering the prodigious cold that must be occasioned by the total absence of the sun for one half of the year, and the intense heat that must ensue upon its continual shining upon it for the other ; which immoderate degrees of heat and cold must be pernicious to the antediluvian plants and animals ; unless their bodies were of a very different constitution from what they are now. Nor can there be any necessity to lengthen a day into a year, for the sake of a gradual and regular formation of things, without precipitance or acceleration, where an Almighty Agent is acknowledged to be concerned q.

IT may not therefore be amiss, laying all hypotheses aside, briefly to propose such an explication of the cosmogony as may be most agreeable both to reason and the letter of scripture. The Mosaic creation explained.

AND first, it is conceived that the Mosaic creation is neither to be extended to the whole universe, nor yet confined to the terrestrial globe alone ; the middle opinion, that it included the solar system, and that only, seeming the most probable, from the near similitude and relation the several planets in that system bear to one another, and their having the same common center and luminary ; so that though the historian chiefly regards the earth in his whole narration, yet there is reason to presume that the other planets were formed in the same manner, and in the same time as the earth, of so many particular chaotic masses.

MOSES, after the general assertion that both heaven and earth were originally made r by God, and before he begins his account of their reduction into the present system, informs us, that the earth, in particular, was at first in an unformed and desert state, when, as a thing preparatory to the work, the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters ; by which spirit some understand the third person in the blessed Trinity †, others, that plastic nature ‡ which was subservient to him on this occasion, or some other emanation of the divine power ; which it is reasonable to suppose moved the chaotic mass, whose surface was covered with water, or other fluid matter, and impregnated it with several kinds of vital influence, preparing every part to receive the intended disposition, order, and life.

° Ibid. p. 228.

P Ibid. p. 329, &c.

q Vid. KEILL's Remarks on Mr. Whiston's Theory.

r The original word עָרָא is allowed not necessarily to signify a creation, or production out of nothing : yet as the Hebrew tongue has no other word to express such a creation, it is most likely Moses uses it here in that sense.

† GROTIUS, &c.

‡ Dr. CUDWORTH's Intell. Syst. p. 148. Yet

others by this spirit of God understand no more than a violent wind, which they suppose was sent to dry up the waters. Chal. paraphrase, DAUSIUS, &c.

THINGS being in this state, the confused stagnating parts of matter began to range themselves in order; and the grosser parts subsiding, the lighter and more tenuious mounted up, by which means the atmosphere being in some degree cleared, the luminous rays of the sun began to pierce it, and caused an imperfect and glimmering light, yet sufficient partly to dispel the before total darkness, and to distinguish day from night. And this account of the light, which appeared on the first day, is much more reasonable than to suppose the substance of the sun, much less the fixed stars, were then extracted from the chaos<sup>a</sup>; because more than ninety-nine parts in an hundred of the matter of the universe, are fiery corpuscles, and if they were included at first in the chaos, it could not possibly have been dark or caliginous. Nor is it probable <sup>a</sup> that even the terrene matter of the planets was taken from the Mosaic chaos, not only because it is expressly called the earth, but because such an imagination is directly overthrown by the now undoubted property of the universal gravitation of matter; not to mention the false supposition which must in that case be made, of the earth's being the center of the world<sup>b</sup>. To account for this day's light, before the sun is said to be made, there is no occasion to recur to the supposition of its being either the divine Shechinah<sup>c</sup>, or no more than a temporary light, occasioned by the rapid motion communicated by God to a portion of matter<sup>d</sup>.

THE second day, the expanse or air, called by Moses heaven, was perfected, being now freed from the gross terrene particles which before crowded it, and made capable of supporting clouds and aqueous vapours, which were the superior waters, as those on the earth were the inferior<sup>e</sup>. By the waters above the firmament cannot be understood the planetary waters<sup>f</sup>, for the reasons given above; and the notion the old christian fathers had of super-celestial waters, is perfectly groundless.

THE former part of the third day's work was to gather the waters, which before covered the face of the earth, into seas and lakes, that the dry land might appear. How this was effected is not easy to determine. That God himself should raise the mountains, and hollow the channels of the sea for this purpose, appears not a little indecent; for which reason some have supposed the mountains might have been thrown <sup>c</sup> up by the force of a subterraneous fire, or flatus, in the same manner as earthquakes are now caused<sup>g</sup>; but the more philosophical opinion is, that they were occasioned by the different densities of the several columns of the earth, when its surface was first formed, some sinking lower into the abyss than others; for it is more than probable that the mountainous columns are much hollower and lighter than the other, notwithstanding the vulgar opinion to the contrary<sup>h</sup>. The latter part of this day's work was the production of vegetables, which were designed as food for the future animals. But how great soever we suppose the fecundity of the primigenial earth to be, it is scarce to be imagined, that trees and plants could arrive at full growth, and bear their several fruits and feeds in so short a space as a day, without the assistance of a super-<sup>d</sup> natural power: and as God is on all hands allowed to have formed the seeds of those vegetables, it may not, perhaps, be wrong to attribute their sudden maturation also to his interposition; though it be well known how much vegetation may be helped and forwarded by art, even at this day, of which there have been some surprizing instances, and much more might be expected from nature in that vigorous state.

On the fourth day the two great lights, the sun and the moon, are said to have been made and placed in the heaven. It must not, however, be supposed they were then first created, or assigned to their respective orbs; for the sun was not only in being from the beginning of the Mosaic creation, but had all along great influence <sup>e</sup> on the earth, its light and heat gradually encreasing, and influencing the earth and its productions with greater power, as the air became from time to time more and more pure and defæcated; and the moon, as well as the other planets, kept pace with the earth in its formation; but only that the bodies of those luminaries, which had been hid from the earth till the fourth day, when the air was perfectly freed from the heterogeneous particles, and the vapours which before obscured it, did then first appear to the earth, and visibly begin to perform their several offices. The stars also are for the same reason said to be made on that day; tho' the planets, as we have said, were forming before; and the fixed stars were no part of this creation*.

<sup>a</sup> Which is the opinion of Dr. NICHOLS, and others. See his Conference with a Theist, Vol. I. Part 2.
<sup>b</sup> Vid. WHISTON, of the Mosaic Creation, p. 35, &c. <sup>c</sup> The notion of ABRAVANEL. <sup>d</sup> Vid. SAURIN, Dissert. p. 2. <sup>e</sup> GROTIUS, &c. <sup>f</sup> This is Dr. NICHOLS's Interpretation, ubi supra.
<sup>g</sup> RAY on the Creation, and Bishop PATRICK in his Commentaries. <sup>h</sup> See WHISTON's Theory, Book II. p. 82.

AFTER the formation of the inanimate world, Moses proceeds to the formation of animals; and he begins with fishes and fowls, which were both produced, on the fifth day, out of the waters in great numbers†. And as the original of fish and volatiles was from the same element, so there is supposed to be some congruity in their nature, being both oviparous, and their motions of swimming and flying something alike.

IN the former part of the sixth and last day, the terrestrial animals were produced out of the earth.

- a THE manner of the original formation of plants and animals, in which the wisdom of the creator principally appears, has never been accounted for by any philosopher with any tolerable success; matter, and the laws of motion having nothing at all to do in these things, whatever they have in the inanimate part of the world. How ridiculous and groundless those hypotheses are which make them to be produced from the earth, supposed ever so fruitful, by the influence and heat of the sun, appears from the late discovery made in philosophy, that there is no such thing as equivocal generation of any the meanest animal or plant; the sun, and earth, and water, and all the powers of nature in conjunction, being able to do nothing at all towards the producing of any thing endued with so much as even a vegetative life‡. It must be therefore necessarily allowed, that God himself, or some agent impowered by him, actually formed both plants and animals, making use of the earth and water as the matter only whereof he constituted their parts. But whether these first vegetative and sensitive creatures were created in their seeds only (which contain the plants and animals themselves in little, and dispersed over the superficial part of the land and water, which had power given them to hatch and bring them forth; or whether they were created in their full state of perfection, seems not easy to decide. It has been thought by some modern philosophers, that God at first created only two of each species of animals, from which all the rest proceeded by generation: to support which opinion, they observe, that there was but one man and one woman created, and at the deluge but two of each kind (of unclean beasts) were preserved in the ark. But it seems more consonant to scripture, that a great number of every kind were formed at first: we are assured the aquatic creatures and fowls were brought forth abundantly; and plants, having no locomotive power, must necessarily have been created dispersedly all the world over. There has been also a farther question moved concerning the creation of animals, viz. whether all animals that already have been, or hereafter shall be, were at first actually created by God? or whether he hath given to each kind of animal such a power of generation, as to prepare matter, and produce new individuals in their own bodies? and it seems to be the most reasonable opinion, that God did himself, at first, actually create all the individual animals that ever were, or ever shall be; and that there is no such thing as any production of new ones. For what were that but a creation of such individuals? and what did God at the first creation more than, if this be true, we see every day done; that is, produce a new animal out of matter, which itself prepares? all the difference is, that God does that in an instant, which the creature must take time to do. Besides, the parent animal cannot be the agent or efficient in the generation, or forming and nourishing of the foetus, because that is a work of art and reason, which brute creatures are not endued withal; nor indeed does man himself understand any thing of the process of generation in himself. Again, it is most probable, if not certain, that most animals have in them from the beginning, the seeds or eggs of all the young they shall afterwards bring forth; which when spent and exhausted, the creature becomes barren: the females of all viviparous quadrupeds being brought forth with their testes or ovaria; and all birds formed with their ovary, or egg-cluster, containing the seeds of all the eggs they shall ever lay. Now had the creature a power of producing new ones, what need was there that there should be so many at first formed in them? Whereupon these philosophers argue thus; Let us suppose God did at first create two animals, a male and a female: the female must be created with its ovaries, of the formation of plants and animals.

* Dr. NICHOLLS (ubi supr.) supports the opinion of the creation of other worlds or systems before ours, by a criticism on the Hebrew words וְהָיָה (in Genes. i. 16.) which signify together with; and thence concludes, that by Moses's text the moon was to rule the night and, or together with, the stars, which shine then only; the words he made being interpolated in our translation. By the stars coming in so abruptly in this place, some have been ready to think those words were added since Moses's time, or crept into the text from a marginal annotation, made to obviate an objection from idolaters, that the stars were not made.

† Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl, &c. Genes. i. 21. But afterwards it is said, that God formed the fowls of the air out of the ground, Genes. ii. 19. The Jews reconcile this, by supposing that they were formed out of both elements mixed, viz. out of soft ooze. But CALMET (in his commentary) says the first passage may be rendered, and let the fowl fly, &c.

‡ Dr. CLARKE's Demonstration of the being and attributes of God, p. 64.

which

which (as we have said) contain so many seeds or eggs as the creature should ever bring forth young. So it is clear, that not only the first pair, but the first generation of animals were actually created. Again, this generation, from their first appearance, had each of them (that is the females) its ovaria, containing in like manner, the seeds of its future off-spring; so that this second generation was also created in the first. The same may be demonstrated of the third and fourth; and so on of all the generations that shall be as long as the world shall last <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> The creation of man,

WHEN the creation had proceeded thus far, and every thing that could be subservient to man, or advance his felicity, was compleated; he, who was to be the lord of all, and for whose sake the whole was framed, was brought into the world, being created in a solemn and immediate manner by God himself <sup>1</sup>, after a consultation, as it were, of the holy Trinity <sup>k</sup>, every Person wherein may justly be presumed to have been peculiarly concerned in the production of that being which was to bear the image of God, and be made capable, in some degree, of his immortality.

<sup>b</sup> and of woman.

MAN then was, by a divine power, created on the sixth day, after the terrestrial animals had been produced; his body was formed out of the dust of the ground <sup>1</sup>, whence he had the name of Adam <sup>m</sup>, and his soul immediately infused into him by his creator; in which better and immortal part more evidently consisted that image, or resemblance of God, wherein he is said to have been made <sup>n</sup>. The woman was formed also on the same day <sup>o</sup>, out of the side <sup>p</sup> of the man, who had been cast into a deep sleep for that end <sup>1</sup>. And this original, it is to be supposed, was chosen, to conciliate the stricter love and union between them; the side being also the most proper part to denote that equality with the man, for which the woman was designed; whereas if she had been taken from the head <sup>r</sup>, it might have argued some intended superiority, or if from the lower parts <sup>s</sup>, the contrary. From what Adam said on his first sight of the woman, that she was bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, it appears he well knew whence she was formed; whether he was sensible of the past operation, or had it otherwise revealed to him, as probably it was in a vision as he slept. Besides Eve, it is pretended by some Rabbins, that God made another woman out of the earth named Lilith, of whom the Jews relate many stories <sup>t</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> Traditions concerning their size,

THAT the first pair were created in an adult and perfect state, immediately capable of the full exercise of their natural powers and faculties, is not to be doubted: nor is it to be imagined, but that they both came out of their maker's hands in the greatest perfection both of body and mind <sup>u</sup>. But we must not hence entertain those extravagant opinions which some have held in those respects. The Talmudists say, that Adam reached from one end of the earth to the other, when first created, but that when he had sinned, God squeezed his stature to an hundred ells <sup>v</sup>: though others suppose this was done at the request of the angels, who were terrified at his gigantic size, and that God still left him nine hundred cubits high <sup>a</sup>; and that was not a great deal too much, if he waded through the sea into our continent after his expulsion from paradise, which, as some imagine, was separated from this world by the ocean <sup>b</sup>. The Mohammedans also have a tradition from their prophet, that Adam was as high as a tall palm tree <sup>c</sup>; but this would be too much in proportion, if that were really the print of his foot, which is pretended to be such, being somewhat above two spans long, on the top of a mountain in the island of Ceylon, thence named Pico de Adam; and too little, if Eve were of so enormous a size, as is said, that when her head lay on one hill near Mecca, her knees rested on two others in the plain, about two musket-shots asunder <sup>d</sup>. The beauty of Eve is said to have been so extraordinary, <sup>beauty,</sup> that the prince of the angels fell in love with her, which occasioned his fall <sup>e</sup>; and to give as charming an idea of Adam's person, some have imagined, that God, at his creation clothed himself with a human body superlatively beautiful, and by that model formed the body of Adam; which apparition was the first prelude of the incarnation <sup>f</sup>; and what is yet more wonderful, Adam all the while looked on, and saw his maker, in that lovely form, fashioning every limb <sup>g</sup>. Nor have the gifts of his <sup>and knowledge.</sup> mind been less magnified than his stature and beauty: some Rabbins <sup>h</sup> have been contented to equal him with Moses and Solomon; others assert that he was master of every science and art; that he knew more the first day of his creation than any other by the experience of a long life <sup>i</sup>; nay, that he surpassed the angels themselves in knowledge <sup>j</sup>: allegorically interpreting what is said of his stature's reaching from one end of the world to the other, of the extent of his understanding <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> RAY'S Physico-Theological Discourses, chap. 4. <sup>1</sup> Mr. WHISTON, conceiving it unfit and impossible for the divine nature of the Father to be so much, and in such a manner, concerned with the corporeal world, and the sinful race of mankind, is of opinion, that the same divine person, who was afterwards frequently conversant on earth, gave the law on mount Sinai, and took the title, adoration, and, to others, incommunicable name of the God of Israel; and who at last was incarnate, and died, and still makes intercession for us with the Father, and will judge the world at the last day; was actually and visibly on earth in a humane shape, and truly and really employed in this creation of the world, so frequently ascribed to him in the holy scriptures, and particularly in this formation of man. Vide his Theory, Book IV. p. 330. <sup>k</sup> Genes. i. 26. Most of the modern expositors take the plural number here used, Let us make, &c. to be no more than a majestic form of speech, as princes now use. The Jewish doctors are of opinion, that this deliberation was real, and held with such angelical beings as God might employ in the work of man's creation: and on this occasion tell the following story; That as Moses was writing his book by God's appointment, and these words came to be dictated, he made some difficulty to set them down; crying out, O Lord, wouldst thou then lead men into error, and make them doubt of the doctrine of the unity? whereupon God answered, I command thee to write, and if any will err, let them err. Bereshitic Rabba. Philo the Jew says, the true reason of this expression is known to God only; yet he conjectures that man alone, of all creatures, being capable of the contraries of virtue and vice; the creation of such a mixed being was partly proper and partly improper for God himself, who therefore here bespeaks his coadjutors, that what is irreprehensible in the actions or will of man may be attributed to God, and what is otherwise, to his subordinate agents. De mundi opificio, p. 15, &c. <sup>m</sup> Genes. ii. 7. <sup>n</sup> אדמה Adamah in Hebrew signifies Earth, but more properly, as is said, a sort of red earth or clay, from the root אד to be red. Ludolphus derives it from the Aethiopic, Adama, i. e. to be pleasant or delightful, which epithets are attributed to the earth for its amenity, and might be to the first man for his beauty. But this name of Adam, it must be observed, is an appellative rather than a proper name, and includes even both the sexes. Ibid. According to some of the Persian Mages (but not the more orthodox) the first human pair were named Missha and Mishana. Hyde, Hist. Rel. vet. Pers. c. 10. <sup>o</sup> Genes. i. 26, 27. Ib. v. 1.

<sup>p</sup> Ibid. i. 27. <sup>q</sup> The original word, which strictly signifies a rib, may be also translated side, as it is all along by the Septuagint. <sup>r</sup> Genes. ii. 21. <sup>s</sup> Which some have imagined. Vid. St. ROMUALD, Abbege du Treior Chronolog. Tom. I. p. 35. <sup>t</sup> Some Rabbins ridiculously fancy that God at first made Adam with a tail, but finding it lessened the beauty of his workmanship, he resolved to cut it off; however, he made it serve for the matter whereout he formed the first woman. Vid. BARTOLOCCI Biblioth. Rabbin. Tom. I. p. 69. <sup>u</sup> Vid. St. ROMUALD, ubi supra. HEIDRAGER, Hist. patriarch. Tom. I. p. 112. <sup>v</sup> Vid. PHILON. Jud. de mundi opificio. p. 31. <sup>w</sup> TALMUD, in libr. Sanhedrim.

BUT it is still more groundless and extravagant to suppose, as several Rabbins have done, that Adam's body was created double, male on one side, and female on the other, <sup>Supposed, by some, to have been created double.</sup> being joined together by the shoulders, the heads looking directly contrary ways: and that God, when he had made Eve, had no more to do than to split this body in two <sup>l</sup>. Others join them by their sides, and say the male body was on the right, which embraced the other round the neck with his left hand, while the other did the same to him with her right. These dreams are sufficiently refuted by the text of Moses. It may not however be improper to add a word of the Hermaphrodites, or Androgynes, <sup>Of the Androgynes of Plato.</sup> of which Plato has said so much: they were bodies which had the two sexes, with four arms, four legs, and two faces on one neck, turned one towards the other. This duplicity of members gave them a prodigious strength, and consequently inspired them with great insolence, and they thought of no less than making war against the gods: who consulting on means to bring them to reason, the advice of Jupiter was approved, and that was to split them in two; which being done, each part still preserved a strong inclination to unite itself to the other, and this was, according to him, the original of love <sup>m</sup>.

THE Mohammedans have several peculiar traditions about the creation of Adam. <sup>Mohammedan traditions concerning the creation of man.</sup> They say, that the angels Gabriel, Michael, and Israfil were sent by God, one after another, to fetch for that purpose seven handfuls of earth from different depths, and of different colours (whence some account for the various complexions of mankind <sup>n</sup>;) but the earth being apprehensive of the consequence, and desiring them to represent her fear to God, that the creature he designed to form would rebel against him, and draw down his curse upon her, they returned without performing God's command; whereupon he sent Azrail on the same errand, who executed his commission without remorse; for which reason God appointed him to separate the souls from the bodies, being therefore called the angel of death. The earth he had taken was carried into

<sup>a</sup> Vid. BARTOLOCCI Biblioth. Rabbini. Vol. I. p. 65, 66. cap. 14.

<sup>b</sup> YAHYA, Comment. in Korân.

<sup>c</sup> BARCEPHA, in tract. de Paradiso,

<sup>d</sup> MONCONIS, Voyages, part I. p. 372, &c.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. BARTOLOCCI. ubi sup. p. 322.

<sup>f</sup> EUGUBIN. in Cosmopoeia, apud Salian. Annal. Tom. I. p. 106.

<sup>g</sup> The latin terms are, Cum fingeretur homo, manus illas divinas aspexit ambrosioque vultus illor, pulcherrima brachia corpus suum fingentia, singulosque artus ducentia. Idem, Ibid.

<sup>h</sup> Apud RIVINI

Serpent. Seducit. p. 50. <sup>i</sup> Vid. SALIAN. ubi sup. p. 107, 113. <sup>j</sup> To prove this, they pretend to alledge the testimony of God himself. They say, that the angels having spoken of man with some contempt, when God consulted them about his creation, God made answer that the man was wiser than they; and to convince them of it, he brought all kinds of animals to them, and asked them their names; which they being not able to tell, he put the same question to the man, who named them one after another; and being asked his own name, and God's name, he answered very justly, and gave God the name of JEHOVAH. RIVIN. Serpent. Seducit. p. 56. This story has been adopted by Mohammed in his Korân, cap. 2. ver. 30, &c.

<sup>k</sup> Ibid. p. 49, &c.

<sup>l</sup> Vid. HEIDEGGER. Hist. Patriarch.

Tom. I. p. 85. which author attributes this opinion to two famous Rabbins, Manasses Ben Israel (in Conciliat. in Genes.) & Moses Maimonides (in More Nevoch. p. 2. cap. 30.) who yet rather approve a different sentiment. <sup>m</sup> PLAT. in Sympol. pag. 1185. Ed. Francof. 1602.

<sup>n</sup> AL TERMEZI, from a tradition of Abu Musa al Athari.

Adabia, to a place now between Merca and Tayef, where, being first kneaded by the angels, it was afterwards formed by God himself into a human form, and left to dry for the space of forty days, or, as others say, as many years; the angels, in the interim, often visiting it, and Eblis (afterwards the devil) among the rest: but he, not contented with looking on it, kicked it with his foot till it rung, and knowing God designed that creature to be his superior, took a secret resolution never to acknowledge him as such. After this, God animated the figure of clay, and endued it with an intelligent soul; and when he had placed him in paradise, formed Eve out of his left side <sup>a</sup>.

The Phœnician tradition.

THE two first human pair, according to the Phœnician tradition, were begotten, or generated by the wind Colpias, and his wife Baan, which is interpreted night <sup>o</sup>; that is, by a hollow wind acting on unformed matter: the meaning being no more than this; that a wind inclosed in several cavities of unshapen matter, worked out of it the first man; the rude matter being the passive principle, or cause, and therefore here figuratively called the wife; and the inclosed wind being the active principle, and therefore here intimated to be as it were the husband, in this first generation <sup>p</sup>.

Of the human soul:

whether infused, or ex traduce.

THAT the soul of man is a spiritual substance, independent on the matter it informs, is evident to any who considers the power and freedom of its operations, which no accident can be supposed to have; and which matter, with all its refinements and maturations, can never be able to perform. It has however been questioned, whether the souls of men are infused into them immediately from God, or whether they are derived, ex traduce, from their parents. The latter opinion has been maintained, from all other creatures having the power of propagating their species in full perfection; by which it seems to follow, that mankind were indueed with the same; from the likeness of temper and disposition of mind, which children often take from their parents; and from the indecency of conceiving God to be incessantly making souls, whenever the sexes are stimulated to satisfy their natural appetite. But it is scarce possible to maintain the immateriality and immortality of the human soul on this supposition: for if the soul be propagated by generation, it must, to our best apprehension, be material, and liable to corruption <sup>q</sup>; it is therefore more reasonable to believe, that though God has committed the formation of our bodies to the agency of second causes, yet he has reserved the production of our souls to himself, who is the Father, and God of the spirits of all flesh <sup>r</sup>.

Whether our souls were created at once, or successively.

It has also been doubted, whether the souls of mankind were all created at once, together with that of Adam, in order to be united to certain bodies which should be prepared afterwards for their reception; or whether they are successively created, as the bodies they are to inform are made fit to receive them? Such of the old philosophers who believed the soul to be a distinct substance from the body, as Pythagoras, Empedocles, and Plato, concluded that all souls must pre-exist in the universe before generation and transmigration into their respective bodies; and this doctrine was not confined to human souls only, but extended universally to all souls and lives whatsoever; for the ancients were so far from denying the sense and consciousness of brutes, that the generality of them allowed them the faculty of reasoning <sup>s</sup>, though they were not able to express their thoughts as man did: for which reason they were supposed, by some, to transmigrate indifferently from men into other animals, and from animals into men; it being only the difference of the organs, and the modification of the matter to which they were united, wherein consisted the seeming disparity of their powers. Several of the ancient christians have also believed the pre-existence of souls, induced by this consideration, that it was incongruous to bring God upon the stage perpetually, and make him immediately interpose every where in the generation of men, by the miraculous production of their souls out of nothing. Nay, the continual creation and decreation of the souls of brutes has been thought so improbable, that it has been fancied they are but so many particular emanations, or effluxes, from that source of life <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> KHOND AMIN, JALLALO'DDIN, Comment. in Koran, &c. Vid. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. Orient. p. 55.

<sup>o</sup> SANCHONIATHO, apud EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. 1. c. 10. As to the words Colpias and Baan, Bochart takes the first of them to be the same with קול-פי-יב Col-pi-yab, i. e. the voice of the mouth of God; but this is improbable, because it is plainly the name of a wind, derived from the Greek Κέρας, which signifies a hollow place or cavity, whether those little ones in our bosoms, garments, &c. or those large ones which we call bays in the sea-shore: nor is there such a phrase in the Hebrew tongue, as the voice of the mouth of Yah; besides other reasons. Baan he would correct Baut, which he affirms to signify the night: but it is more probably the בנה Bohu of Moies, as Scaliger and Grotius agree. Vid. CUMBERLAND'S Remarks on the Hist. of SANCHONIATHO, p. 207. <sup>p</sup> CUMBERLAND, ibid. p. 209. <sup>q</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 38. <sup>r</sup> Numb. xvi. 22. Vid. Mr. STACKHOUSE'S Body of Divinity, p. 223, &c. <sup>s</sup> Vid. PLUTARCH. de placitis Philos. l. 5. cap. 20. See BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Perreira, Rem E.

above, which animate such matter as is fitly prepared to receive and be actuated by them, so long as it continues such; but when those organized bodies, by reason of their indisposition, become incapable of being further acted upon, are resumed and retracted into that original head or fountain; it seeming not at all absurd to grant perpetuity of duration to the soul even of brutes, any more than to every the least particle of matter<sup>c</sup>. Nor is this doctrine of pre-existence unknown to the Mohammedans, who imagine that God drew out of the loins of Adam all his posterity at once, and made a covenant with them that they should acknowledge him for their lord<sup>d</sup>. They say, that all these men were actually assembled together in a valley near Mecca, or as others say, in the plain of Dabia in India, in the shape of pismires, which were endued with understanding; and after they had, in the presence of the angels, as witnesses, confessed their dependance on God, they were again caused to return into the loins of their great ancestor<sup>e</sup>. That the Jews had likewise some notion of the soul's existing before the body, appears from their question put to our Saviour, whether the man that was born blind<sup>f</sup>, had himself sinned, or his parents, to deserve that punishment; and as this opinion was not then contradicted, some have supposed it to have been thereby tacitly approved.

NOTWITHSTANDING which, the vulgar opinion of the successive creation of souls, may with good reason be allowed; for why should we imagine that God put forth all his creative vigour at once in a moment, ever afterwards remaining a spectator only of the consequent result, and permitting nature alone to do all, without any farther interposition<sup>g</sup>? and how is it possible, that if our souls ever were in such a state of pre-existence, we should have so perfectly lost all memory and consciousness of any thing?

BEFORE we have done with this subject, the creation of man, we must take some notice of the opinion of those who think mankind were in being before Adam, who was the progenitor of the Jews only. To support which, they alledge that Moses makes mention of two distinct creations, one of mankind in general<sup>h</sup>, and the other of Adam and Eve<sup>i</sup>; and in the progress of his history gives strong intimations that there were several more men in the world when they were created; else it is not easily to be conceived how Cain could be a tiller of the ground<sup>j</sup>, which must pre-suppose all the artificers that have relation to tillage; or what reason he had to apprehend, that every one that found him would slay him<sup>k</sup>; nor can his going into another country, marrying a wife, and building a city<sup>l</sup>, be otherwise accounted for. From which they would infer, that Moses intended only to give an account of the origin of the Jews, and not of the primitive parents of the whole humane race<sup>m</sup>. These objections are easily answered; for the passage wherein the creation of man is mentioned the second time, is plainly no more than a recapitulation of what had been said before of the creation of the world in general, with a more particular detail of that of our first parents. And as to the numbers of men supposed to be in the world about the time of the murder of Abel, it is by no means improbable, that these should be the descendants of Adam and Eve, whose posterity, in the space of near one hundred and thirty years, (for it was in that year of Adam's age that Seth, who was given in lieu of Abel, was born) might, by a fair calculation, be multiplied to many thousand souls, considering the primitive fecundity, and that none are supposed to have died in the interim<sup>n</sup>.

BUT the most plausible objection of the pre-adamites is, that if Adam and Eve be allowed to be the progenitors of all mankind, there can be no tolerable cause assigned of the difference in colour between the whites and the blacks; it being very improbable they were both the off-spring of the same parents. To this it may be answered, that the variety of complexions in the world may be rationally accounted for another way. We know how the hair and colour of mens bodies differ, according to the climate they inhabit, and their greater or lesser distance from the sun: we may therefore well conclude, that the first colony, which settled in a very hot country, received a great change in their complexion, proportionable to the heat of the climate, and became very tawny, gradually inclining to blackness, as the sun was more intense upon them. Hence, in a generation or two, that high degree of tawnyiness might become natural, and at length the pride of the natives. The men might begin to value themselves upon this complexion, and the women to affect them the better for it; so that their love

<sup>c</sup> CUDWORTH, ubi supra, p. 44. &c.

<sup>d</sup> Al Koran, cap. vii. ver. 173.

<sup>e</sup> See D'HERBELOT,

Biblioth. orient. p. 54. MARRACCIUS in Alcoran. p. 290.

<sup>f</sup> John ix. 3.

<sup>g</sup> CUDWORTH, ubi

supra. <sup>h</sup> Genes. i. 27.

<sup>i</sup> Genes. ii. 9. Ib. v. 1.

<sup>j</sup> Genes. iv. 2.

<sup>k</sup> Genes. iv. 14.

<sup>l</sup> Ib. ver. 16, 17.

<sup>m</sup> Vid. PEYRERII Præadamit. l. 3. cap. 4.

<sup>n</sup> BLOUNT's Oracles of Reason, p. 218.

<sup>o</sup> Vid. NICHOLLS's Conference with a Theist, Vol. I. part I.

for their husbands, and daily conversation with them, might have a considerable influence upon the fruit of their wombs, and make each child grow blacker and blacker, according to the fancy and imagination of the mother; the force of which is evident from many instances. Upon this supposition, the children thus produced must every birth approach nearer to an absolute blackness; and as their tender bodies came to be exposed naked (as the manner of such countries is) to the violent heat of the sun, their skin must needs be scorched in an extraordinary manner, and, perhaps, its very texture altered, and by that means contract a blackness far superior to that of their parents. By such degrees it is not improbable that people of the fairest complexion, when removed into a very hot climate, may, in a few generations, become perfect negroes. As to what some have imagined, that this blackness was at first preternatural, and a judgment inflicted upon Ham, the son of Noah, for discovering his father's nakedness<sup>b</sup>, and that all people of that complexion are the progeny of that undutiful son<sup>c</sup>; this seems very unlikely, and without foundation, the curse on that occasion being laid on Canaan, the son of Ham, by name, and yet his posterity are allowed not to have been black.

Thus have we attended the earth through its several degrees of formation, seen it perfected, clothed with trees and plants, and replenished with animals; and at last man, for whom the whole was designed, and to whom the dominion of it was expressly given by its maker, introduced and placed in it.

The time and season of the creation.

Whether all this was really done in the space of six days, has been a question; some, as has been observed, thinking it much too short for such a work, and others too long<sup>k</sup>, supposing that the world was created in a moment, and that Moses extends it to six days, the better to help the imagination of the people, that things may seem to rise in some order and method, and to take off any image of haste, or precipitancy. But we cannot see any reason to depart from the letter of Moses in this particular, the creation described by him being not the creation of the substance of all things out of nothing, which was most probably the effect of one individual act, but the formation of one world, or system only, out of matter before created<sup>l</sup>.

It has been disputed also in what season of the year the world was made; which it is to be presumed must be meant in respect of the place where Adam was created; for otherwise all the seasons must have been in being at once in different parts of the world. Some have supposed the vernal equinox to have been the time; but others the autumnal, which opinion is the more generally received<sup>m</sup>, and seems to be confirmed from the years anciently beginning from that time<sup>n</sup>. This indeed was afterwards altered by Moses, who ordered the ecclesiastical year should commence from the vernal equinox, or the month Nisan<sup>o</sup>: but the Jews in civil affairs still continued to compute from the former, or the month Tisri.

The place where Adam was created.

Another subject of enquiry has been the place where Adam was created. There is an ancient tradition, that it was in Syria, near where Damascus now stands<sup>p</sup>; others will have it to have been in Armenia<sup>q</sup>; but it was, most probably, in or near the garden of Eden, the seat designed for him, where-ever that was.

Things made prior to the creation.

The Mohammedans, who have very right notions as to the creation of the world in six days, do however believe, that God, previous to that creation, made the table whereon, as they suppose, his decrees are written; the pen wherewith they are written; the waters whereon his throne is established; and the throne itself<sup>r</sup>: wherein they have have imitated the Jews, who say, that God created seven things before the world; viz. paradise, the law, the souls of just men, Israel, the throne of God's glory, Jerusalem, and the Messiah<sup>s</sup>.

Of angels.

Before we quit this subject, it may be expected we should say something of the creation of angels, who so eminently concerned themselves in the affairs of mankind, at least in the first ages of the world.

ANGELS, in the proper signification of the word<sup>t</sup>, do not import the nature of any being, but only the office, to which they are appointed, especially by way of message, or intercourse between God and his creatures; in which sense they are called the ministers of God, who do his pleasure, and ministring spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation. That there are such beings as we call angels, that is, certain permanent substances, invisible and imperceptible to our senses, endued with understanding and power superior to that of humane nature, created by God, and subject to him, as the supreme Being; ministering to his divine providence in the government of the world by his appointment, and more especially attending the affairs of mankind; is a truth so fully attested by scripture, that it cannot be doubted, and was so generally acknowledged by the Jews, that it is scarce to be believed that even the Sadducees themselves utterly denied their existence, but only that they had no notion of their appearing in those latter times; as many Christians, though they do not absolutely impugn the being of spirits, yet are far from giving credit to the frequent stories of apparitions. Nay, the existence of such invisible beings was generally acknowledged by the ancient heathens, though under different appellations; the Greeks calling them dæmons, and the Romans genii, or lares<sup>a</sup>: Epicurus seems to have been the only one among the old philosophers who absolutely rejected them<sup>b</sup>; and indeed, the belief of middle intelligences influencing the affairs of the world, and serving as ministers or interpreters between God and man, is as extensive as the belief of a God; having never, as we know, been called in question by those who had any religion at all.

<sup>a</sup> Genes. ix. 22. <sup>b</sup> Ib. ver. 25. <sup>c</sup> St. AUSTIN. PHILO. JUD. LE GRAND, Hist. sacræ. <sup>d</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 2. p. 312. <sup>e</sup> Vid. JACOB. CAPPELLI Obierv. in Genes. c. i. ver. 14. p. 583. <sup>f</sup> Vid. Exod. xxiii. 16. & xxxiv. 22. <sup>g</sup> Exod. xii. 2. <sup>h</sup> Vid. HEIDECC. Hist. Patriarchar. Tom. I. p. 84. <sup>i</sup> CALMET's Comment. in Genes. <sup>j</sup> Vid. ECHELLENS. Hist. Arab. c. 9. <sup>k</sup> Missechet Pelschim. <sup>l</sup> The word Angel is Greek, and signifies a Messenger: the Hebrew מַלְאָכִים, the Arabic ملائكة, and Persian فرشتگان, signify the same thing. The Angels are in Daniel (cap. iv. ver. 13, &c.) called חַשְׁמַנִּים or Watchers, from their vigilance; for which reason they are in the remains we have of the prophecy attributed to Enoch, named Egregori; which word imports the same in Greek.

AND had we no such revelation and tradition, it seems very reasonable to suppose there are intermediate beings to fill up the gap which would otherwise be in nature; for as there is a gradation of creatures on earth, some having barely being, as earth, air, and water; some that besides being have life, as vegetables; some that besides life have sense and perception, as brute animals; and some that besides sense have reason and cogitation, as men: and as we see our sensitive part exists in beings beneath us; so it is very probable that our more noble and intellectual part exists in beings as much superior to us as we are to brutes; and that there is a like gradual ascent from the lowest rank of them, which borders upon man, to the highest, which comes as near as a finite creature can, to an infinite deity<sup>c</sup>.

THAT the angels were in being long before the Mosaic creation, is generally allowed<sup>d</sup>, and indeed cannot be doubted, since they were actually present, if not employed in that creation, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy<sup>e</sup>; and since it is more than probable that the fall of the apostate angels was some time at least before it.

As to the natures of these beings, we are told that they are spirits<sup>b</sup>, but whether pure spirits divested of all matter, or united to some thin bodies, or corporeal vehicles, has been a controversy of long standing. Not only the ancient philosophers, but some of the christian fathers<sup>c</sup>, were of opinion that angels were clothed with ethereal or fiery bodies, of the same nature with those which we shall one day have, when we come to be equal to them. But the more current opinion, especially of later times, has been, that they are substances entirely spiritual, though they can at any time assume bodies, and appear in humane, or other shapes<sup>d</sup>.

THAT the angelical powers and abilities vastly excel those of man, cannot be denied, if we consider that their faculties are not clogged or impeded, as ours are, by any of those imperfections which are inseparable from corporeal beings: so that their understandings are always in perfect vigour; their inclinations regular; their motions strong and quick; their actions irresistible by material bodies, whose natural qualities they can controul or manage to their purposes, and occasion either blessings or calamities, public or private, here below. Instances of which are too numerous to mention.

BESIDES their attendance on God, and their waiting and executing his commands, they are also presumed to be employed in taking care of mankind and their concerns: and that every man had such a tutelar or guardian angel, even from his birth, was a firm belief and tradition among the Jews; and our SAVIOUR himself seems to have been of the same sentiment<sup>e</sup>. The heathens were also of the same persuasion<sup>f</sup>, and thought it a crime to neglect the admonitions of so divine a guide<sup>g</sup>. Socrates publickly confessed himself to be under the direction of such an angel, or dæmon, as several others have since done<sup>a</sup>. And on this tutelar genius of each person, they believed his happiness and fortune depended. Every genius did his best for the interest of his client; and if a man came by the worst, it was a sign the strength of his genius was inferior to that of his opponent, that is, of an inferior order; and this was governed by chance. There were some genii, whose ascendant was so great over others, that their very presence entirely disconcerted them; which was the case of that of Augustus in respect to that of M. Antony<sup>i</sup>: and for the same reason, perhaps, some persons have wit, and speak well, when others are absent, in whose presence they are confounded, and out of countenance. The Romans thought the tutelar genii of those who attained the empire, to be of an eminent order, on which account they had great honours shewn them: nations and cities also had their several genii<sup>k</sup>. The ancient Persians so firmly believed the ministry of angels, and their superintendence over human affairs, that they gave their names to their months and the days of their month, and assigned them distinct offices and provinces<sup>l</sup>: and it is from them the Jews confess to have received the names of the months and angels, which they brought with them when they returned from the Babylonish captivity<sup>m</sup>. After which we find they also assigned charges to the angels, and in particular the patronage of empires and nations; Michael being the prince of the Jews<sup>n</sup>, as Raphael is supposed to have been of the Persians<sup>o</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. PLUTARCH. de placitis philos. l. 1. c. 8. & VARRON. apud August. de civit. Dei. l. 7. cap. 6.
<sup>b</sup> Vid. PLUT. ibid. <sup>c</sup> Vid. STACKHOUSE'S Body of Divinity, p. 185, &c. <sup>d</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archaeol. l. 2. p. 300, &c. <sup>e</sup> Job xxxviii. 7. Yet some have imagined they were created the first day, and designed by Moses under the name of lights; Others, that they were created the sixth day, after man, to crown and consummate the creation, which rose by degrees from the less to the more perfect parts. <sup>f</sup> Vid. TILLOTSON'S Sermon. Vol. II. <sup>g</sup> S. BASIL, S. ATHANASIUS, and METHODIUS; and also S. AUGUSTIN. apud SIXT. Senens. l. 5. Annot. 8. Vid. Acta Concil. Nicen. 2. Act. 5. <sup>h</sup> MAIMONID. More Nev. p. 2. cap. 49. <sup>i</sup> Vid. Matth. xviii. 10. <sup>j</sup> Vid. MENAND. ARRIAN. in Epictet. <sup>k</sup> Vid. M. ANTONIN. Meditat. l. 2. §. 15. l. 5. §. 19. &c. PLOTIN. Ennead. 3. l. 4. DIOG. LAERT. in Zenon. p. 418.

THE Mohammedans have so great a respect for the angels, that they account a man an infidel who either denies their existence, or loves them not. They believe them to be free from sin, enjoying the presence of God, to whom they are never disobedient: that they have subtil pure bodies, being created of light; and have no distinction of sexes, nor do they need the refreshment of food or sleep. They suppose them to have different forms and offices; that some adore God in several postures; others sing his praises, and intercede for men; some carry and encompass his throne; others write the actions of men, and are assigned guardians to them<sup>p</sup>.

As the numbers of these celestial spirits are very great<sup>q</sup>, it is likewise reasonable to believe that there are several orders and degrees among them, which is also confirmed by scripture: whence some speculative men have distributed them into nine orders, according to the different names they are there called by; and reduced those orders into three hierarchies, as they call them; to the first of which belong seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; to the second, dominions, virtues and powers; and to the third, principalities, arch-angels, and angels. They imagine farther, that there are some who constantly reside in heaven; others who are ministers, and sent forth, as there is occasion, to execute the orders they receive from God by the former. The Jews reckon but four orders, or companies of angels<sup>r</sup>, each headed by an arch-angel; the first order being that of Michael, the second of Gabriel, the third of Uriel, and the fourth of Raphael; but though the Jews believe them to be but four, yet it seems there were rather seven<sup>s</sup>. The Persians also held there were subordinate degrees among the angels<sup>t</sup>.

Of the fallen angels.

ALTHOUGH the angels were originally created perfect, good, and obedient to their master's will, yet some of them sinned<sup>u</sup> and kept not their first estate<sup>v</sup>, but left their habitation, and so of the most blessed and glorious, became the most vile and miserable of all God's creatures. They were expelled the regions of light, and cast down to hell, to be reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, until the day of judgment. With heaven they lost their heavenly disposition, which delighted once in doing good, and praising God; and fell into a settled rancour against him, and malice against men: their inward peace was gone; all desire of doing good departed from them; and instead thereof, revengeful thoughts and despair took possession of them, and created an eternal hell within them.

The time of their fall, &c.

WHEN, and for what offence these apostate spirits fell from heaven, and plunged themselves into such an abyss of wickedness and woe, are questions very hard, if not impossible, to be determined by any clear evidence of scripture. As to the time, it is most reasonable to believe that their fall preceded the creation of the world; though some have imagined it to have been after, and that carnality, or lusting to converse

<sup>a</sup> Particularly PLOTINUS, whose daemon is said to have appeared at the evocation of an Egyptian priest in the temple of Isis at Rome, in the presence of Plotinus himself, and proved to be a god, and not a simple daemon; whereupon Plotinus was immediately congratulated by the priest on so extraordinary a prerogative. PORPHYR. in vita Plotini.

<sup>i</sup> PLUTARCH. in Antonio, p. 930.

<sup>k</sup> Vid. DODWEL.

<sup>l</sup> præl. II. ad Spart. Hadrian. p. 176. &c.

<sup>m</sup> Vid. HYDE, Rel. vet. Pers. cap. 19. & 20.

<sup>n</sup> TAL-

<sup>o</sup> vid. Hierosol. in Roth ha shana.

<sup>p</sup> Dan. xii. 1.

<sup>q</sup> HYDE, ubi sup. p. 270, 273.

<sup>r</sup> Com-

<sup>s</sup> pendium Theolog. Moham. c. 3. apud Reland. de Rel. Mohammed.

<sup>t</sup> Revel. v. 18.

<sup>u</sup> MAIMONID.

<sup>v</sup> More Nevoch. part 2. c. 10.

<sup>w</sup> Revel. iv. 5. viii. 2. Tobit xii. 15.

<sup>x</sup> Vid. HYDE, de Rel. vet. Pers. c. 12. & 20.

<sup>y</sup> 2 Pet. ii. 4.

<sup>z</sup> Jude, ver. 6.

with women upon earth<sup>1</sup>, was the sin which ruined them<sup>2</sup>: an opinion built on a mistaken interpretation of scripture, as if angels were meant by the sons of God, who are said to have begotten the mighty men of old on the daughters of men<sup>3</sup>. Others have supposed, that the angels being informed of God's intention to create man after his own image, and to dignify his nature by CHRIST's assuming it, and thinking their glory to be eclipsed thereby, envied man's happiness, and so revolted<sup>4</sup>: and with this opinion that of the Mohammedans has some affinity, who are taught, that the devil, who was once one of those angels who are nearest to God's presence, and named Azazil<sup>5</sup>, forfeited paradise for refusing to worship, or pay homage to Adam; at the command of God<sup>6</sup>. But on what occasion soever it first shewed itself, pride seems to have been the leading sin of the angels<sup>7</sup>: who admiring, and valuing themselves too much on the excellence of their nature, and the height of their station, came at length to entertain so little respect for their creator, as to be guilty of downright rebellion and apostasy<sup>8</sup>.

It is certain from scripture, that these fallen angels were in great numbers<sup>9</sup>, and that there was also some order and subordination preserved among them; one especially being considered as their prince, and called by several names, Belzebub, Satan, or Sammaël, by the Jews; Abârîman by the Persians; and Eblis by the Mohammedans. Their constant employment is not only doing evil themselves, but endeavouring by all arts and means to seduce and pervert mankind, by tempting them to all kind of sin, and thereby bringing them into the same desperate state with themselves.

BESIDES the angels and devils, the Mohammedans believe there are a sort of intermediate creatures, which they call Jin, or Genii, of a grosser fabric than angels; some of whom are good, and others bad, and capable of future salvation, or damnation, as men are. The *Oriental*s pretend that these Genii inhabited the world for many thousand years before the creation of Adam, under the reigns of several princes, who all bore the common name of Solomon: but falling at length into an almost general corruption, Eblis was sent to drive them into a remote part of the earth, there to be confined: that some of that generation still remaining, were by Tahmûrath, one of the ancient kings of Persia, who waged war against them, forced to retreat into the famous mountains of Kâf. Of which successions, and wars, they have many fabulous and romantic stories. They also make different ranks and degrees among this kind of beings (if they are not rather of different species) some being called absolutely Jin, some Peri, or fairies; some Div, or giants; others Tacwins, or fates<sup>10</sup>.

As to the ancient Greeks and Romans, we do not find they had any notion of evil spirits, or devils, in the usual sense of the word, if we except only Plutarch's evil principle before mentioned. Their infernal gods were not conceived to be of an evil nature; and though they believed the furies were the tormentors of wicked men in another life, yet they looked on them as goddesses, and the avengers only of evil actions.

MUCH more might be added to what we have already said on these subjects; but as we may be thought already to have exceeded the bounds of an introduction, we shall here conclude it, and hasten to the history itself.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 54. 2. <sup>2</sup> JOSEPHUS, PHILO JUD. ORIGEN, TERTULLIAN, &c. <sup>3</sup> Genes. vi. 2, 4. <sup>4</sup> IRENAEUS, LACTANTIUS, GREGORY NYSSEN, &c. <sup>5</sup> Vid. RELAND. de Rel. Mohammed. p. 189, &c. <sup>6</sup> Al Korân, cap. 2. ver. 34. <sup>7</sup> Vid. i. Tim. iii. 6. and the magnificent comparison of the fall of proud Sennacherib to that of Lucifer; Isaiah xiv. 12, &c. <sup>8</sup> The opinion of St. CHRYSOSTOME, THEODORET, ATHANASIUS, &c. <sup>9</sup> Yet some have endeavoured to prove there is no more than one devil. Vid. Lettres de BAYLE, Tom. I. p. 360. <sup>10</sup> Vid. d'HERSELOW, Bibl. Orient. p. 369, 370, &c.

AN UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

BOOK I.

The ASIATIC History to the Time of ALEXANDER the Great.

CHAP. I.

The General History of the WORLD till the FLOOD.

SECT. I.

The Creation of Man, and the Situation of the Garden of Eden.

IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. The earth was once in a confused and desolate state, but by divine providence, and second causes subservient to that purpose, gradually, in the space of six days, reduced into a habitable world; clothed with trees, shrubs, plants, and flowers, and stocked with various kinds of animals. And when all these things were, by the care and beneficence of God, prepared for the reception of his principal guest, then, and not till then, was Man created and introduced into the world <sup>a</sup>.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4205.

The creation of the world, and
of man.

WHATEVER opinions the ancient heathens might have of the origin of mankind, we are assured, by the most authentic records, that we are descended from two persons, <sup>a</sup> Adam and Eve <sup>b</sup>, who were formed by God in the most absolute perfection both of body and mind, and subject to none of those irregular appetites, diseases, wants, and sorrows, which they afterwards, by their rebellion, brought on themselves and their unhappy posterity. And lest any thing should be wanting to compleat their happiness, a most delightful habitation was prepared for them in Eden, by their gracious creator; a garden, or paradise <sup>c</sup>, whereon all the beauties of nature were profusely bestowed, well watered, and planted with all sorts of trees, that were either pleasant to the sight, or good for food. In the midst of which garden were two trees of a very peculiar, and it seems contrary nature; one called the tree of life, the fruit of which had the virtue of rendring those who eat it, in some degree at least, immortal; and the other the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the consequence of the tasting which was so pernicious to them and their off-spring.

The happy
state of the first pair.

BUT before we proceed, it may be expected we should say something with reference to the situation of this garden, concerning which there has been so great a variety of opinions among learned men.

Situation of the garden of Eden.

SEVERAL of the primitive fathers believed that there never was a local paradise, and that all which is spoken of it in scripture is to be understood in an allegorical sense: others, who allowed the reality of paradise, have swerved so far from the letter, as to suppose it not to be situated on any part of this terrestrial globe. They have placed it in the third heaven, within the orb of the moon, in the moon itself, in the middle region of the air, above the earth, under the earth, in a recess hidden and removed from the knowledge of men, in the place possessed at present by the Caspian

Extraneous opinions concerning it.

<sup>a</sup> Genes. i.

<sup>b</sup> Genes. iii. 20.

<sup>c</sup> Genes. ii. 8, &c.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

sea, under the Arctic pole, and under the equator, with many more such extravagancies, which have been collected by several authors<sup>c</sup>, some of whom have thought it worth while to give such whimsies a serious answer.

ON the other hand, many of those who have allowed a terrestrial paradise, have fallen into no less extravagancies. There is scarce a corner of the earth which has not been ransacked in search of it. They have looked for it in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, in America, in Tartary; upon the banks of the Danube, and the Ganges; in the isle of Ceylon, in Persia, in Armenia, in Mesopotamia, in Chaldea, in Arabia, in Palestine, in Syria; about the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus; near the cities of Damascus and Tripoly; in Ethiopia, towards the mountains of the moon; and which will doubtless be thought as much out of the way, in Sweden.

What owing to.

THIS diversity of opinions proceeds partly from that humour which prevailed in the early ages of christianity, of allegorizing all passages of scripture which had the least appearance of difficulty in them, and partly from the little agreement to be found betwixt the geography of Moses, and that of the heathen authors, whose imperfections are not yet perhaps sufficiently supplied to resolve this difficult problem. As for the Jews, from whom we might have expected some light into matters which concern their own antiquities, they are perfectly ignorant of the geography of their bible, and have run as much astray as other nations in their descriptions of paradise; supposing, as Josephus<sup>f</sup> and all the rest of their authors have done, the Ganges and the Nile to be two of the four rivers, in which the christian fathers have almost unanimously followed them.

Several Edens.

THERE are several places which bear the name of Eden; we find two mentioned in scripture, besides that in the Mosaical description, if it be not one of them; viz. one near Damascus in Syria<sup>g</sup>, the other in or about Thelassar in Chaldea<sup>h</sup>. Ptolemy places an Audan in this last country, and another on the Euphrates. There is also another Eden in Syria near Tripoly<sup>i</sup>, in the road to Damascus, as the former seems likewise to be. Cartwright, in his travels<sup>k</sup>, gives an account of an island in the Tigris<sup>l</sup>, called Eden, as he informs us, by the people of the country, and about twelve miles above Mausel (A). There is a city near Tarsus in Cilicia, still called Aldena, and Aden is a very noted one on the coast of Yaman, or Arabia Felix, a little without the straits of Bab al Mondab; for Eden or Aden signifying pleasure, that name was given to places remarkable for the delightfulness of their situation, considered either in themselves, or comparatively with the adjacent country; and the last seems to be the case of Aden in Arabia, which has nothing more than ordinary to deserve that name, but the barrenness of the neighbouring soil.

The Mosaical paradise local,
not imaginary.

IT appears plainly from the Mosaical description (B), however preposterous a learned author<sup>m</sup> thinks it, that Moses had no imaginary paradise in view, but a portion of this habitable earth, bounded with countries and rivers, very well known by the names he gives them, in his time; and (as appears from scripture) for many ages after. Eden is as evidently a real country as Ararat, where the ark rested, and Shinaar, where the sons of Noah removed after the flood. We find it mentioned as such in scripture, as often as the other two; and there is the more reason to believe it, because the scenes of these three remarkable events are laid in the neighbourhood of one another, in the Mosaical history: but the Jews having, probably,

<sup>c</sup> STEPH. MORINUS, dissert. de parad. terrest. præfix. oper. Bocharti, Edit. 1722. MOSES BAR CEPHA, de parad. comment. P. DAN. HUET. de situ paradisi. BURNET'S Theory of the Earth. RALEIGH'S hist. of the World, &c.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Kings xix. 12. Isaiah xxxvii. 12. <sup>e</sup> Antiq. Jud. lib. I. cap. i. <sup>f</sup> Amos i. 5.

<sup>g</sup> 2 Kings xix. 12. Isaiah xxxvii. 12. <sup>h</sup> MAUNDREL'S travels, p. 135. <sup>i</sup> Vid. The preacher's travels, p. 91, 95. <sup>j</sup> Vid. ASSEMANI Bibl. orient. tom. I. p. 516. <sup>k</sup> Dr. BURNET'S Theory of the Earth, book II. chap. i. at the end.

(A) This remark, whether true or false, seems to have occasioned Raleigh's straining the expression in the Nestorian epistles, (1) translated into Latin by Masius, where that isle is not called Eden, but is said to be in the Tigris, a river of Eden.

(B) And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden (2). — And a river went out of Eden to water the Garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads (3). The name of the first is Pison [Fisbon]: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold (4). And the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium [Bdolah] and the onyx-stone [Shoham] (5). And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia [Cush] (6). And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of [or eastward to] Assyria [Alshur]. And the fourth river is Euphrates [Perath or Frath] (7).

(1) Ad calcem Bar Cephæ, comment. de situ paradisi, p. 264. ver. 10. (4) Ver. 11. (5) Ver. 12. (6) Ver. 13.

(1) Gen. ii. 8. (7) Ver. 14.

(3) Ibid.

during

during the distraction of their affairs about the time of the captivity, lost the remembrance of all the particulars relating to this account of Eden (as indeed they have of most things relating to their antiquities) except that of the rivers Hiddekel and Frat; the christians, who have busied themselves much in search after it, have lost their way for want of guides, which has been the occasion of so many strange notions about it, as we have already mentioned; and there must always be a difference among men in opinions, where the uncertainty and defectiveness of the proofs leave room for controversy.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

SOME of the latest moderns <sup>a</sup>, misled by the affinity of names, have supposed they found the name of the Pison preserved in the Pasi-tigris, or rather (as they would have it, to favour their hypothesis) the Piso-tigris, whilst others <sup>c</sup> take it for granted, that it is the Phasis, as they conclude the Aras to be the Gibon, from the conformity of the signification; both those terms being used by the Persians to signify any great river in general. But at that rate, Eden may be any where, and every where, since a conformity of names, either in sound or signification, may be found in all countries; and if that sort of proof be admitted; unless under proper restrictions, it will be no hard matter to prove, that America was peopled immediately by the posterity of Noah, as some have alledged.

This enquiry uncertain and conjectural.

THE Bdolab and Sbobam, which were the produce of Havilah, being unknown names, as well as that of their native country, they are interpreted by every one so as to favour the scheme he espouses. Thus the Bdolab is rendered bdellium, the carbuncle, the loadstone, the oleaster. Those who place paradise in Armenia, will have it to be crystal <sup>v</sup>, because they find that stone thereabouts; and those who situate it in Chaldea, towards the Persian gulph, insist that it signifies pearl, which is fished in great quantity in Babrein, near al Katif, on the Arabian coast, where the country of Havilah is to be found, according to this hypothesis; and it must be owned, this conjecture seems to come nearest the truth, considering manna is compared <sup>u</sup> to the Bdolab for colour; and so the Talmudists describe manna to be round as coriander-seed, and white as pearls. In like manner the Sbobam is made by different authors to signify the beryl, and the emerald <sup>x</sup>; perhaps with as little propriety as it is rendered in our bibles the onyx-stone, which translation is condemned by Bochart <sup>y</sup> and others (C).

OF the three schemes which at present obtain amongst the learned, the first, which places paradise near Damascus in Syria, about the springs of Jordan, and has for its patrons Heidegger <sup>z</sup>, Mr. le Clerc <sup>aa</sup>, Pere Abram <sup>ab</sup>, and Pere Hardouin <sup>ac</sup>, seems the worst grounded, being destitute of all the marks specified in the Mosaical description, which ought always to be the principal test in this enquiry. The second hypothesis places Eden in Armenia, between the springs or heads of the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Phasis, and is espoused by two great men, eminent for their skill in geography, namely, Sanfon, and the late Mr. Hadrian Reland <sup>ad</sup>, besides Calmet <sup>ae</sup>. But this scheme is not much better supported than the first; for according to the modern discoveries, the Phasis does not rise in the mountains of Armenia, near the springs of the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Tigris, as Strabo <sup>b</sup>, Ptolemy <sup>c</sup>, Dionysius <sup>d</sup>, and the rest of the ancients have wrongly informed us, which led them, without doubt, into this error; but by the map of Colchis or Mingrelia, in Thevenot's collection, and the account of Sir John Chardin, in his travels, that river has its source far away in mount Caucasus, and does not flow from south to north, but on the contrary from north to south; a great extent of country, and the river Kor (which by which place Eden in Syria and Armenia ill-grounded.

The schemes

<sup>a</sup> FRANCIS JUNIUS, HUGO GROTIUS.

differt. de situ paradisi, p. 7. CALMET, comment. sur la Gen. ii. 8.

<sup>b</sup> Numb. xi. 7.

<sup>c</sup> RELAND, ibid. p. 31.

<sup>d</sup> Vol. I. p. 30.

<sup>e</sup> RELAND, ibid. p. 27.

p. 94.

<sup>f</sup> In Gen. cap. ii. 8.

<sup>g</sup> PHARUS vet. test. l. 2. n. 16. p. 6.

<sup>h</sup> Histor. patriarch.

or Piny.

<sup>i</sup> Dissertat. de situ paradisi.

<sup>j</sup> Dict. de la Bible, p. 150, & Commentaire sur la

Genese, chap. ii. 8.

<sup>k</sup> Lib. X. & XI.

<sup>l</sup> Tab. III. Asia.

<sup>m</sup> Periegesis.

(C) On this occasion we cannot help observing, that our translators have often swerved from the original Hebrew, to follow the Septuagint, if not the German version, especially in names and terms. Thus Aram is generally rendered Syria; Khashtim, Chaldea; Mizraim, Egypt; Cush, Ethiopia; and the like: but we need not send the reader further than the Mosaical description of Eden above-cited, in which it appears, there are no less than six variations. They have moreover introduced a corrupt pronunciation, either by following the German orthography instead of the English, or continuing the orthography of the vulgate, which prevailed before the reformation. Thus they have constantly made use of the J consonant instead of the Y: Jacob and Joseph should be written Yacob and Yoseph, or rather Yosif; Benjamin, Benyamin, or rather Benyamim.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

its situation would much better supply the place of the Pifon than the Pbasis) interposing; as may be seen by the map. As one mistake generally draws on another, Reland, led again by that deceitful guide the similitude of names, supposes Cush to be the country of the Cossæans or Cussæans; but if the Cossæans were the inhabitants of the mountains <sup>c</sup>, which, with Partbia, bounded Media on the east; and which, in all likelihood, as he conjectures, was Kubestân, or the mountain country, as that name signifies; how could they be settled along the Araxes, which yet it was necessary they should be, to favour his opinion? for Kubestân is the most eastern or north-eastern part of Irâk Ajami, a well known province of Irân or Persia at large, agreeable to Diodorus Siculus <sup>f</sup> and Arrian <sup>g</sup>, who makes the country of the Cossæans <sup>a</sup> a part of Media; though some place them in Persia, and Ptolemy in Susiana: besides, the Pbasis and Scythia (which Sanfon understands by Cush or the Cossæans) seem to have been too remote to be known to Moses. Neither does this hypothesis account for that river which watered paradise, and from whence the other four had their rise; and Reland will not allow it can be done, but by supposing a subterranean river, which may as well serve for the scheme of the Jews, followed by the Fathers, which makes the Pifon and Gibon, the Nile and the Ganges.

The third scheme most probable.

ACCORDING to the third opinion, Eden is placed upon the united stream of the Dijlat or Hiddekel and Frat, called by the Arabs, Sbat al Arab, that is, the river of the Arabs; which <sup>b</sup> begins two days journey above Basrab, and about five leagues <sup>b</sup> below divides again into two or three channels, which empty themselves into the Persian gulph. By this hypothesis the Sbat al Arab is the river passing out of Eden, which river, considered according to the disposition of its channel, and not according to the course of its stream, divides into four heads or different branches, which make the four rivers; two below, viz. the two branches of the Sbat, which serve for the Pifon and Gibon; and two above, viz. the Frat and Dijlat, or the Euphrates and Hiddekel. According to this disposition, the western branch of the Sbat will be Pifon, and the adjoining part of Arabia, bordering on the Persian gulph, will be Havilah; and the eastern branch will be the Gibon, encompassing the country of Cush or Kbuzestân, a province of Irân, as it is still named by the <sup>c</sup> Persians.

Eden to be looked for in Chaldea.

THIS opinion was first started by Calvin, and is with some little variation followed by Stephanus Morinus, Bochart, and Huet bishop of Avanches; and, indeed, all the passages of scripture where Eden is mentioned, concur to establish it somewhere hereabouts. The prophet speaking of Tyre, says, Haran, and Canneb, and Eden, were thy merchants <sup>1</sup>. Now if Cannab be Calne or Calyo, which is taken to be Ctesiphon or Medain, the seat of the Partbian race of Persian kings, then Eden must have been to the south of that city, according to the order of mentioning the places, which seems to be from north to south. The same order is observed in two other places of the old testament, where mention is made of Gozan, Haran, Rezesb, and <sup>d</sup> the children of Eden which were in Telassar <sup>2</sup>. To this we may add an argument of some, that the city of Enoch, or rather Hanukb, built by Cain, and called after the name of his son, is placed to the east of Eden <sup>3</sup>; and Ptolemy places a city, called Anuchta, in Susiana or the country of Cush.

WITH regard to the natural marks ascribed to Havilah, authors mention that part of Arabia as productive of gold; and as for the Bdolab and Sbobam, they may be made the produce of any country, as we have before observed. However, the Bdolab being considered either as pearls, or bdellium (supposed to be a transparent, odoriferous, but bitter gum) is allowed to be a native of Arabia.

Objections to the third
scheme.

BUT though this hypothesis seems the best of any that hath been yet advanced, <sup>e</sup> and to account tolerably well for the Mosaical description, yet is it liable to exception: for the two branches of the Sbat al Arab, which by this scheme represent the Pifon and the Gibon, seem not considerable enough to deserve the name of rivers, nor are of sufficient length to encompass countries of any extent; the place where the Sbat al Arab divides below Basrab, being not above eighteen leagues <sup>m</sup> distant from the places where those two branches fall into the sea. Indeed, if we could be sure there was a third branch, which, according to some accounts and maps, parting from the Sbat about Basrab, falls into the sea at al Katif, it might serve tolerably well for the Pifon; and for the Gibon, we should chuse to substitute either the river Karon, or the river Karba; the first of which falls into the Sbat al <sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> STRABO, Lib. XIV. <sup>f</sup> Lib. XVII. cap. iii. <sup>g</sup> In histor. Ind. <sup>h</sup> THEV. TRIV. PART. II. chap. ix. <sup>1</sup> Ezek. xxvii. 23. <sup>2</sup> Isaiah xxxvii. 12. 2 Kings xix. 12. <sup>3</sup> Gen. iv. 17. <sup>m</sup> THEVENOT'S travels, Part II. chap. x. Teixeira, in his journey from Basrah to Aleppo.

Arab, the other into the Tigris, and may much more properly be said to encompass the whole land of Cush, as running through Kbuzestan; whereas the eastern branch of the Sbat washes only a corner of that country, or rather one side of an island made by it and the Caron.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

New schemes proposed.

Or suppose we should alter this scheme a little, and situate Eden above the confluence of Euphrates and Tigris, we shall find one or two large arms crossing the intermediate country from one river to the other, which would much better supply the place of the Pison and Gibon, than the branches of the Sbat al Arab, provided other circumstances agreed with this alteration. If these branches of the Tigris had been known to Grotius and others, they would not perhaps have fallen into so gross a mistake, as to make the Nabar Malca, or Royal River, which passes from Euphrates to Tigris, the Gibon: it would better have suited with the Mosaic description to have supposed it to be the river of Eden, which was divided into four heads, in which case the parts of those rivers to the south of the Nabar Malca, would serve for the Pison and Gibon; and indeed that would answer the Mosaic description, as to the rivers, almost without exception. But the truth is, such an hypothesis cannot be admitted without overthrowing the credibility of the scripture, and allowing the most ancient books in it were written after, or in the times of the Babylonish captivity; for the Nabar Malca, or Basilicos Potamos, as the Greeks called it, is an artificial canal still in being, cut from Euphrates to Tigris, a little above Babylon, in the latter times of the Babylonian empire. The oriental authors attribute this work to Nimrod<sup>a</sup>; perhaps it may be the same with the river Cutha, which a Persian author<sup>c</sup> says was dug by a king of Babel of the same name, and supposed to be Cush the father of Nimrod.

Those who patronize the Armenian paradise, may likewise improve or amend their scheme out of the modern travellers and maps<sup>d</sup>, where they will find the Morad Sbaï, which falls into Euphrates, and the Kor, which joins the Araxes or Aras; either of them better fitted to supply the place of the Pison than the Phasis; or if they chuse to have the Euphrates and Tigris united with the other two Mosaic rivers, they may adopt the Sert, which falls into the Tigris at Hesn Keisa, and throw out the Aras and Kor; the head of which last Ptolemy has made to change place with that of the Phasis. As a wrong or confused account of the rise and course of rivers, delivered by the ancients, has been the occasion of many of the mistakes into which authors have fallen in treating of this subject, the inquirer ought to have recourse to the modern observations of geographers and travellers, which often help where the others fail, but have been too much neglected by the learned.

AFTER all, we ought not to be so earnest about this matter; for, strictly speaking, the Mosaic description does not agree with the state of things, either as they now are, or ever were in all probability: for there is no common stream, of which the four rivers are properly branches, nor can one conceive how a whole land can be encompassed by a river, as Havilah is said to be by the Pison, and Cush by the Gibon, without being an island. But we are to consider paradise described according to Moses's notion of things, and that imperfect knowledge of the world which they had in those early times. It is absurd in this case to alledge an alteration made by the deluge in the bounds of countries, or the course of rivers; for Moses describes things as they were supposed to be at the time he wrote; nor is it credible that the Hiddekel and Frat were branches of a river before, and had springs of their own afterwards.

The Mosaic
description of Eden imperfect.

IT is observable, that there is no manner of doubt in authors, with relation to these two rivers; nor indeed is there the least room for it, they having retained their names nearly, if not exactly the same, to this day; for what the Hebrews called Hiddekel, the Arabs, and perhaps the Affyrians and Chaldeans, called Dijlat then, as they do at present; and the Pherath, Forat, or Frat, is still called Frat by the neighbouring people; for Euphrates is one of those corrupt names which our translations have borrowed from the Septuagint version, and which probably the Greeks, as Reland<sup>e</sup> judiciously observed, took from the Persians, who often set the word Ab or Au, which signifies water, before the names of rivers; of which word, and Frat, the name Euphrates is compounded. The other opinion which forms that name from a conjunction of Frat with the preceding particle bua, in the Hebrew text, is absurd; as supposing the Greeks first came acquainted with that river, by reading this passage of Moses relating to the situation of Eden.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. HYDE, de Reliq. vet. Persar. p. 40.
<sup>b</sup> Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> TABARI, in cap. de morte Sarz apud HYDE.

<sup>d</sup> De situ paradisi.

* Particularly those of DE LISLE, which are far the best.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4105.
Several para-dises.

THE oriental nations give the name of paradise to several places, rather for the deliciousness of their situation, than a real persuasion that any of them was the paradise of Adam, which the Mohammedans in particular do believe not to be on earth, but in the seventh heaven. And of the ancient Persians, some thought it to be in the sun, as the Manichæans, and other hereticks did; and others, that there is no paradise now in being, but after the resurrection the earth will be renewed, by being melted and changed into another form, and a paradisiacal state; so that they seem to have believed the whole earth to have been paradise, before the curse given it at the fall. However, the terrestrial paradises mentioned by the Arabs and Persians, are, 1. The plain of Damascus, which they call al Gaulta. 2. Obolla, a village in Irak, on the western branch of the Sbat al Arab, where there are most pleasant gardens. 3. Sheb Bawân, a place in Fars, or proper Persia, situate on the river Nilûb, near Nubendiyân. 4. Sogd Samarkand, or the valley of Samarkand. 5. Gangdiz, or the castle of the Ganges, called also Bebishti Gang, or the paradise of Ganges, Arim or Arin, and Kubbat al ard, or the vertex of the earth. 6. Jam gherd. But these two last places are imaginary, and supposed to be situate eastward of China, in the middle of the sea, where the zodiac and equator intersect each other, exactly at one hundred and eighty degrees of longitude from the fortunate islands (or Canaries), where they place the other intersection. So that these two places are supposed to be paradisiacal, as considered mathematically, and situate exactly under the intersection of the equator, where they think the temperance and clemency of the air must needs render such a situation extremely delightful. The Indians place their earthly paradise in Cashmîr, near the head of the Ganges (whence that above-mentioned seems to have taken its name, though in another part of the world) and this not only on account of the amenity of that small kingdom, especially in respect of the more southern parts of India; but because the river Ganges, which that nation esteems so sacred, is supposed to take its rise from thence. But the more general tradition of the east is, that paradise was in Serendib, or rather Selandro (D), that is the island of Selan, or, as we corruptly call it, Ceylon, or Zeilan (E). The Arab writers also take notice of several paradises, as that of Iram or Aram, in Yaman or Arabia Felix, built by Shaddâd, the son of Ad, who being destroyed, together with his people, by a divine judgment, his palace and gardens, wherein he exceedingly prided himself, were rendered invisible (though preserved to this day), and never seen but by Gôp's particular permission; which favour one Colabab pretended to have received, in the reign of the Khalif Mouwiyah: and another planted by the Molâhidab, or Ismaeliens, a race of princes called by the Europeans Assassins, in a valley in Curdistan; which was designed, by its delightfulness, to ravish the persons to whom it was shewn, and make them believe it was in the prince's power to place them in paradise; and in hopes of that felicity, to engage them in an implicit obedience to all his commands, and to commit any villany which he should judge conducing to his designs.

NOR were the ancient heathens themselves without some obscure tradition concerning a paradise, or rather several paradises, in the earth; but they generally placed them out of our continent; in the ocean, or beyond it, or in another hemisphere; as the garden of the Hesperides, the Fortunate islands, Ogygia, and Taprobane, and the like; which as they were all characterized like so many paradises, so they were all seated out of this continent by their geography and descriptions of them. From which tradition, and the general inclination of the christian fathers, as well as profane authors, to place paradise in the southern hemisphere, or beyond the equinoctial, a late learned man was induced to believe the same thing; though he supposed the whole earth, before the fall, to be in an eminent degree paradisiacal.

* Vid. MARRACC. in Alc. p. 24.    * See before, p. 32.    * HYDE de Rel. vet. Pers. c. xxxiii. p. 400.    w Vid. D' HERBELOT, p. 378, & 361.    * Vid. BERNIER.    † Vid. HYDE, ubi supra, c. x. p. 172, &c.    * Vid. D' HERBELOT, ubi sup. p. 378.    * Vid. eund. p. 51, &c.    b Vid. DIODOR. Sic. l. ii. p. 173.    * Dr. BURNET in his Theory, l. ii. c. 7.

(D) Div, in the Malabaric tongue, signifies an island.

(E) It is surprizing that Mr. LE CLERC should take Serendib for Madagascar (1).

(1) Comment. in Gen. c. viii. p. 72.

S E C T. II.

Of the fall of man.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

GOD having placed Adam, immediately after his formation, in the garden of Eden, Adam placed whose situation we have been endeavouring to discover, to dress and to keep in paradise it, gave him leave to eat freely of the fruit of every tree in the garden, except only that of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, which he strictly commanded him not to taste, under pain of death, the certain consequence of his disobedience <sup>1</sup>.

THE first thing which Adam did, after his introduction into paradise, and the very day of his creation, was to give names to all the beasts and birds which presented themselves before him, not only for that purpose, but to perform their homage, as it were, and make Adam sensible that there was none among them fit to be a companion for him <sup>2</sup>. We might on this occasion say something of the original of speech, did we not reserve that enquiry for a more proper place. He names the beasts and birds.

AFTER this, GOD having formed Eve out of the side of Adam, as he slept, brought her to him, who knowing her to be bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, took her for his wife, and lived with her, free from any sense of shame, though they were both naked <sup>3</sup>. Takes Eve to wife.

How long they continued in this happy condition, is very uncertain; it is probable they did not immediately transgress the divine command, but it should seem, by the narration of Moses, that their fall was not long after their creation. The Jews in general, and most of the christian fathers, believe it to have been on the very day they were created <sup>4</sup>; but this is next to impossible; for a day would be a great deal too short for the several actions, that must on that supposition have been comprized in it. Besides, GOD himself, after the sixth day was past, declared (as at the end of the preceding days) every thing to be very good <sup>5</sup>; which is not reconcilable with truth, if sin, the greatest evil, had then entered into the world. Some therefore conjectured, that this calamity happened the eighth day <sup>6</sup>, and others the tenth of the world's age; supposing that in commemoration thereof the great day of expiation, being the tenth day of the year, was instituted in after-times <sup>7</sup>. If we can subscribe to the opinion of those who make a day and a year to have been the same before the fall <sup>8</sup>, there is indeed no difficulty in supposing it even on the sixth day. The continuance of the state of innocence.

THE fall of man is succinctly related by Moses, in the following manner <sup>9</sup>; that the serpent being more subtle than any beast of the field, asked the woman, whether it was true, that GOD had not granted her and her husband leave to eat of every tree in the garden? to which she answered, that GOD had allowed them to eat of all, except only the fruit of the tree in the midst of the garden; which he commanded they should not taste, nor so much as touch, lest they should die. The serpent replied, that they should not die; for GOD knew the virtue of the tree, and that so soon as they eat of it their eyes would be opened, and they become like gods, knowing good and evil. Whereupon Eve, seeing the fruit tempting to the view, and desirable to make one wise, took of the fruit of it, and eat; and gave also to her husband of it, and he did eat. Immediately the eyes of both were opened, and they knowing they were naked, sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves aprons. After this, Adam and Eve hearing the voice of GOD walking in the garden in the cool of the day, hid themselves among the trees; but on GOD's calling for Adam, he excused himself for not appearing, because he was naked. Upon this, GOD demanded of him, who it was that told him he was naked, and whether he had disobeyed his command, in eating the forbidden fruit? Adam did not encrease his guilt by denying it, but confessed, that the woman had offered him the fruit, and he had tasted it. She being examined likewise, acknowledged what she had done, but said the serpent had seduced and deceived her. GOD then proceeded to judgment: he first cursed the serpent above all beasts, and condemned him to go on his belly, and eat the dust; adding, that he would put enmity between him and the woman, and their several off-spring; and that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, who should bruise the other's heel. The woman was punished with the pain of childbirth, and put in subjection to her husband; and as to the man, GOD cursed the

<sup>1</sup> Genes. ii. 17. &c.

<sup>2</sup> Genes. ii. 19.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. ver. 20.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. ver. 21. &c.

<sup>5</sup> Vid.

EDWARDS'S survey, Vol. I.

<sup>6</sup> Genes. i. 31.

<sup>7</sup> EDWARDS, ubi supr.

<sup>8</sup> Vid. USHER

ad ann. mundi, 1. & BAYLE, Dict. hist. Art. Abel, Rem. A.

<sup>9</sup> Vid. WHISTON'S Theory, l. 2.

p. 96. &c.

<sup>10</sup> Genes. iii. 1. &c.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

ground for his sake, declaring that it should bring forth thorns and thistles, and that he should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; till he returned to the dust from whence he was taken. And at last, God having clothed them both with skins, turned them out of the garden, lest they should take of the tree of life, and eat and live for ever: and to prevent any attempt to return to their former habitation, he placed cherubims at the east of the garden, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to guard the passage to the tree of life.

Some objections to the letter of that relation.

THIS concise account being, at first view, 'incumbred with some improbabilities, several learned and pious men have been inclined to believe, the whole ought to be taken in an allegorical sense, and not according to the strictness of the letter; alleging for their excuse, that the ancients, and particularly the eastern nations, had two different ways of delivering their divinity and philosophy, a popular, and a mysterious or hidden one: of which dubious sort of stile the scripture often makes use in explaining natural things; sometimes in accommodating itself to the capacities of the people, and at other times to the real, but more veiled truth; and that to obviate the many difficulties which occur in the literal history of this sad catastrophe, the safest way is to understand it as a parabolical story, under which the real circumstances are disguised and concealed, as a mystery not fit to be more explicitly declared.

THE first objection made to the letter of this history is in relation to the serpent, and particularly the improbability of his having the use of speech, and rational discourse; for to suppose an evil spirit, or the devil, made use of the organs of this animal, has no foundation in the text of Moses, who attributes the seduction of Eve to the natural craftiness of the serpent only. Besides, the very speech of such an animal, if Eve had taken it to be dumb, must have so frightened her, that she would scarce have staid and entered into a conference with it. And if the serpent had originally the gift of speech, but lost it, as a punishment of his crime in seducing the woman, Moses would surely not have passed it over in silence, and mentioned so small a penalty as going on his belly, and licking the dust; the meaning of which words it is not easy to explain, unless we say, that the serpent did before walk upright, or on four feet; for if he crept from the beginning, it seems ridiculous to impute, as a punishment for a crime, what he was by nature subject to.

As to the trees, the nature of them both seem to have been very extraordinary: the tree of life, it is said, had the virtue to prolong life considerably, if not for ever. But if the longevity or immortality of men had depended only on one tree, what if Adam had not sinned? how could his posterity, when they were dispersed over the face of the whole earth, have been able to come and gather fruit from this tree? or how could one tree have sufficed all mankind? The nature of the tree of knowledge is still more difficult to conceive; it seems to have instilled into our first parents a new sense of shame and modesty, to which, before the fall, they were utter strangers. But a very different virtue is intimated to have been in the tree, that on eating of it a man became as a God, knowing good and evil.

SOME further objections have been also made to this history; as the slightness of the crime for which so terrible a punishment has been laid on mankind (for which reason some have thought Moses's design in this relation was to authorize the rigour of his own laws); the improbability of Adam and Eve's sewing fig-leaves together without thread or needle, and of God's making them coats of skins, and consequently by himself, or (as is more decent to suppose) by an angel, killing and flaying the animals; and the needless precaution of placing cherubims to guard the entrance of the garden, lest the exiles should endeavour to repossess themselves of it by fraud or force.

CONCLUDING therefore that these things will not bear a literal construction, an allegorical or figurative sense has been put on this whole account: and it is pretended that the history of the fall exhibits the defection of the soul; the serpent represents concupiscence; the man, to whom he durst not apply himself, is the picture of reason; and the woman, whom he so easily seduced and overcame, is the emblem of sense; and so on.

The literal sense defended.

BUT though it cannot be denied, that some of the ancient philosophers affected such an allegorical way of writing, to conceal their notions from the vulgar, and keep their learning within the bounds of their own school, yet it is apparent Moses had no such design; and as he pretends only to relate matters of fact, just as they happened, without art or disguise, it cannot be supposed but that this history of the fall is to be taken in a literal sense, as well as the rest of his writings.

<sup>1</sup> Sic vacat exiguis rebus adesse Deo. Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 2. c. 7. See also PHIL. JUD. de mundi opificio, p. 36. MAIMON. More Nevoch. Part. II. c. 30. <sup>2</sup> Vid. SAURIN'S Dissertations.

As to the particular objections which have been mentioned, and first as to the serpent; it is answered, that as Moses contents himself with relating facts as they appeared, without any comment or explication; he makes the serpent, it is true, who was the visible instrument, to have been the seducer of the woman, and says nothing of the latent efficient cause: for which reason some of the ancient Jews were of opinion, that the whole passage is to be understood of a real serpent, which creature they suppose had originally the gift of reason and speech; so that Eve might well have understood him (F). Others, thinking this too difficult of belief, have imagined that it was not a real serpent, but only the devil under that name: but this opinion is no less liable to exception. For though the devil is frequently stiled in scripture the serpent, and the old serpent, yet why he should be called the most subtle beast of the field, we cannot conceive; neither will the punishment inflicted on the serpent suffer us to doubt but that a serpent's body, at least, was employed in the transaction.

Year of the World, 1.
Year before Christ, 4105.
The tempter was the devil, who abused the body of the serpent.

THE most common, therefore, and indeed the only probable opinion is, that it was the devil, some wicked and malicious spirit (probably the chief of those beings) who envied the happiness of mankind, and was thereupon resolved to bring them into the same miserable condition with himself, and his apostate companions; and that to effect his purpose, he made use of a serpent's body (G), as the properest organ by which to carry on his fraud with success. And this seems reasonable, not only from the improbability of a brute beast's over-reaching mankind in their highest pitch of understanding, but from the attestation of other parts of scripture, where the devil is called the old serpent; and is by our Saviour himself said to have been a murderer from the beginning, or the first creation, alluding to his mischievous destruction of mankind at that time: the author of the book of Wisdom, who was well acquainted with the doctrines of the Jewish church, also telling us, that by the envy of the devil death came into the world<sup>a</sup>.

WHY the devil should chuse the body of a serpent rather than that of any other creature, was probably on account of that subtlety attributed to him by Moses; which may not, perhaps, so much denote the craft and insidiousness, as the familiar and insinuating nature of this creature (H). That the serpent before the fall was mild and gentle, and more familiar with man than any other creature; and that he did not then creep on the ground, but went erect (I), and had by his engaging behaviour gained, in some measure, the good will of our first parents, is not only the sentiment of both Jews<sup>b</sup> and Christians<sup>c</sup>, but seems likewise to have some foundation in scripture: for when God says, that he will put enmity between the serpent and the woman, and between his seed and her seed, it must be implied that there was some kind of friendship between them before.

Why he made choice of that creature.

IT is no way unreasonable therefore to suppose, that this creature was beloved both by Adam and Eve: she especially might be delighted with it; she laid it perhaps in her bosom, adorned her neck with its windings, or made it a bracelet for her arms. So that its being so intimate with the woman, made it the properer instrument for the devil's purpose, who sliding into it, might wantonly play before her, until he insensibly brought her to the forbidden tree, and then twisting round its branches, might take of the fruit and eat, to shew her, by experience, that there was nothing of death contained in it, before he began to bespeak her; and his speech might be the less surprising to her, because she might probably think (as he might positively affirm) that this new acquired faculty proceeded from the virtue of the fruit.

BUT this conjecture is still more probable, if we will but allow that the serpent, whose body the devil possessed, was not of a common ordinary species, but

<sup>a</sup> Revel. xii. 9. Ibid. xx. 2. <sup>b</sup> Wisd. ii. 24. <sup>c</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. ubi supra. <sup>d</sup> BASIL. Homil. de Paradiso. DAMASCEN. de Orthodox. Fid. lib. 2. c. 10.

(F) JOSEPHUS supposes that all creatures at that time used the same language, and that the serpent conversing familiarly with Adam and Eve, excited by envy of their happiness, maliciously persuaded the woman to taste of the tree of knowledge; for which, among other punishments, he was deprived of the use of speech, and of his feet, and obliged ever after to crawl upon the ground (1.) Of the same opinion are ASEN EZRA, and others.

(G) The Arabs, before Mohammed, believed that the devils were transformed into serpents (2.)

(H) The Mohammedans have a tradition, that the devil offering to get into paradise to tempt Adam, was not admitted by the guard. Whereupon he begged of the animals, one after another, to carry him in, that he might speak to Adam and his wife; but they all refused him except the serpent, who took him between two of his teeth, and so introduced him (3.)

(I) The Mohammedans also say, that the serpent was then of a beautiful form, and not in the shape he now bears (4.)

(1) Antiq. l. 2. c. 1. §. 4. in Alcoran. p. 22.

(2) Vid. ibid.

(3) RELAND. de Rel. Moham. l. 2. p. 271.

(4) See MARRACC.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

Of what kind the serpent probably was.

something like that flying fiery sort, which, as we are told, are bred in Arabia and Egypt. They are of a shining yellowish colour like brass, and by the motion of their wings, and vibration of their tails, reverberating the sun-beams, make a glorious appearance. Now if the serpent, whose body the devil abused, was of this kind (though perhaps of a species far more glorious) it was a proper creature for his purpose: for these serpents are called in scripture Seraphs or Seraphim<sup>a</sup>, and gave name to those bright angelical beings which we commonly understand by that appellation: it being very probable, from the representations of them tolerated in the Jewish church, that the angels, when they ministered to Adam and Eve, were wont to put on certain splendid forms; some of them the form of Cberubin, or beautiful flying oxen, and others the shape of Seraphim, winged and shining serpents. The devil therefore might usurp the organs of one of these shining serpents, which by his art and skill in natural causes he might improve into such a surpassing brightness, as to represent to Eve the angelical appearance or Shechinah (K) to which she was accustomed; and having done this, it was no wonder that he so easily deceived her.

HOWEVER this be, it is reasonable to suppose that it was some beautiful creature, whom Eve took to be an angel that wished her well, while he discoursed with her. For it is impossible to conceive that she should be so simple and ignorant as to think that beasts could speak, much less that they knew more of God's mind than herself: nor seems it credible that she could be deceived but by a creature which appeared so gloriously as to make her mistake it for an heavenly minister, who might come to explain to her the divine command. And if we observe in what manner the tempter addresses himself to her (L), we shall find this supposition confirmed.

His addressing Eve.

It is not improbable<sup>a</sup> that the seducer, before he spoke to Eve, represented himself as one of the heavenly court, who came to congratulate the happiness that God had bestowed on them in paradise, which was so great, that he could not easily believe he had denied them any of the fruit of the garden: he desired therefore to be satisfied from her own mouth of the truth of what he pretended to have heard; and as the woman acquainted him with the whole prohibition, he first suggests that she mistook the meaning of it, that death could not be the punishment of so small a fault; and to flatter her ambition, deludes her with a false promise, that on eating the fruit, which he pretended had a sovereign quality to illuminate the understanding, and advance the other faculties of the soul, she and her husband should immediately become as angels, nay, as Gods, and their happiness be inconceivably great, and independent on any but themselves.

THIS seems to have been the purport of the serpent's words, by which he gained the ear of Eve; and she, allured by the beauty of the fruit, and pushed on by curiosity and vanity, could not resist the temptation: and when she had eat, was so far from being sensible of her condition, that fancying herself already in possession of the chimerical happiness which had been promised her, she invited her husband to partake with her. And he, it is probable, after some reluctance, was prevailed on, by her charms and endearments, to violate the command, contrary to his sense of duty, and to share the fate which God's indignation for her transgression should bring upon her<sup>b</sup>.

The punishment of the serpent reasonable.

The sentence denounced on the serpent cannot seem strange, if we consider how different his original form was from his present; and that God probably intended the debasement of that once glorious creature, not so much to express his indignation against the beast, as to make it a monument of man's unhappy fall, and a testimony of his displeasure against sin: nor could this be unjust; the meer instrument of an enormous crime being detestable, and often destroyed by human laws; and this great change in the serpent, perhaps, not felt, at least not distinguished or conceived by him as a misfortune<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Numb. xxi. 6.
vinity, p. 284, &c.

<sup>b</sup> See Bishop PATRICK's Commentary.
<sup>c</sup> Vid. NICHOLLS's Conf. Vol. I.

<sup>k</sup> See STACKHOUSE's Body of Di-

(K) This seems to be the opinion of TERTULLIAN, when he tells us, that Eve gave attention to the serpent, as to the Son of God, &c. (1).

(L) The learned ABRAVANEL supposes the whole to be only dumb shew, and that the serpent did not speak at all, neither did Eve say any thing to it; but that being a very nimble and active creature, it got upon the tree of knowledge, took and eat of the fruit; that Eve, having seen it several times do so, and not die, concluded with herself that the said fruit did not occasion death, and that it might not only be grateful to the taste, but procure them that knowledge which God seemed to have grudged them (2).

(1) De Præscript. Hæret. p. 220.

(2) STACKHOUSE's Body of Divinity, p. 287.

In reference to the two trees, which seem to be so very extraordinary, it is but reasonable to imagine there was a wide difference between the state of innocence and our present condition; and consequently, that there were some things consonant to the first state, which are very incongruous to our present. Now of those Moses has mentioned but a few, and among them these trees. As to the tree of life, nothing can be more agreeable to a state of innocence, which seems to imply a state of immortality; and something was requisite to make men immortal when their bodies were not so; and what can be supposed more effectual than the fruit of such a tree? When God had designed that mens bodies should never yield to death, it seems but reasonable he should direct them to the eating of such a fruit whose juice was of that spirituous nature as to impregnate their blood with an indefatigable vigour, and to keep them up in constant youth, without pain, disease, or weakness, till such time as he should translate them to a better world (M). Whether this tree was the only one of the species is uncertain; but if it was, it is probable that, had there been no lapse, many of them would have been transplanted to other parts of the world, as the innocent off-spring had encreased; and when mankind had sinned, it is likely God destroyed this species out of the world, as now grown useless and inconsistent with the curse and punishment of man. And of this tree the heathens seem to have had some traditional notion, when they speak of the Nectar and Ambrosia, which maintained the immortality of their gods, and Moly, which was the great Panacea, or universal medicine celebrated by the poets <sup>d</sup>.

THE tree of the knowledge of good and evil is conceived to have been so called, either because it had really a virtue to open man's understanding, and to make him distinguish between good and evil; or else because the eating of it would eventually teach him the difference between the good of obedience, and the evil of transgression: but others suppose it so called, merely from the devil's pretending it had a virtue to confer knowledge, having received its name from the unfortunate deception; though it be, in a preceding passage, called the tree of knowledge of good and evil, by way of anticipation: and as to God's saying, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil, that is taken to be a bitter irony, to upbraid man with his foolish disobedience and disappointment <sup>e</sup>.

BUT what particular tree this tree of knowledge was, has been a matter of much conjecture; the vine, the apple, the common, and Indian fig-tree (N), and wheat, though no tree, have all put in their claims (O); and though the generality are for the common

<sup>d</sup> Idem, ibid.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. BARCEPHAM de Parad. part 1. c. 19.

EDWARDS'S Survey, Vol. I.

<sup>f</sup> Vid.

NICHOLLS, ubi supra.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. BARCEPHAM, ubi sup. p. 48.

(M) It is the joint opinion of the best ancient writers, both Jewish and Christian, that in case our first parents had continued in their obedience, they would, after such a time of trial as the divine wisdom should think convenient, have been translated or removed from earth to heaven; and that their posterity likewise would have been liable to no sorrow or misery of any kind, but possessed of constant happiness, and in their several courses and successions taken up into a heavenly paradise (1.)

(N) Goropius Becanus is most confident it was the Indian fig-tree; which notion, however, he did not borrow from Moses Barcephas, as Sir Walter Raleigh supposes (1). The chief reasons urged why it should be this tree, are 1. The goodness of the fruit, and fairness of the tree. 2. The breadth of its leaves, very commodious for hiding the nakedness of Adam and Eve, which it is supposed they would cover as soon as ever they perceived it; and therefore from the forbidden tree, that being the next at hand. 3. The largeness and thickness of the tree, very proper to conceal them, as they imagined, from the presence of God. But here Becanus, from the words of the vulgate version, in medio ligni, imagined they hid themselves in the body of the tree itself, though the stem of the Indian fig-tree, notwithstanding the extravagant size given it by some authors, be not very large. As Sir Walter Raleigh, who had himself seen many of these trees in America, has given a description of them, we think it worth while to transcribe it. "They grow, says he, in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soil), they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem; for from the utmost end of the head-branches, there issueth out a gummy juice, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth, but it taketh root, and then being sided both from the top boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh itself a tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young trees, there fall again the like cords, which in one year, and less (in that world of perpetual spring) become also trees of the bigness of the nether part of a lance, and as strait as nature and art can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a grove, as no other tree in the world can do. Now one of these trees considered with all his young ones, may, indeed, shroud four hundred, or four thousand horsemen, if they please; for they cover whole valleys——But that they bear any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never find (3)."

(O) The Mohammedans have the like different opinions among them relating to this tree; some affirm it was an ear of wheat; others a fig-tree; and a third party a vine (4).

(1) See BULL'S State of Man before the Fall. BARCEPHA de Parad. Part I. c. 12.

(2) Barcephas takes it, indeed, to have been the fig-tree; but does not join the word Indian to it, as we can find.

(3) Hist. of the World, Part I. Book I. c. 4 §. 2.

(4) Vid. MARRACE, in Alc. p. 22.

Year of the
World, &
Year before
Christ, 4305.

The trial by forbidding a fruit, rational.

And the punishment consequently just.

The circumstances of the aprons and coats explained.

The cherubim and flaming sword, what?

fig-tree, yet what Moses has so industriously concealed, is above the power of any to discover. Philo the Jew, according to his custom, allegorizes what is said of both these trees, supposing that no such ever were, nor ever will be in the world<sup>m</sup> (P).

THAT the trial of man's obedience should be by such a prohibition as is mentioned by Moses, seems perfectly rational, and adapted to the state of innocence; no moral precept could have been at all proper for that purpose, because there was then scarce a possibility of their transgressing any such: it must therefore have been some indifferent action, neither good nor evil in itself, but so far only as it was commanded or forbidden. And what so natural and agreeable to the state of our first parents (considering they were to live all their lives in a garden) as the forbidding them to eat of the fruit of a certain tree in that garden? a tree near at hand, and which might give them every moment an opportunity of shewing their observance of the divine command, by their abstaining from it<sup>n</sup>.

AND this takes off the objection against the punishment inflicted on man for his disobedience, as too severe, and no way proportionable to the offence; for we are deceived, if we suppose that good and evil is only in the nature of the thing, and not in the commands and prohibitions of God. And considering this crime to have been a downright rebellion against God, and committed against the clearest conviction of conscience, with other aggravating circumstances, it will appear to have been a crime so heinous, that nothing now-a-days can be supposed to resemble it.

No sooner was the intoxicating juice of the forbidden tree gone off, and the criminals began to return to their senses again, but the eyes (Q) of their understanding were opened, and they perceived their own nakedness (R), and the foul degradation of their nature; to conceal which, as far as they were able, they twisted, or platted the flexible branches of the fig-tree round their waists, so that the broad leaves hanging down might serve them instead of aprons: for we must not imagine that they sewed the leaves together, as taylor's do their cloth, which is more than the words of Moses imply (S).

JUDGMENT being passed on all that were concerned in this unhappy affair, it is said that God, before he drove Adam and Eve out of paradise, clothed them with skins, which it is conceived is not necessarily to be understood, as if God himself, or even an angel, made the coats; it being common for the Hebrew tongue verbally to attribute things to God, which are not done by his immediate act, but by his direction, or even by the permission of his ordinary providence. So that it is probable Adam and Eve only received instructions how to make them<sup>o</sup>.

As to the cherubims and flaming sword placed to guard the way of the tree of life, there are several opinions concerning them. They who place paradise in the southern hemisphere, conceive the sword to have been no more than the torrid zone, which in the parallel situation the earth is then supposed to have had, must have been a region of flame intolerably hot like a furnace, and consequently impassable; its encompassing the whole earth sufficiently answering the Mosaic description P, that it turned every way.

<sup>m</sup> PHILO JUD. de mundi opificio, p. 35.

Confer. ubi supra.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid.

<sup>o</sup> TERTULLIAN. Apolog. cap. 47. Vid. BURNET's Theory, Book II. c. 7. Theor. Sacr. Telluris, l. 2. c. 6.

(P) Those who admire allegorical interpretations will have the forbidden fruit to have been no other than the sensual act of generation, for which the punishment inflicted on the woman was the pain of child-birth (1). But this opinion has not the least foundation in the words of Moses; especially if we consider that Adam knew not his wife till after their expulsion out of paradise.

(Q) The expression that the eyes of them were opened, occasioned a popular belief, that Adam and Eve were blind till they had transgressed; which imagination St. Austin has taken the pains to refute (2).

(R) By perceiving their nakedness, a late writer conceives no more is meant than that they were sensible of their transgression. Thus after the golden calf was consecrated, Moses is said to have seen the people naked; (Exod. xxxii. 25.) And in the new testament συμυδς is sometimes taken for a sinner. Others, indeed, suppose that the fruit of this forbidden tree provoked our first parents to lust, and some indecent motions of the body; for according to the modesty of the Hebrew tongue, nakedness may well enough denote an irregular appetite to venereal pleasures: (and this is the opinion of St. Austin, mentioned hereafter.) But our author thinks this conjecture is without any manner of foundation, and that it is hard to conceive how Adam and Eve should not know themselves to be naked before their fall; or why they should be more ashamed of their nakedness then, than they were before. When they were the only inhabitants of the world, their bed, under the canopy of heaven, was equally as chaste as if it had been covered and enclosed; and therefore this nakedness of theirs must, in his opinion, be understood in a figurative sense (3).

(S) The original word סָבַח, which is translated Sewed, signifies no more than to put together, to apply, or fit; in which sense it is used Job xvi. 15. and Ezek. xiii. 18. And לָבַח, which we render leaves, signifies also branches of trees, such as were fit to make booths or bowers; Nehem. vii. 15. (4).

(1) Vid. BARCEPHAM de Parad. ubi sup. LEON Hebreu, Philosophie d'amour, Dial. 3. p. 620, &c. (2) AUGUST. de civit. Dei, l. 14. c. 17. supra.

(3) LE CLERC's Dissertat.

(4) Dr. NICHOLLS's Conf. ubi

Others have thought it to have been a wall or circle of fire encompassing paradise (T); and that this flame was an accension of some inflammable matter round about the garden, which excluded all comers to it, till the beauty of it was defaced: which opinion may be more probable to them who place paradise about Babylon, where there is such an abundance of naphtha and bitumen, and where there are fields, which even yet, at some time of the year, seem all on fire. And if it be objected, that the cherubims had nothing to do with such a wall; it is answered, that it is usual for the scriptures to express all extraordinary works of God by angels; as to call a plague, or famine, a destroying angel; and the like <sup>1</sup>. Some Rabbins<sup>2</sup> are of opinion that this flaming sword was an angel; which they found on that passage, where it is said, that God maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire<sup>3</sup>. And hence it has been imagined, that this flaming sword, which was esteemed by the Jews a second angel, was of a different kind from the cherubim, viz. a Seraph, or flaming angel, in the form of a flying fiery serpent, whose body vibrated in the air with lustre, and may be fitly described by the image of such a sword<sup>4</sup>.

Year of the World, 1.
Year before Christ, 4305

HAVING thus examined the circumstances of the fall, it may be proper to consider the effects it had upon our first parents and their posterity, and also upon the ground, which was cursed for their sake.

The effects of the fall, on men, and on the ground.

THE unhappy pair did not indeed die immediately, but they became subject to death, which continually hung over their heads; the time they had to live, being but as the space between a criminal's condemnation and his execution. They had lost God's favour, and forfeited paradise: the necessities of life were now to be gotten by hard labour of the man, and child-birth was to be attended with great pain in the woman: so that the remembrance of their past happiness, and the prospect of the innumerable miseries to which they had made themselves and their off-spring obnoxious, must needs fill them with regret and despair. For since they could not by generation transmit any thing to their posterity, but what they had themselves; their descendants were destined in like manner to undergo the troubles of life, and the pains and agonies of death, the necessary consequences of Adam's transgression: nor is there in this any injustice, we being thereby deprived only of what he had no title to. But that we are thereby become the objects of God's wrath, and deserving eternal damnation, by the imputation of the guilt of Adam's sin (which is the doctrine of St. Austin and his disciples, thence named Supralapsarians) has seemed to many a very harsh opinion, and to reflect on the goodness and justice of God.

As this is a point greatly controverted among divines<sup>5</sup>, and foreign to our present design, we shall only say; that the general manifest depravity and corruption of human nature, so very different from what we must suppose it to have been in its original state, would induce us to believe it the effect of our first parents transgression; whereupon unruly passions and appetites got that superiority over, and influence on our wills, which reason alone ought to have; and this might be possibly occasioned, in some degree at least, by the infirmities which our bodies necessarily contracted, by proceeding from such a root, and by the great change brought on the earth, air, and other elements, by the curse. For whatever the ancients have said of the plenty and happiness of the golden age, seems chiefly to have been some broken notions and traditions of man's first estate in paradise, and of that universal harmony wherein the world and all things would have continued, had not his fall introduced a change. The fruits of the earth were at first spontaneous, and the soil, without being torn and tormented, satisfied the wants and desires of man; but upon his apostasy from God, as a punishment for his sin, God cursed the ground, which immediately brought forth thorns and thistles; for we must not suppose, with some, that the original fertility of the earth continued till the destruction brought upon it by the universal deluge. The deluge was, indeed, the completion of the curse, but some considerable effects of it appeared before; otherwise how could Adam be said to eat bread in sorrow, and in the sweat of his face all the days of his life? As the earth was impoverished on man's transgression, so the air and other elements became disordered, in some measure unwholesome, and sometimes fatal. Hence proceeded famines, pestilences,

<sup>1</sup> Pseudo-Anselm. Elucid. c. 15.

Nevoch. p. 1. cap. 49.

<sup>2</sup> Psalm civ. 4.

<sup>3</sup> NICHOLLS, ubi sup.

<sup>4</sup> TENNISON of Idolatry.

<sup>5</sup> Vid. MAIMONID. More

See STACKHOUSE's

(T) The words commonly rendred flaming sword, are in the original the flame of cutting, or division, or a devouring flame; for the same word which signifies a sword, signifies also division; and is in the new testament translated both ways (1).

(1) See Matth. x. 34. & Luke xii. 51. NICHOLLS, ubi sup.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

The change in the constitution
of man.

earthquakes, storms, and all manner of natural calamities, which cause an innumerable variety of diseases and distempers<sup>v</sup>.

BUT in order to give a more clear idea in what degree and manner nature became impaired by the fall; it may be proper to consider the constitution of man's body (for what concerns his soul is not properly within the compass of this design) and of the earth in that primitive state; and by what means they were reduced to their present condition.

As to the constitution of man's body, it appears that nakedness was then no inconvenience or shame, and consequently there was no sense of any need to cover it. Those inclinations which provide for the propagation of mankind, were, it seems, so regular, and so entirely under the command of reason, that not so much as an apron was esteemed necessary to hide those parts, which all the world have since thought proper to conceal<sup>1</sup>. But some have imagined, that in case man had persevered in his state of innocence, there would have been no matrimonial commerce, but mankind would have been otherwise propagated (V); and this the ancient fathers were inclined to believe, from their pre-possession in favour of the merits and excellency of celibacy<sup>2</sup>. This opinion St. Augustin combated by very strong arguments<sup>3</sup>, such as the benediction of God, and his command to encrease and multiply; the distinction of the sexes preceding the fall; and the absurdity of supposing sin to have been necessary for the propagation of mankind. Yet he agrees, that in the state of innocence, the work of generation would have been carried on without any mixture of passion, or loss of virginity; and that man would then have proceeded to the propagation of his species, whenever he judged it requisite, without any incitement of lust. In the primitive state also, the temper of the human body seems to have been more soft, pliable, and alterable than now it is: some sorts of fruits and food were able to cause a mighty change therein, either to fix and adapt it to its present condition, or discompose and disorder it: thus the fruit of the tree of life had the virtue of rendering the body permanent and immortal, on the one hand; and that of the tree of knowledge, of bringing upon it diseases, corruptions, and mortality, on the other; but the first effect of this latter fruit is supposed to have been the revolt of the parts subservient to generation, which, it is pretended, appears from the shame which immediately seized those who had tasted it (W). And, to say the truth, since man, in his fallen state, was unable to conform himself to the dictates of reason, love was necessarily to be introduced into the world; for otherwise it is not conceived how mankind could have subsisted: so that the passions were then raised, in order to induce men to do that to satisfy their appetites, which before they did merely from prudential considerations<sup>4</sup>.

THERE was also a considerable difference between the condition of the woman before the fall, and that which she has since been in; particularly, she was then in a state of greater equality with the man, and little more subject to sorrow in the propagation of posterity than he<sup>d</sup>. Nay, the very animals seem to have been, at that time in a state of greater capacities and operations; nearer approaching to reason and discourse, and partakers of higher degrees of perfection and happiness than they have been ever since<sup>e</sup>.

The change in
the constitution
of the earth,
&c. as declared
according to Dr.
Burnet.

WHEREIN the fecundity and amenity of the primitive earth consisted, and by what means it became so much altered for the worse, is difficult to be determined. It is indeed presently accounted for, if we have recourse to the divine interposition, and suppose that the sterility of the earth, and malignity of the air, and the general depravation of nature was effected by God, or his subordinate agents. But to assign a probable natural cause of such effects is not so easy. Dr. Burnet's notion is, that the fertility and paradisiacal state of the first earth was entirely owing to a perpetual equinox, the consequence of the situation of its axis, which he supposed to have been then parallel to the axis of the ecliptic, in which it was carried about the sun with the other planets. And that it really had such a situation, he thinks needs no other proof than its own

<sup>v</sup> Vid. STACKHOUSE, ubi sup.

<sup>2</sup> Vid. WHISTON'S Theory, Book III. p. 238.

<sup>3</sup> Vid.

SALIAN. Annal. Tom. I. p. 174. CORNEL. à LAPIDE, in Gen. II. BARCEPHA de Parad. part. I. c. 25.

<sup>d</sup> AUGUST. de Civit. Dei, l. 14. c. 21, &c.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Eve,

Rem. F.

<sup>d</sup> Vid. WHISTON'S Theory, Book III. p. 239.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 240.

(V) Paracelsus was so firmly persuaded of this, that he maintained Adam and Eve to have been created without the parts of generation; which afterwards grew out of their bodies like excrescences (1).

(W) Some Rabbins also seem to have attributed this to the natural quality of the forbidden fruit (2).

(1) Apud Vossium de Philos. cap. 9. p. 71. Rem. C.

(2) Vid. BAYLE, Dict. Hist. Art. Eve, evidence; for it is the immediate result and common effect of gravity or libration, that a body left freely to itself in a fluid medium, should settle in such a posture as best answers to its gravitation; and the first earth being uniform, regular, and every way equally ballanced<sup>f</sup>, there was no reason why it should encline at one end, more than the other, towards the sun. And this position he supposes the earth kept till the deluge, when it was so broken and divided, according to his hypothesis, that it lost its equal poise; and the centre of its gravity changing, one pole became more enclined to the sun, and the other more removed from it, and to the parallel situation, which it had before, was changed to an oblique one; whence proceeded the variety of seasons, and those irregularities in the temperature of the air, which have since obtained <sup>g</sup>. But this does not account for the immediate effect of God's curse on the earth, which, as has been observed, must by no means be deferred so late as to the flood.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 405.

To avoid this difficulty, Mr. Whiston has supposed that the earth in its primitive state had no diurnal motion about its own axis, but only an annual motion about the sun; so that the sun and planets then rose in the west, and set in the east, contrary to what they have ever since done (X).

On this supposition, as well as the former, there would also be a perpetual equinox through the world, which characters the fathers usually applied to the paradisiacal state, and the ancient heathens to the golden age<sup>h</sup>. The great change therefore which was made in nature at the fall, he takes to be the commencing of a new motion or rotation of the earth about its present axis: by this means the poles of the world, which to the first inhabitants of the earth (dwelling near the intersection of the ancient ecliptic with the present northern tropic) were neither considerably elevated nor depressed, suddenly changed their situation; the northern pole appeared to be elevated above, and the southern depressed below the horizon: and the course of the heavens seemed bent or inclined to the southern parts of the world (Y). And the probable mechanical cause of this commencement of the earth's diurnal motion, after its annual had continued some time, assigned by him is, the impulse of a comet with little or no atmosphere, or of a central solid hitting obliquely upon the earth along some parts of its present equator: from which impulse both the annual orbit of the earth would be altered, and a vertiginous motion about a new and real axis would certainly commence. And he observes that in all probability this comet was of the bigness of one of the small secondary, rather than of the large primary planets; for otherwise by its causing vast tides in the abyss, after it was passed by, it would have occasioned many more alterations in the earth than we have reason to believe happened at that time (Z).

—and Mr.
Whiston.

<sup>f</sup> See the Introduction, p. 37. c.

<sup>g</sup> BURNET'S Theory of the Earth, Book II. c. 3.

<sup>h</sup> Vid.

BURNET'S Theor. l. 2. c. 1. & 10. Archæol. l. 2. c. 5. & 6. <sup>i</sup> WHISTON'S Theory, Book II. p. 98, &c.

(X) This he thinks may have been the foundation of that story in Herodotus (1), who tells us, that the sun, in the space of eleven thousand three hundred and forty years, four times inverted his course, and rose in the west. But what he mainly depends on, is that discourse in Plato (2), where relating some very ancient traditions (as he expressly says they are, and delivered by our first parents to their posterity) about the primitive state of things, he says, that there was a great change made in the heavenly motions, the sun and other stars formerly setting in the same place where they now rise, and rising where they now set; which change he attributes to GOD, who sometimes directs the motion of the universe himself, and at other times, after so many periodical revolutions as he sees fitting, leaves it; whereupon it is, as it were, spontaneously carried about by a motion contrary to the former. And this change Plato reckons the greatest and most entire of any the heavenly bodies undergo.

(Y) The inclination of the earth is much insisted upon by the ancients. Plutarch tells us, that Lemæippus was of opinion the earth fell towards the south, because of the rareness of those parts; the northern regions being grown rigid and compact, while the southern were scorched, or on fire (3).

Democritus and Empedocles gave nearly the same reason for it; and Diogenes and Anaxagoras specify the very time when this happened; viz. after the first coalition of the world, and the production of animals out of the earth: and they thought this inclination was probably the effect of providence, on purpose that some parts of the world might become habitable, and others uninhabitable, by reason of the frigid, torrid, and temperate climates thereof (4).

(Z) That the diurnal motion did not begin till some time after the annual, Mr. Whiston imagines to be evinced from the late discovery (as it is called) of an internal magnet freely moving within the earth, and from which all the variations of the magnetic needle are supposed to arise. The poles of this interior magnet being, as they suppose, distant from the earth's axis, slowly change their places in respect of the external earth, by a motion westward: whence he concludes, that the enclosed magnet or nucleus, has not attained the same velocity with the exterior parts in their diurnal revolution, because the impulse by which the diurnal motion was first impressed upon the external earth, has not yet been so perfectly communicated to the internal magnet, as to equal the first motion impressed and still preserved by the superior parts of the globe (5).

(1) HERODOT. l. 2. c. 142. (2) PLATO, in Politic. p. 174, 175. (3) PLUT. de placit. philos. l. 3. c. 12. (4) Idem, ibid. l. 2. c. 8. (5) Vid. Dr. HALLER'S Theory of the variation of the magnetic needle, Philol. Trans. N° 195.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

BUT besides the impression of this new motion, another effect of such a collision of a comet would be the change of the earth's orbit from an ellipsis, as it was before the fall, to a perfect circle. For Mr. Whiston supposes the reduction of the very oblong eccentric orbit of the earth into a circular one, which he thinks it had before the deluge, was gradual, and not done all at once; the greatest part at the commencing of the Mosaic creation, and the rest at the commencing of the diurnal motion. All this being supposed, and that providence adjusted all circumstances so as should be most for the advantage of the regions adjoining to paradise, where alone Adam and the other creatures dwelt in this state; we shall have the earth revolving in a moderately eccentric ellipsis, without any diurnal rotation, about the sun in the space of a year; we shall have some diameter of the earth, which passed near paradise, parallel to the longer axis of its ellipsis, and the place of paradise respecting nearly the same fixed stars with the perihelion of the ellipsis. Which being again supposed, we may observe, that as a circular orbit is much the best for a globe inhabited all round (as the earth was designed to be after the fall), that providing equally for the convenience of both hemispheres; so is this elliptic orbit the best for a globe inhabited but in one place, as the earth was in its primitive state, this providing peculiarly for the happiness of that particular spot where alone the living part of the creation was to reside. For the heat of the day time would gradually encrease before, and decrease after noon, but yet would never be over violent; because the increase of the heat, by the sun's rising higher and higher above the horizon in the forenoon or spring, would be prevented, in a great measure, by the earth's real receding from him, and approaching nearer his aphelion during the same time: and vice versa in the afternoon or summer, which would render the state of the air more equal and uniform. And thus also the too long duration of the night would be entirely avoided: for the whole night-time would then bear a small proportion to the day, and amount perhaps to no more than two months; out of which must be deducted the two twilights, each of near a fortnight, which would reduce the darkness of the night itself to about a single month; out of which another fortnight is to be still deducted for the time of the moon's being above the horizon, and enlightning the earth: so that at last, if the moon's crepuscula be allowed for, as they ought to be, we shall scarce have a week of pure darkness in the whole year, to the great comfort and advantage of this truly paradisiacal state; wherein there would be a constant warmth without the frequent interposition of cold; an air perfectly clear and homogeneous, and susceptible of the utmost power of the solar heat, and the seasons equable, or gradually distinguished from one another, with other natural consequences. But so soon as man had rendered himself unworthy of that happy state, and God had pronounced a curse on the ground, presently the earth began a new and strange motion, and revolved from west to east upon its own axis: the succession of day and night returned frequently, while the annual motion, performed on a different axis, distinguished the seasons, and in conjunction with the diurnal, described the equator and the tropics; by which, and the polar circles, the face of the earth was distinguished into zones, with respect whereto the particular regions of the earth changed their situation; so that paradise, which was before near the middle or ecliptic, was now beyond the northern tropic. The figure of the earth, which was before truly spherical, degenerated into an oblate spheroid; the torrid zone rising about fifteen or sixteen miles upwards, and the frigid one subsiding as much downwards. The compages of the upper earth, and of its strata, became thereby chapped and broken, and so carried up the warm steams from beneath, arising from the hot central solid, to particular receptacles and volcano's, which before served, in a more equal and uniform manner, to heat and invigorate the entire earth and its productions. In these and other circumstances was the state of nature altered for the worse on the fall, according to this gentleman's theory.

* Ibid. p. 114, &c.

* Ibid. Book IV. p. 353, &c.

S E C T. III.

The Chronology from the Creation to the Deluge stated.

BEFORE we enter on the history of the antediluvian world, it will be necessary that we should settle the chronology of this period.

As Moses has not set down the particular time of any transaction before the flood, except only the years of the fathers age, wherein the several descendants of Adam, in the line of Setb, were begotten, and the length of their several lives ; all we can do in this period, is to endeavour to fix the years of the lives and deaths of those patriarchs, and the distance of time from the creation to the deluge.

AND this might be easily done, if there were no varieties in the several copies we now have of Moses's writings ; which are the Hebrew, the Samaritan, and the Greek version of the Septuagint : but as these differ very considerably from one another, learned men are much divided in their opinions, concerning the chronology of the first ages of the world, some preferring one copy, and some another.

THAT the reader may the better judge of the variations in the three copies in this period, we shall in the following table subjoin the numbers of each ; to which we take the liberty to add those of Josephus, as corrected by Dr. Wills and Mr. Whiston, the numbers in the present copies of that historian being greatly corrupted.

A TABLE of the Years of the Antediluvian Patriarchs.

Their Ages at their Son's Birth.					Years they lived after the Son's Birth.			Length of their Lives.
	Heb.	Samar.	Sept.	Joseph.	Heb.	Samar.	Sept.	Heb.	Samar.	Sept.
Adam , - - -	130	130	230	130	800	800	700	930	930	930
Setb , - - -	105	105	205	105	807	807	707	912	912	912
Enos , - - -	90	90	190	90	815	815	715	905	905	905
Cainan , - - -	70	70	170	70	840	840	740	910	910	910
Mabalalcel , - - -	65	65	165	65	830	830	730	895	895	895
Jared , - - -	162	62	162	62	800	785	800	962	847	962
Enoch , - - -	65	65	165	65	300	300	200	365	365	365
Methuselah , - - -	187	67	187	187	782	653	802	969	720	696
Lamech , - - -	182	53	188	182	595	600	365	777	653	753
Noah was aged } at the Flood, }	600	600	600	600
To the Flood,	-1656	1307	2262	1556

To this Table it will be necessary, in order to explain the consequences of these variations, to add separate chronological tables, shewing in what year of his contemporaries the birth and death of each patriarch happened, according to the computation of each of the said three copies.

A Chronological TABLE of the Years of the Patriarchs, according to the Computation of the Hebrew.

	Years of the world.	Years of Seth,	Years of Enos,	Years of Cainan,	Years of Mahalaleel,	Years of Jared,	Years of Enoch,	Years of Methuselah,	Years of Lamech,	Years of Noah,
Adam created, -
Seth born, - -	130
Enos born, - -	235	105
Cainan born, -	325	195	90
Mahalaleel born,	395	265	160	70
Jared born, -	460	330	225	135	65
Enoch born, -	622	492	387	297	227	162
Methuselah born,	687	557	452	362	292	227	65
Lamech born, -	874	744	639	549	479	414	252	187
Adam dies, -	930	800	695	605	535	470	308	243	56
Enoch translated,	987	857	752	662	592	527	365	300	113
Seth dies, - -	1042	912	807	717	647	582		355	168
Noah born, - -	1056		821	731	661	596		369	182
Enos dies, - -	1140		905	817	745	680		453	266	84
Cainan dies, - -	1235			910	840	775		548	361	179
Mahalaleel dies, -	1290				895	830		603	416	234
Jared dies, - -	1422					962		735	548	366
Japhet born, - -	1556							869	682	500
Shem born, - -	1558							871	684	502
Lamech dies, - -	1651							964	777	595
Methuselah dies, -	1656							969		600
The Flood, - - -

A Chronological TABLE of the Years of the Patriarchs, according to the Computation of the Septuagint.

	Years of the world.	Years of Seth,	Years of Enos,	Years of Cainan,	Years of Mahalaleel,	Years of Jared,	Years of Enoch,	Years of Methuselah,	Years of Lamech,	Years of Noah,
Adam created, -
Seth born, - -	230
Enos born, - -	435	205
Cainan born, - -	625	395	190
Mahalaleel born, -	795	565	360	170
Adam dies, - -	930	700	495	305	135
Jared born, - -	960	730	525	335	165
Enoch born, - -	1122	892	687	497	327	162
Seth dies, - -	1142	912	707	517	347	182
Methuselah born, -	1287		852	662	492	327	165
Enos dies, - -	1340		905	715	545	380	218
Lamech born, - -	1474			849	679	514	352	187
Enoch translated, -	1487			862	692	527	365	200
Cainan dies, - -	1535			910	740	575		248
Noah born, - -	1662				867	702		375	188
Mahalaleel dies, -	1690				895	730		403	216	28
Jared dies, - -	1922					962		635	448	260
Japhet born, - -	2162							875	688	500
Shem born, - -	2164							877	690	502
Lamech dies, - -	2227							940	753	565
Methuselah dies, -	2256							969		594
The Flood, - -	2262									600

A Chronological TABLE of the Years of the Patriarchs, according to the Computation of the Samaritan Pentateuch.

	Years of the world.	Years of Seth,	Years of Enos,	Years of Cainan,	Years of Mahalaleel,	Years of Jared,	Years of Enoch,	Years of Methuselah,	Years of Lamech,	Years of Noab,
Adam created, —
Seth born, —	130
Enos born, —	235	105
Cainan born, —	325	195	90
Mahalaleel born, —	395	265	160	70
Jared born, —	460	330	225	135	65
Enoch born, —	522	392	287	197	127	62
Methuselah born, —	587	457	352	262	192	127	65
Lamech born, —	654	524	419	329	259	194	132	67
Noab born, —	707	577	472	382	312	247	185	120	53
Enoch translated, —	837	757	652	562	497	427	365	300	233	180
Adam dies, —	930	800	695	605	535	470		343	276	223
Seth dies, —	1042	912	807	717	647	582		462	388	335
Enos dies, —	1140		905	815	745	680		553	486	433
Japhet born, —	1207			882	812	747		620	553	500
Shem born, —	1209			884	814	749		622	555	502
Cainan dies, —	1235			910	840	775		648	581	528
Mahalaleel dies, —	1290				895	830		703	636	583
Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech die, —	1307	The Flood,				847		720	653	600

To the varieties exhibited in the two last tables, others might be added, by admitting the various readings of some numbers in the Samaritan and Septuagint: for as to the Hebrew copies, there is here a constant agreement among them (A).

THE manuscript from which the Samaritan pentateuch was published (B), agrees exactly with the Samaritan numbers given by Eusebius<sup>a</sup>. But St. Jerom tells us<sup>b</sup>, that in his time there were some Samaritan copies which make Methuselah 187 years old at the birth of Lamech, and Lamech 182 at the birth of Noab, just as the Hebrew does. Now if these numbers be approved as the true original numbers, the interval from the creation to the flood will be 1556 years (C); differing from the Hebrew computation but 100 years, in the age of Jared at the birth of Enoch: and if this last be allowed to be a mistake of the transcriber, by his dropping a number, and writing 62 instead of 162, as has been suspected, the Samaritan will be perfectly reconciled with the Hebrew, and all difference between them vanish (D).

THERE are indeed some other variations in the Samaritan numbers, as given by Eusebius; but as they are plainly owing to the negligence of the copier, or the printer, we think it needless to trouble the reader with them.

SCALIGER, on the authority of an old Samaritan chronicle, having at the end a table of the years of the patriarchs to the time of Moses, would correct two of the Samaritan numbers in Eusebius; viz. instead of 65, the age of Mahalaleel when he begat Jared, he thinks it should be 75; and instead of 67, the age of Methuselah, when he begat Lamech, he would have it 77<sup>c</sup>. By which alterations he reckons 20 years

<sup>a</sup> In Chronic. Græc. p. 3, 4. <sup>b</sup> In Quæst. in Genes. <sup>c</sup> SCALIGER in Græc. Euseb. p. 403.

(A) It is observable, that the Hebrew numbers were exactly the same when the two Talmuds were composed; and that the Chaldee paraphrase of Onkelos, which is allowed to have been written about the time of our Saviour, does also agree with the Hebrew chronology.

(B) This MS. was written A. D. 1404. (1).

(C) Mr. WHISTON allowing of these two corrections, which are supported by the attestation of Josephus, follows this computation in his chronological table (2).

(D) This is the hypothesis of Father Tournemine, who in his Samaritan chronology reckons 1656 years to the deluge.

(1) Vid. JOAN MORIN. in Præf. Ed. Septuag. Græc. Paris, 1618. (2) See also his Essay towards restoring the true text of the old Test. &c. p. 27.

more to the flood than Eusebius and the manuscript; that is, 1327 (E). But as he acknowledges the table, whereon he grounds these corrections, contains some great absurdities, it seems unreasonable to oppose it to the joint authority of Eusebius and the Samaritan manuscript <sup>d</sup>.

As to the Septuagint, in the common editions of that version, the age of Methuselah at the birth of Lamech, is 167, and consequently, the sum total of this period, according to them, is no more than 2242. But in this case Methuselah will outlive the flood 14 years; and we may well wonder, with Eusebius <sup>e</sup>, where he was preserved. To obviate this objection, we are told that in some copies Methuselah is said to have lived but 782 (not 802) years after the birth of Lamech, and no more <sup>a</sup> than 949 in all <sup>f</sup>. But the Alexandrian manuscript entirely takes away the difficulty, by giving the same number in this place with the Hebrew.

PEZZON is of opinion, that the age of Lamech at the birth of Noah, should be but 182, as it is both in the Hebrew and in Josephus, supposing, with St. Austin, that the present number is the error of the scribe, who first copied the original Septuagint manuscript in Ptolemy's library <sup>g</sup>. So that he computes 2256 years to the flood. And if this correction be admitted, and one more mentioned also by St. Austin <sup>h</sup>, viz. that Lamech lived 595 years after the birth of Noah, and not 565, as in the present copies, there will then remain no other difference between the Septuagint and the Hebrew than 600 years added to the ages of six of the patriarchs when they begat their sons <sup>i</sup>, and Methuselah will, conformably to the Hebrew and Samaritan, die in the year of the flood. <sup>b</sup>

As we have chosen to follow the chronology of the present Samaritan copies, after the flood, for the reasons which will be found in another place, we have done the same in our calculations in this period; which may, with very little trouble, be reduced to the chronology of the Hebrew or Septuagint, by those who prefer the accounts of those copies.

SECT. IV.

The History of the Antediluvian Patriarchs.

Year of the
World, 1.
Year before
Christ, 4305.

WHERE Adam dwelt after his expulsion from paradise, is uncertain; but it is likely he did not remove far off (F). He now consummated his marriage with Eve, which, as the words of Moses seem to imply, he had not done before the fall <sup>k</sup> (G): a strong argument for the short duration of the state of innocence. The eldest son of Adam, named Cain, was born probably in the first year of the world; and his second, Abel (H).

<sup>a</sup> Vid. LUD. CAPPELLI Chronol. Sac. de civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 13.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> Chron. Græc. p. 4.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid.

<sup>e</sup> AUGUSTIN.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. PEZZON, l'Antiquité des temps rétablie, p. 57. & CAPPELLI Chronolog. sac.

<sup>g</sup> Genes. iii. 24- iv. 1.

(E) It is remarkable that Scaliger, taking the Samaritan numbers to be brought down no lower than to the birth of Noah, computes 1947 years to the flood, according to that chronology; wherein he is again mistaken 20 years, in the adding of the 600 years of Noah's life to the former number. And he at the same time quarrels with Synellus for not committing the same fault (1).

(F) The eastern tradition is, that Adam went into India (2) and did penance on the mountain thence named Pico de Adam, in the isle of Ceylon, for several years. Some Rabbins pretend, that he was separated from Eve for 130 years, and lived with another woman named Lilith, formed out of the ground like himself; during which time he begat demons on her, as the devils did on Eve (3). Daaimonides supposes, that by those demons were meant only wicked and impious men, as the race of Adam were before Seth, whom he is therefore said to have begotten in his own likeness, and after his image (4). The Mohammedans say, that when they were cast down from paradise, Adam fell on Ceylon, and Eve near Jeddah in Arabia; and that after a separation of 200 years, Adam was, on his repentance, conducted by the angel Gabriel to a mountain near Mecca, where he found and knew his wife, the mountain being thence named Arafas; and that he afterwards retired with her to Ceylon, where they continued to propagate their species (5).

(G) Yet some Rabbins, as R. Solomon Yarchi, and R. Moses Haddarshan (6), were of a contrary opinion. Others of them indeed went much farther, as Father Bartolucci assures us, whose words we subjoin (to shew what abominable imaginations some men are capable of) but desire to be excused the translating of them. De protoparantse Adamo ita sinistra sentiunt, ut ipsum etiam nefaria incontinentia, quod referre pudet, insimulant; & ante Eve formationem, omnia jumenta ferasque campi carnaliter cognovisse aiunt (7).

(H) Some Rabbins imagined, that Cain and Abel were twins (which Calvin (8) also supposed) but, that Cain was the off-spring of the devil, or Samael, who first lay with Eve; and that she afterwards, by superfetation, conceived Abel by Adam (9). Some heretics fancied both Cain and Abel to have been the issue of the devil (10).

(1) SCALIG. in Græc. Euseb. p. 403. orient. p. 55.

(2) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patriarch. Tom. I. p. 112. & BARTOLOCC. Bibl. Rabbini. Tom. I. p. 291.

(3) MAIM. More Nevoch. p. 1. c. 7.

(4) Vid. D'HERBEL. ubi supra.

(5) Vid. HEIDEGG. p. 111. in Genes. iv. 2.

(6) BARTOLOCC. ubi sup. p. 75.

(7) Vid. CORN. 2 LAPIDE.

(8) BARTOLOCC. ubi supra.

(9) Vid. EPIFAN. Hæres. 40.

a the year following *. When they were grown up, they betook themselves to distinct employments; the former of them to husbandry, and the latter to the keeping of sheep. And their inward dispositions were still more different; Cain being wicked and avaricious, but Abel just and virtuous.

In process of time the two brothers brought their respective offerings to God †; Cain of the fruit of the ground, and Abel of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof **; but they met with very different success: for God had respect to, or accepted the offering of Abel, but Cain's he did not accept ‡. At this preference Cain was so enraged and transported with envy against his brother, that he could not help shewing it by his countenance. God however condescended to expostulate the matter with him, and asked him what reason he had to be angry, since if he did well, he should be accepted; and he could blame none but himself for what was the consequence of his own ill behaviour: and, in particular, he could not justly be angry with Abel, who had no design to supplant him, and should always pay him the respect due to an elder brother. But this admonition had so little effect on Cain, that on a convenient opportunity, when they were together in the field, he rose up against Abel

Year of the World, 2.
Year before Christ, 4304.

Year of the World, 129.
Year before Christ, 4177.

Cain and Abel, their offerings, Abel murdered.

* Genes. iv. 2.

† JOSEPH. Ant. l. i. c. 2.

* The name Cain signifies an acquisition, or possession, being derived (though not very regularly) from the verb קָנָה Kana, to acquire. Abel, or rather Habel, signifies vanity, and not mourning, as Josephus (1) and Eusebius (2) suppose.

The Arab authors say, that before Cabil (for so they call Cain) Adam had a son named عبد الحارث Abd alhareth, on the following occasion. When Eve was big with her first child, the devil came to her, and asked her if she knew what she carried within her, and which way she should be delivered of it: She being unable to give an answer to this question, went in a fright to Adam, and acquainted him with the matter, who not knowing what to think of it, grew sad and pensive; whereupon the devil appeared to him, and told him, that as he knew the mysterious name of God, he would, in virtue thereof, by his prayers, obtain of God, that Eve might be safely delivered of a son in his (Adam's) own likeness, provided he would promise to call his name Abd alhareth, or the servant of al Hareth (which was the devil's name in heaven) instead of Abdallah, or the servant of God, as Adam had designed. This Adam and his wife agreed to, and accordingly gave the child that name, upon which it immediately died (3). The parents are taxed with this in the Koran, as an Act looking towards idolatry (4). But the whole story seems to have no other foundation, than Cain's being called by Moses Obed adamah, i. e. a tiller of the ground, which might be translated by the Arabs Abd alhareth.

Abu'lfaragius (5) says Cain was born in the thirtieth Year of the world, with a twin sister, whom that Author calls Klimia, Eutychius (6) Acrun, and others Kilmanna; and that thirty years after, Abel was born with a twin sister also, named Lebudha, or Lefura, by Eutychius (who says Lefura was her Greek name) Oswain, and by others Delborah (7).

† It has been supposed by some (but without any ground) that they brought their offerings to Adam to offer for them (8).

The oriental tradition makes these sacrifices to have been offered, and Cain's malice excited against his brother on the following occasion. When they were grown up, in the one hundred and thirtieth year of the world, according to Abu'lfaragius, Adam proposed to Eve, that Cain should marry Abel's twin sister, and Abel Cain's: but this Cain refused to agree to, insinuating to have his own sister, who was the handsomest of the two. Adam hereupon was greatly displeased, because it was against the divine command that he should marry his twin sister (for it being the common opinion, that marriages ought not to be had in the nearest degrees of consanguinity, since Cain and Abel must necessarily marry their sisters, it seemed reasonable to suppose they ought to take those of the remoter degree) and ordered his sons to make their offerings before they took their wives, referring the dispute, probably, to God's determination. But while they went up the mountain for that purpose, the devil put it into Cain's head to rid himself of his brother; for which wicked intent, his sacrifice was not accepted; and they were no sooner come down from the mountain, than he fell on Abel, and killed him with a stone (9). Thus was a woman, according to this story, the occasion of the first quarrel in the world; Nam fuit ante Helenam, &c.

** The opinion of those who think Abel did not kill or offer the Animals themselves, but only their milk and wool, will be considered hereafter, when we enquire into the origin of sacrifices.

‡ Though the difference put by God between the two offerings can be attributed to nothing but the wickedness and ill disposition of Cain, and the righteousness and faith of Abel (10); yet it has been imagined, that Cain's ill success was owing to some defect in his offering, or his presenting the worst part of it to God, and reserving the best to himself. The reason given by Josephus (11) is very frivolous; he says, that God was more delighted with Abel's offering, as being the spontaneous production of nature; and displeased with Cain's, because it was forced by the art and industry of a covetous man (12).

In what visible manner God declared his acceptance of Abel's offering, is not expressed by Moses. The common opinion is, that fire from heaven descended on the sacrifice and consumed it, but did not touch Cain's. This is supported by the version of Theodotion, who translates the word חָטָא, which we render had respect unto, εὐπρέπει, he set on fire; the usual sign whereby God has been pleased to testify his approbation in other instances. The Mohammedans likewise affirm the same thing (13). And the heathens themselves boasted of the like extraordinary marks of the divine favour in some particular places (14).

(1) Antiq. l. ii. cap. 6. (2) De Prop. Ev. l. 2. (3) Vid. D'HERBIOT. Bibl. Orient. p. 438, &c. SELDEN de jure Nat. &c. l. 5. c. 8. MARACC. in Alcor. p. 291. (4) AL KORAN, c. 7. VER. 189, &c. (5) p. 6. (6) p. 15. (7) Vid. PLEKRIUM in Genes. iv. 1. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr.

l. i. p. 112.

(8) Vid. HEIDEGG. ubi sup. p. 117.

(9) ABU'LFARAG. p. 6, 7. EUTYCH.

p. 15, 16. (10) Vid. Heb. xi. 4. (11) Antiq.

l. i. c. 2. (12) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. t. 1.

p. 120. (13) Vid. MARACC. in Alcor. p. 229.

(14) See BAYLE Diff. Hist. Art. Egnatia.

Year of the
World, 129.
Year before
Christ, 4177.

Cain's punishment.

his brother and slew him*, and buried his body, in hopes of concealing the murder<sup>a</sup>.

AFTER the commission of this horrid fact, Cain being questioned by GOD about his brother, returned an evasive answer, that he knew not what was become of him; churlishly asking, if he was his brother's keeper? But GOD soon convinced him that what he had done was not hid from him; and as a punishment, condemned him to be a fugitive and a vagabond on the earth, and to till an ungrateful soil, which should not reward his labour with the plenty and encrease he had before experienced. This sentence, though it fell short of the heinousness of his guilt, was yet thought too severe by Cain, who complained that his punishment was greater than he could bear; since he was to be banished from the presence of GOD, and from his near relations, and being a vagabond and friendless, would be in danger of being killed by the next that should meet him †. But GOD told him, that whosoever slew Cain, vengeance should

* Genes. iv. 3—8.

<sup>a</sup> JOSEPH. ubi sup.

* Before the commission of the fact, Moses tells us, according to the English translation, that Cain talked with Abel his brother. The words strictly signify, Cain said unto Abel his brother: after which there is a blank space left in the Hebrew copies, as if something was wanting. The Samaritan Pentateuch, and Septuagint version, supply this, by adding the words, Let us go into the field: but the Jerusalem Targum, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel have obliged us with the whole conversation. Says Cain, There is no future judgment, nor judge, nor life after this, nor reward for the just, nor punishment for the wicked: the world was neither created, nor is governed by the mercy of GOD, forasmuch as thy oblation was accepted, and mine rejected. To which Abel answered, There is a future judgment, and a judge, and a life to come: there is both a reward for the just, and a punishment for the unjust: the world was created, and is governed by the mercy of GOD. And because my works are better than thine, therefore was my oblation accepted, and thine rejected. Upon which ensued the quarrel which ended in Abel's murder. An ill beginning of religious controversy. Mohammed has also, in his Koran (1), inserted the debate between the two brothers, somewhat to the same purpose.

The time, place, and manner of this murder are all uncertain. It happened, very probably, not long before the Birth of Seth, who was appointed instead of Abel: but St. Austin (2) will not allow Seth to be the next Son which Eve had after Abel's death; supposing that expression to mean no more than that Seth succeeded that righteous person in his virtue and piety. Some are of opinion, that Adam assigned his sons their several employments in the fiftieth year of the world (as Eusebius says he did) that Cain and Abel made their offerings A. M. 100, and that thirty years after, Abel was killed. But neither reason nor scripture lead us to believe that Cain concealed his resentment so many years (3). The place where Abel was slain, according to an ancient tradition, is said to be still shewn at the foot of a hill near Damascus (4). As to the manner wherein Cain committed this murder, there is a great variety of opinions. Eutychius and the Arabs say he struck him on the head with a stone; some  Jews tell us, that he tore him in pieces with his teeth; others, that he killed him with the jaw-bone of an ass, which is the weapon the painters generally put into Cain's hand: some arm him with a fork; St. Chrysostom with a sword, St. Irenaeus with a scythe, and Prudentius with a pruning hook (5).

Whether Abel was a married man or not, has been disputed. Some of the ancient fathers have maintained the affirmative (6), as did also some heretics called Abelians (7). But it is improbable he should continue single if he lived to be near one hundred and thirty: the world wanted peopling too much to allow any room for such continency. Nor do St. Jerom and St. Austin (8) seem to doubt of his being married, though Moses makes no mention of his offspring.

(1) Chap. 5. ver. 33, &c. (2) De civit. Dei, L. 15. c. 15. (3) See BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Abel, Rem. C. (4) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. t. 1. p. 126. (5) Vid. BAYLE ubi sup. Rem. G. (6) BASIL. & AMBROS. apud CORN. & LAPIDE in Genes. iv. & v. (7) Vid. BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Abeliens. (8) Vid. SALIAN. Annal.

The Rabbins, and some Christians (9) say, that Adam and Eve mourned for Abel one hundred years, during which time they lived separate; Adam particularly in a valley near Hebron, thence named the valley of tears (10). The inhabitants of Ceylon pretend, that the salt lake on the mountain of Colombo was formed by the tears which Eve shed on this occasion (11).

† These words of Cain are variously interpreted. The first sentence, which our version renders, My punishment is greater than I can bear, some translate, My sin is greater than can be forgiven (for און signifies iniquity rather than punishment, and סלח to forgive, as well as to bear); and others interrogatively, Is my Sin too great to be forgiven? which last is the sense followed by the Hebrew expositors, and seems to be the best (12). The latter words, in the English translation, And it shall come to pass that every one that findeth me shall slay me, have also been rendered, I wish that any person that finds me may kill me (13).

That there were such numbers of men in the world, at the time of Abel's murder, that Cain might justly apprehend some danger from them, will appear from the calculations hereafter made of the increase of mankind before the flood. Mr. Bayle (14) thinks that Cain was not so much afraid of his kindred, the descendants of Adam, (though he might justly fear the resentment of Abel's children, if he left any) but of some strangers whom he apprehended he should meet in his banishment, where he would be friendless, and have none to support him; and therefore supposes, that, in his fright, he either did not consider there were no men in the world but what were the offspring of his father, or else feigned an apprehension, to move GOD's compassion. But we conceive there will be no occasion for either of those suppositions, if we consider in how few descents the degrees of kindred, at least of affection, decrease, and at length vanish; and that Cain might justly be looked on, even among his relations, as a common enemy. Not to mention the vast numbers of men, which he could not but think would in a few years to come overspread the earth, and have probably little knowledge of, or respect for him.

tom. 1. p. 184. (9) EUTYCH. p. 16. (10) Vid. SALIAN. ubi sup. p. 190. (11) Vid. CHEVREAU, Hist. du Monde, tom. 4. p. 255. (12) See SHUCKFORD'S Connection, vol. 1. p. 6. (13) LIGHTFOOT, vol. 1. p. 3. (14) Dict. Hist. Art. Cain, Rem. A.

- a be taken on him seven fold; and the more effectually to secure him from that apprehension, was pleased to give him a sign* (probably by some sensible miracle) that none that met him should take away his life†.

CAIN, soon after this unfortunate affair, having wandred about for some time, at length settled with his wife and family in the land of Nod, where he built a city, and called it, after the name of his son, Enoch‡.

- WHERE the land of Nod (which word signifies wandering) was situate, is uncertain. Moses places it, according to our translation, on the east of Eden; and it has been observed, that Ptolemy mentions a city called Anuchiba in Susiana, or Kbuzestân, a country lying eastward from Chaldea: which situation, and the near resemblance of the name Anuchiba to the original Hanokh (for tba is supposed to be only the Chaldee termination) induced the learned Huet to believe it to be the same with that built by Cain. But it seems very improbable, that the city of Enoch, built before the flood, should either withstand the deluge, or retain its antient name after so great an alteration of the face of things. Besides, Susiana being a very fertile and pleasant country, it is not likely Cain should be banished thither; but rather to some barren and desolate land, remote from the place of his nativity, and separated by mountains, or other natural obstructions, from the commerce of his relations. For which reason Grotius and Junius are of opinion, that the country into which Cain retired, was the desert Arabia; but that lying on the west, and not on the east of Eden, to remove so formidable an objection, it is said, that the words which we translate on the East of Eden, signify no more than before, or over-against Eden, as the Septuagint have rendered it‡.

WHEN Cain built this city, cannot be conjectured by any circumstance recorded by Moses; but it is probable he did it not till many years after his banishment, and when his posterity was greatly increased. Philo supposes he also built six other cities, named Maich, Jared, Tebe, Jesca, Selet, and Gebat; but what foundation he had for it we cannot conceive‡.

- JOSEPHUS says, that the punishment inflicted on Cain was so far from effecting any amendment in him, that he grew worse, and became a reprobate to all sense of goodness, indulging himself in all manner of pleasures, though he wronged his neighbours to procure them: that he got together abundance of wealth by rapine and violence; encouraging his followers in luxury and robbery, and becoming their instructor in evil courses: that he first corrupted that simplicity wherein men had till then lived, by the invention of measures and weights; changing their innocence of life, which was happily ignorant of such things, and their greatness of mind, into fraud and cunning: and that he also first set bounds to fields and possessions, and walled the city which he had built, obliging his dependants to live in a community†, the better, it is probable, to secure their ill-gotten wealth.

- SOON after the murder of Abel, and probably the next year, his loss was made up to his parents in another son they had, whom Eve named Seth, that is, appointed, because he was appointed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew‡.

* Genes. iv. 9—14.

† Ibid. ver. 16, 17.

‡ See RALIGH'S Hist. of the World, book I. c. 6. §. 4. Hist. Art. Cain, Rem. D.

* Genes. iv. 25.

† See WELLS'S Geogr. of the Old Testament.

‡ JOSEPH. ANT. L. I. c. 2. See BAYLE Dict.

* This is the true sense of this passage, and not that God set a mark upon Cain (1) according to the common exposition; in pursuance of which, many ridiculous conjectures have been made as to this imaginary mark. Some say that God stigmatized Cain on the forehead with a letter, which was to serve him as a passport, being taken either from the name of Abel (2), or the ineffable name of God (3) or from the word repentance, that every one might perceive Cain had repented. Others say this mark consisted of three letters, which composed the name of the Sabbath (4), or else that it was the sign of the cross (5). Others suppose that Abel's dog was given him as a constant companion, either to warn people not to attack him (6), or to prevent his taking any dangerous road (7). Others say that his face was covered with leprosy (8). Others, that the mark was nothing but a wild aspect, with bloody eyes, which rolled in a horrid manner (9). Most of the fathers imagined that his body continually trembled to that degree, that he could not get his victuals to his mouth (10). The Septuagint version favours this opinion; for instead of a fugitive and a vagabond, they have translated σένον & τρίμων, lamenting and trembling; and the Hebrew words do indeed import a restlessness and uneasiness of mind, with which Cain is supposed to have been afflicted all his life (11). Some say that wherever he stopped, the earth shook and trembled around him (12). Others pretend that God inspired him with extraordinary courage, and rendered him void of all fear. And another notion, as well founded as any of the former, is, that Cain had a horn grew on his forehead, to warn folks to avoid him (13.)

(1) Vid. SHUCKFORD, p. 8.

(2) Veteres

Hebraei apud Gesehrard.

(3) SOLOM. YARHI.

Vid. SALDEN. Otia Theol. p. 345.

(4) In Tan-

clumæ, fol. 4.

(5) SALDEN. ubi sup.

(6) Ibid.

(7) CORN. & LAPIDE in Genes. iv.

(8) SALDEN.

ubi sup.

(9) Vid. SALIAN. annal. tom. 1. p. 191.

(10) PROCOPIUS in Genes. iv. Vid. etiam

HIERONYM. Epist. cxiv. ad Damas.

(11) Vid. EUTYCH. p. 16.

(12) Apud SALDEN. ubi sup.

(13) Apud SALIAN. ubi sup. Vid. BAYLE Dict.

Hist. Art. Cain, Rem. B. & HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. 1. p. 129.

Year of the World, 129.
Year before Christ, 4177.

He goes into banishment, and builds a city.

Grotius more quick.

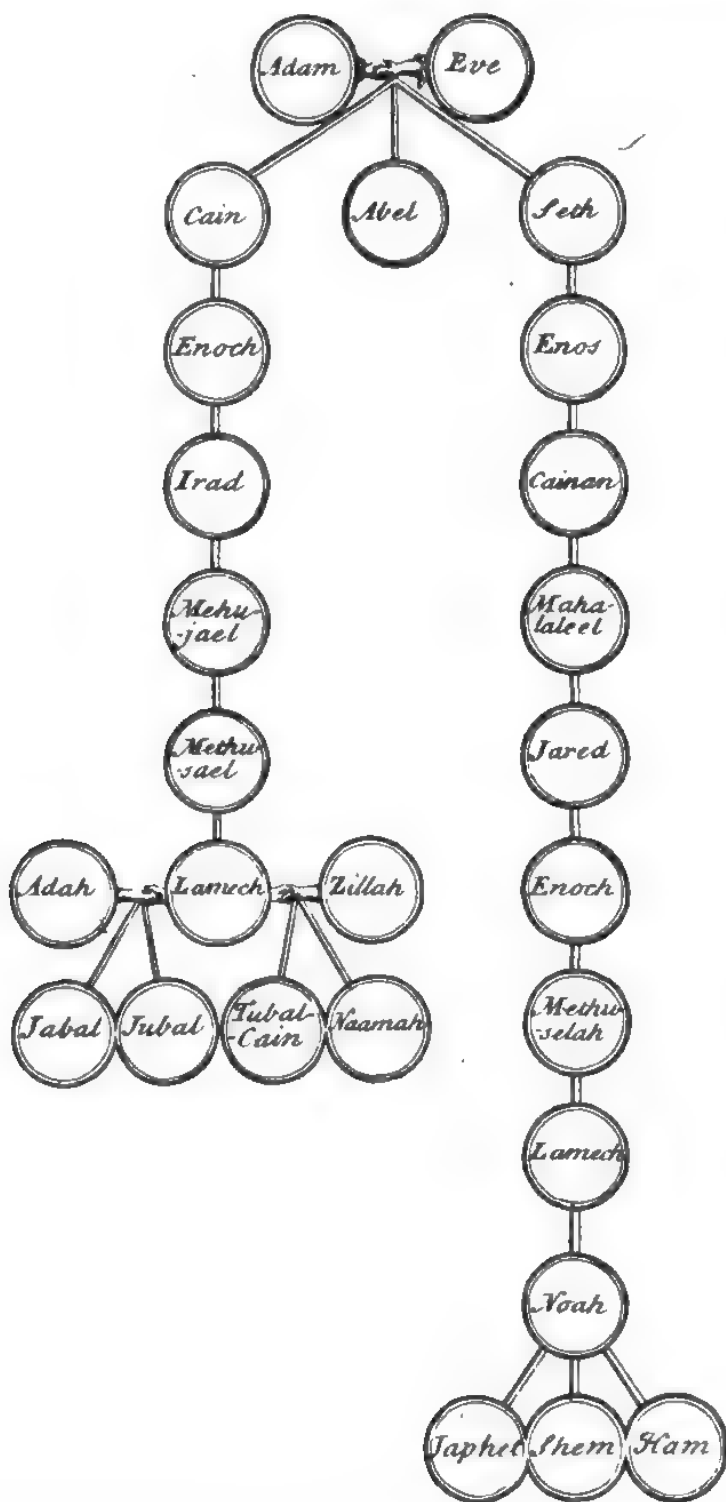

Year of the World, 130.
Year before Christ, 4176.

Seth born.

Year of the World, 130.
Year before
Christ, 4176.

The genealogy of the antediluvians.

As the whole progeny of Adam, of whom we have any mention in Scripture, were the descendants of Cain and Seth, it may be proper to give the following genealogical table of the antediluvians.

Of the line of Cain.

THE sacred historian confining himself chiefly to the line of Seth, from whence Noah was descended, has acquainted us with very few particulars relating to that of Cain; nor can we thence form any conjectures how long he * or any of his descendants lived.

* There is an oriental tradition, which was believed by several christians in St. Jerom's time (1), that Cain was accidentally killed by Lamech, one of his own posterity: for they say, that Cain being old and dim-lighted, and in continual terror on account of the murder he had committed, used to wander up and down in the woods, and one day sat down in a thicket to rest himself; and that Lamech, who was also blind, being a hunting, attended by a youth (whom some will have to be his son Tubal-cain) either himself heard a rustling, or was informed by the lad that there was something in the bushes, which he took to be a wild beast, and thereupon letting fly an arrow, he struck Cain (for it proved to be him) to the heart; when he came to know what he had done, he in a rage fell upon his conductor, and killed him also (2). Others relate

(1) Vid. HIERONYM. in Epist. ad Damas.

(2) R. GEDALIAH in Shal'sheleth hakkab. p. 92. Vid. EUTYCH. p. 22.

■ All that we have recorded is, that Lamech, the fifth in descent from him, married two wives, Adah and Zillah<sup>a</sup>, which is observed to be the first known instance of polygamy; that by the former he had two sons, Jabal, who was the first that dwelt in tents, and fed cattle<sup>b</sup>; and Jubal, the inventor of musick: and by the other, a son named Tubal-Cain, who found out the art of forging and working of metals<sup>c</sup>; and a daughter named Naamah<sup>d</sup>, supposed by some<sup>e</sup> to have invented spinning and weaving<sup>f</sup>. And that on some occasion or other, Lamech made a speech to his wives<sup>g</sup>, the explication of which has greatly puzzled the interpreters<sup>h</sup>.

Year of the World, 130.
Year before Christ, 4176.

HOWEVER, we are assured by other historians<sup>i</sup>, and it is highly probable, that the posterity of Cain were enormously wicked, exceeding their father, if possible, in all manner of villanies; every succeeding generation growing worse than the former, and becoming wholly addicted to rapine and brutish lusts. This reprobate race is generally supposed to be meant by Moses under the designation of men, and the daughters of men, as the other family of Seth is by that of the sons of God<sup>j</sup>.

SETH had this year a son named Enos; about which time it is thought that his descendants, who were as eminent for piety and virtue, as those of Cain were for the reverse, had the appellation we have just mentioned given them. For it is conceived that those words<sup>k</sup>, which in our translation are rendered then began men to call upon the name of the LORD, properly signify, then men began to be called by, or after the name

Year of the World, 135.
Year before Christ, 4071.
Enos born.

<sup>a</sup> Genes. iv. 19. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 20, 21, 22. <sup>c</sup> R. LIPOMAN. in catena, & GENEBRARD in Chron. Vid. VOSSII de Idolol. l. i. c. 17. <sup>d</sup> Genes. iv. 23, 24. <sup>e</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. i. c. 2. EUTYCH. p. 25. EBN AL ANID, &c. <sup>f</sup> Vid. HEIDEGG. ubi supra, p. 136. <sup>g</sup> Genes. iv. 26.

late the latter circumstances differently, and say that he killed Cain with a stone which he flung at him, and the youth, ignorantly, as he clapped his hands in sorrow for what he had done (1). And this they say was the occasion of those words of Lamech to his wives, mentioned in a following note. This accident some place in the seven hundred and thirtieth year of Cain's age (2); others in the years of the world seven hundred and one, or eight hundred seventy five (3). According to Tosiatius, Cain lived near eight hundred years (4). There are some who fix his death in the year of the world nine hundred and thirty one, and pretend that he was knocked on the head by the fall of a house (5). Paul de Burgos makes him perish in the deluge (6); and there are others who say he killed himself (7).

<sup>a</sup> This seems to be understood, as R. Solomon Yarchi explains the passage, of feeding cattle in the desert, and removing with their tents and herds from place to place, as they found pasture, which is the way of life of the Arabs, thence called Strenita: for others, and in particular Abel, followed a pastoral life before Jabal (8).

<sup>b</sup> Josephus (9) commends Tubal-Cain (whom he calls Tubal) for his great strength and skill in war; to the perfecting of which art he probably contributed by the invention of arms.

<sup>c</sup> Some imagine Naamah to have been the wife of Noah (10); others of Ham (11); and that she being saved from the destruction of the deluge, was therefore mentioned by Moses. Her name signifies delightful, or beautiful; and her person is said to have been so charming, that Aza and Azael, two angels, fell in love with her, and begat on her demons called Gedim (12).

Many authors, from some affinity in the names and inventions of these children of Lamech, have thought Jubal to have been the Apollo, Tubal-Cain the Vulcan, and Naamah the Venus or Minerva of the heathens. And not to omit Jabal, it has been imagined he was their Pales (13). But these are at best suppositions only, and very precarious ones too, as will be shown in a more proper place.

Josephus makes the whole number of Lamech's issue by his two wives, to be seventy-seven (14).

<sup>g</sup> His words, according to our translation, are; Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech: for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt. If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold. Almost to the same purpose are the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Syriac versions; and they are commonly explained by the above-mentioned tradition of Lamech's unfortunately killing Cain, and the youth that attended him; which being an undesigned act, he had reason to think he deserved a much less punishment than Cain (15).

Others take these words to be a thraconical menace of Lamech, (whom they suppose to be a vindictive impious person) spoken on occasion of some quarrel he had with his wives; and that the sense is, I will or would kill a man if he wounded me, and a young man if he hurt me, &c. (16).

The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel, and the Arabic translation, read the passage interrogatively or negatively, Have I slain a man? that is, I have not slain a man, that I should bear the guilt, or be punished for it; nor have I killed a young man, that my seed should be destroyed for it. And it is thought Lamech spoke them on occasion of some terror or apprehension his family was in, lest Abel's murder should be revenged on them; which fear he shews to be groundless, because he had done nothing to deserve any ill treatment (17). This interpretation seems the most reasonable, but cannot be depended on; the speech being introduced by Moses very abruptly, and without any connection with what precedes or follows it.

(1) ELMACIN. or rather EBN AL ANID, p. 7. (2) EUTYCH. ubi sup. (3) Apud SALIAN. annal. l. i. p. 214. (4) Apud eund. ibid. (5) ST. RICHARD. Nitroge Chronol. citing CEDRENIUS, SYNCHELL. p. 11. (6) Apud PERERUM in Genes. iv. ver. 23, 24. (7) ARMENI apud Guidon. Carmelitum citante Prateolo, in elench. heret. p. 63. (8) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. patr. l. i. p. 141. (9) Antiq. l. i. c. 2. (10) BERECHIT RABBA. R. SOL.

YARHI. (11) CUMBERLAND'S Rem. on SANCHONIATHO, p. 107. (12) In libro ZOHAR. (13) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. l. i. p. 141, & seq. (14) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. i. c. 2. (15) Vid. PERER. in locum. (16) Vid. HEIDEGG. ubi sup. p. 140. BAYLE Diss. Hist. Art. Lamech, Rem. D. E. (17) See SHUCKFORD'S Connection, vol. I. p. 10, &c.

Year of the
World, 235.
Year before
Christ, 4071.

of the Lord, that is, the sons of God<sup>a</sup>. But some take the words, according to the former version, to mean that then the public worship of God was first set up, and proper ceremonies and stated times appointed for that service<sup>1</sup>: And others, particularly the Jews, suppose they intimate, that idolatry, or the deifying of men, had its rise about this time, either adhering to the latter version, or translating the passage thus; Then men profaned in calling upon the name of the Lord<sup>2</sup>.

Of the three next descendants of Seth, Cainan, Mahalaleel and Jared, and of Methuselah and Lamech, the grandfather and father of Noah, Moses has recorded no more than their several ages. The oriental authors commend them, as they do Seth and Enos, for their piety, and the salutary injunctions they left behind them, forbidding their children all intercourse with the race of cursed Cain<sup>3</sup>.

ENOCH the son of Jared, and father of Methuselah, was a person of most extraordinary piety, walking with God, as the Scripture expresses it, for at least the last three hundred years of his life: as a reward for which exemplary behaviour in so corrupt an age, he was taken up by God into heaven, without tasting death<sup>4</sup>.

Year of the
World, 887.
Year before
Christ, 3419.

Enoch translated.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. I. p. 148. SHUCKFORD'S Connect. vol. I. p. 41.

<sup>1</sup> PERER.

DRUSIUS, MERCERUS, &c. Vid. SIMSON Chron. col. 56.

<sup>2</sup> Vid. SELDEN de diis Syris proleg. c. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Vid. EUTYCH. p. 20, &c. ELMACIN.

<sup>4</sup> Genes. v. 22 & 24.

* The interpretation of Onelos is, Then men left off calling upon the name of the Lord; as if the worship of God began then to be neglected.

Some of the Jews (particularly Simonides) have gone so far as to charge Enos himself with being the author of idolatry, and inventing images, by whose mediation men might address themselves to God (1).

But the introduction of the idolatrous worship of the heavenly bodies and angels, is by the Sabians, the professors of it, referred to Seth himself. They give him also a son called Sabi, from whom the sect seems to have taken its name, unless it be rather derived from נִסְיָ Saha, or the host of heaven, the objects of their worship: of this sect we shall take occasion to speak more particularly hereafter, observing only in this place, that they call the book which contains the fundamentals of their religion and morality, the book of Seth, and reckon the patriarch Enoch also among the propagators of Sabiism (2).

† Moses expresses it thus; And Enoch walked with God, and he was not: for God took him. Which passage the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews paraphrases in this manner; By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God (3). By which words it seems plain, that Enoch did not die, but suffered only such a change as was necessary to fit him for the place whither he was going (4). Yet several of the Jews believe he actually died (5).

The Jewish commentators suppose Enoch was carried into the terrestrial paradise (6). Of the same opinion were some of the christian fathers (7). And it has been imagined that both he and Elias will return from thence, at the coming of Antichrist, with whom they are to wage war (8). But these notions are justly rejected by the most judicious interpreters. The vulgate translation of an apocryphal book says, indeed, that Enoch was translated into paradise. Henoch placuit Deo, & translatus fuit in paradisum, ut det gentibus poenitentiam (9); but it has been observed, that the Greek says only that he was translated, without making any mention of paradise.

The Koran mentions the assumption of Enoch (10), who is there called إدريس Edris, which name is derived from עִדְרִישׁ, in Hebrew, to enquire into, and in Arabic, to read, or study with attention; and was given him for his supposed eminent learning and great knowledge. The Mohammedan commentators say, that Edris is now alive in one of the seven heavens, being carried thither after he had tasted death, but that God restored him to life (11).

The learning of Enoch, and particularly his skill in the mathematical sciences, has been celebrated by Jews, Christians and Mohammedans.

The Jews say he first invented letters, and became acquainted with the signs of heaven (12). They call him Metatron (13), (though some take this to be a name of the angel Gabriel) (14) which the Targum of Jonathan seems to interpret by the following words, the great scribe: but Buxtorf (15) is rather inclined to think it signifies the ambassador, or messenger of God, and is the same with the Latin word Metator (16).

The Greek christians supposed Enoch to be the same with the first Egyptian Hermes, who dwelt at Sais; that he first discoursed of superior substances, and foretold the deluge; and that he built the pyramids, engraving thereon the figures of artificial instruments, and the elements of the sciences, fearing lest the memory of them should perish in that general destruction (17). Eusebius (18) also attributes the invention of astronomy to Enoch, and says he was the same with Atlas, to whom the Greeks ascribe the same thing. Origen (19) mentions a book attributed to Enoch, different from his prophecy, containing secrets concerning the names of the parts of heaven, and of all the stars and constellations, which is said to be extant among the Ethiopians in their tongue (20). The learned Mr. du Peirese used his utmost endeavours to get it from thence, but to no purpose (21).

The

(1) Vid. HOTTINGER. Smegma Orient. p. 230. HEIDEGG. ubi sup. p. 148.

(2) Vid. POCCOCK.

Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 138.

(3) Heb. xi. 5.

(4) Vid. 1 Corinth. xv. 50.

(5) ABEN EZRA.

HISCUNI, &c. apud HEIDEGG. ubi sup. p. 169.

(6) KIMHI in lib. 2. Reg. ii. 1.

(7) IRENAEUS,

PROFOP. GAZAUS, JUSTIN. MARTYR. apud HEIDEGG. p. 171.

Sed also ABULFARAG. p. 7.

(8) HEIDEGG. ibid. (9) Ecclus. xlv. 16. (10) AL

KORAN, cap. xii. ver. 54, 55. (11) JALLAL'OD-

DIN, &c. (12) Vid. HOTTING. Smegma Orient.

p. 239. (13) JUCHARIN, p. 5. ZOHAR ex Midrasb Ruth. fol. 81. (14) Vid. HYDE de Rel. vet.

Persar. p. 263. (15) In Lexico Talmud. (16) Vid.

HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. i. p. 167. (17) ABUL-

FARAG. p. 9. (18) Apud Euseb. de prep.

Ev. l. 9. c. 17. (19) Hamid. 28. in lib. Numer.

& in Anaceph. l. de principe. (20) GENE-

BEARD. Chronol. p. 14. (21) D'HERBEL. Bibl.

THAT

■ THAT Enoch was a prophet, and that some prophecy of his was preserved either in writing, or (as is most probable) by tradition, even to our SAVIOUR'S time, appears from the passage quoted thence by St. Jude<sup>n</sup>. However the piece under the title of the scripture or prophecy of Enoch, of which we have some fragments extant*, is allowed to be a manifest forgery; though several of the fathers had a better opinion of it than it deserves<sup>o</sup>. Many passages are quoted thence in that very ancient writing, the Testament of the twelve patriarchs, and it is also cited by Clemens Alexandrinus<sup>p</sup>. St. Austin makes mention of the scripture of Enoch, but denies it to be genuine<sup>q</sup>. And when Celsus objected its authority to Origin, he replied that the books attributed to Enoch were not looked upon by the church as divine writings<sup>r</sup>. That there was a book, under the name of Enoch, in the hands of the Jews, appears from its being referred to in their ancient book Zohar<sup>s</sup>.

Year of the World, 887.
Year before Christ, 3419.

ADAM having seen a numerous posterity issued from his own loins †, after a life of nine hundred and thirty years ‡, paid that natural debt to which he had by his disobedience subjected himself and them<sup>t</sup>. That he repented of his sin, and made his peace with GOD, is very reasonable to believe<sup>**</sup>, notwithstanding the uncharitable opinions of some to the contrary ††.

Year of the World, 930.
Year before Christ, 3376.
Adam dies.

WHERE he was buried cannot be collected from Scripture. St. Jerom<sup>u</sup> seems to approve of the opinion of those who imagine he was buried at Hebron ‡‡, in the cave Conjectures concerning the place of his burial.

<sup>n</sup> Jude, ver. 14, 15. <sup>o</sup> TERTULLIAN de habitu mulier. IRENÆUS, CYPRIAN, LACTANTIUS, &c. <sup>p</sup> In Eclogis ex prophet. p. 801, 808. <sup>q</sup> De civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 23. & l. 18. c. 38. <sup>r</sup> ORIGEN. contra Cels. l. 5. <sup>s</sup> Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. 1. p. 176. <sup>t</sup> Genes. v. 5. <sup>u</sup> HIERON. in Matth. xxvii.

The Mohammedan authors say, that Edris received thirty books of revelations from GOD, wherein the secrets of the most occult sciences were written; and that he found out the use of the pen, the needle, (for they pretend he was a taylor, and the first of the trade) arithmetic, and astronomy. They also tell us he was the first who took up arms for religion, or the cause of GOD; for being sent to preach to, and reclaim the posterity of Cain, who refused to give ear to him, he thereupon made war upon them, carrying their wives and children into slavery. The same authors say, that Enoch was the innocent cause of idolatry; for one of his friends mistaking him after his assumption, at the suggestion of the devil, made a statue of him, to which he paid peculiar honours, which in time degenerated into a superstitious adoration (1).

Father Bartolocci has endeavoured to shew from the testimony of the more ancient Jews, that Enoch, surnamed Edris, was a different person from the antediluvian Enoch, and that he lived many ages after him (2).

* These fragments were first published by Joseph Scaliger in his notes on the Greek Chronicon of Eusebius (3); and afterwards more correctly by J. Goar, in his edition of the Chronography of George Syncellus (4). We shall give the reader the substance of them by and by.

† Besides Adam's three sons named by Moses, and the supposed twin-sisters of Cain and Abel (5), we are told he had two daughters, one named Azuam, or Same, who married Cain, and the other Azava, who was the wife of Seth (6).

‡ The oriental authors are so exact as to fix the very day and hour of the death of Adam, and also of several of the other patriarchs (7). But we presume our omitting those niceties will not be judged a fault.

** The Jews say both Adam and Eve were very penitent (8), and that he in particular was so exceedingly afflicted for his sin, that he had died of grief, had not GOD sent the angel Raziel to comfort him (9). They even acknowledge him to have been favoured with the gift of prophecy, and that he foretold the flood (10). The Mohammedans also do not only reckon him among the prophets, but make him one of the six (the others being Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed) who introduced a new dispensation; and say that GOD gave him ten books of revelations, containing laws, promises, threatenings, and prophecies (11); which notion perhaps they borrowed of the Jewish authors, who pretend that Adam wrote the book intitled Sepher Jesira, or the book of the creation (which others attribute to Abraham) and certain treatises of the duty (12). Some Rabbins make him to have been the author of the ninety second Psalms: and in some manuscripts the Chaldee title of that Psalms imports it to be the hymn which the first man sang on the Sabbath-day (13). Eusebius Nieremberg (14) has been credulous enough to give us two hymns, faithfully copied from the revelation of Amadeus in the library of the Escurial, as the genuine compositions of Adam; one being that which he repeated on his first interview with Eve, and the other the penitential Psalms sung by them after the fall.

† A certain heretical sect, named Tatianites, affirmed he was damned (15).

‡ This is offered to be proved by this passage of scripture, according to the vulgate translation, Nomen Hebron ante vocabatur Cariath-arbe: Adam maximus ibi inter Enacim situs est (16). But the name Adam is unwarrantably inserted in the text, the Hebrew plainly signifying (as the other versions render it) that Hebron was formerly called Kerjath Arba, or the city of Arba, who had been a great man among the Anakims. There is however another origin of that ancient name of Hebron given by

(1) Vid. RELAND. de Reliq. Moham. p. 22. D'HERBELOT ubi sup. ABULFARAG. p. 10. (2) Bibl. Rabbin. t. 2. p. 845. (3) P. 404, &c. (4) P. 11, &c. and p. 14, &c. (5) See before, p. 73. in the notes. (6) SYNCHELLUS ex parva Genes. p. 11. & SETHIANI Hæretici, apud Epiphani. l. 1. p. 287. (7) Vid. EUTYCH. p. 19, &c. ELMACIN. p. 6, &c. (8) Vid. R. ESCHERZ Pirke, c. 20. R. GUNDAL, p. 92.

(9) Lib. JESIRA. Vid. REUCHLIN. de arte cabalistica, p. 8. (10) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 2. (11) Vid. HOTTING. Hist. Orient. p. 15. RELAND de rel. Moham. p. 21. (12) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. 1. p. 314. (13) GASP. SCHOTTUS Techn. curiosa, p. 556. (14) Apud SCHOTTUM ibid. (15) Vid. EPIPHAN. Hæres. 46. EUSEB. Hist. Eccl. l. 4. p. 27. (16) Job. xiv. 15.

Year of the
World, 930.
Year before
Christ, 3376.

of Macpelah, or the double cave, which Abraham, many ages after, bought for a burying-place for himself and family*. The oriental Christians say, that when Adam saw death approaching, he called Seth, Enos, Canaan, and Mahalaleel to him, and ordered them to embalm his body with myrrh, frankincense, and cassia, and deposite it in a certain cave on the top of a mountain, which he had chosen for the repository of his remains, thence named the cave of al Konuz**. The primitive fathers generally believe that he died in the place where Jerusalem was afterwards built, and that he was interred on mount Calvary†, in the very spot whereon CHRIST was crucified‡; which opinion opened a large field for rhetorical flourishes and allusions*. The Mohammedans will have Adam's sepulchre to have been on the mountain Abu-kabis, near Mecca; and the antient Persians in Serendib or Ceylon, where it was for some time, as they pretend, guarded by lions*.

THE time of the death of Eve, the mother of all living‡, is not intimated in Scripture; but there are some who venture to tell us, that she out-lived her husband ten years<sup>b</sup>.

AFTER the death of Adam, the eastern writers say, that Seth with his family separated themselves from the profligate race of Cain, and removed to the mountain where Adam was buried, which they chose for their habitation; Cain and his family remaining below in the valley where Abel was slain<sup>c</sup>. But how this near neighbourhood is consistent with Scripture, which plainly intimates Cain's banishment into a country at some considerable distance from the residence of Adam and his posterity by Seth, we cannot conceive: unless it should be supposed, that Cain, or his descendants, left their own settlements to dispossess Seth and his offspring; or else that the posterity of both were by this time so greatly encreased, that after gradually extending their borders on both sides, they at length met, and straitened each other. However this be, the eastern tradition is, that the progeny of Seth lived in the said mountain in great sanctity and purity of manners**. Their constant employment was praising God, from which they had few or no avocations; for their only food was the fruits of the trees which grew on the mountains, so that they had no occasion to undergo any servile * Genes. xxiii. 3, &c.

tom. i. p. 225.
Orient. p. 56.

* EUTYCH. Annal. p. 19. ELMACIN. p. 6.
* See BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Adam, Rem. L.
* Apud SALIAN. t. i. p. 231.

† Vid. SALIANI Annal.
* Vid. D'HERBELOT. Eibl.
* EUTYCH. p. 19.

by some writers, who taking the word Arba, which also signifies four, in that sense, and not for a proper name, say that city was so called, because four couple were there buried, viz. Adam and Eve, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, and Jacob and Leah (1).

* From the Arabic كانازا kanaza, to lay up privately, as treasure, &c. Some Jews say, that this precaution was ordered by Adam to be taken, lest his posterity should make his relics an object of idolatry (2).

The eastern Christians add, that he farther directed his family, that when they were obliged to leave the neighbourhood of paradise, they should take his body with them, and place it in the midst of the earth, because thence should come his salvation, and that of all his posterity (3). Which order, it is said, was repeated by Lamech to his son Noah, with this addition, that he should take with the body, gold, frankincense and myrrh, as offerings, and appoint one of his sons to attend the corps to, and at the new sepulchre, who was to be a religious person, and unmarried; was to shed no blood, nor offer any sacrifices but bread and wine only; was to be clothed in skins, and should neither cut his hair, nor pare his nails, and was to be called the priest of God; meaning thereby Melchizedek (4). And this Noah and Melchizedek are said to have performed.

† This opinion may be reconciled with the preceding, if we suppose the body was removed to Golgotha after the flood, in pursuance of the above-mentioned orders. Jacobus Edessenus says (5) that

Noah carried the bones of Adam with him into the ark, and when he came out of it he divided them among his sons, giving the skull to Seth, who coming into Judea, repositied it in the sepulchre of Adam on mount Calvary.

A commentator has an odd story, which is absurdly enough fathered on some Jews; that Seth, at the command of an angel, put into Adam's mouth, when he was interred, a seed of the tree of knowledge, which afterwards grew to be a tree, and that CHRIST's cross was made of it (6).

To accompany this story, we shall add two more of the same stamp, though not so properly belonging to this place. One is, that Eve broke a branch from the tree of knowledge, of which she made a cudgel, and by that cogent argument prevailed on her husband to eat of the forbidden fruit (7). The other, that Seth planted a branch of the tree of life, which had been either brought to Adam by an angel, or begged by Seth at the gate of paradise; and that the same becoming a tree, Moses afterwards from that tree took his rod with which he performed so many miracles, the bough with which he made sweet the bitter waters of Marah, and the pole whereon he fixed the brazen serpent (8).

‡ From whence she had her name, which is properly written Hawewah, and derived from the root חיה Haya, to live (9).

** Our authors, if we may credit them, tell us, that paradise was so little higher than the mountain, that the children of Seth could hear the voices of the angels celebrating the praises of God, and even join with them in that service (10).

(1) R. ELIEZER Pirke, c. 20. F.d. HEIDEGG. ubi sup. p. 106. (2) R. ELIEZER ubi sup. JUCHASIN, p. 5. (3) EUTYCH. p. 19. (4) Idem, p. 32. (5) Apud BARCEPHAN de Parad. part. 1. c. 14.

(6) CORN. & LAPIDE in Genes. ii. 9. citing PINEDO. (7) Apud SALDEN. Otia Theol. p. 607. (8) Vid. eund. p. 608. & MOEBIUM de arce serpente. (9) Genes. iii. 20. (10) ELMACIN. p. 6. EUTYCH. p. 20. labours, a labours, nor the trouble of sowing or getting in harvest; they were utter strangers to envy, injustice, or deceit. Their only oath was by the blood of Abel; and they every day went up to the top of the mountain to worship God, and to visit the body of Adam, as a means of procuring the divine blessing <sup>a</sup>.

Year of the World, 930. Year before Christ, 3376.

HOWEVER, what time they had to spare in these happy circumstances, they seem to have employed in cultivating their minds, and in sublime speculations; while the children of Cain, seeking no farther than present convenience and pleasure, were taken up with improving agriculture, and inventing mechanical arts and musical instruments. For it is said that the offspring of Seth, by contemplation of the heavenly bodies, laid the foundations of the science of astronomy; and lest their inventions should be forgotten or lost before they were publickly known, understanding from a prediction of Adam's that there would be a general destruction of all things, once by the rage of fire, and once by the violence and multitude of waters, they made two pillars, one of brick, and the other of stone, and engraved their inventions on each of them, that if the pillar of brick happened to be overthrown by the flood, that of stone might remain; which, Josephus <sup>a</sup> tell us, was to be seen in his time in the land of Syriad <sup>b</sup>.

How long the descendants of Seth continued thus religious, and imitators of their father's virtue, is uncertain. Moses says, That when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, the sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose <sup>c</sup>. By which it appears, that the beginning of their corruption was their marrying into the wicked family of Cain, by which means their manners were soon debauched, and at length degenerated so far, that the wickedness of man was very great in the earth, and every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually <sup>a</sup>. Josephus writes, that the family of Seth persevered in the true worship of God, and in the pursuit of virtue for seven generations; after which, in process of time, they neglected both, shewing twice as much eagerness after wickedness, as they had formerly shewn zeal for virtue: by which means they drew down on themselves the indignation of God <sup>b</sup>.

The defection of the sons of Seth.

THE oriental writers place the beginning of this defection somewhat sooner, in the days of Jared <sup>c</sup>, and in his fortieth year <sup>d</sup>; when they say one hundred of the sons of Seth, hearing the noise of the music, and riotous mirth of the Cainites, agreed to go down to them from the holy mountain. And on their arrival among them, were so captivated with the beauty of the women, who were naked, that they immediately defiled themselves with them <sup>e</sup>. And so these sons of Seth perished by whoring with the daughters of Cain; for when they offered to return again to their former abode, the stones of the mountain (it is said) became like fire, and permitted them to pass no farther <sup>f</sup>. The lubricity of the Cainites is described in very strong terms. The men neighed after the women like horses, and the women in the same manner after the men, com-

<sup>a</sup> EUTYCH. p. 20. ELMACIN. p. 6. <sup>b</sup> JOSEPH. ANT. l. 1. c. 2. <sup>c</sup> Genes. vi. 1, 2. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 5. <sup>e</sup> JOSEPH. ANT. l. 1. c. 3. <sup>f</sup> ELMACIN. p. 9. EUTYCH. p. 27. <sup>g</sup> ABULFARAG. p. 8. Vid. etiam EPIPHAN. Hæres. l. 1. <sup>h</sup> Idem, ibid. <sup>i</sup> EUTYCH. p. 27.

<sup>a</sup> Where this land of Syriad was, is a great dispute. The name is variously written in the manuscripts, Συρία <sup>1</sup> Συριάδα, and Συειάδα; by others Συειάδα (1), and by Enstatius Συειάδα, which last seems the more correct. Some place it in Syria; others (2) with a little more probability, have taken it to be the same with Seirath mentioned in scripture (3), and suppose the Συειάδα pefilim, which the English translation renders the quarries, near Gilgal, in the tribe of Ephraim, were the ruins of Seth's stone pillar. Yet others (4) understand those pefilim, or τὰ γλυφτά, the sculptures, as the Septuagint translate the word, to have been certain idols, lately set up there by Eglon.

But the more certain opinion (5) is, that the Syriadic land was in Egypt; for we are told that Mambræ extracted his history from certain pillars there, whereon inscriptions had been made by Noah, or the first Mercury, in the sacred letters and dialect; but were, after the flood, translated from the sacred dialect into the Greek tongue, but written in the sacred letters, and laid up in books by the second Mercury in the sacred recesses of the Egyptian temples (6). These pillars were in subterraneous caverns near Thebes, and beyond the Nile, not far from the founding statue of Memnon, in a place called Syringes (7), which are described to be certain winding apartments under ground, and which (as it is said) those who were skilled in ancient rites, foreseeing the coming of the deluge, and fearing lest the memory of their ceremonies should be obliterated, built and contrived in vaults dug with vast labour in several places; cutting on the walls many sorts of birds and beasts, and innumerable kinds of animals, which they called hieroglyphic letters (8). And that Seth was not a name unknown to the Egyptians, appears from Plutarch, who tells us, that they constantly called Typhon, which was a Greek name, Seth (9); and hence it is probable Josephus was led into the mistake of ascribing these pillars to the son of Adam.

(1) MALELA, GLYCAS, CEDRENIUS, & Vetus Interpr. (2) VOSSIIUS de LXX Interpr. p. 271. & de stat. mundi, c. 10. MARSHAM Canon. Chron. p. 39. (3) Judg. iii. 19, 26. (4) CHYTRÆUS, &c. (5) Vid. DODWELL.

Differt. de Sanchun. p. 26, 36. FABRIC. Biblioth. Gr. l. 1. c. 11. STILLINGFLEET Orig. Sacr. l. 1. c. 2. & alius. (6) SYNCHELL. p. 40. (7) PAUSAN. l. 1. p. 78. (8) AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. 22. p. 232. (9) FLUT. de Isid. & Offr. p. 351, & 357.

Year of the
World, 930.
Year before
Christ, 3376.

The opinion of those who suppose angels defiled themselves with women.

mitting whoredom and all manner of filthiness promiscuously with one another in public; the old women being, if possible, more brutish and lewd than the young. The fathers lay with their daughters, and the young men with their mothers, so that the children could not distinguish their parents, nor the parents their children.

THE appellation of the sons of GOD, given by Moses to the children of Seth, led Josephus<sup>a</sup>, Philo Judæus<sup>b</sup>, and several of the fathers<sup>c</sup>, into a strange interpretation of this passage, as if the angels, who are also called in scripture the sons of GOD<sup>d</sup>, were thereby asserted to have had to do with women, and to have begotten on them the insolent and impious race we shall mention immediately*. This supposition we think

<sup>a</sup> Jos. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> PHILO JUD. de gigant. p. 184. <sup>c</sup> JUSTIN M. TERTULLIAN, ATHENAG.
CLEMENS ALEXANDR. EUSEB. LACTANTIUS, AMBROSIVS, &c alii apud Sixtum Senenf. Bibl. S. L. 5.
annot. 77. SULP. SEVER. Hist. SACR. l. 1. p. 8. <sup>d</sup> Job i. 6. ii. 1. xxxviii. 7.

* This opinion seems to have been originally occasioned by some copies of the Septuagint, which, in the days of St. Austin, had in this place the angels of God (1). Lactantius supposes the angels who were guilty of this enormity, had been sent down by God to guard and take care of mankind, and being endued with free-will, were charged by him not to forfeit the dignity of their celestial nature, by defiling themselves with the corruptions of the earth; but that the devil at length enticed them to debauch themselves with women. He adds, that being not admitted into heaven, by reason of the wickedness into which they had plunged themselves, they fell down to the earth, and became the devil's mindlers;
but that those who were begotten by them, being neither angles nor men, but of a middle nature, were not received into hell, no more than their parents were into heaven. Hence arose two kinds of demons, celestial and terrestrial. These are unclean spirits, the authors of whatever evils are committed, and whose prince is the devil (2). From hence very probably proceeded the notions of In-cubi, or demons, who are supposed to have carnal knowledge of women (3).

But the fancy of angels defiling themselves with women, has been greatly propagated by that forgery we have mentioned above, entitled the prophecy of Enoch. The fragments we have still extant of which give a more particular history of these imaginary transactions; wherefore we shall here insert an extract of those fragments, though some particulars might perhaps be more properly reserved for another place.

When men were greatly increased, they had daughters of such excellent beauty, that the Egregori, or watching angels (4), fell in love with them, and proposed to one another, that they should go down and chuse themselves wives of the daughters of men:
to which Semiasas, their prince, replying, that he was apprehensive they would not go through with the affair, but leave him to bear the guilt alone, they all swore, and bound themselves under imprecations, that they would not recede from their resolution.
The number of these Egregori was two hundred, who, in the days of Jared, descended on the top of mount Hermion, which was so called from the oath they had taken. Their princes were twenty, whose names (if the readers have any curiosity to know them) follow:

Semiasas , their chief,	Zaniel ,	Samiel ,
Ananias ,	Bakiel ,	Sarinas ,
Aniel ,	Azazel ,	Eumiel ,
Chobabiel ,	Pharmarus ,	Tyriel ,
Orammiane ,	Amarel ,	Jumiel ,
Raniel ,	Anagemas ,	Sariel .
Sampsich ,	Thausiel ,

These, and the rest of them, in the year of the world one thousand one hundred and seventy, took themselves wives, and began to commit lewdness with them, which they continued to do until the flood; and the women bore to them three generations. The first generation were the giants, the giants begat the Nephilim, and the Nephilim those named Eliud, and they were multiplied according to their stature, and taught themselves and their wives magic and enchantments. The tenth of their princes, named Azazel, taught them to make swords, breast-plates, and instruments of war; as also the working of metals, particularly gold and silver, and fashioning various ornaments for the women: he also instructed them in the preparing of cosmetics, the polishing of precious stones, and the art of dying. These things the sons of men provided for themselves and their daughters, and they transgressed; and also seduced those that were virtuous among them, and wickedness prevailed greatly in the earth. Semiasas, the chief of these angels, taught the force of poisonous roots and herbs; Pharmarus the eleventh, charms and incantations; the ninth astrology; the fourth astrology; the eighth aerology; the third the signs of the earth; the seventh those of the sun; the twentieth those of the moon; and in like manner each of them revealed certain secrets to their wives and children. Afterward the giants began to devour human flesh: by which means the number of men daily decreasing, those that remained cried to heaven against their cruelty, and besought God to remember them. Thus the four arch-angels hearing, looked down upon the earth, and beholding a great deal of blood shed thereon, and that all manner of impiety and disorder was committed, made their report thereof to GOD, and at his command bound the princes of those transgressors, and threw them into the abyss, there to be kept to the day of judgment (5). Uriel in particular was sent to Noah, the son of Lamech, to acquaint him that the whole earth was to be destroyed by a deluge, and instruct him by what means to escape it.

Raphael was ordered to bind Azazel [Azazel] hand and foot, and to throw him into darkness, in the desert of Dudael, and to lay him upon sharp stones, and cover him with darkness, that he might dwell therein for ever, being destined to the punishment of fire on the day of judgment. The words which follow directing him to heal the earth of the wounds caused therein by the secrets revealed by the Egregori, are something dark, and deserve not the trouble of an explication. Gabriel's charge was to destroy the giants, the sons of the Egregori, by exciting them to mutual and intestine wars, that they might fall by each others hands; and Michael was commanded to bind Semiasas, and the rest of his companions, and to lead them, after they had seen the slaughter of their beloved sons, to the utmost parts of the earth, where they were

(1) AUGUST. de civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 23. (2) LAC-TANTIUS de orig. err. l. 2. c. 15. (3) Vid.
AUGUST. ubi sup. cap. 65. (4) See p. 48.

before, in the notes. (5) Ex primo libro ENOCH:
apud Syncellum, p. 11, 12, 13. Vid. 2 Pet. ii. 4.

<sup>a</sup> needs no refutation, being utterly repugnant to the notions we have of the nature of those spiritual beings, who are neither married nor given in marriage<sup>r</sup>; though it be hard to accuse, as some have done<sup>s</sup>, those who have fallen into this mistake, of heresy and blasphemy. Others indeed, and particularly several of the Jewish writers, by the sons of God, understand the fallen angels<sup>t</sup>, who seeing the daughters of Cain walking in the nakedness of the flesh, and painting their eyes like whores, wandered after them, and took wives from among them<sup>u</sup>.

Year of the World, 930.
Year before Christ, 33-6.

<sup>b</sup> WHILE we are on this head, it may not be amiss to mention another opinion more reasonable than the last, which is embraced by the Jewish interpreters<sup>v</sup>; they suppose that by the sons of God in this place, are meant the princes, great men and magistrates of those times, who, instead of using their authority to punish and discountenance vice, were themselves the greatest examples and promoters of lewdness and debauchery, taking the daughters of men, or the inferior and meaner sort of people, and debauching them by force†.

THE example of these sons of Seth, who, tempted by the allurements of the daughters of Cain, first left their seat of innocence, was afterwards followed by others, who from time to time descended in great numbers from the holy mountain, and took them wives in like manner of that profligate and abandoned race<sup>w</sup>. From these unhappy marriages issued a generation, which seem to have been no less extraordinary for their great stature and strength, than for their monstrous impiety and injustice. There were <sup>c</sup> in those days giants<sup>x</sup> & in the earth<sup>y</sup>, who being most probably of Cain's race, both were to be confined for seventy generations, till the consummation of all things, and the day of judgment, when they were to be thrown into the gulph of fire. The giants, being begotten by a mixture of spirit and flesh, were condemned to become evil spirits, doing mischief upon the earth, appearing as spectres, and taking no food; but were to rise with mankind at the general resurrection. Therefore from the day of the slaughter of the giants, the Nephilim, the mighty men of the earth, and the great men of renown, the spirits which went forth from their souls, as from flesh, were to continue their mischievous employments till the last day. It was also decreed that mount Hermion, where those angels mutually bound themselves by an oath, should never be without snow and cold till the day of judgment, when it should melt like wax. Mankind are also threatened with a general destruction, and that their life should be but one hundred and twenty years (6).

The issue of the Sethites, and the daughters of Cain, and their impiety.

<sup>r</sup> Matth. xxii. 30. Luke xx. 34, 35. <sup>s</sup> PHILASTRIUS BRIXTENSIS adv. HÆR. cap. 108. CHRYSOST. Homil. 22. in Genes. c. v. <sup>t</sup> R. ELIEZER, c. 13. <sup>u</sup> TARGUM ONKELOS & BEN UZZIEL. R. SOL. YARHI, ABEN EZRA, &c. <sup>v</sup> EUTYCH. p. 27. <sup>w</sup> Genes. vi. 4.

This is the substance of those fragments, many parts of which are so greatly corrupted, that it is difficult to make sense of them; but the best is, the loss is not great.

* Two of them were Aza and Azael, mentioned before (7). Shamhozi (whose name comes very near that of Semiasas) was another; he was the companion of Azael, and begat on some woman Hiyah and Hhiyah, who begat Sidon and Og. Shamhozi is said to have repented of his crime, and in penance for the same to have hung himself up between heaven and earth, in which posture he still remains; but Azael continuing impenitent, presides over the womens toilets (8), and is the same with the goat Azael mentioned by Moses (9). A fourth of these debauched angels, named Mabrael, is said to have lain with Hani's wife about the time of the flood, and Sidon, it is pretended, was the issue of that adultery (10).

These ancient traditions concerning angels were not unknown to Mohammed. The Koran (11) mentions two, named Harut and Marut, who taught magic at Babel. These the commentators say were sent down to be judges on earth, which office they executed with integrity for some time, till Zehara, or the star Venus, descended, and appeared before them in the shape of a beautiful woman, bringing a complaint against her husband (though others say she was really a woman.) As soon as they saw her, they fell in love with her, and endeavoured to prevail on her to satisfy their desires; but she flew up again to heaven, whither the two angels also returned, but were not admitted. On the intercession of a certain man, they were allowed to chuse whether they would be punished in this life, or in the other; whereupon they chose the former, and now suffer punishment accordingly in Babel (12). This story was taken directly from the Persians, who make mention of two rebellious angels of the same names, now hung up by the feet, with their heads downward, in the territory of Babel (13).

† To support this interpretation, they tell us that the verb קָיַם, which is generally rendered to take, signifies also to ravish, or take by violence.

‡ The Hebrew word is נִפְלִימִים Nephilim, from נָפַל Naphal, to fall; which derivation is urged in defence of that opinion, which makes them incarnate spirits, or the fallen angels, under the shape of men (14). The targum of Ben Uzziel agrees with this interpretation, and names two of those angels then conversant on earth, viz. Shamhozi and Uziel. But the root signifies also to fall upon, to rush with violence, &c. According to which sense Symmachus translates Nephilim βίαιαι, and Aquila ἐκκρίσσορας. The other translations generally rendering it giants.

Some take these Nephilim to have been men of ordinary stature, and so called on account only of their enormous impiety, rapaciousness and insolence (15), which, as it seems, was the opinion of Josephus (16). But others, with greater reason, believe p. 44. (13) Vid. HYDE de rel. vet. Persar. c. 12. (14) Vid. PAUL. BURGENS. in loc. (15) PHILO JUD. de Gigant. GOROP. BECANUS in Gigantomach. TEMPORARIUS. (16) Antiq. l. i. c. 3.

(6) Ex cod. ibid. p. 24, 25, 26. (7) Pag. 77. in mois. (8) ELIASHI RABBA in Genes. vi. 2. (9) Levitic. xvi. 8. (10) JUCHASIN. (11) Cop. ii. ver. 302, &c. (12) Vid. MARACC. in Alcor.

by father and mother, and born before the conjunction of the two families*, made a use of their superior power to spoil and tyrannize over the weaker. And the same course of life was followed by the new mongrel offspring, who signalized themselves also by robberies and oppressions, and became mighty men, which were of old, men of renown†.

Year of the
World, 1287.
Year before
Christ, 3019.

The 120 years of God's forbearance.

MANKIND running thus headlong into all manner of vice, and the posterity of Seth, who had for some ages retained their integrity, becoming at length, by their imprudent alliance with the race of Cain, infected with the same contagion of profaneness and immorality, so that all sorts of wickedness began to overspread the earth; and this, notwithstanding the frequent admonitions they probably received by persons from time to time sent by GOD; the divine vengeance might with justice have been immediately executed on so perverse a generation: but GOD, out of his great mercy, was pleased to grant them a convenient time for repentance, no less than one hundred and twenty years; during which space, but no longer, his spirit should strive with man‡, or endeavour to awaken and reclaim them from their wicked course of life†.

NOAH preaches. AMIDST this general corruption, one man however was found to be just and perfect in his generation‡, walking with GOD°. This extraordinary person was * Genes. vi. 4.

† Ibid. ver. 3.

‡ Ibid. ver. 9.

believe they were also of extraordinary stature and strength (1); the word Nephilim being manifestly used elsewhere in scripture (2) to denote men above the common size. Not but that it may also signify those that fall away, apostates (3).

That there were in these ancient times men of a gigantic size and strength, is a thing very credible, both from later instances in historians, both sacred and profane, and modern instances in our own times (4). But we must not hence conclude, as some have done, that mankind in general were in the first ages of a much larger stature than they are at present (5); giants being manifestly spoken of as rarities, and the wonders of their time, though their number seems to have been much greater before the flood.

The opinion of J. Bolduc (6), the Capucine, is too singular to be omitted. He supposes that the different words by which giants seem to be intended in scripture, as Nephilim, Rephaim, Zuzim, Gibborim, Enakim, Zamzummim, Elim, &c. do not, for the most part, denote the uncommon size, but the strength and excellence of the piety and truth of the holy patriarchs, the first propagators of mankind and divine worship. The Nephilim, in particular, he imagines to be those who were distinguished from others, in that they worshipped GOD by falling down, or prostration; in the same manner as the fathers of the order of St. Francis of Assise are remarkable for adoring in the same posture, and kissing the earth before the host.

Some authors have enquired into the original cause of this monstrous stature of the giants; St. Cyril thinks it a judgment of GOD on the lust of their parents (7). They who suppose them to be the issue of the fallen spirits, say it was by their artful promoting and raising the lechery and pleasure of the women with whom they had to do (8). Some attribute it to the vigour of the sons of Seth (9); while others make Seth's descendants in general to have been of a very large size, and those of Cain on the contrary of a less (10).

* This the words of Moses seem to imply; There were giants (says he) in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, &c. So that there appear to have been two distinct races of Nephilim: one of which arose pretty early in the world, being of the posterity of Cain; and another, which began some ages after, being the issue of the sons of Seth by the daughters of Cain (11); and both of them probably continued to the flood.

† This passage of scripture is variously interpreted; the English translation seems to give the true sense of the Hebrew; but the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Syriac versions render the word strive with (which we translate strive with) continue, or dwell in; supposing the meaning to be, either that GOD's spirit of admonition, or forbearance, would not always wait on man; or else that the spirit, or breath of life, should not always continue in him, that is, no longer than the space of one hundred and twenty years, after which, if he continued impenitent, he should be destroyed. And this is the sense of Onkelos. The Jews have much useless learning in their comments on this text (12). But they who infer from hence that the standard of man's life was now reduced and limited to one hundred and twenty years (13), are manifestly mistaken; for that reduction was not made immediately after the flood, nor till the days of Moses. And St. Peter plainly approves the other sense, when he observes that the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing (14); yet this notion spread even among the heathen writers (15).

‡ From this expression some Jews would infer that Noah was a good man comparatively speaking only, in respect of the great wickedness of the rest of the world; but that had he lived in Abraham's time, he would have had but a small share of reputation for virtue (16). But this unjust surmise, had it any foundation in the words of Moses, is refuted by the testimony of Ezekiel (17), who names him as one of the three that had been most eminent for righteousness, and should save their lives by their own merits in the most universal calamities. It is true they give another reason for their opinion, viz. because Noah did not intercede for the old world, as Abraham did for Sodom.

(1) *Vid. AUGUST. de civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 4. CHRYS. in loc. THEODORET. quæst. 48. in Genes. R. SOL. YARHI, ASENZRA. (2) Numb. xiii. 33, 34. (3) See 2 Kings xxv. 11. Jerem. xxxvii. 13. and xxxviii. 19. (4) *Vid. DERHAM's Physico-Theol. b. v. c. 4. GREW's Cosmol. Sacr. b. 1. c. 5. § 25. (5) *Vid. HOMER. VIRGIL. (6) In tract. de ecclesia ante legem. (7) Lib. 3. in Genes. (8) *Vid. FR. VALES. de sacra philos. c. 8. (9) *Vid. HEID.**

*Hist. Patr. t. 1. p. 202. (10) CHRYSOST. in loc. EUTYCH. (11) *Vid. HEID. ubi supr. p. 185. (12) *Vid. eund. ibid. p. 343, &c. (13) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 3. PHILO de gigant. PROCOPI. in locum. (14) 1 Pet. iii. 20. *Vid. AUGUSTIN. de civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 24. (15) *Vid. TREB. POLLION. in Claud. (16) PHILO JUD. de Abrah. p. 354. R. SOL. YARHI in locum. (17) Chap. xiv. 14, 18.**

a Noah *, the son of Lamech, who not thinking it sufficient to be righteous himself, unless he did his utmost to turn others likewise to righteousness by admonition as well as example, became a preacher <sup>b</sup> to the abandoned race among which he lived, employing both his counsel and authority to bring them to a reformation of their manners, and to restore the true religion among them†. But all he could do was to no purpose, for they continued incorrigibly obstinate; so that at length (as Josephus <sup>c</sup> tells us) finding himself and family in imminent danger of some violence, in return for his good-will, he departed from among them with his wife and children.

Year of the World, 1287: Year before Christ, 3019.

ON his departure it is probable they fell into greater disorders than before, having now none to controul, or even to trouble them with unwelcome advice. Moses assures us that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was continually evil <sup>d</sup>; and that the earth was corrupt and filled with violence, all flesh & having corrupted his way upon the earth <sup>e</sup>. Which words leave no room to enquire into the particular crimes of the antediluvian world, which seems to have been over-run with a complication of all manner of debauchery and wickedness, and above all with violence and injustice towards one another. Whether idolatry was practised before the flood, is a question we shall discuss elsewhere; but the eastern authors are for the affirmative, and say the children of Seth were seduced to it by the Cainites <sup>f</sup>.

Mankind incorrigible.

THINGS being in this state, GOD, as the sacred historian pathetically expresses it, repented that he had made man upon earth, and it grieved him at his heart <sup>g</sup>. And the time of forbearance being elapsed, he passed the sentence of their utter destruction by a flood of waters; and not only of them, but of the beasts of the earth and every creeping thing, and of the fowls of the air <sup>h</sup>, which became involved in the calamity of their masters. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the LORD <sup>i</sup>, who had before, probably at the beginning of the one hundred and twenty years, acquainted him with his design of bringing a deluge on the earth; and as a means to preserve him and his from that calamity, directed him to make an ark, or vessel of a certain form and size, capable of containing not only himself and family (for he had three sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet, who were all married before the flood) but such numbers of animals of all sorts, which were liable to perish in the flood, as would be sufficient to preserve the several species, and again replenish the earth, together with all necessary provisions for them <sup>k</sup>. All which Noah performed, and so, by GOD's peculiar favour and providence, he and those that were with him escaped this tremendous and otherwise general destruction; which event, the most extraordinary that is recorded in history, and deserving our greatest attention, must be the subject of a future discourse, after we shall have taken a view of what the profane writers offer us towards the history of this period.

Year of the World, 1306. Year before Christ, 2998.

The whole world destroyed by a flood, except Noah and his family.

* 2 Peter ii. 5.    <sup>c</sup> Antiq. l. i. c. 3.    <sup>d</sup> Genes. vi. 5.    <sup>e</sup> Ib. ver. 11, 12.    <sup>f</sup> EUTYCH. Annal. p. 31.    <sup>g</sup> Genes. vi. 6.    <sup>h</sup> Ib. ver. 7.    <sup>i</sup> Ib. ver. 8.    <sup>k</sup> Ib. ver. 14, &c.

* Lamech gave his son this name, which signifies comfort: for this same, says he, shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the LORD hath cursed. Which words not expressing the means by which Noah was thus to comfort his friends, some writers have thence inferred that he invented the tools and instruments of husbandry (1).

† The eastern christians say, that when GOD ordered Noah to build the ark, he also directed him to make an instrument of wood, such as they make use of in the east, at this day, instead of bells to call the people to church, and named in Arabic ناقوس Nakus, which he was to strike three times every day, not only to call together the workmen that were building the ark, but to give him an opportunity of daily admonishing his people of the impending danger of the deluge (2).

The Mohammedans likewise agree to make Noah a prophet, and, as has been observed, one of the six principal ones (3), tho' he had no written revelations delivered to him (4). The Koran mentions his preaching to those of his time in several places (5). Some of their writers pretend he was sent to convert Zobah, one of the Persian kings of the first race, who refused to hearken to him. He then went to preach GOD's unity publicly, but could make no more proselytes than eighty, who went with him into the ark (6).

‡ The oriental writers agree in making this defection so universal, that at last, they say, there was none left in the holy mountain of all Seth's race, except only Noah and his wife, and his three sons and their wives (7).

(1) YARHI in loc. ZOHAR, parash. i. (2) EUTYCH. Annal. p. 37. (3) See before, p. 79. in the notes. (4) Vid. RELAND de rel. Moham. p. 34.

(5) Cap. xi. ver. 26. cap. 26. ver. 105, &c. (6) Vid. D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient. p. 675. (7) EUTYCH. Annal. p. 35.

SECT. V.

The profane History before the Flood.

Accounts of antediluvian affairs besides that of Moses.

BESIDES the particulars in the preceding section, taken from the writings of <sup>a</sup> Moses, the only records to be depended on in these early times, we have some farther accounts relating to this period transmitted to us by antient writers; particularly those of the Phœnician, Babylonian, and Ægyptian antiquities, which we must not omit, leaving however the reader to judge of their credibility.

Sanchoniatho's Phœnician history.

SANCHONIATHO, who wrote the Phœnician antiquities*, began his history from the origin of the world and of mankind; but his work being apparently written with a design to apologize for idolatry†, instead of deducing the history (as Moses has done) from Adam in the line of Seth, the worshippers of the true God, he has, according to the most probable hypothesis‡, given us that of the idolatrous line of Cain; that the religion which this author, or those he transcribed, patronized, might appear to be <sup>b</sup> introduced by the elder branch, a circumstance which they might think gave it no small lustre and reputation.

IN the following extract from the remaining fragments of this author, we might justly be surprized to find not so much as the least mention of the deluge, did we not consider that destruction was a judgment on the idolatrous world, with which the professors of the true religion probably reproached the heathens, and which the latter were therefore desirous to conceal, to bury, if possible, the very memory of so extraordinary a monument of divine vengeance and their own shame.

Generation I.

SANCHONIATHO having delivered his cosmogony, or generation of the other parts of the world¶, begins his history of mankind with the production of the first pair of mortals¶, whom Philo, his translator, calls Protogonus and Æon‡, the latter of whom found out the food which is gathered from trees.

Generation II.

THEIR issue were called Genus and Genea**¶, and dwelt in Phœnicia: but when great droughts came, they stretched forth their hands to heaven towards the sun††, for him they thought the only God and Lord of heaven, calling him Beelsamen, which in

† See the Intro. p. 12, a.

¶ Vid. ibid. p. 11, d.

¶ Vid. ibid. p. 46, a.

* The credit of the fragments we have remaining of this work, and the age of its author, are enquired into in the preface.

† Viz. That of bishop Cumberland, the substance of whose remarks the reader will find in the following notes.

‡ That these two were Adam and Eve, appears not only from their being the first of human kind, but also from their names, Πρωτόγονος, the first produced, and Ἔων, life (which is the signification of that word in the feminine gender, the masculine article ὁ prefixed to it in the original being a mistake of the transcriber) the latter of them bearing a near resemblance to Eve, both in sense and sound. What our author immediately mentions of the woman's first gathering food from trees, seems to allude to Eve's first eating the forbidden fruit (1).

** Genus, abating the termination, makes a fair approach in sound to the name of Cain; and by its signification seems very proper to denote the man who was the first-begotten in the ordinary course of nature. The Greek word γενέω, whence the Latin gigno comes, being also probably derived from קנא Kana (K and G being letters of the same organ, and consequently easily changed into each other) the root from which the name of Cain was formed. Genea may signify only the wife of Genus, as Cain does the wife of Cains in the civil law (2).

As to what follows, that Cain and his wife dwelt in Phœnicia, this seems repugnant to the Mosaic history, where Nod is said to be on the east of Eden. But it may not be impertinent to add what has been observed, that there was a city in Canaan called Cain; within the bounds assigned to the tribe of Judah (3). In the best maps it is situated not far from the sea, on a promontory lying within the country which the Philistines kept long in their possession; and it is not likely that any who owned themselves derived from Seth, should build a city, and then brand it with the odious name of Cain: but it is possible it might be either built by some of his family before the flood, and its ruins be repaired afterwards, still keeping his name; Joppa, another city in that neighbourhood, being also said to be more antient than the deluge (4). Or it might be built by the old Philistines before Jeshua's time; and they being descended from Mizraim, might, though fallily, believe, as Sanchoniatho reports, that he was of Cain's line, and thence might call this city by his name (5).

†† This seems to have been the first introduction of idolatry, which began with the worship of the sun; several of Cain's descendants added other methods of idolatrous worship, distinctly set down by this author. They proceeded to deify the several parts of nature, and men after their death, and even to consecrate plants shooting out of the earth, which the first men, or those in the elder ages, judged to be gods, and worshipped, as those that sustained the lives of themselves and their posterity, as well as of their ancestors: to these they made their meat and drink offerings; which Sanchoniatho says, were the devices of worship agreeing with the weakness and want of boldness in their minds (6).

(1) Vid. GROT. de veritate relig. Christ. in notis ad lib. I. § 16. CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 215, &c.
(2) CUMBERL. ibid. p. 219, &c.

(3) Josh.

xv. 57.

(4) PLIN. Nat. Hist. l. 5. c. 13.

(5) CUMBERL. ubi sup. p. 219, &c.

(6) SAN-

CHON. apud Euseb. ubi infra.

<sup>a</sup> Phœnician is lord of heaven, and in Greek Zeus. For we, says our author, not vainly, have frequently distinguished those names, but with respect to the later signification of names accruing to them from later things; which the Greeks not knowing, have construed otherwise, being deceived with the ambiguity of their significations.

AFTERWARDS from Genus, the son of Protegonus and Æon, other mortal issue was Generation III. begotten, whose names were Phos, Phur, and Phlox, that is, Light, Fire, and Flame *. These found out the way of generating fire by the rubbing of pieces of wood against each other, and taught men the use thereof. These begat sons of vast bulk and height, Generation IV. whose names were given to the mountains on which they seized: so from them were named mount Cassius and Libanus, Antilibanus and Brathys †.

<sup>b</sup> Of these last were begotten Memnumus and Hypsuranius ‡, but they were so named Generation V. by their mothers, the women of those times, who without shame lay with any man they could light upon **. Hypsuranius inhabited Tyre, and he invented the making of huts of reeds and rushes, and the papyrus. He also fell into enmity with his brother Usons ††, who first invented a covering for his body out of the skins of the wild beasts which he could catch. And when violent tempests of winds and rains came, the boughs in Tyre being rubbed against each other, took fire, and burnt the wood there. And Usons having taken a tree and broke off its boughs, first was so bold as to venture upon it into the sea. He also consecrated two rude stones, or pillars, to fire and wind, and he worshipped them, and poured out to them the blood of such wild beasts as had been caught in hunting ††. But when these were dead, those that remained, consecrated to them stumps of wood and pillars, worshipping them, and kept anniversary feasts unto them *†.

<sup>c</sup> MANY years after this generation, came Agreus and Haliens * ‡, the inventors of Generation VI. the arts of hunting and fishing, from whom huntsmen and fishermen are named.

* Hebrew names like these, though unusual among us, are mentioned in after times in scripture; as, Uri, Uri, Beor, and Lehabim, which signify fire and flames, and answer Philo's well enough. It is supposed they were so called from their inventing the method of kindling and using fire (1).

† This generation were inhabitants and lords in the great mountains which took their names from them. So Seir, a name of Esau, is supposed to have been given to the mountain which he possessed, tho' it be prophetically given to that country before his birth (2).

‡ Bochart makes these two but one person, reading, Memnumus, who is also called Hypsuranius, the latter name seeming to be a translation of the first, which Bochart thinks has lost a syllable, Mem being left instead of Samem, or שָׁמַיִם Shamaim, signifying heaven, to answer Οὐρανός in Philo's translation, as Rum does ὑψος, or high. Scaliger thinks it only put instead of מִמְּנוּן Mimnum, from on high. Bishop Cumberland derives it with less change from מִן רֹמָם Rum, and מִן מַיִם Maim, signifying waters from on high, or issue from above (3).

** The immorality of the women prostituting their bodies, so plainly confessed by our author, agrees with the intimation which Moses gives concerning the debauchery of these ages, and the general corruption of the world which ensued upon it.

†† Usons is thought to be the same with עֵשָׂו Ous, i. e. strong, a name long after given to the son of Aram, whom Josephus calls Ousef, and we write Uz; the termination in Josephus only differs from Philo's Ousous (4).

‡‡ The wind and fire to which these two pillars were consecrated, seem to have been those violent ones that had burnt the wood. This is the oldest instance of worshipping these lower sort of naturally immortal gods; which it is probable were worshipped, because the fire and winds are of kindred to celestial or æthereal matter. The Greek does not expressly say that the blood of the wild beasts was poured out, but it is conceived necessary so to understand the words σπένδον ἐν θυρίων, because there is nothing else in them, besides their blood, which can be poured out as a libation. This is therefore observed to be the first offering of blood to inferior deities. And because this was that of hunted wild beasts, of whose blood no great quantity could be gotten to be poured out of vessels; we may infer that Usons offered some part of their flesh, with their blood dropping out of their limbs. And since there is no reason to doubt but he eat part of what he had taken in hunting, as he offered part; this is the first example of eating flesh before the flood: and the restriction under which it was afterwards granted to Noah, seems to intimate, that the wild antediluvian sons of Cain had fallen into the barbarity of eating raw and bloody flesh, forbidden therefore to Noah and his posterity, both in the case of sacrifice and of ordinary diet, to prevent all correspondence with their savage practices (5).

* † Here is the connection of the worship of men after death, with that of the parts of nature. But it does not appear any sacrifice or prayer was as yet made to them as gods, as is expressly said hereafter of Vulcan.

* ‡ These names are Greek, and therefore Philo's translation of some eastern names of like import. All that can be understood of this age is, that the arts or employments here mentioned, were then much improved, for Usons was a huntsman before.

Though the connection of this generation with the preceding, be expressed more ambiguously than any other in the whole pedigree, by the words after much time, which may occasion a doubt whether this generation was the immediate offspring of the last or not; yet if we consider how far some of the antediluvians were advanced in years before their children were born, we must allow that no argument can be built thereon for the negative. And an interpolation of other generations cannot be admitted without owning so many more generations in Cain's line before the flood, which would make his line to have more links in it than Seth's, a circumstance we have no reason to believe (6).

(1) CUMBERL. ubi sup. p. 237. eund. ibid. (3) Idem, ibid. p. 231.

(2) Vid. ibid. p. 238. (4) Idem, ibid. p. 239, 240. (6) Idem, ibid. p. 242, &c.

Generation VII. OF these were begotten two brothers, the inventors of iron and of the forging <sup>a</sup> thereof: one of these, called Chryfor*, the same with Hephestus, or Vulcan, exercised himself in words, and charms, and divinations; and he found out the hook, bait, and fishing line, and boats slightly built, and he was the first of all men that sailed: wherefore he also was worshipped after his death for a god, and they called him Zeus Michius, or Jupiter the engineer†; and some say his brothers invented the way of making walls of brick.

Generation VIII. AFTERWARDS from this generation came two brothers, one of which was called Technites, or the artist, the other Geinus Autockthon‡, the home-born man of the earth. These found out to mingle stubble, or small twigs, with the bricky earth, and to dry them in the sun, and so made tiling. <sup>b</sup>

Generation IX. BY these were begotten others, of which one was called Agrus [field] and the other Agrouerus, or Agrotes** [husbandman] who had a statue much worshipped, and a temple carried about by one or more yoke of oxen in Phanicia: and among those of Byblus he is eminently called the greatest of the gods. These found out how to make courts about mens houses, and fences, and caves or cellars. Husbandmen and such as use dogs in hunting derive from these; and they are also called Aletæ and Titans.

Generation X. OF these were begotten Amynus and Magus††, who shewed men to constitute villages and flocks.

IN these mens age there was one Eliun‡‡, which imports in Greek Hypsistus [the most high] and his wife was named Beruth, who dwelt about Byblus; and by <sup>c</sup> him was begotten one Epigeus, or Autockthon*†, whom they afterwards called * Bochart's origination of this name from חרש Chores-ar, which he renders Πυρραχυρις, an artificer by fire, is not improbable. Yet bishop Cumberland rather derives it from a simple root חרץ Charas, to bestir one's self vigorously, to cut, &c. from whence χρυσος, beaten, or cut gold, is allowed to come, and why not Chryfor? Since it differs only in termination, and compositions must not be admitted in eastern words without necessity.

This Chryfor is the first man our author informs us of, who was worshipped as a god after his death; a plain confession that such worship was not from the beginning. It is remarkable, that as this sort of idolatry began in the eighth generation, and the flood was drawing near in the next generation but one, so it is more than probable that all, or most of those who were concerned in this first decaying of men, if they lived to be any thing near the age of their contemporaries of Seth's line, were drowned therein (1).

† The original is Diamichius. But our learned bishop chuses to divide the word, and derives Michius from מכין Machi, a machine (2).

‡ Technites seems to be a translation of the eastern name Malachi, from מלאכה Malaca, workmanship, art. The other, Geinus, signifying earthy, has some affinity with Epher and Ephron, Canaanitish names, and probably used by Sanchoniatho (3).

** This generation is remarkable, because to the men thereof, the first statue, or idol to be worshipped, and the first temple we read of, was erected in Phanicia; a small temple, or rather tabernacle, it was, like that of Moloch and his star Chiun, or Remphan (4), and drawn by oxen, in the same manner as the ark, or epitome of God's tabernacle, was sent home by the Philistines, successors to the old Phonicians in their religion and abode, upon a new cart, drawn by milch kine (5).

The names of these men import gods of husbandry, as Pan, Pales, and Sylvanus among the Greeks and Romans. Bishop Cumberland guesses, that in Sanchoniatho, the person whom Philo expresses by Agrus, might be called Siddim, or Sadid, a name whereby one of Cronus's sons is afterwards called; either of which will answer the Greek (6).

The Egyptians, whose religion and descent was the same with that of the old Phonicians, besides Pan, had an ancient deity, named Arcueris, mentioned by Plutarch, and by some taken to be Apollo, by others Orus Senior, and by Scaliger (7) Amubis. But bishop Cumberland thinks he was the same that is here called Agrouerus; and if the g is allowed to melt away, as it often does, or if we take Αγρως and Αγρος as Synonyma, the name is the same; for the termination is arbitrary (8).

†† Amynus seems to import in this place a defender from enchantment, and Magus a forcerer; though both words are capable of a more favourable interpretation. Yet in the lowest dregs of Gain's race we may believe the worst the words will bear (9).

This generation, being the tenth from Adam inclusive, was that generation which, excepting Noah and his family, was entirely destroyed by the flood, together with their children. But those idolaters from whom Sanchoniatho took his genealogies, suppressed all mention of the flood, as he does; and pretended that the line, in which their idolatry began, was continued on to succeeding ages. And this being impossible to be done, in instances of men that ever had any being in the earth, any other way than by taking men out of Noah's line, and annexing them as sons to the last men of that family, which in truth was wholly extinguished in the flood, they proceed to carry on the genealogy with Misor and Sydyr, two persons who in reality, as it will be attempted to shew, were descendants of Noah (10). Wherefore we reserve the history of them and their posterity until after the deluge.

‡‡ In Hebrew עליון Eliun. This person, as will appear when we consider his descendants, must be Lamech, the father of Noah, of the line of Seth, which is here introduced abruptly and imperfectly, as being that of the professed enemies of the false religion which our author patronizes (11).

*† These two Greek names having some relation to the earth, it is likely they translate the title

(1) Idem, ibid. p. 244, &c.

(2) Idem, ibid. p. 232.

(3) Ibid. p. 246.

(4) Amos v. 26.

(5) 1 Sam. vi.

(6) CUMBERL.

ubi supra, p. 247, &c.

(7) De emend. temp.

(8) CUMBERL. ubi sup. p. 249.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 250.

(10) Idem, ibid. p. 177.

(11) Idem, ibid. p. 151.

a Uranus * [heaven], so that from him that element which is over us, by reason of its excellent beauty, is called heaven; and he had a sister of the same parents called Ge † [the earth], and by reason of her beauty the earth had her name given to it.

Hypsistrus, the father of these, dying in fight with wild beasts, was consecrated, and his children offered sacrifices and libations to him. But Uranus taking the kingdom of his father, married his sister Ge, and had by her four sons; Ilus, who is called Cronus [or Saturn], Betylus, Dagon, who is Siton, or the god of corn, and Atlas ‡: but by other wives Uranus had much issue.

Thus far Sanchoiatho; the thread of whose history we break off here, and shall resume in the next period. But before we dismiss this author, we shall in the following

b table compare the pedigree of Cain's line given by him, with that given by Moses: first observing, that though Moses had not recorded ten generations in this line, as Sanchoiatho has, yet it does not thence follow, that there were not ten generations in this line before the flood; for Moses does not tell us that those he has named were all the descents before the flood, nor that the last generation which he mentions was drowned, though probably it was so. However, it is very improbable that eight generations in Cain's line should live as long as the ten in Seth's, especially considering that Cain in all likelihood had children before Seth was born: wherefore it is more reasonable to believe, that Moses has passed over two generations of Cain, as not worthy of mention; and the rather because he does not say that Enoch begat Irak, but only, unto Enoch

c was born Irak **; which will be true if he was not his son, but his grandson, or great-grandson, skipping over two generations, which added to the eight mentioned, will make ten, as in Seth's line before the flood †, thus:

A TABLE of the Descendants of CAIN,

According to MOSES.

1. Adam, Eve,
2. Cain,
3. Enoch,
4. - - - -
5. - - - - 6. Irak,
7. Mehujael,
8. Methusael,
9. Lamech,
10. Jabal,
Tubal-Cain.

According to SANCHOIATHO.

1. Protogonus, Æon,
2. Gennus, Genca,
3. Phos, Pur, Pblox,
4. Cassius, Libanus, &c.
5. Memrumus, Ufous,
6. Agreus, Halicus,
7. Chryfor, or Hephæstus ††,
8. Technites, Gennus,
9. Agrus, Agrouerus,
10. Amynus, Magus,

* Vid. CUMBERL. on SANCHON. p. 303, &c.

title which Moses gives Noah, who is here meant, viz. a man of the earth (1), which we render an husbandman; and that may also be the reason why his wife's name is said to be Ge, the earth (2).

* This name, and that of Eliun, are supposed to have been given to Noah and his father by Thoth and other idolaters by way of sneer, because they worshipped the only supreme God in heaven, in opposition to their earthly gods, which had been men (3). But a better reason is, that it was the constant custom to give new and magnificent names to persons deified (4), as Eliun and Uranus both were; though they had no considerable part of the idolatrous worship, which was chiefly employed in serving Cronus, and his wives and children (5).

† The Atlantian theology, which seems to agree with Sanchoiatho, in saying that Uranus gave his name to the heavens, to imprint a greater idea of himself in the minds of the people, tells us however that his wife's first name was Titea (perhaps from טִיט Tit, mud) and that she being, after her death, consecrated into a goddess, was called Ge (6).

‡ The first of these four sons was Ham, the arguments to prove which will be produced hereafter in a more proper place: who the other three sons here named were, will also be considered elsewhere. We shall only observe here, that none of them are either Shem or Japhet, who, according to the bishop's hypothesis, are found under other names, viz. those of Syde and Nereus.

** The like expression to the same sense is found in another passage (7), where it is foretold that Josiah should be born to the house of David, or be of the posterity of Rehoboam then reigning, though he was many generations after him.

†† Sanchoiatho here places his chief artists in the seventh and eighth generation, whereas Moses, according to this table, places them in the tenth. If we suppose the two last generations, and not the fourth and fifth, to be those omitted by Moses, they will come much nearer. Dr. Cumberland, to obtain a fuller agreement, conjectures that these two links in Sanchoiatho have been transposed, and that Chryfor should be in the eighth place, and Technites in the seventh; or else that the father in the seventh generation might invent those arts,

(1) Genes. ix. 20. (2) CUMBERL. ubi sup. p. 291, &c. (3) Ibid. p. 152. (6) DIODOR. SICUL. l. 3. p. 189, &c. (7) 1 Kings xiii. 2.

Berosus's Babylonian antiquities.

THE Babylonian antiquities were collected by Berosus*, a Chaldean by birth, who <sup>a</sup> lived in the time of Alexander the Great†. But of that work we have now remaining only some few fragments, the substance of which, so far as comes within the present period, we here subjoin.

The manner of men acquiring the knowledge of arts and sciences.

AFTER a description of Babylonia, he writes, that in the first year there appeared out of the red sea, at a place near the confines of that country, a certain irrational animal ‡, whose name was Oannes. He had his whole body like that of a fish, but beneath his fishes head he had another head grew; he had also feet like a man, which proceeded from the fishes tail, and a human voice, the picture of him being preserved to that very day. This animal conversed with men in the day-time without eating any thing; he delivered to men the knowledge of letters and sciences, and skill in various arts; he taught them to dwell together in cities, to erect temples, to introduce laws, and instructed them in geometry; he likewise shewed them how to gather seeds and fruits; and, in short, imparted to mankind whatever was necessary and convenient for a civilized life. But after this time there was nothing excellent invented. When the sun set, this animal retired into the sea again, and stay'd there in the night-time, being of the amphibious kind. After him there appeared several other animals of the same form, mentioned in the ensuing history. This Oannes did not deliver his instructions by word of mouth only; but, as our author assures us, wrote of the origin of things§, and of political œconomy¶.

OTHER authors have also made mention of this Oannes: Helladius calls him Oes (if <sup>c</sup> it be not rather the scribes way of abbreviating Oannes) and agrees in general with the foregoing account; but adds, that he had the hands, as well as the head and feet of a man; that it was reported he was produced from the primigenial egg (as his name testified †) and that he was in reality no more than a man, though he seemed to be a fish, because he was compleatly dressed in a fishes skin‡. Hyginus likewise writes that Euabanes, a name not very distant from Oannes, came out of the sea in Chaldea, and explained astrology§.

The antediluvian kings of Chaldea.

BEROSUS proceeds to give us a series of ten kings who reigned in Chaldea before the flood; but as there are some small variations in the authors who have transcribed that historian, we shall here exhibit them to the readers view.

A TABLE of the Chaldean Kings before the Flood, from BEROSUS.

According to Africanus <sup>a</sup> .			According to Abydenus <sup>b</sup> .			According to Apollodorus <sup>c</sup> .
	Sari.	Years.		Sari.			Sari.
1. Alorus reigned	10	00	1. Alorus reigned	10		1. Alorus reigned	10
2. Alasparus - -	03	00	2. Alaparus - -	03		2. Alaparus - -	00
3. Amelon - - -	13	00	3. Amillarus - -	13		3. Amelon - - -	00
4. Amenon - - -	12	00	4. Ammenon - -	12		4. Ammenon - -	00
5. Metalarus - -	18	00	5. Megalarus - -	18		5. Megalarus - -	18
6. Daonus - - -	00	99	6. Daos - - -	10		6. Daonus - - -	10
7. Euedorachus -	18	00	7. Euedoreschus -	00		7. Euedoreschus -	18
8. Amphis - - -	10	00	8. Anodaphus - -	00		8. Amempsinus - -	10
9. Otiartes - - -	08	00	9. - - - - -	00		9. Otiartes - - -	08
10. Xisuthrus - -	18	00	10. Sisithrus - - -	00		10. Xisuthrus - -	18
	110	99

<sup>a</sup> ALEX. POLYHIST. apud Syncell. p. 28. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 14. c) <sup>c</sup> ALEX. POLYHIST. ex Beroso, apud Syncell. p. 28. <sup>d</sup> HELLAD. apud Photium, Bibl. Cod. CCLXXIX. col. 1594. <sup>e</sup> HYGIN. fab. 274. The printed editions of Hyginus have Eubadnes. <sup>f</sup> Apud SYNCCELL. p. 18. <sup>g</sup> Apud eund. p. 38. C. <sup>h</sup> Apud eund. p. 39. B. Vid. Chron. GRÆC. EVSÆB. p. 5.

arts, and on that account be celebrated by Thoth, or his scribes; and the sons might bring them to greater perfection in the eighth generation, and for that reason be rather taken notice of by Moses (1).

* Of this author the reader will find a more particular account in the preface.

† The Greek is ζῷον ἄσπερον; but the sequel plainly shews him to have been nothing less than irrational: some corruption may therefore very justly be supposed.

As to the names of Oannes and Annedotus given to this person, and those of the same appearance who are mentioned below, it may seem a folly to offer as any explanation of them. By their coming up out of the sea, it is most probable they were strangers, and arrived in Chaldea by shipping (2). The Syriac word ܐܢܢܕܐ Anudo, signifies a traveller or foreigner, and might without much violence be converted into either of the said names.

‡ An egg in Greek is called Oon.

(1) CUMBERL. ubi supra, p. 232, &c.

(2) Vid. NEWTON's Chronol. p. 210, 211.

a THE reigns of these kings Berosus computes by Sari, or decads of years*, which seems to be a very convenient method in those times, when the lives of men were at least ten times as long as they have been in later ages. According to which way of reckoning, the sum of all their reigns amounts to twelve hundred, or more nicely eleven hundred and ninety nine years; which offers no violence to the Mosaic chronology. The length of their reigns.

As these ten successions exactly answer the ten generations from the creation to the flood, the first king Alorus has been supposed to be the same with Adam†, as Xisuthrus plainly appears to be Noah. Alorus gave out, that G O D himself had declared him the pastor of the people‡; and, indeed, if any man could pretend to dominion by divine right, it must have been Adam. Remarkable events under them.

b OF Alasparus, the second king, nothing remarkable is related. His successor Amenon, or Amullanus, was of the city of Pantibibla†: in his reign, according to Abydenus, a second Annedotus, or animal resembling the demigod Oannes, arose out of the sea, twenty six Sari, or two hundred and sixty years after the beginning of this monarchy*; but Apollodorus writes, that he appeared under the next prince Amenon, after forty Sari, or four hundred years: which if they be computed from the creation (according to the Samaritan chronology) will end in that king's reign; but if from the first year of Alorus, will reach twenty years within that of Metalarus. Others, supposing this Annedotus was the hateful Oannes himself, blame Polybistor for anticipating the time of his coming, by placing him in the first year‡.

AFTER Amenon and Metalarus, who were both of Pantibibla, succeeded Daonius, who was of the same city, and a shepherd. In his time four animals § of a double form, half man and half fish, came out of the sea to land, whose names were Euedocus, Enengamus, Encubulus, and Anementus¶.

UNDER the next prince, Euedereschus, who was likewise of Pantibibla, there appeared another animal, like the former, named Odacon. All these explained more particularly what Oannes had summarily and concisely delivered¶.

THE eighth and ninth kings were both of another city called Laranchi*. When the latter of them Otiartes, or, as Polybistor calls him, Ardates, was dead, he was succeeded by his son Xisuthrus.

IN his reign happened the great deluge, of which our author gives the following account: Cronus or Saturn appeared to Xisuthrus in a dream, and warned him that on the fifteenth of the month Desius mankind would be destroyed by a flood; and therefore commanded him to write down the original, intermediate state, and end of all things, and bury the writings under ground in Sippara, the city of the sun; that he

* PERIZON. Orig. Ægypt. c. 2.    † ABYDEN. ex Beroso apud Syncell. p. 38.    ‡ Idem, ib. & p. 39. C.    § Vid. SYNCCELL. p. 39. C.    ¶ ABYDEN. ib.    † APOLLONOR. ex Beros. ib.    ‡ Idem, ib.

* Berosus wrote his chronology by the computation of Sari, Neri, and Sosi; which being ancient measures of time, and well known when the original records were written, could not, it is conceived, have wanted explanation in those records. But Berosus, or some later writers, have, either out of ignorance, or design, magnified these measures of time beyond all imagination, and tell us, that the Sarus contained the interval of three thousand six hundred years, the Nerus of six hundred years, and the Sosus of sixty (1). However, other authors have taken those years for days only, and blame Eusebius for not perceiving them to be days (2); and, as it seems, with great reason: for, not to insist on the incredible length of the reigns of those princes, on the first hypothesis, which no writer of common sense or modesty could offer to impose on the world, it plainly appears they were no more than days, from the reign of the sixth king, which is more exactly expressed in the first table to be ninety nine years, but in the others, by the round number of ten Sari, or 100 years; and the word Sarus, throwing away the termination, is no other than the Chaldei, or Syriac ܣܪܝܢ 'Sar, ten. The Sarus therefore contained three thousand six hundred days, or just ten old Chaldean years of three hundred and sixty days each: and that before the deluge, not only the civil year, but also the tropical solar, and lunar year consisted of just twelve months of thirty days a-piece, or three hundred and sixty days in the whole, has been fully proved by a very learned gentleman (3).

† Of this city of Pantibibla, as Scaliger observes (4) the ancients have taken no notice. It seems to be the same with Sippara, hereafter mentioned (probably the Sippara of Ptolemy) where Xisuthrus deposited the records he wrote before the flood. This latter name may be derived from the Chaldei ܫܦܪܐ Sephar, or Sphar, a book, or record; and Pantibibla is the translation of that name into Greek (5). Sir Isaac Newton (6) takes it to be the Sepharvaim of the scripture (7).

‡ Apollodorus says only that the fourth Annedotus appeared at this time (8); but the reading of Abydenus seems the more correct.

(1) Vid. SYNCCELL. p. 17. & ABYDEN. apud eundem, p. 38. C.    (2) ANNIANUS & PANDORUS apud SYNCCELL. p. 35. Vid. eund. p. 17.    (3) Mr. ALLIS's Disc. of the antient year, in Mr. WHISTON's Theory, Book II. p. 144. Vid. etiam should also build a ship, and go into it with his relations and dearest friends, having first <sup>a</sup> furnished it with provisions, and taken into it fowls and four-footed beasts; and that when he had provided every thing, and was asked whither he was sailing, he should answer, To the gods, to pray for happiness to mankind. Xisuthrus did not disobey, but built a vessel, whose length was five furlongs, and breadth two furlongs. He put on board all that he was directed, and went into it with his wife, children, and friends. The flood being come and soon ceasing, Xisuthrus let out certain birds, which finding no food, nor place to rest upon, returned again to the ship. Xisuthrus, after some days, let out the birds again; but they came back again to the ship, having their feet daubed with mud: but when they were let go the third time, they came no more to the ship, whereby Xisuthrus understood that the earth appeared again; and thereupon he made <sup>b</sup> an opening between the planks of the ship, and seeing that it rested on a certain mountain, he came out with his wife, and his daughter, and his pilot; and having worshipped the earth, and raised an altar, and sacrificed to the gods, he and those who went out with him disappeared. They who were left behind in the ship, finding Xisuthrus, and the persons that accompanied him, did not return, went out themselves to seek for him, calling him aloud by his name: but Xisuthrus was no more seen by them; only a voice came out of the air, which enjoined them, as their duty was, to be religious; and informed them, that, on account of his own piety, he was gone to dwell with the gods; and that his wife, and daughter, and pilot, were partakers of the same honour. It also directed them to return to Babylon, and that, as the fates had ordained, they <sup>c</sup> should take the writings from Sippara, and communicate them to mankind; and told them that the place where they were was the country of Armenia. When they had heard this, they offered sacrifice to the gods, and unanimously went to Babylon; and when they came thither, they dug up the writings at Sippara, built many cities, raised temples, and rebuilt Babylon again<sup>d</sup>.

SCALIGER. in Græc. Euseb. p. 406.    (4) Ubi supra, p. 407.    (5) See CUMBERLAND on Samson. p. 255.    (6) Chronol. p. 275.    (7) 2 Kings xix. 13.    (8) Apud SYNCCELL. p. 39.

The antediluvian kings of Egypt.

THE Egyptians, who would give place to no nation in point of antiquity, have also a series of kings, who, as is pretended, reigned in Egypt before the flood; and, to be even with the Chaldeans, began their account the very same year that theirs does, according to Berosus <sup>e</sup>.

THERE was an ancient chronicle extant among the Egyptians not many centuries <sup>d</sup> ago<sup>h</sup>, which contained thirty dynasties of princes who ruled in that country, by a series of 113 generations, through an immense space of 36,525 years*: during which Egypt was successively governed by three different races; of whom the first were the Aurite, the second the Mestrai, and the third the Egyptians <sup>f</sup>.

BUT this extravagant number of years Manetho <sup>g</sup> (to whose remains we must chiefly have recourse for the ancient Egyptian history) has not adopted, however in other respects he is supposed to have been led into errors in chronology by this old chronicle<sup>i</sup>, which yet seems to have been a composition since Manetho's time. That writer <sup>k</sup> began his history with the following sixteen dynasties, or reigns of princes; the first of

<sup>e</sup> ALEXAND. POLYHISTOR ex BEROSO, apud SYNCCELL. p. 30, 31. & apud CYRILL. contra JULIAN. l. 1. ABYDENUS, ex eodem, apud SYNCCELL. p. 38, 39. & apud EUSEB. de PRÆP. EV. l. 9. c. 12. <sup>f</sup> SYNCCELL. p. 17. <sup>g</sup> Vid. eund. p. 51. & EUSEB. Chron. GRÆC. p. 6. <sup>h</sup> SYNCCELL. ibid. <sup>i</sup> MANETHO apud SYNCCELL. p. 18. & EUSEB. Chron. GRÆC. p. 7.

* This number appears manifestly to have been not a real chronological, but a fictitious astronomical calculation, being produced by multiplying 1461 by 25; and is the period of the grand revolution of the zodiac, so famous in the Egyptian and Greek fables; at the end of which it will return to the point whence it began to move, viz. the first minute of the first degree of Aries (1).

From some such computation it is probable Diodorus took the numbers he mentions of 18,000 years, the space which the gods and heroes reigned, and 15,000 from Orus the son of Isis, the last of them, to the 180th olympiad, during which time Egypt was governed by men (2); or those, which he elsewhere tells us were the number of years from Isis and Osiris to Alexander the Great, viz. above 10,000, or somewhat less than 23,000 (3). Other extravagant numbers were also by the Egyptian priests imposed on Herodotus and Plato, as we may observe elsewhere.

† These three races, if there be any shadow of truth in this account, seem most probably to have been the gods, demigods, and mortal men, which are by other authors said to have reigned successively in Egypt: the Aurite (which name Goar (4) derives from Abavis or Avaris, though that city was built long after the flood by the Pastors, and Perizonius, more probably, from ἤνις Oni, light) being the gods or antediluvian princes; the Mestrai, the demigods, or postdiluvians of the race of Mizraim; and the Egyptians, the mortal kings, the first of whom was Menes (5): and this hypothesis, as will be observed by and by, accounts tolerably well for the chronology.

‡ This writer was somewhat later than Berosus. See the preface.

(1) Vid. SYNCCELL. p. 52. (2) DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 41. (3) Idem, ib. p. 20. (4) In notis ad

SYNCCELL. Vid. MARSHAM. Canon. Chron. p. 107. (5) Vid. PERIZON. Antiq. Egypt. p. 23, &c.

whom

a whom were called gods, and the other nine demigods. These, he says, reigned one thousand nine hundred and eighty five years*; and the first of them, Vulcan, nine thousand †.

A TABLE of the Gods and Demigods, who are supposed to have reigned in Egypt before the Flood.

		G O D S.			Years	Months	Days
b	1.	H ephestus, or Vulcan , reigned - - - - -	-	-	724	6	4
	2.	Helios, or the Sun , the son of Vulcan , - - - - -	-	-	86	0	0
	3.	Agathodæmon, - - - - -	-	-	36	6	10
	4.	Cronus, or Saturn , - - - - -	-	-	40	6	0
	5.	Osiris and Isis , - - - - -	-	-	35	0	0
	6.	- - - - -	-	-	00	0	0
	7.	Typhon, - - - - -	-	-	29	0	0
		D E M I G O D S.
c	8.	Orus, - - - - -	-	-	25	0	0
	9.	Ares, or Mars , - - - - -	-	-	23	0	0
	10.	Anubis, - - - - -	-	-	17	0	0
	11.	Hercules, - - - - -	-	-	15	0	0
	12.	Apollo, - - - - -	-	-	25	0	0
	13.	Ammon, - - - - -	-	-	30	0	0
	14.	Tithoes, - - - - -	-	-	27	0	0
	15.	Sofus, - - - - -	-	-	31	0	0
	16.	Zeus, or Jupiter , - - - - -	-	-	10	0	0

d As to this table, it must be observed, that the numbers were no part of the original record, but added by some moderns, who have mangled the chronology according to their own fancies<sup>1</sup>, and therefore deserve no regard; though we have transcribed them as we found them in Syncellus.

Though the transcribers of Manetho<sup>m</sup> have generally taken it for granted, that this succession of princes were supposed by Manetho himself to have reigned before

The first seven of them only reigned before the flood.

<sup>1</sup> See the note †.      <sup>m</sup> AFRICANUS, EUSEBIUS, PANDORUS, & SYNCELLUS.

* This number of years in Manetho (which the modern chronologers unjustly correct to eleven thousand nine hundred and eighty five, or eleven thousand nine hundred and eighty eight, to make them agree with the larger numbers in the old chronicle, or in some other interpolators of Manetho) plainly shews the nine thousand years, if it be not a corrupted number, [or if those years were not lunar years] allowed here to the reign of Vulcan alone, did not belong to those dynasties themselves, but rather to that immense interval of time before the reigns of the antediluvian gods or kings were reckoned, or before the present settlement of the world began. Accordingly the old chronicle, as will be seen by and by, ascribes no number of years to this Vulcan, but thirty thousand to the Sun. Diodorus also assures us, that some reckoned Vulcan as the first of those gods, and others the Sun (1); which agrees well with the inscription on the Egyptian obelisk, to be produced hereafter, which calls Vulcan not an ordinary god himself, but the father of the gods (2).

† This exorbitant number of years has been taken by several of the later Greek historians not for solar, but lunar years or months; and accordingly, dividing the number of days of so many lunar revolutions by three hundred and sixty five, the number of days in a year, they reduce the nine thousand to seven hundred twenty four years and a half and four days; which way of reckoning, though Syncellus ridicules (3), yet it should seem from the testimony of ancient writers, to omit those of Africanus and Eusebius (4), to be the original computation, excepting only a small mistake, which we shall mention presently. For Diodorus says, some of the most ancient kings of the succession of the gods reigned above twelve hundred years a-piece; and that this appearing incredible, some supposed that the motion of the sun being not known in the first times, the year was described by the revolution of the moon (5); and with this do other authors of good credit (6) agree, who assure us that the old Egyptian year was lunar. It must only be observed, that the antediluvian year containing but three hundred and sixty days (7), the above-mentioned calculation must be rectified in that respect; and then the nine thousand years of Vulcan's reign will make just seventy five sari, or seven hundred and fifty years; which seems indeed a little disproportionate to the reigns of his six successors, which together can amount to no more than four hundred and fifty years. However, this way of computation will reduce this and the other extravagant numbers we meet with in the Egyptian history within some bounds of credibility.

(1) DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. p. 13. (2) WHISTON'S Appendix to his Essay to restore the true text, &c. p. cxc. (3) SYNCCELL. p. 18. (4) Apud eund. p. 17, & 40. (5) DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. p. 22

(6) PLUTARCH. in Numa, p. 72. PLIN. Hist. nat. l. 7. c. 48. MACROB. Sat. l. 1. c. 14. LACTANT. Instit. l. 1. EUDOXUS apud Proclum, in Tim. l. 1. p. 31. (7) See before, p. 91. in the notes.

the flood; yet we very much doubt whether that historian really made the nine last, called a demigods, to be antediluvians. For it appears from the sum of the years, which these gods and demigods are said to have reigned, that all of them could not possibly have reigned before the flood, even according to the Hebrew account; and if the epoch of the Egyptian kingdom began the same year with that of the Babylonians, as is expressly said, the total of the reigns of their antediluvian princes could not exceed twelve hundred years. Besides, the number of sixteen kings seems too large in proportion to that of the Babylonian kings, and of the generations of Moses in the same period. It is therefore more conformable to Manetho's chronology, to suppose the first seven only, whom he calls Gods, and the old chronicle Aurita*, were antediluvians; and that they reigned b twelve hundred years, part of the nineteen hundred and eighty five*, the remainder of which will be accounted for hereafter. And this hypothesis seems to be confirmed from the consideration of the last of these gods Typhon, who probably reigned immediately before the flood, and perished therein. For several circumstances of the deluge are mentioned in the history of Osiris and Typhon; particularly the very day when it began, or when Osiris (who is taken for Noah) was shut up in the ark†; The name of Typhon, according to some learned men, signifies also a deluge or inundation‡; whence the Egyptian priests called the sea Typhon§: and Typhon, or, as the Latin poets call him, Typhaus, is represented as a monstrous giant, warring against heaven, and at last overcome by Jupiter, and submersed in water¶. From all which it appears probable, c that he was one of those mighty men which were of old, whose wickedness was so exceeding great, that it drew down that judgment upon them‡.

THE first of these gods, Vulcan, from his inventing the working of metals, and instructing mankind therein, which is on all hands attributed to him, has been thought to be the same with the Tubal-cain of Moses, and to have been contemporary with Noah¶. But it seems a little inconsistent, that a person in the eighth generation from Adam, and the last recorded by Moses in the line of Cain, should have no less than six successors, whose reigns, together with his own, amounted to no less than twelve hundred years; when it cannot be supposed that Tubal-cain could be born at the soonest before the year of the world four hundred, according to the Samaritan, or five hundred according to the Hebrew chronology. d

By these gods, Manetho, as he elsewhere explains himself, meant no more than mortal men, who for their wisdom and goodness were severally promoted to the regal dignity, and afterwards made immortal¶. Their particular inventions, and prudent institutions, which gained them this honour from the people, we may more conveniently consider when we enter on the history of the Egyptian nation: since, besides the interruptions which must be occasioned by attempting it in this place, there are so great disagreements throughout concerning these gods¶, that it would be in vain to endeavour to reconcile the foregoing table with the accounts of the Greek authors, which seem rather to relate to the times after the flood. For the Greeks were very liberal in bestowing the names of their gods, with or without foundation; and frequently gave e the same name to several persons: which has introduced a confusion that might have been avoided, had they given us the true Egyptian names, instead of undertaking to interpret them. Nor is this the only instance in which those writers, especially the later Greek chronographers, have corrupted and confounded Manetho's history, as will be observed hereafter.

* See the note † in p. 92.

¶ PLUTARCH de Isid. & Osir. p. 356.

¶ Idem, ibid. p. 363.

¶ APOLLON. Argon. l. 2. ver. 1215, &c. * Vid. Mr. ALLIN's Disc. of the ancient year, in Mr. Whiston's Theory, p. 169, &c. * TZETZES, Chiliad. 10. ver. 492, &c. * MANETHO, apud Euseb. de Prep. Ev. l. 1. c. 1. p. 45. Vid. DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 8. * DIOD. SIC. ibid. p. 21.

* Mr. Whiston (1) says that this very number, nineteen hundred and eighty five, for the antediluvian gods and semigods of Egypt, will not be at all too large for the present chronology, if we suppose it to extend from the beginning of the world to the death of the last of these semigods, Jupiter Hammon, or Ham; it only implying that he then outlived the deluge either three hundred and twenty nine, or four hundred and twenty nine years, [that is, according to the Hebrew chronology, or the Samaritan of Mr. Whiston] which exactly agrees with the length of men's lives at that time. But this cannot be allowed by us, who follow the chronology of the present Samaritan copy; for then Ham would live six hundred and seventy eight years after the flood, which would be above one hundred and fifty more than Ssem. Besides, it is unreasonable to suppose the first of these reigns commenced at the creation, and directly contrary to the original author, who makes the Babylonian and Egyptian kingdoms coeval, and to Mr. Whiston's own way of reckoning elsewhere (2): nor is it reasonable to continue Ham's reign (if he was Jupiter) immediately from the flood.

† The Arabs at this day express the general deluge by the word الطوفان al tufan.

(1) Appendix, ubi supra, p. cxc.

(2) In his Chronological Table.

■ HAVING mentioned the old Egyptian chronicle, it may be proper to acquaint the reader, that according to that record, Vulcan has no time assigned him, as appearing both night and day: the Sun, who was the son of Vulcan, reigned thirty thousand years: after him Saturn and the other twelve gods reigned three thousand nine hundred and eighty four years: then the eight demigods two hundred and seventeen years; after whom began the thirty dynasties *.

Thus have we put together the most material pieces of history to be found in profane authors, relating to the times preceding the flood; among which, though there be some which bear apparent marks of truth, yet we believe the greater part will be judged to deserve little credit: however, as every thing which has the least pretence to so great antiquity, cannot but be entertaining and curious, we hope our labour in collecting them will not be condemned as useless.

SECT. VI. Of the DELUGE.

THIRTEEN hundred and odd years after the earth was made and inhabited, it was overflowed and destroyed in a deluge of water. Not a deluge that was national only, or over-run some particular region, but over-spread the face of the whole earth, from pole to pole, and from east to west, and that in such excess, that the floods over-reached the tops of the highest mountains; the rains descending after an unusual manner, and the fountains of the great deep being broke open, so as a general destruction and devastation was brought upon the earth and all things in it, mankind and other living creatures; excepting only Noah and his family, who, by a special providence of God, was preserved in a certain ark, or vessel, with such kinds of living creatures as he took in to him. After these waters had raged for some time on the earth, they began to lessen and shrink, and the great waves and fluctuations of this deep, or abyss, being quieted by degrees, the waters retired into their channels and caverns within the earth; and the mountains and fields began to appear, and the whole habitable earth in that form and shape wherein we now see it. Then the world began again, and from that little remnant preserved in the ark, the present race of mankind, and of animals, in the known parts of the earth, were propagated. Thus perished the old world, and the present arose from the ruins and remains of it *.

Year of the World, 1307.
Year before Christ, 2999.
A short history of the flood.

This is a short story of the greatest event that ever yet happened in the world; the greatest revolution, and the greatest change in nature: which therefore justly deserves to be more particularly considered in all its circumstances.

THAT there was such an universal destruction by water, as is related by Moses, is confirmed by the concurrent testimonies of several of the most antient writers and nations in the world. What account the Chaldean records give of it, we have already seen *. The Indian and Persian traditions we may mention hereafter. That the Egyptians were no strangers to this event, appears not only from those circumstances in the story of Osiris and Typhon mentioned above †, but from the testimony of Plato; who says that a certain Egyptian priest recounted to Solon, out of their sacred books, the history of the universal flood, which happened long before the particular inundations known to the Græcians ‡. The inhabitants of Heliopolis in Syria shewed a chasm or cleft in the earth in the temple of Juno, which, as they say, swallowed up the waters of the flood §. Nay, the very Americans are said to acknowledge and speak of Profane testimonies of this catastrophe.

* Chron. Verus apud STINCELL. p. 51. & EUSEB. Chron. Gr. p. 6.    † Vid. BURNER'S Theory, Book 1. c. 2.    ‡ Pag. 91, 92.    § Pag. 94.    ¶ PLATO, in Timæo.    * LUCIAN. de Dea Syria, l. 2. p. 882.

* The author, who mentions this, says the Greeks gave an account of the universal deluge, [which they and others (1) have confounded with that of Dencalion] too curious to be omitted. The tradition goes, proceeds he, that the present race of men was not the first, for they totally perished; but is of a second generation, which being descended from Dencalion, encreased to a great multitude. Now of these former men they relate this story: They were very insolent, and addicted to unjust actions; for they neither kept their oaths, nor were hospitable to strangers, nor gave ear to suppliants; for which reason this great calamity befel them. On a sudden the earth poured forth a vast quantity of water, great showers fell, the rivers overflowed, and the sea arose to a prodigious height; so that all things became water, and all men were destroyed: only Dencalion was left unto a second generation, on account of his prudence and piety. He was saved in this manner: he went into a large ark, or chest (Αρπη) which he had, together with his sons and their wives; and when he was in, there entered swine, and horses, and lions, and serpents, and all other creatures which live on the earth, by pairs. He received them all, and they did him no hurt, but the gods created a great friendship among them; so they sailed all in one chest while the water prevailed.

(1) Vid. OVID. Metam. l. 1. ver. 260, &c.

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 1999.

it in their continent<sup>f</sup>: and we are told that there is a tradition among the Chinese, a that Puoncu, with his family, escaped out of the general deluge<sup>g</sup>; though another expressly asserts the Chinese annals make no mention at all of the flood, and that it is a mistake in those who imagine they do<sup>h</sup>: however, it seems their historians do speak of a flood, which some suppose to be that of Noah<sup>i</sup>, but they do not make it universal<sup>k</sup>. Most nations have some tradition of a deluge, which happened in their respective countries: but it must be owned at the same time, that several of them were particular inundations only, and therefore carefully to be distinguished from that of Noah; though antient and modern writers frequently confound them together<sup>l</sup>, and relate circumstances of the one, which belong only to the other.

Whether topical.

SOME difficulties which seem to attend the Mosaic account of the deluge, such as b the finding out waters sufficient to drown the world, and the improbability of all sorts of animals being preserved in the ark, have induced some, even men of learning, to suppose that Noah's flood was not universal, but national only, and confined to Judea and the regions thereabouts<sup>m</sup>, or perhaps to that track of land which lies between the four seas, the Persian, Caspian, Euxine, and Mediterranean<sup>n</sup>, or at most reached no farther than the continent of Asia<sup>o</sup>. And to support this presumption, they alledge, that since the primary design of the flood was to destroy mankind only, who could hardly be thought in so short a time to have overspread the face of the whole earth, there was no necessity to carry the waters beyond the bounds of what was inhabited: and though in this case all the animals in the world (which were probably farther propagated than man, being created in greater numbers, and perhaps in divers parts) might not have been destroyed; yet it is conceived that it was necessary to save some in the ark for future propagation, and that men might have them ready for their use presently after the flood, which could not otherwise have been<sup>p</sup>. One author indeed has gone so far, as to suppose that all mankind did not perish in the deluge, and has endeavoured to prove, from a peculiar exposition of the curses of Cain and Lamech, that the Africans and Indians are of their posterity<sup>q</sup>. But as he has elsewhere himself confuted this opinion by the strongest arguments<sup>r</sup>, we shall say no more of it. And it is easy to shew, against those who hold the former opinion, that they deny a matter of fact to get over a difficulty, and that the deluge was universal in its extent as d well as effect.

<sup>f</sup> J. DE LAET, de Orig. Gent. Americ. p. 215. Vid. etiam ACOSTAM, HERRERAM, &c. <sup>g</sup> VOSSIUS, Ep. ad Andr. Colvium, p. 409. <sup>h</sup> COUPLET, Pref. ad Tab. Chronol. p. 3, 8. <sup>i</sup> Vid. MARTINII Hist. Sinic. l. 1. p. 12, & 39. <sup>k</sup> See LE CLERC's Dissertations. <sup>l</sup> STILLINGFLEET, Orig. Sacre. book 3. c. 4. p. 540. Vid. VOSSIUM de at. mundi, p. 283. <sup>m</sup> STILLINGFLEET, ibid. <sup>n</sup> See BEDFORD's Scripture Chronol. p. 39. <sup>o</sup> See WHISTON's Theory, &c. p. 158, 388, &c.

prevailed. These things the Greeks relate of Deucalion. But as to what happened after this, there is an antient tradition among those of Hierapolis, which deserves admiration: viz. that in their country a great chasm opened, and received all the water; whereupon Deucalion erected altars, and built the temple of Juno over the chasm. This same chasm, says our author, I have seen, and it is a very small one, under the temple; whether it was formerly bigger, and since lessened, I cannot tell, but that which I have seen is little. In commemoration of this history, they do thus: twice in every year water is brought from the sea to the temple, and not by the priests only, but all Syria and Arabia, many come from beyond Euphrates to the sea, and all carry water, which they first pour out in the temple, and afterwards it sinks into the chasm, which, though it be small, receives abundance of water. And when they do this, they say Deucalion instituted the ceremony in that temple as a memorial of the calamity, and of his deliverance from it (1).

* An Arab, who travelled into China about the beginning of the ninth century, giving an account of a conversation he had with the emperor, among other things, says, that mentioning the flood to that prince, on occasion of a picture of Noah which he shewed him, and telling him that that prophet, and those who were saved with him in the ark, peopled the whole earth; the emperor laughed, and said, "Thou art not deceived as to the name of Noah;" but as to the universal deluge we know nothing of it. It is true that the deluge did drown a part of the earth, but it did not reach so far as "our country, nor yet to the Indies (2)." Ebn Shoknab ranks the Chinese among those who deny the flood.

† Not only Deucalion's flood in Thessaly, but those of Ogyges in Attica, and Prometheus in Egypt, have been thought the same with that of Noah (3). Those spoken of by the Americans seem to have been national; as was that of Asia minor, mentioned by Diodorus (4), from the Samothracian tradition, which yet they pretended was the most antient of all: to omit several others enumerated by Sir W. Raleigh (5), some of which he has taken from the spurious Xenophon of Annius.

‡ Melo, who wrote a book against the Jews, speaking of the deluge, seems to make it topical, and not to have reached Armenia. His words are these: "At the time of the deluge, a man who had escaped with his sons, went from Armenia, being driven out of his possessions by those of the country; and passing over the intermediate region, came into the mountainous part of Syria, which was then desolate (6)."

(1) LUCIAN, de Dea Syria, tom. 2. p. 882. Ed. Benedicti. (2) Anciennes relations des Indes & de la Chine, p. 67. (3) Vid. HEIDEGGER, Hist. Patr. tom. 1. Exerc. 18. § 52. (4) Lib. 5.

p. 322. (5) Hist. of the world, part 1. book 1. c. 7. § 6. (6) MELO apud Euseb. de Præp. Ev. l. 9. c. 19. (7) Genes. iv. 15. (8) Ibid. & ver. 24.

- a FOR, 1. The scriptures put this matter out of doubt, expressly telling us, that all the high hills under the whole heaven were covered by the waters, and that all flesh died that moved upon the earth, except only Noah and those that were with him in the ark *. Nor will the terms of Moses allow the word earth in this place to be restrained, as it may in some others, to Judea †, or any other particular track of land: for, unless the laws of nature were miraculously suspended, before the waters in one region, much less a whole continent, could exceed the tops of the highest mountains, they would certainly diffuse themselves and overflow the rest of the earth. 2. If the deluge was topical, there was no need of the ark; Noah and his family needed only to have retired to another country, which he might do with more ease, and in less time, than build so vast a vessel; the beasts might have saved themselves by flight, or their loss, especially those of the unclean kinds, have been replenished from other places; and the birds might, without much difficulty, have flown to another continent. 3. The number of mankind before the flood was vastly superior to what the present earth is, perhaps, capable of sustaining, as will appear hereafter; and the waters must therefore have overspread, in all probability, a larger part of the earth than is now known to be inhabited: and consequently the whole globe, that none might escape the divine vengeance, must have been overflowed. 4. The earth itself seems to offer us a demonstrative argument of the universality of the deluge, from the vast numbers of the shells and teeth of fish, bones of animals, entire or partial vegetables, and other strange things, which are to be found on the tops of the highest mountains, and in the bowels of the earth, at a great distance from the sea, and were probably left by the flood ‡.

Year of the World, 1207.
Year before Christ, 2999.

It is now time to consider by what means this terrible devastation was brought on the earth, and in what manner those that escaped it were preserved.

If the deluge was universal, the quantity of water required to effect it is so immense, that it has been generally thought extremely difficult, if not impossible, to say whence it came, or whither it went. The proportion of water sufficient to cause such an inundation, has been computed at eight oceans †; but a person well able to make the calculation, says, that there must have been, at the lowest computation, twenty Conjectures as to the manner wherein the deluge was effected.

* LE CLERC's Dissert. BURNET's Theory, Book I. c. 3. & WHISTON's Theory, ubi supra, & p. 275, &c.

† BURNET's Theory, Book I. c. 2.

* The words of Moses one would think are too plain to admit any subterfuge. GOD looked upon the earth, and beheld it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And GOD said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me—and I will destroy them with the earth (1). Behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die (2).—Every living substance that I have made, will I destroy from off the face of the earth (3).—And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of soul, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man. All in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died. And every living substance was destroyed which was upon the face of the ground, both man, and cattle, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven; and they were destroyed from the earth: and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark (4).

† Peyrerius, one part of whose præ-adamite system is, that the flood extended no farther than Judea, which he supposes to be all that Moses meant by the earth, would also persuade us, that that writer, by mankind which were to be destroyed, intended the posterity of Adam; by the living creatures, the Gentiles or præ-adamites, mixed with the race of Adam; and by the great deep, the sea of Palestine (5).

‡ This argument is offered with some diffidence:

for though the most experienced philosophers now agree, that these shells, &c. are not mock-productions of nature, or originally formed in the places where they are found by some plastic power of salts, or other minerals, (which was the conjecture of Dr. Plot (6), and other naturalists) inasmuch as they are not to be distinguished from real shells, teeth, &c. by the nicest examination of the eye, and even the microscope, and burn not immediately into a calx or lime, as all stony or stony substances do, but first into a coal, and then into a calx, which is the known quality of things of a bony or fleshy nature; yet they do not agree that these things were brought in by the universal deluge, for this reason, among several others, that living animals, or fish, have been found in some of those fossil shells (7), and that such marine substances are sometimes formed and generated in human bodies (8); and therefore it is supposed they were formed by a spermatric principle, as fish spawn received into the chinks and other meat's of the earth, and falling down in rains, &c. (9) which may be allowed, indeed, of the several kinds of shell-fish, whose shells might preserve them in the earth, but can hardly be admitted as to others of those fossils, such as the glossopetra, or teeth of the shark, and the other bones of larger creatures. As to the subterraneous woods and fossil trees, there seems to be no great reason to believe they were thrown down by the deluge, and have lain buried in the earth ever since; it being much more probable, that they either were occasioned by inundations of the sea, or were filled by men in the places where they now lie; as is undeniable of many of them, which still shew the marks of the ax (10).

(1) Genes. vi. 12, 13. (2) Ibid. ver. 17. (3) Genes. vii. 4.

(4) Ibid. ver. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23. (5) PEYRER. Præ-adamit. (6) Nat. Hist. of Oxfordshire.

(7) See Mrs. LLWYD's letter in

Mrs. RAY's Physiol. Disc. p. 181. (8) Ibid. p. 184.

(9) Ibid. p. 190, &c. (10) Ibid. RAY's Physiol. Disc. p. 228.

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 1999.

two oceans<sup>r</sup>. And where to find this is the question. There are the clouds above, and a the deeps below and in the bowels of the earth; and these are all the stores we have for water<sup>s</sup>: and Moses directs us to no other for the causes of the deluge; The fountains of the great deep, says he, were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened; and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights<sup>t</sup>. By the great deep some understand the ocean<sup>u</sup>, but others, with more reason, the subterraneous abyfs or vast collection of waters in the bowels of the earth<sup>v</sup>. But it is thought the waters which either the abyfs or the rain could afford, will fall prodigiously short of the proportion required. According to the observations made of the quantity of water that falls in rain, the rains could not afford one ocean, nor half an ocean, and would be a very inconsiderable part of what was necessary for a deluge<sup>w</sup>. If it rained forty days and forty b nights throughout the whole earth at once, it might be sufficient to lay all the lower grounds under water, but it would signify very little as to the overflowing of the mountains; so that it has been said, that if the deluge had been made by rains only, there would have needed not forty days, but forty years to have brought it to pass<sup>x</sup>. And if we suppose the whole atmosphere condensed into water, it would not at all have been sufficient for this effect; for it is certain that it could not have risen above thirty two foot, which is well known to be the usual height to which water can be raised by the pressure of the atmosphere<sup>y</sup>; for the weight of the whole air, when condensed into water, can be no more than equal to its weight in its natural state, and must become no less than eight hundred times denser, for that is the difference between the weight of c the heaviest air, and that of water<sup>z</sup>. And as to the abyfs, if by it we intend the sea, that is no higher than the land, as some have formerly imagined, and therefore could contribute nothing to the deluge; it would keep its bed as it does now, and take up the same place: and if we understand the subterraneous waters, they would be quiet in their cells, and not ascend otherwise than by force; and if force were used to draw them out on the surface of the earth, their places must be filled again with other waters, so as this turns to no account upon the whole<sup>a</sup>.

THIS being the case, some cut the knot which they cannot loose, and shew us the naked arm of omnipotence; saying, that G O D created waters on purpose to make the deluge, and then annihilated them again when the deluge was to cease. But our business is not here to enquire what G O D could work by his almighty power, but to account for this event in the best manner we can from natural causes; nor are we rashly to fly to the divine omnipotence, especially for the creation of new matter. Moses plainly assigns natural causes of the deluge, forty days rain, and the disruption of the abyfs; and St. Peter has assigned a cause also, the natural constitution of the world<sup>b</sup>; and neither of them mention a word of a new creation of waters. Others therefore, instead of a creation, suppose a transmutation, and say the air was changed into water, and that was the great instrumental cause of the deluge<sup>c</sup>. But this opinion agrees as little with the philosophy of Moses or St. Peter as the last, and renders the opening of the abyfs perfectly needless<sup>d</sup>: besides, such a transmutation would in effect e be no more than a condensation, the insufficiency of which has been already shown. According to a third expedient, the rain and sea-waters were rarefied so as to reach the determined height: but if the waters were fifteen times rarer than they naturally are (as in that case they must have been) it is hard to say how they could either drown man or beast, keep alive the fish, or support the ark<sup>f</sup>. A fourth opinion is, that

<sup>r</sup> Dr. KEILL, in his Remarks on WHISTON'S Theory. Vid. RAY'S Disc. p. 118. <sup>s</sup> Genes. vii. 11; 12.

<sup>t</sup> Vid. CLERIC. Comment. in loc.

<sup>u</sup> Vid. MERSENN. Cogit. Physico-mech. p. 221.

<sup>w</sup> Auct. Catene in Genes. vii. 4.

<sup>x</sup> VOÏSIUS in Epist. ad And. Colvum, p. 385.

<sup>y</sup> See Dr.

HALLEY'S Dissert. in the Philos. Transf. Vol. XVI. p. 104.

<sup>z</sup> BURNET ubi sup.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Pet. ii. 6.

<sup>b</sup> KIRCHER. de arca Noe, l. 2.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. BURNET ubi sup. & c. 3.

<sup>d</sup> Vid. VOSS. ubi sup.

* Moses, in his account of the creation, speaking of waters above the firmament (1), though it be generally understood of the clouds and aqueous vapours sustained in the middle region of the air (2), yet some have fancied them to be waters placed above the heavens, and have been willing to make use of them for a supply, when they could not find enough under the heavens to make up the mass of the deluge; though if these imaginary waters were there, how to get them down, or to lift them up again, is not easy to tell. But since the system of the world has been better known, and the nature of the heavens, it is presumed there are none that would assert these super-celestial waters, much less make that extravagant use of them, as to bring them down hither for a cause of the deluge (3).

† Notwithstanding the word אֲבוּיָם Abuiym, depth; in some passages (4) is supposed to signify the sea, yet it may be there much better interpreted of subterraneous waters, as it manifestly must in other places (5). And being here joined with the epithet רַבָּה rabbah, great, it seems Moses intended that vast collection of waters, which the most sagacious naturalists place in the womb of the earth, the receptacle of the greatest part of that deep which covered the earth at the beginning of the creation (6).

(1) Genes. i. 6, 7. (2) See the Introd. p. 42. b.

(3) BURNET'S Theory, Book 1. c. 2. (4) Psal.

xxxiii. 7. Prov. viii. 27, 28. (5) Deut. viii. 7. Ezek.

xxxi. 4. (6) Genes. i. 2. Vid. BURNET, B. 1. c. 7.

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 2999.

- a the antediluvian earth, with all its stones, metals, mineral concretions, and all fossils whatsoever that had obtained any solidity, was totally dissolved in the deluge, the cohesion of its parts perfectly ceasing: that the corpuscles of these solid fossils, together with the corpuscles of those which were not before solid, such as earth, sand, and the like; as also animal bodies and parts of animals, bones, teeth, shells; vegetables and parts of vegetables, trees, shrubs, herbs; in short, all bodies whatsoever which were either in the earth, or that constituted the mass of it, if not quite down to the abyss, yet at least to the greatest depth we ever dig, all these were promiscuously taken up into the waters, and made one common mass: that at length they subsided downwards together, generally, and as near as might be expected in such a confusion, according to the laws of gravity; and thus formed the strata of stone, marble, coal, and the rest, of which the earth manifestly consists; and there being bodies of different kinds and constitutions, which are nearly of the same specific gravity, it thence happened that bodies of quite different kinds subsided at the same instant, and fell together with the same stratum; for which reason the shells of cockles, escallops, and the rest, which have a greater degree of gravity, were enclosed and lodged in the strata of stone and marble, and the heavier kinds of terrestrial matter, the lighter shells not sinking down till afterwards, and so falling among the lighter matter, as chalk and the like<sup>d</sup>. But this strange and bold hypothesis, to which the author was driven to solve these phenomena of the interior parts of the earth (which yet might possibly be otherwise accounted for<sup>e</sup>) is so little consistent with the Mosaic history of the deluge, takes so little notice of the opening the windows of heaven, and is so contrary to the universal law of mutual attraction, and the specific gravities of bodies, accounts for so few of the phenomena of the deluge, implies such a new sort of formation or creation of the earth at the deluge, without warrant for the same, and is so much more than his observations require, or will support, that it cannot engage the assent of any considering person<sup>f</sup>. A fifth opinion is, that though the rains might afford a vast quantity of water towards a deluge, yet the chief cause was the changing the centre of the earth, and setting it nearer to the centre or middle of our continent; whereupon the Atlantic and Pacific oceans must needs press upon the subterraneous abyss, and so by mediation thereof force the water upwards, and compel it to run out at these wide mouths and apertures made by the divine power breaking up the fountains of the great deep. These waters thus poured out from the orifices of the fountains upon the earth, the declivity being changed by the removal of the centre, could not flow down to the sea again, but must needs stagnate upon the earth, and overflow it, and afterwards, the earth returning to its old centre, return also to their former receptacles. This hypothesis gives a fair and easy solution of all the phenomena of the deluge, save only the generality of it, making it topical, and confining it to our continent: for which reason a very sagacious naturalist, who otherwise approves it, proposes a sixth way of solving them; and that is, by supposing that the divine power might at that time, by the instrumentality of some natural agent, to us at present unknown, so depress the surface of the ocean, as to force the waters of the abyss through the beforementioned channels and apertures, and so make them a partial and concurrent cause of the deluge. And it appears from instances, that there are, at some times, in the course of nature, extraordinary pressures on the surface of the sea<sup>g</sup>, which force the waters outwards upon the shores to a great height<sup>h</sup>. But this we fear is too occult a cause to give much satisfaction to a philosophic enquirer.

We have still to consider the hypotheses of two persons well known in the republic of letters, whose theories we have consulted on other occasions; Dr. Burnet and Mr. Whiston.

- f To have a complete idea of that of the former, we must remember that he conceives the first earth, from the manner of its formation, to have been externally regular and uniform, of a smooth and even surface, without mountains, and without a sea; and that the waters belonging to it were wholly enclosed within or under its upper

Dr. Burnet's
Theory.

<sup>d</sup> Woodward's Nat. Hist. of the Earth.

Whiston's Theory, p. 276, &c. and Ray's Disc. p. 165, &c.

<sup>e</sup> See before, p. 97. and after, § 7.

<sup>g</sup> Ray, ibid. p. 117, &c.

<sup>f</sup> See

<sup>h</sup> We had upon our coasts, not many years ago, an extraordinary tide, wherein the water rose so high as to overflow all the sea-banks, drown multitudes of cattle, and fill the lower rooms of the houses of many villages that stood near the sea, so that the inhabitants, to save themselves, were forced to get into their upper rooms and garrets. And how this could be effected, but by an unusual pressure on the superficies of the ocean, our author cannot well conceive (1).

(1) Ray, Disc. c. 2. p. 119.

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 2999.

crust, which formed a stupendous vault around them <sup>a</sup>. This vast collection of waters <sup>a</sup> he takes to have been the great deep, or abyfs of Moses<sup>1</sup>, and that the disruption of it was the chief cause of the deluge. For he supposes that the earth being for some hundreds of years exposed to the continual heat of the sun, which, by reason of the perpendicular position he imagines the earth's axis then had to the plane of the elliptic, was very intense, and not allayed by that diversity of seasons which now keeps our earth in an equality of temper <sup>2</sup>, its exterior crust was at length very much dried; and when the heat had pierced the shell, and reached the waters beneath it, they began to be rarefied and raised into vapours, which rarefaction made them require more space than they needed before, and finding themselves pent in by the exterior earth, they pressed with violence against that arch to make it yield to their dilatation. And as the repeated action of the sun gave force to those enclosed vapours more and more, and made them more strong and violent, so on the other hand it weakened more and more the arch of the earth that was to resist them, sucking out the moisture that was the cement of its parts, and parching and chapping it in sundry places; and there being no winter to close up its parts, it grew more and more disposed to a dissolution, and at length, when GOD's appointed time was come, the whole fabric broke, and the frame of the earth was torn in pieces as by an earthquake; and those great portions, or fragments, into which it was divided, fell down into the abyfs, some in one posture, and some in another <sup>1</sup>.

THIS hypothesis the author thinks not only agrees with the narration of Moses, <sup>c</sup> and answers the assertion of St. Peter, that the first earth was obnoxious to a deluge from its constitution <sup>m</sup>, but supplies all the defects of other explications. The fall of those prodigious fragments would raise a vast commotion in the abyfs, and throw its waves to a great height, which would overwhelm the mountains, now first formed, for some time: for after the first violent shock, he imagines there were ever and anon some secondary ruins which broke and made new commotions, till at length, when all the ruins were settled and fixed, the waters began to settle too, and the dry land to appear. Thus the earth put on a new form, and became divided into sea and land; the greatest part of the abyfs constituting our present ocean, and the rest filling up the lower cavities of the earth, mountains and hills appeared on the land, islands in the sea, and <sup>d</sup> rocks upon the shore: and so providence at one stroke dissolved the old world, and made a new one out of its ruins, which we now inhabit <sup>n</sup>.

BUT though it be reasonable to believe the first earth had its axis inclined to the plane of the ecliptic as well as the present, and had the same vicissitudes of seasons; yet allowing the theorist's supposition of its parallel position to be true, it is not conceivable the heat of the sun would even then have had the power he imagines, or affect the earth in such a degree as to cause great cracks or fissures in it, or to raise the water under it into vapours, since we find no such effects in the hottest country or season; nor is it probable such rarefaction, were it possible, should be so extreme as to break through an arch of some hundred miles thick. Besides, it is to be feared, that if the action of the sun was so strong, the abyfs, the only storehouse of waters in the first earth, would have been near exhausted <sup>2</sup> before the time of the deluge. This account also seems not very consonant to the Mosaic history, which describes a gradual rise and abatement, and long continuance of the flood, not a violent transient shock, which would not have lasted many days, if hours <sup>o</sup>: not to mention the little use our author makes of the rains, which he supposes indeed to have fallen throughout the earth (though he does not know how that could proceed from natural causes) and to have contributed to the disruption of the abyfs, by weakening the arch of the earth, and stopping its pores, which would make the vapours struggle the more violently; and that nothing but a miracle could save the ark in so prodigious a storm and convulsion <sup>f</sup> of nature <sup>p</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> See the Introduction, p. 37. b.

<sup>1</sup> BURNET's Theory, Book. 1. c. 7.

<sup>2</sup> See before, p. 66. d.

<sup>1</sup> BURNET, ubi sup. c. 6. p. 95, &c.

<sup>m</sup> 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6, 7.

<sup>n</sup> BURNET, ubi sup. p. 101, &c.

<sup>o</sup> Vid. KEILL's Examination of BURNET's Theory.

<sup>p</sup> BURNET, ubi sup. p. 133, 136, &c.

* Dr. Keill has made a plain calculation of this matter, and concludes, that since none of the antediluvian rivers, according to the theorist, returned into the abyfs again, it must needs follow, that in eight hundred and twelve years it would be quite empty, upon supposition that there were as many rivers in the primitive earth as are in ours: but as there was then twice the land, if there were no seas, so there must be allowed twice as many rivers to water it; and by such a double quantity, the abyfs would be emptied in half that time (1).

(1) KEILL's Examination of Dr. BURNET's Theory, p. 164.

a THE expedient of the other learned theorist is the trajection of a comet *, which he supposes passed so close by the body of the earth, at the time of the deluge, as to involve it in its atmosphere and tail. On which hypothesis, he proceeds to account for the deluge in this manner:

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 2999.

He says, that when the earth had passed through the tail and atmosphere of the comet, which he supposes to consist of vapours rarefied and expanded in different degrees, and in which it would remain, on calculation, for about two hours, it must have acquired a large cylindrical column of vapours, whose basis were somewhat larger than one of the earth's greatest circles, and whose altitude were equal to the diameter of the comet's atmosphere: that these vapours would be impeded from descending towards the sun by the earth's interposition and attractive power, and so would fall down with great violence on its surface; a great part of which being in a very rare and expanded condition, after their primary fall, would immediately be mounted into the air, and afterwards, on their condensation, descend in violent and outrageous rains on the face of the earth, and very naturally occasion the forty days and forty nights rains mentioned by Moses.

Mr. Whiston's
Theory.

THAT the presence of this comet, as it approached and came below the moon, would cause a double tide, as well in the seas above, as in the abyss below; that in the seas would be less considerable, but the other would be vastly great, and produce mighty effects. For on the nearest approach of the comet, the surface of the abyss would put on an elliptic or oval, instead of its former spherical figure, and the orb of earth which rested on it would be obliged to accommodate itself to that larger oval surface; which being impossible for it to do while it remained solid, it must of necessity enlarge itself, and by the violent force of the increasing surface of the abyss, be stretched, cracked, and have innumerable fissures made quite through it; or rather the tide must open and enlarge those fissures which were produced at the commencement of the diurnal rotation. Thus would the fountains of the deep be broken up, and sufficient gaps made for a communication between the abyss below and the surface of the earth above; which was no sooner done, than the fall of the cometic waters began, and quickly covered the earth, and crowded the air with vast quantities thereof; which waters being adventitious, and of a prodigious weight, must press downwards with a mighty force, and endeavour to sink the orb of earth deeper into the abyss, according as the entire weight of each column of earth and its incumbent water together did now require, agreeably to the laws of hydrostatics; which laws he supposes not to have been exactly complied with at the earth's first subsiding into the abyss, otherwise he could scarce have expected any elevation of the subterraneous waters. But since the lower strata of the earth were, according to him, in a good measure settled and consolidated together before the upper were all formed, the whole compages would archwise sustain itself much higher than the law of specific gravity would otherwise require; and so upon the disruption of the upper earth, its several columns, as there was room, would settle themselves lower than they were at first, and their weight, augmented by the additional waters of the comet, would squeeze and press on the surface of the abyss; which being a fluid mass, and incapable of sustaining a pressure on one part, without equally communicating it to all the rest, must burst out wherever such pressure was wanting, and throw itself up the fissures, through which it would ascend with a mighty force, and carry up with it whatever was in its way, whether earth or water, and thereby add to the quantity of water already on the face of the earth, and become a fresh augmentation of that deluge which began already to overwhelm and destroy the inhabitants thereof.

THE abatement and decrease of the waters of the deluge, our author supposes was first by a wind, which dried up some; and secondly, by their descent through those breaches and fissures (at which part of them had ascended) into the bowels of the earth, which received the rest. To which latter also the wind, by hurrying the waters up and down, and so promoting their lighting into the before-mentioned fissures, was very subservient. The air he grants could sustain a very inconsiderable quantity in comparison of the entire mass; but as he supposes the antediluvian earth, though it was not

* WHISTON'S Theory, p. 376, &c. 380, &c.

* That a comet actually appeared at the deluge, is attested by several authors (1). Pliny (2) mentions one which appeared in the reign of Typhon, that is, at the flood, or immediately before it; and speaks of the direful effects of it. And our author has endeavoured to prove, that the last most remarkable comet, which was seen in these parts in the year 1680, (whose revolution he computes to be in about 575 years, and whose trajectory Sir Isaac Newton has delineated) was that very comet which came by the earth at the beginning of Noah's deluge, and which was the cause of the same (3).

(1) Vid. HAVELII cometograph. l. 12. p. 794.
(2) Hist. nat. l. 2. 25.

(3) WHISTON'S Theory, p. 187.

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 2999.

deficite of lesser seas and lakes, yet to have had no great ocean, separating one continent a from another, and covering so large a portion of it, as the present earth has<sup>c</sup>; he conceives the upper region of the earth, being generally dry and porous, and of a great thickness, was capable of receiving a much greater quantity of water than was on the earth at the time of the deluge<sup>a</sup>.

To this theory objections have been made, as well as to the former: for, though there are some surprizing coincidents, which make it indeed probable that a comet did really come very near, and passed by the earth when the deluge began, and might cause a prodigious tide in the sea, and in the abyfs; yet it has been thought somewhat strange, that the swelling of the abyfs should have such an effect as to make convenient fissures in the solid crust of earth which enclosed it, without shattering its whole frame. Nor b has the theorist's account of draining off the waters from the surface of the earth, been judged satisfactory; it being difficult to conceive, that those subterraneous cavities, which he supposes could contain but a small proportion of the waters requisite to make the deluge, should yet be capable of receiving the greatest part of them when it was over. These difficulties however might possibly receive a solution: but the greatest objection of all is, that it is far from being clear, whether the atmosphere of a comet be a watery substance or no; or if it were, that it should afford such a vast quantity of water as the theory has occasion for, on the earth's bare passing through it. For it is said, the observations of the most curious enquirers make it not improbable, that the circle about the body of the comet is nothing but the curling and winding round of c the smoke, rising at first to a determinate height from all parts of the comet, and then making off to that part of it which is opposite to the sun. And if this opinion be true, the earth, by passing through the atmosphere of the comet, ran a greater risque of a conflagration than a deluge<sup>c</sup>.

The most rational account of the deluge.

It seems therefore, after all, that the divine assistance must be called in on this occasion. For though the waters which covered the earth at the creation, might be sufficient to cover it again; yet how this should be effected by mere natural means, cannot be conceived. The waters which were suspended in the clouds, might indeed descend upon the earth, and that in cataracts or spouts of water (as the Septuagint interpret the windows of heaven) like those in the Judies, where the clouds frequently, instead of dropping, fall with a terrible violence in a kind of torrent<sup>d</sup>; and this alone might cause a great inundation in the lower grounds: but as the clouds could pour down no more water than they had, which would soon be exhausted at this rate, it seems from the length of the rains continuance, that the showers were rather moderate and gradual. The subterraneous stores would afford a much more plentiful supply to compleat the deluge, and probably contain more water than enough to drown the world to a greater height than Moses relates<sup>e</sup>: the only difficulty is to draw it out of the abyfs on the surface of the earth. And here, since we can assign no natural cause, we apprehend we may, not unphilosophically, resolve it into the divine power, which might on this occasion so far controul (no greater a miracle than that of continuing) e the usual course of nature, as to effect its purpose. And indeed the event was so extraordinary, and the consequences thereof so considerable, that it is very reasonable to believe God did in an especial manner interpose therein. The Stoics, who supposed alternate destructions of the earth by fire and water, made no doubt of the possibility of a general deluge. "There are vast lakes, says Seneca, which we do not see; great part of the sea lies hidden and concealed, and many rivers glide in secret; so that there may be causes of a deluge on all sides, when some waters flow in under the earth, others flow round about it, and being long pent up, overwhelm it: and as our bodies sometimes dissolve into sweat, so the earth shall melt, and, without the help

<sup>a</sup> WHISTON'S Theory, p. 374. See also p. 61. marks on Whiston's Theory, and NICHOLL'S Conference, Vol. I. and RAY, ubi sup. p. 116.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 401, &c.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. KEILL'S Re-

<sup>d</sup> Vid. PATRICK'S Comments

* Though Sir W. Raleigh (1) allows thirty miles for the height of the mountains, yet the highest in the world will not be found to be above five direct miles in height. Olympus, whose height is so extolled by the poets, does not exceed a mile and a half perpendicular, and about seventy paces. Mount Atlas, which is said to cast its shade into the Isle of Lemnos (according to Pliny eighty seven miles) is not above two miles in height; nor

Caucasus much more (2): nay, the pike of Teneriff, reputed the highest mountain in the world, may be ascended in three days, (according to the proportion of eight furlongs to a day's journey) which makes it about the height of a German mile perpendicular (3). And the Spaniards affirm, that the Andes, those lofty mountains of Peru, in comparison of which, they say, the Alps are but cottages, may be ascended in four days compass (4).

(1) Hist. of the world, Book 1. c. 7. §. 6. (2) Vid. Voss, in Melam. l. 2. c. 2.

(3) Vid. VAREN.

Geogr. l. 1. c. 10. prop. 3. FLEET'S Orig. Sac. p. 544, &c.

(4) STILLING-

- a " of other causes, shall find in itself what shall drown it, there being in all places, both
 " openly and secretly, both from above and from beneath, an eruption of waters, ready
 " to overflow and destroy it ".

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 2999.

HAVING thus considered the efficient causes of the deluge, we must next take a view of the ark, whereby Noah and his family were delivered from this destruction.

Of the ark.

- WE might presume, if Moses had not told us so, that a vessel proportionable and adapted to the use designed, must have been of more than human contrivance, and built by the direction of God himself. The length of it was 300 cubits, the breadth 50, and the height 30; but what was the exact measure of the cubit here mentioned is disputed. Some, fearing the capacity of the ark would be otherwise too small for the intended purpose, have enlarged the dimensions even to extravagance*: but the general opinion of learned Men is, that they were but common cubits<sup>2</sup>, one of which, though formerly supposed equal to eighteen of our inches<sup>3</sup>, is now allowed to contain almost 22, or more exactly 21.888<sup>4</sup>. According to which measure, the ark must have been 547.2 English feet long, 91.2 broad, and 54.72 high, and the solid contents 2,730,781.9008 feet, almost double to what they would be by the former computation. The form of it was an oblong square, or parallelopiped, with a flat bottom, and a sloped roof raised a cubit in the middle<sup>5</sup>; it had neither sails nor rudder, nor was it made sharp so as to cut the water: which form, as it was admirably contrived for lying steadily on the water without rolling, which might have endangered the lives of the animals within it, so it was very unfit for swimming to a great distance, or for riding in a boisterous sea. It consisted of three stories, each of which, abating the thickness of the floors, might be about eighteen foot high, and was partitioned into a great many rooms or apartments<sup>6</sup>. This vessel was without doubt so contrived as to have the benefit of the air and light on all sides<sup>7</sup>, though the particular construction of the windows be not mentioned; and the whole seems to have had another covering besides the roof, probably made of skins, like that of the tabernacle<sup>8</sup>.

THAT the space in the ark was abundantly sufficient to contain both Noah and his family, and the animals, and all necessary provisions for them, does evidently appear from the geometrical calculations of learned men<sup>9</sup>, who have yet generally supposed * SENEC. Nat. quest. l. 3. c. 27.      * Vid. BUTRON. de arca Noe. POOL's Synopsis, in loc.

 † Vid. BERNARD. de mensuris & ponder. antiq. l. 3.      * See the preface.      * Genes. vi. 14, 15, 16.
 Ibid. ver. 14, 16.

* When Celsus objected that the ark was a monster with all things in its belly (1), Origen answered, that the ark was like a great city, whose base was 90,000 cubits long, and 15,000 broad (2); but in another place he is more moderate, and without encreasing the number of the Mosaic cubits, supposes they were geometrical cubits, each containing six ordinary cubits (3); which last opinion is approved by St. Austin (4). Some, who cannot digest these geometrical cubits, suppose the ark was measured by a larger cubit of three foot (5), or by the sacred cubit, which was larger by a hand's breadth than the common cubit (6), all without the least ground or intimation to that purpose in the sacred historian. Sir Walter Raleigh (7) supposes the antediluvian cubit was larger than that which was afterwards in use; because, as he imagines, mankind were then of a larger stature: but this gains no room in the ark, because the bulk of its cargo must have been encreased in proportion.

† There are various translations of the word Sohar (8), which is found but once in the whole bible in this sense. Our version renders it window, as it seems very properly; for the root in the Chaldee signifies to shine, or to give light; wherefore one of the paraphrasts (9) imagines Sohar to have been a precious stone or carbuncle, which Noah was to fetch from the river Phison, to illuminate the ark. From the following words, and in a cubit shalt thou finish it above, some have supposed the window was to have been a cubit square, or but a cubit high, which would have been much too small; but the relative it being in the Hebrew of the feminine gender, and Sohar of the masculine, those two words cannot agree; and therefore the proper antecedent seems to be the ark, which was to be covered with a roof raised a cubit high in the middle.

‡ Noah is said, after the flood, to have removed the covering of the ark (10), which cannot well be supposed to have been the roof, but something flung over it, like that of the tabernacle, which is expressed by the same Hebrew word; and the use of it was probably to hang over and defend the windows in bad weather.

** Bishop Wilkins has reduced the number of species of animals, which at first view may seem almost infinite, within very moderate bounds; he reckons they do not amount to one hundred of quadrupeds, and two hundred of birds; and of these must be excepted such as live in the water, such as proceed from a mixture of different species, and such as change their colour, size, and shape, by changing their climate; and thence, in different countries, seem to be of different species, when they are not. He afterwards enters into a particular detail of the animals, the quantity of food necessary for them, and of the capacity and proportion of the ark; and concludes, there was room enough, and to spare: whereupon he observes, that had the most skilful mathematicians and philosophers been set to consult what proportions a vessel designed for such an use should have in the several parts of it, they could not have pitched p. 30. (6) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. Tom. I. Esen. 17. §. 10. (7) Ubi sup. §. 9. (8) Genes. vi. 16. (9) JONATHAN. (10) Genes. viii. 13.

(1) ἡ ἀρχὴ τοῦ ἀνατολῆς ἡδὺν ἡδὺν. (2) ORIGEN. com. Cels. l. 4. Vid. KIRCHER, de arca Noe, c. 8. (3) Idem, Homil. 2. in Genes. (4) De Civit. Dei, l. 14. c. 27. (5) CAPPEL. Hist. Sacra.

Year of the
World, 1307.
Year before
Christ, 2999.

the length of the cubit to have been but eighteen inches<sup>c</sup>; whereas, if we take the dimensions according to the larger measure abovementioned, the whole capacity will be nearly doubled<sup>d</sup>, as may be easily proved.

BUT another objection has been raised against the preservation of animals in the ark, which may not be so easily answered; and that is, how the unknown kinds of serpents in Brasil, the slow bellied creature of the Indies, and all those strange species of animals seen in the West-Indies, should either come into the ark, or be conveyed out of it into those countries which are divided from that continent where Noah was, by so vast an ocean on one side, and at least so large a track of land on the other (supposing a passage out of one continent to the other, which has not been yet discovered) and some animals cannot live out of the particular clime wherein they are<sup>e</sup>. But to this it may be answered, that it is probable, that the temperature of the air, before the deluge, was so equal and serene, that all kinds, even of the American animals, might live and be found in those parts of Asia when Noah went into the ark, though none of them could bear the climate since, by reason of the change in nature. The great difficulty is how to get them into America after the flood was over: and here we confess we cannot tell how that was done, any more than we can by what means America was peopled; and yet even those who contend for a partial deluge, allow the inhabitants of that country to be descendants of Noah<sup>f</sup>.

Its materials.

THE timber of which the ark was framed, Moses calls Gopher wood<sup>g</sup>; but what tree the Gopher was<sup>h</sup>, is controverted. Some will have it the cedar<sup>i</sup>, others the pine<sup>j</sup>, some the box<sup>k</sup>, and others, particularly the Mohammedans, the Indian plane tree<sup>l</sup>: but they seem to be in the right who suppose it to be the cypress<sup>m</sup>; which, besides the resemblance in name, is allowed to be a very proper sort of timber for the building of ships<sup>n</sup>, and not subject to rot<sup>o</sup>. To preserve it from leaking, Noah was directed to pitch it with pitch both within and without; which requiring a very large quantity, some have supposed it to be not pitch but bitumen, such as was used in the building the tower of Babel: which is probable enough, though Moses uses a different word in that place.

Where built.

NOR is there less disagreement as to the place where the ark was built, and the time spent therein. One supposes it was built in Palestine, and that Noah planted the cedars of which he made it, in the plains of Sodom<sup>p</sup>; another takes it to have been built near mount Caucasus, on the confines of India<sup>q</sup>; and a third, in China, where he imagines Noah dwelt before the flood<sup>r</sup>: but the place seems rather to have been somewhere near Eden; from whence it is to be presumed Noah would not remove far, though not for the reason alledged by some<sup>s</sup>, viz. because he was the eldest son in a lineal descent from Seth, which is no way certain from scripture; nor can we think it was far from Ararat, where the ark rested, that being a vessel which could not be driven to a great distance. It was therefore probably built in Chaldea, in the territories of Babylon<sup>t</sup>; where there was so great a quantity of cypress in the groves and gardens in Alexander's time, that that prince built a whole fleet out of it for want of other timber<sup>u</sup>. And this

<sup>c</sup> BUTEO, de arca Noe. Bishop WILKIN'S Essay towards a real character. Dissert. sur l'arche de Noe.

<sup>d</sup> STILLINGFLEET'S Orig. Sacr. l. 3. c. 4. p. 542.

<sup>e</sup> Targum of ONKELOS, and most of the old Rabbins.

<sup>f</sup> MUNSTER.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. PELETIER

<sup>h</sup> Genes. vi. 14.

<sup>i</sup> Scholiast. Grec.

<sup>j</sup> EUTYCH. p. 34. D'HERBEEL. p. 675.

<sup>k</sup> FULLER Miscell. l. 4. c. 5. BOCHART. Phaleg.

lib. 1. c. 4. <sup>l</sup> Vid. PLUTARCH. Sympos. lib. 1. quest. 2. VEGET. l. 4. c. 34. PLATO, de legib.

l. 4. <sup>m</sup> VITRUV. l. 2. c. 9. PLIN. l. 16. c. 40. THEOPHRAST. Hist. plant. l. 5. c. 5. <sup>n</sup> JA-COB. EDESSEN, apud Barcepham, de parad. part. 1. c. 14. p. 38. <sup>o</sup> TEMPORARIUS Chronol.

Demonst. l. 1. <sup>p</sup> WHISTON'S Theory, p. 387, &c. <sup>q</sup> Dr. WELLS'S Geogr. of the old Test. vol. I.

p. 65. <sup>r</sup> Vid. BOCHART. ubi supra. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. I. Exerc. 17. §. 20. <sup>s</sup> STRABO, pitched on any more suitable to the purpose than those mentioned by Moses (1). It is not to be expected we should here examine the several plans given of the ark, which may serve indeed to shew us the possible, but not the real disposition of it; however, for the readers satisfaction, we have inserted a view of the ark, according to that plan which seems to us most likely to be the true one.

l. 16. p. 1072, & 1076. ARRIAN. de Exped. Alex. l. 7.

* Mr. Whiston thinks it most probable, that some were preserved from the deluge in the American continent as well as in this, though we have no records left among them to give us notice of it. The silence of the Sacred historian as to that world, he takes to be no objection, because he supposes the whole earth of Moses comprehends no more than the then known parts of the world (2).

† Aben Ezra and Kimhi only say it is a sort of wood so called, which is light, and swims on the water. The Vulgate and Septuagint take the word Gopher not to denote the species of timber, but for an adjective; the first translating ligna levigata, smoothed or planed timber, and the other ξύλα τετραγωνα, square timber (3). Vossius endeavours to prove, that the expression of this last version signifies not timber squared by the workman, but such sort of trees whose branches shoot quadrangularly, or by four and four, at equal distances from the earth. Of which kind are the pine, fir, cedar, and some others; but not the cypress (4).

(1) WILKIN'S Essay, &c. See also TEMPORARIUS, Chronol. Demonstr. lib. 1. p. 32. (2) WHIS-

TON'S Theory, p. 409, &c.

(3) Vid. EUTYCH.

p. 34. (4) VOSS. de Sept. Interp. c. 11.

conjecture

a conjecture is confirmed by the Chaldean tradition, which makes Xisuthrus sail from that country *. Year of the World, 1307. Year before Christ, 2999. And in what time.

As to the time, a Rabbin says, the ark was fifty two years in building *: the fathers and oriental authors, a hundred *, because Noah is said to be an hundred years old before any mention is made of the ark †. Some from the words of St. Peter, that the long-suffering of God waited while the ark was preparing ‡, suppose Noah was employed therein the whole time of forbearance †, which was one hundred and twenty years †: and others think the time much shorter, because Noah's three sons, the eldest of whom was born in his five hundredth year, are not only mentioned before the directions given for the ark, but they and their wives are ordered to be taken into the ark in those very directions †, which seems to imply they were then married; and yet they had no children till after the flood, unless they perished in the deluge. But there is no such connection or exact order of time kept in this whole narration, as to establish any of these conjectures. All we can affirm, is, that such a vessel as the ark, and the necessary preparations of timber for it, could not be the work of a few years.

THE appointed time of the deluge being come, and all things in readiness, Noah, at God's command, went into the ark with his wife, his sons, and his daughters-in-law †; and he took in to him, pursuant to the divine directions, of all kinds of beasts, and of fowls, and of every thing that creepeth on the earth; of the unclean by pairs, and of the clean by sevens, the male and his female † †. Noah went into the ark in the fix Year of the World, 1308. Year before Christ, 2998. Noah, &c. enter into the ark, and the flood begins.

* See before, p. 61, &c. † R. ELIEZER Pirke, c. 23. ‡ ORIGEN. GREGOR. AUGUSTIN. &c. ELMACIN. p. 11. † Genes. v. 32. † 2 Pet. iii. 20. † BEDFORD'S scripture chronol. p. 21. Vid. R. SOLOMON. † Genes. vi. 3. † Ibid. ver. 18. † Genes. vii. 7. and 2, &c.

* It is certain, both from the testimony of Moses and St. Peter (1), that eight persons, and no more, were saved in the ark; and though there be a tradition among the Mohammedans to the same effect, which is said to have been received from their prophet himself, yet others of them report this number variously: some say they were but six; others ten; others twelve; others seventy eight; others four-score, half men and half women (2); and that one of them was the elder Jorham (3), the preserver, as some pretend, of the Arabian language. But it is more extraordinary, that a christian writer should encrease the number of Noah's family, by supposing he had daughters of his own, and their husbands, his sons-in-law, with him in the ark (4). The Mohammedans, on the other hand, also tell us, that the family of Noah were not all saved; but that one of his sons named Yam (5), or Canaan (6), whom some make his grandson, and the son of Ham (7), and others his wife's son by another husband (8), perished in the flood. The Korans says Noah called to his son from the ark, saying, Embark with us, my son, and stay not with the unbelievers: he answered, I will get on a mountain, which will secure me from the waters; to which Noah replied, There is no security this day against the decree of God, unless for them on whom he shall have mercy. And immediately a wave separating them, he was drowned (9). Some commentators (10) add, that Noah's wife likewise perished with her son.

The Eastern authors differ as to the name of Noah's wife. Some of the Jews call her Tishah, or Arisfab (11); others say she was Naamah, the daughter of Lamech (12), of the race of Cain. The Gnostics called her Noria; for which Epipha- nus (13) reprehends them, and says her name was Barthemos. Eutychius tells us Noah's wife was Hai-cal, the daughter of Namusa, the son of Enoch; and that Shem's wife was named Salit; Ham's, Nablat; and Japhet's, Arisfab; and that they were all three the daughters of Methuselah (14). But these deserve the same credit as the Sibyl, who pretends she was in the ark with Noah, being one of his daughters-in-law (15).

The Eastern authors add, that Noah, in pursuance of the directions of Adam, handed to him for that purpose (16), took the body of that patriarch with him into the ark, and placed it in the midst of the vessel, as a barrier between the men and the women, who had no commerce during the deluge (17).

† It is a doubt whether there went into the ark but seven of every clean, and two of every unclean species, or fourteen of the first, and four of the last. Some adhere to the former exposition (18), and others to the latter (19), which seems to be the natural sense of the Hebrew words, seven and seven; and two and two; the male and his female (20). Besides, if there were but seven of the clean beasts, one must have been without a mate; and if we answer, that the odd one was for sacrifice (21), it is more than Moses tells us, who, on the contrary, repeats it, that the animals all went in by pairs (22). If this be admitted, the capacity which we have allowed the ark, being double to what bishop Wilkins computes it, will be no more than necessary for double the number of animals; especially if we consider the birds all went in by sevens: unless the distinguishing word clean, which is inserted in the Samaritan text, and in the Septuagint and Syriac versions, should be supplied in the Hebrew (23).

(1) 1 Pet. iii. 20. (2) AL ZAMAKHSHARI & JALLALO'DDIN in Alcor. c. 11. ver. 40. EBN SHOHNAH. (3) Idem. (4) CONST. MANASSER apud HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. Tom. I. Exerc. 17. §. 23. (5) EBN SHOHNAH. (6) JALLALO'DDIN. (7) D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient. p. 676. (8) AL ZAMAKHSHARI. (9) AL Koran. c. 11. ver. 43. (10) JALLALO'DDIN. & AL ZAMAKHSH. (11) Shalsel. Hakkab. p. 92. (12) Berebit Rabbah, & Shalsel. Hakkab. p. 7. (13) Harsif. 26. (14) EU-

TYCH. p. 34. (15) SIBYLLA ERYTHR. l. 3. (16) See before, p. 80. (17) EUTYCH. p. 38. Vid. ELIEZER. Pirke, c. 23. YAHYA, in Al Koran. apud Maracc. p. 340. (18) JOSEPH. Ant. l. 1. c. 3. AUGUST. de civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 27. HIERONYM. cont. Jovin. l. 2, &c. (19) JUSTIN. MARTYR. ORIGEN. ABEN EZRA, &c. (20) Genes. vii. 2. (21) THEODORET quass. 50. in Genes. R. SOLOMON. (22) Genes. vii. 9, 15, 16. (23) Vid. CLERIC. in loc. HEIDEGG. ubi sup. §. 25.

Year of the
World, 1308.
Year before
Christ, 2998.

The waters assuage.

Year of the
World, 1305.
Year before
Christ, 2998.
Noah, &c.
leave the ark.

hundredth year of his age, on the seventeenth day of the second month*, which answers to our second of December*, while the rest of mankind were in the height of security, and contemning the repeated admonitions of Noah, did eat and drink, did marry wives, and were given in marriage, until the flood came and destroyed them all<sup>c</sup>. For on the self-same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened; and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights. The waters of the flood continued gradually to encrease for five months, till they reached their utmost height, which was fifteen cubits, or upwards, or twenty seven foot above the tops of the highest mountains; but they seem to have been free from storms or violent commotions, and to have raised and carried the ark gently along; that vessel, as has been observed, being unable to abide a stormy sea.

At the end of the five months, God caused a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters began to assuage, the two sources which fed them being stopped and restrained. On the very first day of their decrease, viz. the seventeenth of the seventh month, or the second of May, they fell so much, that the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat: and by the first of the tenth month, or fifteenth of July, the tops of the neighbouring mountains began to appear. Forty days after, or about the twenty third of August, Noah, the better to judge of the height of the waters, opened the window or lattice of the room where the birds were kept, and let out a raven †, which flew to and fro till the earth was dry, but gave Noah no satisfactory information; whereupon he sent out a dove ‡ three several times, staying seven days between each. The first time the dove quickly returned, finding no place dry enough for her to rest on; the second time she came back in the evening, bringing in her mouth an olive leaf plucked off, which shewed a considerable abatement of the waters; and the third time she returned no more.

On the first day of the first month, answering to our seventh of October, in the six hundredth and first year of Noah's life, that patriarch removed the covering of the ark, to have a more extended view, and saw the surface of the earth was cleared of the waters; however, he stayed sometime longer in the ark, till the twenty seventh of the * Genes. vii. 6, 11, 13.

† Matt. xxiv. 38. Luke xvii. 27.

If it be asked by what means Noah got all these animals together into the ark, the best answer that has been given is, that they came voluntarily, by a supernatural impulse from God (1); which seems to be intimated by the words of scripture (2): though others suppose it was done by the assistance of angels (3).

* Several writers have fallen into mistakes as to the day when the flood began, by computing from the vernal equinox. But since the antediluvian year indisputably commenced from the autumnal equinox, the seventeenth day of the second month will fall about the time we have fixed it, according to the Samaritan chronology; and according to the Hebrew, on the seventh of December, as archbishop Usher computes (4); on the sixth of November, as others reckon (5); or, more exactly, on the twenty-eighth day of November, which is the calculation of Mr. Wiston (6).

It is remarkable, that the day assigned by Moses for the beginning of the deluge, agrees exactly with the day wherein Plutarch tells us Osiris went into the ark, viz. the seventeenth of Athyr, which month is the second after the autumnal equinox, the sun then passing through Scorpius (7). Nor does it differ above a day or two from that set down by Berosus, if we allow what probably may have been the case, that that writer, or his transcribers, fell into the mistake abovementioned, and supposed the flood began the second month from the vernal equinox, which was Desius (8); whereas the true month was Apellans, the second from the autumnal equinox.

The Mahomedans say the flood began the tenth of Rajeb (9).

† The raven is supposed to have been sent out, because Noah thought the smell of the carcases would tempt him to fly to some distance (10); instead of which he kept hovering about the ark, having some jealousy, as the Jews pretend, of his mate (11). Though the Hebrew says the raven returned again, yet according to the Septuagint, Syriac, and Vulgate versions, he did not return; wherefore it is thought he perished in the waters (12). The Rabbins have framed a dialogue on this occasion between Noah and the raven, who asking why he was picked out to be sent on that errand, Noah told him, because the world might well be without ravens, which were neither fit for food, nor for sacrifice (13).

‡ The dove was probably sent because of her tameness, her flying far, feeding on the ground, and returning to her nest from the greatest distance (14). Some of the Jews pretend she took the olive leaf from paradise, others from mount Olivet; for they imagine Judas was not drowned in the deluge (15). From the olive leaf Noah might infer, that the lower hills, where those trees chiefly grow, were left by the waters, and that the vegetables were not totally destroyed (16). The Chaldean tradition agrees with the Mosaic history in the circumstance of the birds being sent out by Xisuthrus (17). And Plutarch says, that according to the mythologists, a dove was let out of the ark, and that her going out was to Deucalion a sign of fair weather, and her return of foul (18).

(1) Vid. PHILON. Jud. de vita Moysi, l. 2. p. 663. JALLALO'DDIN in al Koran apud Maracc. ubi sup.
(2) Genes. vii. 20. vii. 9. (3) ELIEZ. Pirke, c. 23. (4) Annal. ad A. M. 1656. (5) Vid. CLERIC. in loc. (6) Theory, p. 218. (7) PLUT. de Iside & Osiride, p. 356. D. (8) Vid. GALEN. Comment. in l. 1. Epid. (9) EBN SHOKHAN.

(10) Vid. BOCHART. Hieroz. part. 2. l. 2. c. 12. (11) In Aggudtah. (12) Vid. BOCHART. ubi sup. (13) Beresbit rabbah, §. 33. (14) BOCHART. ubi sup. l. 1. c. 6. (15) Beresbit rabbah. ubi sup. (16) BOCHART. ubi sup. (17) See before, p. 92. (18) PLUTARCH. de solert. animal. p. 968.

a second month, or the second of December, when by God's direction he came forth out of the ark, with his family and all that were with him, having remained therein a year and ten days, according to the antediluvian computation; and according to the present, a full year, or three hundred sixty five days *.

Year of the World, 1309: Year before Christ, 2997.

We shall conclude this section with adding a word or two concerning the Persian and Indian traditions relating to the deluge.

The Persian and Indian traditions of the flood.

An eastern writer tells us, that some of those who embrace the Magian religion, are said to deny the flood, or at least the universality of it, pretending it reached no further than a cliff near Hulwan †, a city of Irak, bordering on Curdestan. Yet the orthodox among them acknowledge this general destruction by water, wherein all mankind b perished, except some few that were preserved by providence; and that it was sent by God to punish the crimes of mankind, one of whom, named Malcus, was a monster of wickedness and impiety. One odd circumstance mentioned by them is, that the first waters of the deluge gushed out of the oven * of a certain old woman named Zala Cusfa †.

We are told, by the same author, that the Indians acknowledge no deluge: but this must not be understood of all; for the Bramins say, that the four tribes, or casts, of which the first race of men consisted, degenerating from their primitive innocence, the priest neglecting his piety, the soldier becoming insolent and tyrannical, the merchant practising deceit in trade, and using false balances, and the artizan spending the profits of his inventions in riot and excess; their impiety and wickedness grew at length c to so insufferable an height, that God's indignation was justly provoked, and he sent a flood which destroyed all nations without exception: after which, God, to repair mankind, created three persons of greater excellency than those of the former generation; to one of whom, named Bremaw, he gave the power of creating men and animals, which he executed accordingly; the first human pair proceeding one from his right side, the other from his left. The man was called Manow, and the woman Ceteroupa, and by them was the earth replenished †. It must be observed, however, that these people believe several alternate destructions and reparations of mankind; and some of them say, there have been already no less than three destructions by water, d and that another is yet to be expected by the same element †.

SECT. VII.

Of the state of the antediluvian world, and the changes made in the earth by the deluge.

WE cannot dismiss the history of the old world, without taking a transient view of the antediluvian state of mankind, and of the alterations which have been e wrought in nature by the flood.

Of the state of the old world.

THE religion, policy, arts and sciences of these first men would be a very entertaining subject, if the greatest part of what can be said on these heads was not reducible to a few conjectures.

THE only thing we know as to their religious rites is, that they offered sacrifices, and that very early, both of the fruits of the earth, and of animals; but whether the blood and flesh of the animals, or only their milk and wool were offered, is a dispute which we shall consider elsewhere. Some have endeavoured to prove, that all the patriarchs from Adam had stated places, and annual and weekly times set apart for divine worship, and also a separate maintenance for the priests; all which particulars f may be true, though they cannot be made out from scripture. But what is more extraordinary, they pretend to tell us the very day of the week on which the antedi-

The religion of the antediluvians.

* Genes. vii. and viii.

† EDW. SHORHAN.

‡ Vid. HYDE, de rel. vet. Persar. c. 10. and LOEB's account of the religion of the Perses, p. 9.

* LOEB's Discourse of the Banian religion,

c. 6, and 7. † Propag. of the gospel in the east, part 1. lett. 3. See also the Introd. p. 33.

* Mohammed has borrowed this circumstance, and inserted it in his Koran (1). The commentators say, it was the sign by which Noah knew the flood was coming (2). And some pretend it was the same oven which Eve made use of to bake her bread in, being of a form different from those we use, having the mouth in the upper part; and that it descended from patriarch to patriarch, till it came to Noah (3).

(1) Al Koran. c. 11. ver. 40. and c. 23. ver. 28.

(2) Vid. MARACC. in Alc. p. 340.

(3) Vid. D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient. Art. Noab.

luvian sabbath was kept, and that it was the same with the Christian sabbath, or sunday *; ■ which notion we shall, in a proper place, shew to be very groundless and precarious.

Their arts and sciences.

OF the arts and sciences of these people we have not much more to say. They seem rather to have spent their time in luxury and wantonness, to which the abundant fertility of the first earth invited them, than in discoveries or improvements which probably they stood much less in need of than their successors. The art of working metals was found out by the last generation of Cain's line; and music, which they might be supposed to practise for their pleasure, was not brought to any perfection, if invented, before the same generation. Some authors have supposed astronomy to have been cultivated by the antediluvians, though this is probably owing to a mistake of Josephus b: but it is to be presumed the progress they made therein, or in any other science, was not extraordinary; it being even very doubtful whether letters were so much as known before the flood (as will be shewn in another place) whatever is pretended by some men who have conceived so high an opinion of Adam's knowledge, that they suppose it to have been almost universal; nor can any thing be inferred from the books attributed to that patriarch, or to Seth and Enoch c, which are forgeries too gross to deserve any consideration.

Their polity.

As to their politics and civil constitutions, we have not so much as any circumstances whereon to build conjectures. It is probable the patriarchal form of government, which certainly was the first, was set aside when tyranny and oppression began to take place, and much sooner among the race of Cain than that of Seth. It seems also that their communities were but few, and consisted of vastly larger numbers of people than any formed since the flood; or rather it is a question whether, after the union of the two great families of Seth and Cain, there were any distinction of civil societies, or diversity of regular governments at all; it is more likely that all mankind then made but one great nation, though living in a kind of anarchy, divided into several disorderly associations: which, as it was almost the natural consequence of their having, in all probability, but one common language, so it was a circumstance which greatly contributed to that general corruption, which otherwise perhaps could not have so universally overspread the antediluvian world. And for this reason chiefly, as it seems, so soon as the posterity of Noah were sufficiently increased, a plurality of tongues was miraculously introduced, d in order to divide them into distinct societies, and thereby prevent any such total depravation for the future.

THE state of the natural world before the flood seems to have been exceedingly different from what it is at present.

The old world more populous and fertile than the present.

THE antediluvian world was in all probability stocked with a much greater number of inhabitants than the present earth either actually does, or perhaps is capable of containing or supplying. This seems naturally to follow from the great length of their lives, which exceeding the present standard of life in the proportion, at least, of ten to one, the antediluvians must accordingly in any long space of time double themselves, at least, in about the tenth part of the time in which mankind do now double themselves; for they began to beget children as early, and left off as late in proportion as men do now, and the several children of the same father seem to have succeeded as quickly one after another as they usually do at this day; and as many generations which are but successive with us, were contemporary before the flood, the number of people living on the earth at once would be by that means sufficiently increased to answer any defect which might arise from other circumstances not considered. So that, if we make a computation on those principles *, we shall find that there were a considerable number of people in the world at the death of Abel, though their father Adam was * SMITH'S Doctrine of the Church of England concerning the LORD's day. Vid. BEDFORD'S Scripture Chronol. p. 6. b See before, p. 81. c See before, p. 78, 79.

* It is now generally owned, and that from good observations, that mankind do double themselves in about three hundred and sixty, or three hundred and seventy years; or allowance being made for all, but very uncommon and very rare cases of general wars, famines, plagues, and such like desolations, in about four hundred years. So that allowing the period for the doubling of mankind, from the creation to the deluge, to be ten times shorter, by reason of their so much longer lives; if we have a series of forty numbers beginning at two (for so many God created himself at first) and doubling themselves in forty, or for convenience in forty-one years at a mean, or one age with another, till the deluge, we shall, in some degree, obtain the sum total of mankind at the deluge, and also in the several ages before that time; though this period of doubling must still have been much shorter in the earliest, and longer in the latest times of the interval: which computation Mr. Wiston (2), to whom we are obliged for these observations, has given us in the following table.

(1) See Sir W. PETTY'S Essay on the multiplication of mankind; and the Philosophical Transactions, Nº 196. p. 597, &c. p. 249.

(2) Theory of the earth,

a not then 130 years old, and that the number of mankind before the deluge would easily amount to above one hundred thousand millions (even according to the Samaritan chronology) that is to twenty times as many as our present earth has in all probability now upon it, or can well be supposed capable of maintaining in its present constitution <sup>a</sup>. From whence it follows, that to sustain so much larger a number of inhabitants (besides the brute animals, which were very probably as numerous in proportion) the earth must have been much more fruitful before that desolation than it has been since <sup>b</sup>, though it was then barren in comparison of its primitive fertility before the fall.

ONE of the most extraordinary circumstances which occurs in the antediluvian history, is the vast length of mens lives in those first ages in comparison of our own. <sup>Of the longevity of the antediluvians.</sup> b Few now arrive to eighty or a hundred years, whereas before the flood they frequently lived to near a thousand; a disproportion almost incredible, were it not incontestably certain from the joint testimonies of sacred and profane writers <sup>c</sup>, whose authority in this point being not to be eluded, some, to reconcile the matter with probability, have imagined that the ages of those first men might possibly be computed not by solar years, but months <sup>d</sup>, which reduces the length of their lives rather to a shorter period than our own. But for this there is not the least foundation; besides the many absurdities that would thence follow, such as their begetting children at about six years of age, as some of them in that case must have done, and the contraction of the whole interval between the creation and the deluge to considerably less than two hundred years, even according to the larger computation of the Septuagint.

c THE causes of this longevity are variously assigned: some have imputed it to the sobriety of the antediluvians, and the simplicity of their diet; that they eat no flesh <sup>e</sup>, and had none of those provocations to gluttony, which wit and vice have since invented. This, were it true, might have some effect, but not possibly to such a degree as we are speaking of, since we have had many temperate and abstemious persons in latter ages, who yet seldom have exceeded the usual period. Others have imputed it to the excellency of their fruits, and some peculiar virtue in the herbs and plants of those days; but as the earth was cursed immediately after the fall, its fruits we may sup-

<sup>a</sup> WHISTON'S Theory, p. 246, &c.    <sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 256.    <sup>c</sup> VARRO, apud Lactant. Inst. divin. l. 1. c. 12. Vid. AUGUSTIN. de civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 12.

Series.	Years of doubling.	Years of the world.	Number of mankind.	Series.	Years of doubling.	Years of the world.	Number of mankind.
1	2	2	4	20	40	420	2,097,152
2	4	6	8	21	42	462	4,194,304
3	6	12	16	22	44	506	8,388,608
4	8	20	32	23	46	552	16,777,216
5	10	30	64	24	48	600	33,554,432
6	12	42	128	25	50	650	67,108,864
7	14	56	256	26	52	702	134,217,728
8	16	72	512	27	54	756	268,435,456
9	18	90	1,024	28	56	812	536,870,912
10	20	110	2,048	29	58	870	1,073,741,824
11	22	132	4,096	30	60	930	2,147,483,648
12	24	156	8,192	31	62	992	4,294,967,296
13	26	182	16,384	32	64	1056	8,589,924,592
14	28	210	32,768	33	66	1122	17,179,869,184
15	30	240	65,536	34	68	1190	34,359,738,368
16	32	272	131,072	35	70	1260	68,719,476,736
17	34	306	262,144	36	72	1332	137,438,953,472
18	36	342	524,288	37	74	1406	274,877,906,944
19	38	380	1,048,576	38	76	1482	549,755,813,888

* Josephus reckons up the testimonies of Menetho, Berosus, Moabius, Hesiodus, Jerom the Egyptian, and the writers of the Phœnician antiquities. He says also, that Hesiod, Hecataeus, Hellanicus, Acusilaus, Euborus, and Nicolaus, wrote that the antients lived a thousand years (1). Of all which testimonies we have none now extant, except only that of Hesiod (2).

† A learned physician has advanced a very contrary opinion. Among several causes of the longevity of the first men enumerated by him, one is their eating of raw flesh; the most nourishing and best parts whereof he supposes are carried off in dressing by the action of the fire (3).

(1) JOSEPH. Ant. l. 1. c. 4. & dieb. rer. 130, &c.

(2) In oper.

(3) BEVEROVICIUS Thef. Sanitat. l. 3.

pose gradually decreased in their virtue and goodness till the flood; and yet we do not see the length of mens lives decreased considerably, if at all, during that interval. Others have thought that the long lives of those inhabitants of the old world proceeded from the strength of their stamina, or first principles of their bodily constitutions; which might indeed be a concurrent, but not the sole and adequate cause of their longevity: for Shem, who was born before the deluge, and had all the virtue of the antediluvian constitution, fell three hundred years short of the age of his fore-fathers, because the greatest part of his life was passed after the flood *.

It has therefore been more rationally supposed, that the chief cause of this longevity was the salubrious constitution of the antediluvian air, which after the deluge became corrupted and unwholesome, breaking by degrees the pristine crasis of the body, and shortening mens lives, in a very few ages, to near the present standard. But how the flood should induce or occasion such a change in the air, is not easy to comprehend *.

The changes made in the world at the deluge, according to Dr. Burnet,

Dr. BURNET, as he attributes the fertility and paradisiacal state of the first earth to a perpetual equinox, the consequence of the direct or parallel position which he supposes the earth then had to the sun; so he thinks the barrenness of the present earth, and the malignity of our air, are owing to the inequality of seasons introduced at the deluge, when the earth, being broken and shattered, lost its poise, and fell into that oblique situation which it now has †. Thence proceeded an unequal temperature of the air, violent exhalations, meteors, thunder, lightening, rain, snow, hail, ice, tempestuous winds, and the like, to which the earth was before an utter stranger, causing a sensible decay in nature, and a gradual contraction of human life *.

—and Mr. Whiston,

Mr. WHISTON is of the same opinion as to the different states of the air before and since the deluge, and the effects thereof on human bodies, as well as on the productions of the earth; but assigns very different causes for both. He thinks the purity and equality of the antediluvian air were the natural and regular properties of an original earth, such as one would rationally expect in a world newly come out of the hands of its creator, and such as the generality of our fellow planets (especially our next neighbour the moon) as far as we can observe, are supposed to have had at first, and hitherto retained. So that all that can in reason be desired, is to give a plain account of those opposite phenomena of the earth which we are now so sensible of, and by what means the deluge could occasion the same †. And this he endeavours to do, by supposing, 1. That the comet, which, according to his hypothesis, was the cause of the deluge, in passing by the earth, by its attraction accelerated the earth's annual motion, and changed its then circular orbit into an ellipsis<sup>m</sup>; and, 2. That the earth at the deluge carried off vast quantities of the gross heterogeneous and indigested masses with which the chaotic atmosphere of the comet was crowded; part of which were received into our air, and the other part, being mixed with the waters derived from the comet, settled and formed a new crust over the surface of the earth, which was somewhat increased by the dirt and soil thrown up by the subterraneous waters, and washed from the mountains *.

THESE two great changes in the natural world would have very considerable consequences. That made in the earth's orbit, besides altering the form of the year *, would, by placing us at a greater distance from the sun, occasion a very sensible decrease in the heat of that luminary, which must (on calculation) have been a twenty fifth part greater before the flood than since †. The primigenial soil would lie buried under the sediment or factitious crust, which he computes to be about one hundred and five foot thick ‡, wherein the fertile mold would be much thinner spread than before the deluge; considering which circumstances, together with the great damp put to the influence of the central heat, as well by the waters of the deluge, as the consolidation of the adventitious sediment, it naturally follows that the present earth could

* BURNET's Theory, Book 2. c. 2, 4. See STACKHOUSE's Body of Divinity, p. 307, &c.

† RAY on the deluge, p. 122.

‡ See before, p. 66, 67.

* BURNET's Theory, Book 2.

c. 2, 3.

† WHISTON's Theory, p. 363.

‡ Ibid. p. 207, &c.

* Ibid. p. 275, 417.

• Ibid. p. 363.

• Ibid. p. 418.

* The antediluvian year was, according to this gentleman, in absolute space of time nearly equal to our present and ancient lunar one, and above ten days, or, more nicely, ten days, one hour, twenty eight minutes and an half shorter than our present solar year; yet it contained three hundred and sixty antediluvian days, which were equal to only three hundred and fifty five days, four hours, and about twenty minutes of our present days; the earth's diurnal motion having been retarded, and our days consequently lengthened in that proportion, partly by the quantity of foreign matter derived from the comet at the deluge, and partly from another cause (1).

(1) WHISTON's Theory, p. 208, 209, 210.

- a be nothing near so fruitful and luxuriant in her productions as the antediluvian was<sup>1</sup>. This supposition of a new crust acquired by the earth at the flood, by the way, also accounts for the phenomena we formerly mentioned of the bones, teeth, and shells of fish, and other marine and vegetable productions so frequently dug up, even on mountains, and at great distances from the sea<sup>2</sup>. The heterogeneous composition of our present gross atmosphere, acquired likewise from the comet, must necessarily occasion great irregularities and depravations in the temperature and constitution of the air. For the difference of climates being not wholly owing to the sun's heat, or the nature of the air, but partly to those calorific and frigorific mixtures which are uncertainly contained therein; and our air being now in the torrid zone full of sulphureous and sultry, and in b the frigid ones of nitrous and freezing effluvia or exhalations, which may be removed, on the veering of the wind, from one region to another; those extremities of heat and cold, and sudden changes in the temper of the air, which we are now so sensible of, are thence easily accounted for; and the same nitro-sulphureous and other heterogeneous mixtures and exhalations might likewise occasion those coruscations, meteors, thunder, lightening, clouds, rain, winds, and storms, so common with us; from which, and their pernicious effects, the pure homogeneous antediluvian air was perfectly free<sup>3</sup>.

As both the theorists deny there was any rain, at least in the habitable parts of the primitive earth, it may be asked what expedients they have found out to supply it with water. Mr. Whiston, who allows there were rivers, lakes, and seas (though no great c ocean) in the first earth, effects this with little difficulty; supposing the vapours elevated by the sun in the day, which the purity and thinness of the air hindered from condensing and falling down in rain, descended however in regular and gentle mists in the night<sup>4</sup>. But Dr. Burnet, in whose antediluvian earth there were neither mountains nor seas*, and the whole element of water was locked up in the abyss, is obliged to have recourse to a more extraordinary explication. He says, that the action of the sun being very strong and constant in raising vapours, and the earth at first moist and soft, as it grew more dry, the rays of the sun would pierce more deep into it, and reach at length the great abyss which lay underneath, and was an inexhausted storehouse of new vapours †. Those vapours would be hindered by the heat from condensing into clouds d or rains in the warmer parts of the earth, and there being no mountains nor contrary winds to stop or compress them, would bend their course where they found the least resistance, and that would be towards the poles or colder regions, where, when they were arrived, they would be condensed and fall down in a continual rain or dew upon those parts of the earth, so that there would be a constant source of waters, which would neither fail nor overflow, but find the earth with an equal supply throughout all the parts of the year. And to account for the flowing of these waters on the even surface of the earth, and of their forming themselves into rivers, which seems a difficulty not easily to be got over, he supposes the earth was not exactly spherical, but oval, the polar parts being higher than the equinoctial, that is, more remote from the center; by which means the waters which fell about the extreme parts would have a continual descent towards the middle parts of it, forming by the way lakes, and dividing e into lesser and lesser streams, till at length they were either exhaled again by the sun, or drank up by the thirsty sands of the torrid zone<sup>5</sup>.

If either of these hypotheses be admitted, the dispute whether there was any rain—Whether any bow or not before the deluge must be at an end. For in an air, wherein there fell no rainbows before the flood.

* Ibid. p. 363, &c. † Ibid. p. 423, &c. ‡ Ibid. p. 365, &c. § Ibid. p. 369. ¶ BURNET'S Theory, p. 310, &c.

* To this form of the primæval world, and the change made therein by the deluge, Dr. Burnet (1) has met with a surprizing testimony from an Ethiopian tradition delivered to the count Balthasar Castiglione by a philosopher of that nation then in Spain, which is to the following effect, viz. That the first earth was much more spacious than the present, and nearer to heaven: that it was perfectly round, without mountains or vallies, but all hollow, or full of cavities within, like a sponge: that the inhabitants breathed a most pure air, and passed their lives happily; the earth spontaneously bringing forth most excellent fruits without plowing or sowing: but after some ages, when mankind, elated with pride, had degenerated from their primitive innocence, the angry gods shook the earth with so vehement a concussion, that the greatest part of it fell down into the caverns below; and the water, before inclosed in those hidden recesses, was thereby violently forced out; and to this the fountains, rivers, lakes, and sea owe their original: that that part of the earth which had not fallen in, but stood above the rest, appeared as mountains; and the islands and rocks in the midst of the sea, are nothing else but fragments of the hollow earth which remained after that sudden disruption and fall of the whole terrestrial frame (2).

† Yet if a calculation made be true, this storehouse would be quite exhausted long before the deluge (3).

(1) See his Theory, p. 386. (2) FR. PATRICIO, fontium Alutinenſium ſcaturigine, p. 41. (3) See della Rhetorica degli Antichi, apud RAMAZZIN. de the note, p. 100.

rain in sensible round drops, to refract and reflect the rays of light, on which the rainbow entirely depends, the appearance of that beautiful phenomenon could not be expected; and indeed it is somewhat hard to conceive how it could be a sign or confirmation of the covenant which God made with Noah, that he would drown the world no more with water, if it had been in the clouds before, and with no regard to this promise. For if we suppose it even an arbitrary sign, and to have no connection with the effect, it seems that to make it significant and satisfactory, it must be something new, otherwise it could not signify a new thing, or be the confirmation of a new promise. And accordingly, it has been observed, that the signs by institution only, mentioned in scripture, have all something new and strange, as a mark of the hand of God: at least it must be acknowledged, that if Noah had never seen a rainbow before, that sign must have made a much more lively impression on him, and given him much greater comfort and assurance in God's promise, than if it had been no more than what he must have often observed before the late terrible devastation<sup>a</sup>.

Whether flesh might be eaten
before the flood.

Whether flesh was permitted to be eaten before the deluge, is also a question which has been much debated<sup>v</sup>. By the permission expressly given to Noah for that purpose after the flood<sup>w</sup>, and God's assigning vegetables only for food to man as well as beast at the creation<sup>x</sup>, one would imagine it was not lawful before; yet others have supposed that it was included in the general grant of power and dominion given to Adam by God over the animal creation<sup>y</sup>; and the distinction of beasts into clean and unclean, which was well known before the flood<sup>z</sup>, is insisted on as a strong argument on this side, and which it is not easy to answer. To say that distinction was used proleptically, is a mere subterfuge; and to suppose it made solely to distinguish what was lawful or unlawful to be sacrificed, and not what might or might not be eaten, is little better; it being the custom to offer to God such fruits and animals as were fit for food and sustenance, and not such as were of no use or benefit to mankind in that respect.

SECT. VIII.

An Enquiry concerning the Situation of Mount Ararat, and the various Opinions about it.

IT may be proper, before we close this chapter, to give some account of the mountains of Ararat, whereon the ark rested, the situation of which is rendered in some measure uncertain by the different traditions concerning it.

THE Sibylline verses place mount Ararat in the borders of Black Phrygia, near Celæne, at the springs of the river Marfyas<sup>a</sup>, which rises out of the same lake with the Meander, and falls at length into it<sup>b</sup>. But it appears from good authorities that there is really no mountain at all in that place, at least none near so high as Ararat must needs have been, but only a small hill, or eminence<sup>c</sup>. This fancy therefore seems to have taken its rise from Apamea, another city near Celæne, being surnamed Cibotos, or the ark; not, as Bockart observes<sup>d</sup>, from any tradition of Noah's ark, but from its situation, being shut up like an ark, or chest, by three rivers which encompassed it; as the port of Alexandria in Egypt was called Cibotos from the bay surrounding it: besides, Cibotos was a new name which does not seem to have been known in those parts till given to Apamea, built by Seleucus, or Antiochus Soter; and Celæne<sup>e</sup> had a prior right to it, if there had been any such tradition: so that what is farther alledged of the Apameans coining medals having on the reverse the impression of an ark, as may be seen on three severally struck in honour of Adrian<sup>f</sup>, Septimius Severus, and Philip the Arabian<sup>g</sup>, is of no weight.

BEN GORION seems to extend the name of Ararat to Caucasus<sup>h</sup>: but by the mountains of Ararat have been generally understood, both by ancient and modern authors, those of Armenia. Ararat is by the Septuagint<sup>i</sup> and in the Vulgate<sup>k</sup> rendred Armenia<sup>l</sup>; and there is actually a province of that country named Ararat<sup>m</sup>, or Ararat, from a plain therein so called in memory of Arai the eighth king of that nation, who was slain in

<sup>a</sup> BURNET'S Theory, p. 324, &c. Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. Tom. I. Exerc. 15. <sup>v</sup> Vid. Ibid. Exerc. 19. §. 26, &c. <sup>w</sup> Genes. ix. 3, 4. <sup>x</sup> Genes. i. 29, 30. <sup>y</sup> Genes. ver. 26, 28. <sup>z</sup> Genes. vii. 2.

<sup>a</sup> XENOPHON, LIVIUS, l. 38. <sup>b</sup> STRABO, l. 12. MAX. TYRIUS, ferm. 38. <sup>c</sup> STRABO

ubi supra. PTOLEM. lib. 5. cap. 3. STEPHAN. in Hierosol. <sup>d</sup> Phaleg. lib. 1. cap. 3. <sup>e</sup> STRABO

ubi supra. LIVIUS ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> CALMET Dict. de la Bible, Art. Apamee. <sup>g</sup> Vid. FALCONERII

differt. de num. Apam. apud Kircher. Arca Noe, l. 2. c. 6. <sup>h</sup> Lib. 6. cap. 96. <sup>i</sup> Isa. xxxvii. 38.

<sup>k</sup> Gen. viii. 4. <sup>l</sup> Kings xix. 37. <sup>m</sup> Vid. la Notice des Eglises qui dependent du Patr. d'Armenie, publiee par le P. SIMON a la fin de son Histoire Critique de la Creance, & des Coutumes des Nations du Levant; & SCHROEDER. differt. de rebus Armenicis.

* The Samaritan version translates it Serendib, which is the name the eastern writers give to the island Ceylon. See before, p. 58.

a battle there<sup>m</sup>; Araji arat <sup>n</sup> signifying the slain of Arai. But though authors have generally agreed in placing Ararat in Armenia, yet they differ as to the particular situation of the mountain where the ark rested, there being two opinions concerning it, each of which is supported by a tradition.

THE first opinion is, that it was one of the mountains which divide Armenia on the south from Mesopotamia and that part of Affyria inhabited by the Curds, from whom those mountains took the name of Curdue, or Cardu, by the Greeks turned into Gordyæi, and other names*. It is called by the Arabs Al Judi<sup>o</sup>, (if it be not a mistake for Gordi<sup>o</sup>, or a corruption of Cordi, or Jordi†, as it ought to be written by the Arabs<sup>o</sup>;) and also Thamanin<sup>o</sup>, probably from the town hereafter named, at the foot of it.

First tradition about mount Ararat.

b THE tradition which affirms the ark to have rested on these mountains must have been very ancient, since it is the tradition of the Chaldeans themselves<sup>o</sup>: the Chaldee paraphrasts consent to this opinion<sup>o</sup>, which obtained very much formerly; but when we come to enquire into the particular part of these mountains whereon the ark rested, authors seem to place it out of Armenia: Epiphanius in the country of the Cordyæans<sup>o</sup>, or between the Armenians and Cordyæans, on the mountain Lubar<sup>o</sup>; the eastern authors, as well Christians as Mohammedans, on mount Thamanin or Al Judi<sup>o</sup>, which overlooks the country of Diyar Rabiab<sup>o</sup> in Mesopotamia, near the cities of Mausol, Forda†, and Jazirat ebn Omar<sup>o</sup>**, which last one affirms to be but four miles from the place of the ark<sup>o</sup>.

c To confirm this tradition, we are told that the remainders of the ark were to be seen upon these mountains: Berosus and Abydenus both declare there was such a report in their time<sup>o</sup>. The first observes farther, that several of the inhabitants thereabouts scraped the pitch off the planks as a rarity, and carried it about them for an amulet: Cardu mountains. and the latter says, they used the wood of the vessel against many diseases with wonderful success. The relics of the ark were to be seen also in the time of Epiphanius, if we may believe him<sup>o</sup>; and we are told the emperor Heraclius went from the town of Themanin up the mountain Al Judi, and saw the place of the ark<sup>o</sup>. This town of Themanin, is, or was, situate at the foot of the mountain Al Judi<sup>o</sup>; the name signifies eighty (and not eight, as Bochart, Calmet, and others would have it) in memory of the eighty persons who, according to a Mohammedan tradition, were saved in the ark<sup>o</sup>; though the Christian writers among the Arabs, who say this city was built by Noah and his sons near Forda, not approving that tradition, suppose it called so because they were eight<sup>o</sup>.

Remainder of the ark to be seen for a long time on the Cardu mountains.

THERE was formerly a famous monastery, called the monastery of the ark, upon the Cardu mountains, where the Nestorians used to celebrate a feast day on the spot where they supposed the ark rested; but in the year of CHRIST 776. that monastery was destroyed by lightning, with the church, and a numerous congregation in it<sup>o</sup>. Since Monastery of the ark formerly there.

* MOSES CHORENENSIS, Compend: Geogr. univers. p. 46, 52. <sup>o</sup> Upruzh upruun.
<sup>o</sup> EUTYCH. Annal. p. 41. D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Gioudi. <sup>o</sup> BOCHART. Phaleg. lib. 1. cap. 3.
<sup>o</sup> GOLIUS in Not. ad Afragan. p. 187. <sup>o</sup> Geogr. Nubiens. p. 202. <sup>o</sup> BEROSUS apud Josephum Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 4. <sup>o</sup> ONKELOS & JONATHAN in Genes. viii. 4. <sup>o</sup> EPIPHAN.
Hæres. 18. <sup>o</sup> Idem, ibid. lib. 1. § 4. <sup>o</sup> Geogr. Nubiens. p. 202. EBN SHOHNAH, MS.
<sup>o</sup> EBN AMID, l. 1. c. 1. <sup>o</sup> EUTYCH. Annal. p. 41. Vid. etiam D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. p. 404.
Art. Gioudi, & p. 676. <sup>o</sup> BENJAMIN. TUDELENS. Itiner. p. 61. <sup>o</sup> BEROSUS apud Josephum
Antiq. l. 1. c. 4. <sup>o</sup> ABYDENUS apud Euseb. Chron. Græc. & Præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4. <sup>o</sup> Hæres. 18.
<sup>o</sup> EBN AMID Hist. Arabum, l. 1. c. 1. <sup>o</sup> D'HERBELOT, ubi supra. Vid. AGATHIUS, l. 4. p. 135.
<sup>o</sup> D'HERBELOT, p. 677. <sup>o</sup> Vid. EUTYCH. & EBN AMID, ubi supra. <sup>o</sup> Vid. Chronic. DIONYSII
Patriarch. Jacobitar. apud Asseman, Bibl. Orient. Tom. II. p. 113.

* The Greek and Latin writers name them Carduchi, Cardiei, Cordyæi, Cordueni, Gordi, Cordai, Cardi, &c. the orientals call them also Cardon, Cordin, Curud, &c. Bochart (1) supposes they are the same which are called by mistake in Josephus Carm (2).

† Jordi may be changed into Judi by an easy mistake of the Ra for the Waw; but it is odd such an error should be so universal.

‡ If this name were not usually written Forda by the Arabian authors, we should judge it ought to be Korda, from the name of the mountain. D'Herbelot mentions a town called Corda, at the foot of Al Judi (3).

** Jazirat ebn, or bani Omar, is a city in an island of the Tigris, so named from the Khalifah Omar ebn Abd alaziz, of the family of Ommiyah, who, if you will believe Benjamin the Jew (4), (tho' he by mistake calls him Omar ebn al Khettab) removed the remains of the ark into that city, and built a Mohammedan temple therewith. The Syrians call it Gozarta, or the island; but we must not confound it, as Assemani does (6), with the Gzerta of Mafius, called by some the isle of Eden, which is no more than twelve miles above Mausol; whereas Jezirat ebn Omar is ninety miles above that city (6), in one of the roads from Aleppo to Tauris (7).

(1) Phaleg. lib. 1. cap. 3. (2) Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 2. (3) Bibl. Orient. Art. Gioudi. (4) Itiner. p. 61. (5) Bibl. Orient. tom. II. dissert. de Monophys.

(6) Geogr. Nubiens. p. 202. (7) TAVERNIER, Voyage de Perse, liv. 3. chap. 4.

which time probably the credit of this tradition hath declined, and given place to another which at present obtains.

Second tradition about mount Ararat.

THE second opinion therefore places mount Ararat towards the middle of Armenia, near the river Araxes, or Aras, above 280 miles distant from Al Judi to the north east.

JEROM seems to be the first who hath given an account of this tradition: Ararat, says that father, is a champaign country, incredibly fertile, through which the Araxes flows, at the foot of mount Taurus, which extends so far. Wherefore by the mountains of Ararat, whereon the ark rested, are not to be understood the mountains of Armenia in general, but the highest mountains of Taurus, which overlook the plains of Ararat<sup>1</sup>. These probably are the plains mentioned before, which gave name to the country. An author of the middle age observes, that near the city of Naxuan [Nakb-chuwan] are the mountains on which the ark rested, having the Araxes running at the foot of them<sup>2</sup>; and since that time all the travellers into those parts speak of no other mountain of Ararat.

THIS tradition would appear of equal antiquity with the former, could we be certain this was the high mountain Baris<sup>3</sup>, in the province of Minyas † in Armenia, to which, according to a tradition reported by Nicholas of Damascus<sup>4</sup>, many people in the time of a deluge fled for sanctuary; and upon the top of which a certain man struck with his vessel. As it is no new thing to find the same relicks in two different places at once, the same author also assures us, that several pieces of the timber of that vessel were to be seen on the mountain Baris a long time after it had landed there<sup>5</sup>; but this circumstance may be urged as an objection against Baris being the same with the last mentioned mountain, which is said to be inaccessible. However, at the foot of it they also shew a town called Cemain, which comes pretty near to Sbenonab<sup>6</sup>, signifying eight, the number of persons who came out of the ark, and, as the Armenians say, built it<sup>7</sup>.

Objections to it.

AN objection indeed has been started by a late traveller, which tends to overthrow both traditions: he says, he does not see where the dove could find an olive-branch, if the ark be supposed to have rested on any of the mountains of Armenia, for the olive is not found thereabouts<sup>8</sup>; nor (we are told) in any part of Asia beyond Aleppo, except one single place near Casbin<sup>9</sup> in Persia. However, it seems to have been otherwise antiently, for the scripture mentions Affyria as a land of oil-olive<sup>10</sup>; and we are told, that the olive grew in Gogarene, a province of Armenia<sup>11</sup>. Another has observed, that this mountain is so pointed at the top, that he could not easily conceive how the waters of the deluge could withdraw quick enough, just when the ark was over it, so as to leave it on so narrow a space<sup>12</sup>.

Called Masis by the Armenians.

BUT the Armenians are not to be convinced by any arguments that this is not the very mountain on which the ark rested; they call it Masis<sup>13</sup>, and derive the name from Amasia<sup>14</sup>, the third successor of Haskb<sup>15</sup>, the founder of their nation. The Turks

<sup>1</sup> HIERONYM. in Esai. 37. <sup>2</sup> RUBRUQUIS de Tartaris, c. 48. <sup>3</sup> Apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 4. <sup>4</sup> Ibid. <sup>5</sup> נַחֲשׁוֹן. <sup>6</sup> Vid. RUBRUQUIS, ubi supra. <sup>7</sup> P. TOURNEFORT's Voyages, lett. 76. <sup>8</sup> TAVERNIER Voyage de Tunquin, p. 181. <sup>9</sup> 2 Kings xviii. 32. <sup>10</sup> STRABO, l. 11. p. 800. <sup>11</sup> POULLET, Nouv. relat. du Levant, part 1. c. 10. p. 132. <sup>12</sup> RUBRUQ. TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. GOL. Not. ad Alfrag. p. 237. <sup>13</sup> MOSES CHOREN. p. 47.

* Bochart (8) supposes Baris, in the Armenian tongue, to be the same with ἀροῤῥίσιον, the descent or going forth, as we are told that nation called the place where Noah came down from the ark (9); and has found an Arabic word of that signification something like it; but we doubt much whether he could find an Armenian one: բարձր bardsr, signifies high in that tongue, and might be given to this mountain on account of its height; but this is only conjecture. Others tell us Baris, in the Egyptian language, signifies a sort of a ship (10), and therefore think the name has some reference to the ark; and that the same may be alluded to in the names of the temple of Baris, and the mountains Imbar and Nibar in that neighbourhood (11) (though their situation be very uncertain) as well as the Lubar of Epiphanius (12).

† Some will have Minyas to be written Mihyas (13); but the first seems to be the true reading, since we find Minni joined with Ararat in scripture (14). Sir Isaac Newton makes one name of Ararat Minni (15): and perhaps Armenia is only a contraction or compound of Har and Minni, which signifies the mountain, or mountainous country of Minni; though the Armenians themselves derive the name from Aram, one of their kings (16).

‡ This etymology overthrows Chardin's Armenian derivation from Mis, or Misbeck, the son of Japhet, whom he says that nation consider as their founder; and his Persian derivation from Aziz, an Arabic word signifying dear or beloved (17); which last, however, might have been an epithet of this mountain, since a traveller calls it Ajfe Mjis.

(8) Phaleg. l. 1. c. 3. (9) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 4. EUSEB. de locis Hebr. ex interpr. Hieron. (10) HERODOT. Enterp. HESYCH. (11) STRABO, l. 11. p. 799, 803. (12) Vid. FULLER. Miscell. Sacr. l. 1. c. 4. (13) VOESIUS apud a name it Agri dagh, that is, the heavy or great mountain*, and Parmak daghi, or the mountain of the finger, in allusion to its appearance*†: it stands about twelve leagues to the east [or rather south-east] of Errvan* and of Ejmiadzin, or the three churches, (from which last it is two short days journey) four leagues from the Aras‡, and ten to the north-west of Nackebuvan†. Here we must observe a mistake of the modern as well as ancient geographers, who have placed this mountain several degrees more to the west than it ought to be. This error of theirs hath misled many historians, and made them look for Ararat somewhere else, since they could not reconcile the situation which the maps give it, with scripture. Sir Walter Raleigh set the example to our English historians, and rests the ark not upon the mountains of Armenia, but some of those between Persia, Tartary, and India: he takes the mountains of Ararat in a more extended sense than either the ancient traditions or scripture will allow; and to serve his turn, supposes the mountains of Caucasus, towards Brittania and Scythia, to be part of a branch of Taurus, which in its way through Asia crossed Armenia‡; but for this there does not appear the least authority from the observations of travellers in those countries. However, his opinion hath been followed by some of our latest writers‡; not considering, perhaps, that Sir Walter took his notion from Goropius Becanus, one of the most fanciful authors that ever wrote; and that this last was led into it by the beforementioned mistake of the geographers†.

Berkel. in Steph. voce Μισίας. (14) Jerem. li. 27. (15) Chronol. p. 323. (16) MOSES CHOREN. Hist. Arm. p. 49. (17) CHARDIN, Voyage en Perse, tom. I. p. 157. LUCAS, voyage 1. tom. II. chap. 2.

MOUNT Mafis is encompassed by several petty hills, on the tops of which are found many ruins, thought to have been the buildings of the first men, who feared for a time to descend into the plains‡. It stands by itself in form of a sugar-loaf, in the midst of one of the greatest plains that is to be seen‡, detached as it were from the other mountains of Armenia, which make a long chain‡. It consists of two hills‡; the lesser is the more sharp and pointed‡; the higher, which is that of the ark, lies north-west of it‡, and raises its head far above the neighbouring mountains‡. It seems so high and big, that when the air is clear it does not appear to be above two leagues from Errvan‡, (whence one writer, deceived by the sight, computes the distance but at one league‡) and may be seen four or five days journey off‡. Yet travellers agree that the height of it is not extraordinary‡: one thinks he hath passed a part of Caucasus which was higher‡; and another says it is not above twice as high as mount Valerian, near Paris‡: they therefore impute its being visible so far off to its lonely situation in a vast plain‡, and upon the most elevated part of the country, without any mountains before it to obstruct the view‡. As for the snow with which, according to all accounts, it is per-

Description of mount Mafis.

* CARTWRIGHT'S Travels, p. 33. CHARDIN, Voy. en Perse, tom. I. p. 157. TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. † D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient. p. 404. ‡ CHARDIN, ubi supra. † TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. ‡ Idem, ibid. ‡ RALEIGH'S Hist. of the world, book I. ch. 7. § 10. ‡ SHUCKFORD'S Connect. vol. I. p. 98, 103. ‡ CARTWRIGHT, or the Preacher's Travels, p. 30, 31. ‡ TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. ‡ TAVERNIER, ubi supra. ‡ POULLET, p. 131. RUBRUQUIS, ubi supra. ‡ TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. ‡ NEWBERRY in Purchas, part 2. p. 1417. ‡ TAVERNIER, ubi supra. ‡ Idem, p. 130. TAVERNIER, ubi supra. ‡ CHARDIN, ubi supra. ‡ POULLET, ubi supra. ‡ RUBRUQUIS, NEWBERRY, & POULLET, ubi supra. ‡ CHARDIN, ubi supra. ‡ POULLET, ubi supra. ‡ TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. ‡ POULLET, ubi supra.

Mafis (18), which perhaps he mistook for Aziz Mafis. Other travellers write it Messis Saur (19), and Mafisufar (20), and say it signifies the mountain of the ark; but this is also a mistake: for though the Armenians call a mountain Sar, yet Mafis does not signify an ark. They should have written Mafis Sar, which signifies no more than mount Mafis: but faults of this kind in travellers are numberless, they being seldom acquainted with the language of the countries they visit.

From Mafis doubtless the ancients made their Mons Mafius, the situation of which they have delivered with as much uncertainty as the moderns (21).

* Perhaps our author mistook this for another mountain so called by the Turks, which stands near the Caspian sea, between Niasabad and Sbamakbi, and seems to deserve the name better (22).

† It is said the memorial of the ark's resting here is preserved in the name of this city, Nak signifying in Armenian a ship, and Shivan, rested (23). But this seems to be an etymology no better grounded than those above-mentioned; the Persians saying it was named Nakka/b jeban, from the great numbers of painters settled there: for the Persians call one of that profession (by an Arabic word) نقاش Nakka/b; and in Armenian also նակսբ բնաս Nak/benar, is a painter, and նակսբել nak/bel, to paint.

‡ This author, among other out-of-the-way conceits, holds the mountain Parapanisus or Paropamisus (a branch of Taurus, not of Caucasus) to be Ararat. He imagines that the place first inhabited after the flood was Margiana, a province of Persia, from whence those colonies came with Nimrod, which built Babel: his reason for this opinion is, because they went from the east (24) to the plain of Shinuar; whereas Armenia (says he) bears somewhat westward from thence (25).

(18) NEWBERRY in Purchas, part 2. p. 1417.
(19) CARTWRIGHT, ubi supra. TAVERNIER'S Voyage, liv. 1. chap. 4.
(20) GEMELL. Voyages, tom. II. book 1. chap. 2.
(21) Vid. CELLARIUS Geogr.

Antiq. vol. II. lib. 3. cap. 11. p. 232. (22) Vid. OLEARIVS'S Travels, l. 1. c. 5. (23) TAVERNIER, ubi supra. (24) Gen. xi. 2. (25) GOROPHIUS BECANUS Indo-Scythian, p. 473.

petually

petually covered from the middle upwards * (as it is often with clouds during two or a three months of the year *) we are told that is no rule to judge of the height by, since the lowest mountains in those countries, passed with the same ease as the plains, are covered with snow †, which even in the hottest summer lies on the least hills in Armenia ‡, as it does on those small ones surrounding Ararat §.

Fables of the Armenians concerning it.

THE Armenian monks tell a thousand idle stories concerning the ark, the whole ¶, or a part of which, they pretend is still to be seen on the top of the mountains †; something always appearing there black, which they imagine to be the ark ‡, though at the same time they affirm none ever was, nor can get there §; those who have attempted to ascend the hill out of zeal, or otherwise, having been punished, or at least brought back again by angels at night to the place they set out from in the day, to prevent their approaching that vessel †, as happened, they say, to a monk of Ejmiadzin, afterwards bishop of Nisibin, called James; though G O D at length so far complied with his desires, as to send an angel to him with a piece of the ark, who bid him, at the same time, not fatigue himself in vainly endeavouring to ascend the mountain, for that G O D had prohibited the access to the top of it ‡, and would not suffer men to pull in pieces a vessel which had saved so many creatures ¶. But if they are asked whether they have any relicks of the ark, they gravely answer, that it still lies buried in the vast heaps of snow †; which indeed is the charm that hinders the ascent ‡, as one Armenian author confesses †, and is sufficient to defend the ark without the help of an angel. Yet a certain missionary conceits, that the earthly paradise still remains in some agreeable ¶ plain of this mountain, which G O D preserves from heat and cold, and where the prophets Enoch and Elias enjoy a thousand sorts of delights, and are to eat of the tree of life till the end of the world ‡. Indeed the plain under the mount might be allowed its claim to the terrestrial paradise, was it to be decided by the beauty and delightfulness of the situation.

WITHOUT doubt the Armenian priests would be glad to produce better credentials in behalf of their tradition; accordingly, they sometimes tell travellers the said monk had been at the top of Ararat ‡. The Armenian patriarch informed Tournefort, that G O D had favoured one saint with the sight of the ark itself †. And Rubruquis was assured by a bishop, that the beforementioned piece of the ark [brought to James] d was in their church †; and the Copts shew part of a beam of that vessel in theirs at old Cairo in Egypt †. What credit ought to be given to these venerable testimonies, will best appear from the account Tournefort has left us of his attempt to climb this mountain ‡, in which having spent a whole day with infinite fatigue, he was obliged, by the * TAVERNIER, CHARDIN, TOURNEFORT, &c. ubi supra.    † TAVERNIER, ubi supra.

 ‡ POULLET, ubi supra.    § TOURNEFORT, ubi supra.    ¶ CARTWRIGHT, ubi supra.
 b POULLET, CHARDIN, ubi supra.    c CARTWRIGHT, ubi supra.    d HAITHO de Tartaris, lib. 1. cap. 9.
 e RUBRUQUIS, CARTWRIGHT, CHARDIN, &c. ubi supra.    f CARTWRIGHT, p. 34. POULLET & CHARDIN, ubi supra.    g RUBRUQUIS, CHARDIN & TOURNEFORT, ubi supra. P. PHILIPPE Voy. 1. Tom. II. c. 2.    h TOURNEFORT, ubi supra.    i Ibid.    k Vid. CHARDIN, TOURNEFORT, POULLET, LUCAS, &c. ubi supra.    l HAITHO de Tartaris, lib. 1. cap. 9.
 m P. PHILIPPE, ubi supra.    n NEWBERRY, ubi supra.    o TOURNEFORT, ubi supra.    p RUBRUQUIS, ubi supra.    q DE BRUYN Voyage au Levant, Vol. I. c. 35. p. 190.

* "We began, says that author (1), to ascend "mount Ararat about two o'clock in the afternoon, but not without difficulty. We were forced to climb up in loose sand, where we saw nothing but some Juniper and Goats-thorn. This mountain is one of the most sad and disagreeable sights upon earth; there are neither trees nor shrubs upon it, nor any convents of religious. Struys would have done us a favour, if he had told us where the Anchorites he mentions resided; for the people of the country do not remember to have heard there ever were in this mountain either Armenian monks or Carmelites: all the monasteries are in the plain. I do not believe the place is inhabitable in any other part, because the whole soil of Ararat is loose, or covered with snow; it seems too as if this mountain waited continually. From the top of a great abyss, opposite to the village [of Akurlu in the road from Erivan] from whence we came, there continually fall down rocks of a blackish hard stone, which make a terrible noise. There are no living animals but at the bottom, and towards the middle of the mountain. They who occupy the first region, are poor shepherds and scabby flocks, among which one finds some partridges: the second region is possessed by crows and tygers, which passed by us not without giving fear. All the rest of the mountain, that is, the half of it, has been covered with snow ever since the ark rested there, and these snows are covered half the year with very thick clouds. That which is yet more inconvenient and troublesome in this mountain is, that the snow which is melted, runs into the abyss by a vast number of sources, which one cannot come at, and which are as foul as the waters of a land-flood in the greatest storm. All these sources form the stream which runs by Akurlu, and which never becomes clear. They drink mud there all the year; but we found it more delicious than the best wine: it is always cold as ice, and has no muddy taste. Notwithstanding the amazement this frightful solitude cast us into, we endeavoured to find the a snow and intense cold, to return without accomplishing his design, though it was then in the middle of summer †.

(1) In loco super. citat.

" pretended monastery, and enquired whether there " were any religious shut up in caverns. The no" tion they have in the country, that the ark rested
" here, and the veneration all the Armenians have
" for this mountain (for they kiss the earth so soon
" as they see it, and repeat certain prayers, after " having made the sign of the cross) have made
" many imagine it must be filled with religious; and " Struys is not the only person who has told the " publick so. However, they assured us there was " only one forsaken convent at the foot of the gulph;
" that there was no fountain throughout the whole
" mount, only the stream of the abyss, which we " could not come at to drink, but near that con" vent; and that we could not go in a whole day
" to the snow, and down again to the bottom of " the abyss; that the shepherds often lost their way,
" and we might judge what a miserable place it
" was, from the necessity they were under to dig
" the earth from time to time to find a spring of " water for themselves and their flocks; and that it " would be to no purpose to ascend higher in search " of plants, because we should only find rocks
" hinging over our heads, and heaped one upon
" another.

" After this we began to travel towards the first
" range of rocks, with one bottle of water: but " notwithstanding we had made pitchers of our " bellies, in two hours time they were quite dried " up; and water shook in a bottle is a very disagree" able sort of drink: our only hope therefore was to " come at the snow, and eat some of it to quench
" our thirst. It must be acknowledged, that the " sight is very much deceived, when we stand at " the bottom, and guess at the height of a mountain,
" and especially when it must be ascended through " sand as troublesome as the Syrtes of Africa. It is " impossible to take one firm step upon the sand of " mount Ararat; in many places, instead of ascend" ing, we were obliged to go back again down to " the middle of the mountain; and in order to con" tinue our course, to wind sometimes to the right, " and sometimes to the left. When we met with " any Moose-ear which was too short to brouze, it " made our boots as smooth as glass, and so slippery,
" we were forced to stand still.

" To avoid the sand, which fatigued us intol-
" erably, we took our way to the great rocks
" heaped one on another. We pass under them
" as through caverns, wherein we are sheltered " from all the injuries of the weather, except the " cold, which we felt there very sensibly, and " served a little to allay our thirst. We were " obliged to leave this place quickly, lest we should " get a pleurisy; and came into a very troublesome
" way, full of stones, and were forced to leap from " one stone to another. We came about noon to a " place more pleasing, for it seemed as if we were " ready to take hold of the snow with our teeth.
" But our joy lasted not long; for what we had " taken for snow was only a chalk rock, which " hid from our sight a track of land about two " hours journey distant from the snow, and which " seemed to us to have a new kind of pavement,
" not of little flints, but small pieces of stone
" broken off by the frost, and whose edges cut like " flints. We kept in very good order: we assured
" our guides that we would go no farther than
" a heap of snow, which appeared scarce bigger " than a cake; but when we came to it, we found
" the heap was above thirty paces in diameter.
" We every one of us eat more or less, as we " had a mind; and by agreement resolved to ad" vance no farther. This snow was above four " foot thick; and being frozen hard, we took a " great piece to fill our bottle. It cannot be ima" gined how much the eating of snow revives and

" fortifies: we descended therefore from the snow
" with a wonderful vigour, which was not of long " duration; for we came to sands which lay behind
" the abyss, and were full as troublesome as the " former. When we endeavoured to slide along,
" half our bodies were buried; besides, we could " not keep the direct way, but were obliged to go " to the left to come to the edge of the abyss, of " which we had a mind to take a nearer view.
" And indeed it is a most frightful sight; to look " on the horrible precipices ever so little, will make " the head turn round. The noise made by a vast " number of crows, who are continually flying
" from one side to the other, has something in it
" very frightful. To form an idea of this place,
" you must imagine one of the highest mountains in
" the world opening its bosom, only to shew the " most horrid spectacle that can be thought of. All " the precipices are perpendicular, and the extremi" ties are rough and blackish, as if a smoke came " out of the sides and smuted them. About six " o'clock in the afternoon we found ourselves quite " tired out and spent. However, at length ob" serving a place covered with Moose-ear, whose " declivity seemed to favour our descent, that is " to say, the way Noah took to the bottom of the " mountain, we ran thither in haste, and then far " down to rest ourselves, and found there more
" plants than we had all the journey besides:
" and what pleased us mighty well, was, that
" our guides shewed from thence, but at a great " distance, the monastery whither we were to go " to quench our thirst. We laid ourselves on our " backs, and slid down for an hour together upon
" this green plat, and so passed on very agreeably,
" and much faster than we could have gone on " our legs. The night and our thirst were a " kind of spurs to us, and caused us to make " the greater speed. We continued therefore to " slide in this manner as long as the way would " suffer us, and when we met with small flint
" stones which hurt our shoulders, we turned and " slid on our bellies, or went backwards on all " four. Thus by degrees we gained the monastery;
" but so disordered and fatigued by our manner of " travelling, that we were not able to move hand " or foot. To our great misfortune also we found " there neither wine nor water, so were forced to " send to the river, the descent to which was near
" a quarter of a league downright, and the way very
" rugged."

† Yet, if you will believe a certain Dutch traveller (1), these difficulties may be surmounted; for he assures us, he went five days journey up mount Ararat, to see a Romish hermit: that he passed through three regions of clouds; the first dark and thick, the next cold and full of snow, and the third colder still: that he advanced five miles every day;
and when he came to the place where the hermit had his cell, he breathed a very serene and temperate air: that the hermit told him, he had perceived neither wind nor rain all the twenty-five years he had dwelt there; and that on the top of the mountain there still reigned a greater tranquility, whereby the ark was preserved uncorrupted. He farther pretends, that the hermit gave him a cross made out of the wood of the ark, together with a certificate, a formal copy of which the author has given in his sham relation.

(1) STRUYS's Voyages, chap. 17.

THE situation of Ararat, whether it be mount Mafis, or the mountain of Cardu, is a very convenient for the journey of the sons of Noah from thence to Shinaar, the distance not being very great, and the descent easy, especially from the latter, into the plains of Mesopotamia, of which Shinaar is a part. We discover plainly through the Mosaic history, a neighbourhood between the land of Eden, where man was created; that of Ararat, where the remains of mankind were saved; and that of Shinaar, where they fixed the centre of their plantations. And certainly it was more natural it should be so, than to separate those scenes at such a distance from each other, as some have done.

C H A P. II.

The general History from the DELUGE to the Birth of ABRAHAM.

SECT. I.

The Chronology from the Deluge to the Departure of Abraham from Haran stated.

PURSUANT to our intended method, before we proceed to the postdiluvian history, we shall settle the chronology of this first period of it, which, as well as that of the preceding, can be adjusted only from the records of Moses.

THIS is one of the most difficult periods to settle in all chronology; not only because we have no assistance therein from profane history, but also on account of the great diversity between the several copies of the Mosaic writings. It is a great misfortune that there should be any uncertainty with regard to the times next after the flood. For the planting of the world, the forming of societies and governments, the rise of arts and sciences, and the beginning of states and monarchies, falling within these limits, nothing could have been more serviceable to history than a fixed and uniform chronology of these early ages: whereas authors being divided in their judgments about the authenticity of the several copies, have every one chosen to follow that which agreed best with his own notions or hypothesis; whereby they have so perplexed and confounded all transactions, both sacred and profane, which fall within this period, that the history thereof can be compared to nothing but the original chaos.

HOWEVER, it is no small satisfaction, that the great differences between the several copies end here; and that being once got below the birth of Abraham, we enter upon a more certain series of time, about which chronologers are more generally agreed; the variety of the several copies making a difference of but a few years, not several ages, as we find the difference arises to in this period: for the better exhibiting of which, we have inserted the following tables, adjusted in the same form with those we have given of the antediluvian patriarchs.

A TABLE of the Years of the postdiluvian Patriarchs, to the Birth of Abraham.

	Their Ages at their Son's Birth.				Years they lived after their Son's Birth.			Length of their Lives.
	Heb.	Jos.	Sam.	Sept.	Heb.	Sam.	Sept.	Heb.	Sam.	Sept.
Shem after the flood	2	2	2	2	500	500	500	600	600	600
Arphaxad - - -	35	35	135	135	403	303	430	438	438	565
Cainan - - - - -	0	0	0	130	0	0	330	0	0	460
Salah - - - - -	30	130	130	130	403	303	330	433	433	460
Eber - - - - -	34	134	134	134	430	270	370	464	404	504
Phaleg - - - - -	30	130	130	130	209	109	209	239	239	339
Ren - - - - -	32	132	132	132	207	107	207	239	239	339
Serug - - - - -	30	130	130	130	200	100	200	230	230	330
Nabor - - - - -	29	29	79	79	119	69	129	148	148	208
Terah - - - - -	130	70	130	130	75	75	75	205	205	205
Sum to Abraham's birth - - - - }	352	792	1002	1132

all

11

Years of Abraham, 5

ve sta
pl
M th
th be de

7

:

th

ca di
th Fe ar mi ch
th ag co
th:

coj
a
th ag vl ha

Sb
Ar
Ca
Sa
El P Re
Se
N
T
Si

A Chronological TABLE of the Years of the postdiluvian Patriarchs to the Call of Abraham, according to the Computation of the Hebrew.

	Years of the Flood,	Yrs of Noah,	Yrs of Shem,	Yrs of Arphaxad,	Years of Salah,	Years of Eber,	Years of Peleg,	Years of Reu,	Years of Serug,	Years of Nabor,	Years of Terab,	Years of Abraham,
The flood,	0	600	98	35	0	34	30	32	30	29	70	18
Arphaxad born,	2	602	100	65	0	64	64	62	62	61	118	45
Salah born,	37	637	135	100	35	99	99	97	97	96	147	75
Eber born,	67	667	165	135	65	134	134	132	132	131	197	120
Peleg born. Confusion of tongues, and dispersion of mankind,	101	701	199	165	99	164	164	162	162	161	227	145
Reu born,	131	731	229	199	129	194	194	192	192	191	257	175
Serug born,	163	763	261	229	161	226	226	224	224	223	287	200
Nabor born,	193	793	291	259	191	256	256	254	254	253	317	230
Terab born,	222	822	320	288	220	285	285	283	283	282	347	260
Haran born,	292	892	390	358	288	353	353	351	351	350	417	330
Peleg dies,	340	940	438	338	303	368	368	366	366	365	437	350
Nabor dies,	341	941	439	339	304	369	369	367	367	366	438	351
Noah dies,	350	950	448	348	313	378	378	376	376	375	447	360
Abraham born,	352		450	350	315	380	380	378	378	377	449	362
Reu dies,	370		468	368	333	398	398	396	396	395	467	380
Serug dies,	393		491	391	356	421	421	419	419	418	487	400
Terab dies, and Abraham is called from Haran,	427		525	425	390	455	455	453	453	452	521	430

A Chronological TABLE of the Years of the postdiluvian Patriarchs to the Call of Abraham, according to the Computation of the Septuagint.

	Years of the Flood,	Yrs of Noah,	Yrs of Shem,	Yrs of Arphaxad,	Years of Cainan,	Years of Salah,	Years of Eber,	Years of Peleg,	Years of Reu,	Years of Serug,	Years of Nabor,	Years of Terab,	Years of Abraham,
The flood,	0	600	98	35	0	0	105	134	130	130	130	130	55
Arphaxad born,	2	602	100	65	0	0	107	136	132	132	132	132	57
Cainan born,	137	737	235	135	130	0	130	136	132	132	132	132	59
Salah born,	267	867	365	265	213	0	130	136	132	132	132	132	61
Noah dies,	350	950	448	348	213	0	130	136	132	132	132	132	63
Eber born,	397		495	395	260	0	130	136	132	132	132	132	65
Shem dies,	502		600	500	365	0	130	136	132	132	132	132	67
Peleg born. Confusion of tongues, and dispersion of mankind,	531			529	394	264	134	136	132	132	132	132	69
Arphaxad dies,	567			565	430	330	170	136	132	132	132	132	71
Cainan dies,	597				460	360	200	136	132	132	132	132	73
Reu born,	661					394	264	130	130	130	130	130	75
Salah dies,	727					460	330	196	130	130	130	130	77
Serug born,	793						396	262	132	132	132	132	79
Peleg dies,	870						473	339	209	132	132	132	81
Eber dies,	901						504		240	108	130	130	83
Nabor born,	923								262	130	130	130	85
Reu dies,	1000								339	207	130	130	87
Terab born,	1002									209	130	130	89
Serug dies,	1123									330	200	130	91
Abraham born,	1132										209	130	93
Terab dies, and Abraham is called from Haran,	1207										284	205	75

■ THE call of Abraham, where the period ends, is by some reckoned five years sooner, when he left Ur; but this will not agree with scripture, as shall be shewn when we come to settle the next period.

THERE are some variations between the present copies of the Septuagint; but as most of them relate to the length of some of the patriarchs lives, a circumstance not very material, and which makes no difference in the computation, we shall pass them by, and only observe, that some copies place the birth of Arphaxad twelve years after the flood, which will encrease the total of this period ten years; and that some make the age of Nahor, at the birth of Terah, 179*.

b WE have chosen to follow the readings of the Alexandrian manuscript; according to which, the only difference between the Septuagint and the Samaritan in this period, is 130 years given to Cainan, who is added between Arphaxad and Salah, but is to be found neither in the Hebrew nor the Samaritan, nor in the chronology of those times, given us, from the Septuagint itself, by Africanus and Eusebius†: which circumstances we look upon as sufficient authority to reject him out of the number of the patriarchs, notwithstanding his name is inserted in St. Luke‡; which may easily have happened, by its being added from some erroneous copies of the Septuagint, and first, as is most probable, put in the margin, though it has since crept into the text.

c THE difference between the Hebrew reckoning and the Samaritan in this period is very considerable, being no less than 650 years, in which the Hebrew is defective, and in all probability has been corrupted. We reserve for another place the examination of the authenticity of the various copies of the Pentateuch; at present we shall make use of some arguments, drawn from reason, to shew that the Samaritan is to be preferred to the Hebrew.

d IN the first place, this period seems much too short, according to the Hebrew, for the historical facts belonging thereto. We shall shew, when we come to speak of the dispersion, how inconsistent it is in all respects with that transaction, and to what extremes it hath driven those who follow the Hebrew chronology, to place the birth of Peleg, when that dispersion happened, at no greater distance from the flood than 101 years; and how improbable it is, that in the space of 427 years, the world should be in such an improved state, as it appears to have been in the time of Abraham, when cities were built, kingdoms erected, and monarchs extended their dominion even from Persia to Canaan: but we shall confine ourselves at present to some other observations, arising from the consequences of the Hebrew numbers, which we shall give in the words of a learned writer§.

1. IT is not probable, that the seven first Patriarchs after the flood, who lived 300 and 400 years, should beget at thirty, or thereabouts, as the present Hebrew is; and yet the following Patriarchs, who did not live half so long, should not beget their first-born till double the age: Terah at seventy, Abraham at eighty seven, Isaac at sixty, Jacob at eighty four, Levi Kohath and Anram at about sixty each of them; for from the birth of Levi to the birth of Moses the son of Anram, were about 180 years.

2. † IT is not probable, that Noah, who lived 600 years before the flood, * Vid. EUSEB. Chron. Grec. p. 9.

† Luke iii. 36.

‡ Dr. WILLS, in his Appendix to his learned Discourse of the chronology of Josephus.

§ Father Petron, following the present copies of Josephus, places the birth of Terah in the 129th year of Nahor, which agrees with the Hebrew, and the amended number of Josephus, with the addition only of 100 years; and thus the total of this period will be 1257 (1). But afterwards taking in the 10 years, added as above, between the flood and the birth of Arphaxad, he in his second computation makes the whole 1267.

† In this paragraph we have accommodated Dr. Wills's reasoning to our own table of the Hebrew chronology, differing somewhat from his, which follows the shorter calculation, making Abraham born in the seventieth year of Terah, and consequently placing his birth sixty years earlier, that is, in the year of the flood 192, whereby there happens some variation between our calculations, in comparing the years of the deaths of the patriarchs together; and as we have not brought in Joktan with his sons, any more than Peleg, into the first dispersion, we have omitted the third reason urged by the Doctor against the Hebrew numbers. However, for the reader's satisfaction, we shall subjoin them both, by way of note, in his own words.

Secondly, says that author, It is not probable, that Noah, who lived 600 years before the flood, should see ten generations succeed each other after the flood, and live till the fifty eighth Year of Abraham; that Shem should see nine generations after him successively die; and live many years after the death of Abraham, the ninth person lineally descended from him, who yet died in a good old age, an old man (2); that Sala should outlive Phaleg, Ragan, Lamech (3), Nahor,

(1) See his Antiq. des temps retablee, p. 61. the printer, for Seneg.

(2) Gen. xxv. 8.

(3) A mistake of should see nine generations succeed each other after the flood, and live till the 128th <sup>a</sup> year of Terah, within two years of Abraham's birth; that Arphaxad should outlive Peleg, Reu, Serug, Nabor and Terah, for five generations lineally descended from him. And what is more strange, that Shem should survive Arphaxad, and see eight generations after him successively die; and live till the fiftieth year of Isaac, within fifteen years of Abraham's death; that Eber should outlive Abraham himself, the seventh in descent from him, though Abraham dies in a good old age, an old man<sup>d</sup>. Thus the great ancestors, which in course of nature ought to die first, die last; by reducing the standard of the length of human life too fast, for the shortness of the space allowed from the flood to the birth of Abraham. And hence, among other absurd consequences which follow from this chronology, occasion was given to that notion of the Jews, followed still by many modern writers, that Melchizedeck was Shem. <sup>b</sup>

SECT. II.

The History of Noah after the Flood, and of his descendants to Abraham.

Year of the
Flood, 1.
Year before
Christ, 2997.
Noah comes out of the ark.
The precepts given him by God.

THE time of Noah's going forth of the ark, is fixed in scripture <sup>a</sup> to have been on the first day of the six hundred and first year of his age*. The first thing he did upon his landing, was to build an altar, and offer a burnt sacrifice, of every clean beast, and every clean fowl†. † GOD having accepted the sacrifice, blessed Noah, and gave him power over all living creatures, with a permission to eat of them as freely as of the produce of the ground; however, he forbade him to eat the blood of animals, or to shed that of Man; ordering him to punish manslaughter with death, and to people the world as fast as he could‡.

It is not to be thought that these three injunctions contained all that was obligatory on Noah and his posterity, till the promulgation of the law at Sinai; there being nothing here required of his duty towards GOD, the whole consisting in moral precepts: but we are to consider them either as explanatory of, or additional to the Laws which Noah had received in common with the rest of the Antediluvians, and which were derived from Adam. The permission to eat flesh, now first explicitly given, seems to intimate, that it was not allowed before the flood; but to avoid repetitions, we refer the reader to what we have already said on that subject<sup>h</sup>.

THE Rabbins pretend that GOD gave to Noah, and his sons, certain general precepts, which, according to them, contain the law of nature, common to all men indifferently; and for the non-observance of which, the Gentiles themselves have been punished by GOD<sup>i</sup>. These precepts enjoined, 1. To abstain from idolatry. 2. From

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xxv. 8.

* Gen. viii. 13.

† Gen. viii. 20.

‡ Chap. ix. 1—7.

<sup>h</sup> Chap. 1. §. 7.

<sup>i</sup> Vid. SELDEN de jure nat. & gent. lib. I. cap. ult. CALMET, dict. art. Noachides.

Nabor, Terah, and Abraham, for six generations lineally descended from him; and even the last of them lived to be an old man: that Heber should outlive Phaleg, Ragan, Lamech (4), Nabor, Terah, Abraham and Isaac, seven successive generations that descended from him, and yet Abraham and Isaac should both live to be old men (5).

Thirdly, It is not possible that Joktan should have thirteen sons when Phaleg was born, at the division of tongues, if Phaleg was born in the thirty-fourth Year of Heber, as it is in the Hebrew; and to fancy Phaleg first called so at the time of his death, is ridiculous, and expressly contrary to Josephus. At the division of tongues, we are told, that Mizraim, Canaan, Sidon, Elam, Abyss, Aram, &c. gave names to countries, and yet they died before Phaleg. Shem, Arphaxad, Salah, Heber, &c. according to the Hebrew, were alive when GOD instituted circumcision; and yet none of them ordered to be circumcised, which was then the sign of being in covenant with GOD.

* The Mohammedans will have it, that Noah quitted the ark the tenth day of Moharram, which is the first month of their year; and that he instituted the fast, observed by them on that Day, which they call Ashura, in commemoration of his deliverance (6).

† Some Rabbins pretend Shem offered the sacrifice, Noah being rendered unqualified for that office, by having the misfortune to be bit by a lion (7).

(4) Serug.

(5) Gen. xxxv. 29.

(7) SHALSEL. Hakkab. p. 7.

(6) D'HERB. Bibl. orient. p. 676.

a blasphemy. 3. From murder. 4. From adultery. 5. From Theft. 6. To institute judges to maintain those laws. And, 7. To abstain from eating the flesh of any animal, cut off while the animal was living; which last precept was supposed to be intended by the words, the flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall you not eat<sup>a</sup>. This barbarity some pagans are said to have practised<sup>1</sup>. From the time of Moses, the Jews would not suffer a stranger to live among them, unless he observed the Precepts of the Noachide, and never gave quarter in battle to any who were ignorant of them.

Year of the Flood, 1. Year before Christ, 2997.

b MAIMONIDES<sup>a</sup> says, the six first precepts were given to Adam, and the seventh to Noah. To these some Rabbins add others: as the prohibition to draw out the blood of any living creature to drink<sup>a</sup>; to maim animals<sup>a</sup>; to use magick and sorcery<sup>a</sup>; to couple animals, and graft trees with different kinds<sup>a</sup>. But what calls the antiquity of these precepts in question, is, that there is no mention made of them, neither in scripture, nor in Onkelos, nor in Josephus, nor in Philo; and that neither Jerom, nor Origen, nor any of the antient fathers, appear to have known any thing of them.

c BISHOP Cumberland, who likewise justly suspects the veracity of the Rabbins, thinks the patriarchal laws are to be searched for in the scripture; and accordingly in a particular treatise on that subject<sup>a</sup>, he has shewn from thence, that the patriarchs, long before the law was delivered to Moses, carefully observed the principal precepts, as well towards GOD as towards man, so as to fulfil the decalogue; moved thereto either by the same promises, or fear of the same judgments and punishments which were afterwards pronounced by the Mosaical law<sup>a</sup>.

GOD farther made a covenant with Noah<sup>a</sup>, never to drown the world again; God assures promising, as a token thereof, for the future, to set his bow in the clouds, when it rained. This seems to have been done to take away Noah's apprehensions, who, according to Josephus, sacrificed to appease GOD's wrath, fearing an anniversary deluge; for which supposition that historian has been censured somewhat too severely<sup>a</sup>.

Noah the world should not perish by a second deluge.

d NOAH being come down from the mountain, applied himself to husbandry, and planted a vineyard<sup>a</sup>; but the eastern authors<sup>a</sup> make this the work of his Sons. However, Noah having drank of the wine to excess, lay carelessly uncovered in his tent; which his son Ham perceiving, called in his brothers Shem and Japhet, to behold the posture their father was in: but they, out of a sense of duty and modesty, took a garment, and going backwards, covered Noah with it; for which, when he came to know of what had passed, he blessed them, and cursed Ham in his posterity, who were to be servants to their brethren<sup>a</sup>.

Noah becomes an husband-man.

c THE Armenians have a tradition, that Noah, after quitting the ark, went and settled at Erivan, about twelve leagues from Ararat, and that it was there he planted the vineyard, in a place where they still make excellent wine<sup>a</sup>. According to Tavernier, Nakshivan, which is three leagues distant from Ararat, was the place where Noah went to dwell; and he adds, that it is reported to be the oldest city in the world. Another tradition of the country will have the village of Cemain, abovementioned, to be the place where Noah and his Sons fixed their first habitation<sup>a</sup>. But this is to be understood of the places where these towns were afterwards built; for it is not likely they began to build towns so early, much less that the deluge left them standing, if there had been any there before; and the scripture says Noah was in his tent when Ham surprized him in wine.

Where first he settled.

f HOWEVER, this tradition, so far as it relates to Noah's settling in the country near the mountain where the ark rested, seems more probable than a notion lately advanced by some men of learning<sup>a</sup>, that Noah left his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, in some little time, and with his younger issue travelled to China, where he lived before the deluge, and that he was the first king of that country, whom the Chinese call

Noah not Fo hi.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. ix. 4. <sup>1</sup> ARNOS. cont. Gent. lib. 5. See before, p. 87. in the notes. <sup>a</sup> YAD HAZZAKAH, Sepher melakim. c. 9. <sup>a</sup> Rab. CHEVINA. <sup>a</sup> R. CHIDEA. <sup>a</sup> R. SIMON. <sup>a</sup> R. ELIEZER. <sup>a</sup> De legibus patriarcharum, printed in his Origines gentium antiquiss. <sup>a</sup> Ibid. chap. 5. <sup>a</sup> Gen. ix. 11, 17. <sup>a</sup> JOSEPH. ANT. l. 1. c. 3. <sup>a</sup> HIEDEG. Hist. patriar. Exercit. 19. 3. <sup>a</sup> Gen. ix. 20. <sup>a</sup> EUTYCH. p. 43. <sup>a</sup> Gen. ix. 21—27. <sup>a</sup> CALMET Dict. suppl. p. 63. <sup>a</sup> See before, chap. i. §. 8. <sup>a</sup> Dr. ALLIX, in his Reflections upon the books of the holy scripture, p. 112. Mr. WHISTON, in his Chronol. of the old Test. &c. in his new theory of the earth, and his essay for restoring the true text, &c. Mr. SHUCKFORD, in his connection; and Mr. BADFORD, in his Scripture chronology.

Year of the
Flood, 1.
Year before
Christ, 2997.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

Noah dies.

Fo hi*; it seeming more agreeable to reason, as well as scripture, to conclude that Noah continued with his posterity till his death, and that, after quitting the ark, they dwelt somewhere near the mountain where it rested, which was in Armenia; and that they did not remove till such time as they are mentioned in scripture to have begun their journey towards Shinaar<sup>c</sup>.

Noah died in the nine hundred and fiftieth year of his age, and, according to the tradition of the orientals, was buried in Mesopotamia, where they shew his sepulchre in a castle near a monastery called Dair abunah, that is, the monastery of

<sup>c</sup> Gen. xi. 2.

* This opinion (much more reasonable than that of Hornius, who will have Fo hi to be Adam (1), though the Chinese (2) expressly make a different person the first man, whom they call Puon kn) depends on the following observations:

1. The Chinese histories say, Fo hi had no father (3); which agrees well enough with Noah, because the memory of his father might be lost in the deluge, and so give occasion to this fable, that he had no father at all.

2. The same histories affirm, that Fo hi's mother conceived him as she was encompassed with a rainbow (4); which seems an imperfect tradition concerning the first appearance of the rainbow to Noah after the flood.

3. The character and appellation of Fo hi, among the Chinese, agrees with what the scriptures affirm of Noah.—Fo hi, says Le Compté, the first emperor of China, carefully bred up seven sorts of creatures, which he used to sacrifice to the supreme spirit of heaven and earth. For this reason some called him Pao hi, that is, oblation (5). Noah, says Moses, took into the ark of every clean beast by sevens, of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and his female, to keep seed alive upon the face of all the earth (6). And after the flood, Noah builded an ark unto the Lord, and took of every clean beast, and every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar (7).

4. The Chinese histories affirm, that Fo hi settled in the province of Stensi, which is the most north-west province of China (8), and very near to mount Caucasus, upon which (according to an opinion we have taken notice of) the ark rested, and from which Noah must descend to go thence into China. In favour of this opinion, it is also further observed,

5. That the Mosaic history, as it is perfectly silent in relation to the peopling of China at the dispersion, confining itself within the bounds of the then known world; so it says little or nothing of Noah after the flood: which seems to be an intimation, that Noah had no share in the subsequent actions related in the sacred history; and so, by a fair consequence, might be in China, a region out of the compass of the known world.

6. That this is confirmed by the Chaldean tradition of the sudden disappearing of Xisuthrus or Noah, his wife and daughter, and the Pilot, on their coming out of the ark.

7. That the Chinese language and writing are so entirely different from those among us, introduced by the confusion of Babel, that they cannot well be derived from thence.

8. That the dispersion beginning from Babylon, so remote a country as China, could not be so soon reached and peopled, as the prodigious number of its inhabitants at present shew it to have been; and therefore they could not be of so late an original.

9. That the learned sciences seem to have been antiently much better known in China than in these parts of the world; their government and constitution much firmer and more lasting than ours; their most antient histories more authentic and certain than ours, (excepting those of more than human original:) all which things would make one ready to imagine, that as it is probable Noah might be much more wise and learned than any of his sons; so all those settlements, laws and traditions, which are derived from him, are remarkable effects and testimonies of the same (9).

10. And principally that the reign of Fo hi, according to the most rational and exact account hitherto given of the Chinese chronology, coincides with the time of Noah (10); and that the length of the reigns and lives of Fo hi and his first successors greatly corresponds with the duration of the lives of men in the same ages recorded in scripture (11).

But as this opinion is conjectural only, so several objections might be made to it. As,

1. That it is improbable, if Noah was Fo hi, that the Chinese annals should make no mention of so extraordinary an event as the deluge; which they are so far from having recorded, that Couplet (12) expressly makes it an error in those who imagine they have.

2. The uncertainty of the Chinese writers themselves, as to the history of Fo hi and his next successors; some doubting whether there was ever such a man as Fo hi, and others rejecting both him and his successor Shin nungh, and beginning with Hwangh ti the third king: wherefore Couplet leaves them out of the succession of Chinese monarchs; and that not without reason, since Fo hi is said to have had the body of a serpent, and Shin nungh the head of an ox (13.)

3. Moses's account of the dispersion seems most evidently to relate to all mankind without exception, who he supposes were collected together in the plain of Shinaar; as will hereafter be more particularly evinced. And if this be admitted, Noah having no other issue than his three sons named by Moses, consequently could not reign in China.

This matter, however, we may be probably able to decide, when we come to treat professedly of the Chinese affairs; wherein we expect some assistance from the new history of China, lately published in Italy, written by a Mandarin, who, as we are told, has made it appear, that there are no genuine records to be found in that empire, earlier than two or three centuries before CHRIST.

(1) Arca Noe, p. 14.
Hist. Sinicam, lib. I. p. 13.

(2) Ibid. p. 21.
(4) Ibid. p. 313.

(5) LE COMPTÉ

Memoirs of China, p. 313.

Couplet's pream. p. 38, 76.

(6) Genes. vii. 2, 3, 9.

(7) Chap. viii. 20.

(8) Vid. MARTINII

(9) Ibid.

(10) LE COMPTÉ

Couplet's Confucius pream. p. 38, 76.

(11) Genes. vii.

(12) MAR-

TINIUS ubi supra.

Couplet Chronol. in Fo hi.

(9) Vid. WHISTON'S Theory, Book II. p. 137.

Etc. (10) Vid. his short View of the Chronol.

Etc. p. 61. (11) Ibid. p. 64, 65.

(12) Præf.

ad Tab. Chronol. p. 3, 8.

(13) Vid. Ibid.

TINIUS ubi supra.

Couplet Chronol. in Fo hi.

(9) Vid. WHISTON'S Theory, Book II. p. 137.

Etc. (10) Vid. his short View of the Chronol.

Etc. p. 61. (11) Ibid. p. 64, 65.

(12) Præf.

ad Tab. Chronol. p. 3, 8.

(13) Vid. Ibid.

p. 3, 10, 11.

a our Father <sup>d</sup>. According to a common opinion, before his death, he divided the world among his three sons, giving to Shem Asia, to Ham Africa, and to Japhet Europe: but this has not the least foundation in scripture. Year of the Flood, 350.
Year before Christ, 2648.

ALL mankind, at least that we have any account of in scripture, being the issue of these three sons of Noah, who were saved with him in the ark <sup>e</sup>; before we proceed any farther, it will be proper to give a genealogical table of their descendants, in the same manner as we have already given one of the antediluvian patriarchs. (See the plate.) The genealogy of the descendants of Noah.

THE chief design of Moses being to record what particularly concerned the Israelites, he has given us the genealogy of the line of Shem only entire. As to the descendants of the other two sons of Noah, his design seems to have been to bring them down as low as the dispersion, in order to leave to posterity the names of the first founders of nations, and there to dismiss them; for it is observable, that though several particulars are mentioned in the course of the Mosaic history relating to the Canaanites, as the people with whom the Israelites were more particularly to be concerned, yet he hath deduced the genealogy of that branch of Ham no farther; on the contrary, it is shorter than those of Mizraim and Cush by one generation.

NOR indeed is there much to be collected from scripture relating to the descendants of Shem, more than their names and the ages of the patriarchs in the line of Peleg, till we come to Terah the father of Abraham, with whom this period ends. But whatever there may be wanting in the sacred history, the Jews have taken care, according to their usual custom, plentifully to supply with the figments and conceits of their Rabbins, a set of men who have surpassed all others in the art of trifling, and inventing absurdities. On the other hand, the christian chronologers and historians of all ages who have endeavoured to connect the profane history with the sacred, within this period, would furnish us with materials enough to fill up the vacancies, could we think it worth while to collect their several opinions and conjectures; few of them agreeing in any one point, which yet every one is confident he has settled: we shall therefore take notice of but a very few of them; such contradictory sentiments serving only to shew the uncertainty of the whole, and consequently to confound, rather than to instruct the reader.

d WE shall not in this place touch upon the migrations, or the planting of nations by the posterity of Noah, which we have reserved for the subject of a distinct section, that we might not mix the history of that remarkable transaction with other matters. We have also thought proper to change the order of the table, and give an account of the line of Ham before that of Shem, which will more naturally close this section.

THOUGH Japhet is generally placed last in scripture <sup>e</sup>, yet he is expressly said to be the eldest <sup>f</sup>; and that he was so is farther evident, for that Noah was five hundred years old when he begat his three sons <sup>g</sup>, according to which manner of expression in scripture, one of them was born in his five hundredth year: but it could not be Shem; for he being in the one hundredth year of his age at the birth of Arphaxad, two years after the flood <sup>h</sup>, when Noah was six hundred and three years old, it follows that he himself was born in the five hundred and third year of Noah: nor could it be Ham, for he is expressly said to have been the younger <sup>i</sup>; so that Japhet was the eldest of the three sons. Of Japhet and his posterity.

JAPHET being affected, as well as Shem, with filial concern at Ham's exposing their father's nakedness, assisted to cover him, and had a blessing given him by Noah on that occasion. GOD, says that patriarch, shall enlarge Japhet, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant <sup>k</sup>. The first part of this prophecy has been verified in the great possessions which fell to the descendants of Japhet; as all Europe, and all the northern part of Asia, the lesser Asia, Media, Armenia, the coun-

<sup>d</sup> D'HERBEL. p. 677. <sup>e</sup> Genes. v. 32. vi. 10. vii. 13. ix. 18. x. 1. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. x. 21.
<sup>g</sup> Ibid. v. 32. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xi. 10. <sup>i</sup> Ibid. ix. 24. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. ix. 27.

<sup>a</sup> Besides these three sons, some of the Jewish writers give Noah a fourth, named Tam, who, as they pretend, taught astronomy, and instructed Nimrod in the art of war (1). The Mohammedan traditions, generally speaking, allow Noah but three sons, yet an Arab writer mentions another, named Majestun (2), who was probably born after the flood.

† This is the sense of the passage according to the English version and the Septuagint; but the Vulgate translates it, Shem the elder brother of Japhet. The former interpretation must be the true one, for the reason immediately given; though the original and the oriental versions are capable of either sense.

‡ Noah here alludes to the name of Japhet, the root of which signifies to enlarge; though others translate the passage, GOD shall persuade Japhet, that is, bring him over in time to the true worship, figured by the tents of Shem.

(1) JUCHASIN. p. 135.
Art. Nouv.

(2) ABDALRAHMAN EBN ABDALLAH apud d'Herbel. Biblioth. Orient.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

tries between the Euxine and Caspian seas, as well as those lying to the north of them, <sup>a</sup> Grand Tartary, with India and China. Add to these the European colonies in America of late ages; for, as to the original inhabitants of that continent, it is uncertain from which of the three branches they are descended. The next part of the prophecy, that he should dwell in the tents of Shem, seems to refer to the overthrow of the Assyrian empire by the Medes in conjunction with the Babylonians, as well as to the conquests of the Greeks and Romans in Asia; alluded to afterwards by Balaam in his prophecy<sup>1</sup>, that ships should come from the coasts of Chittim, and should afflict Ashur, and should afflict Eber: that is, they should afflict the Assyrians, and those who dwelt beyond the river Euphrates *. And at the same time that they dwelt in the tents of Shem, they made the posterity of Ham their servants, by subduing the Babylonians, the Canaanites, <sup>b</sup> the Egyptians, and other nations descended from that branch, wherein was the completion of the last part of Noah's prophecy.

THIS prophecy seems also to have regard to the state of the true religion, confining it to the race of Shem for a certain period of time, ending perhaps at the coming of the MESSIAH <sup>c</sup>; for since CHRIST the knowledge of the true GOD hath spread considerably more among the descendants of Japhet, than it did before amongst those of Shem, having till then been confined almost wholly to the nation of the Jews, however the Mohammedans rank Japhet himself among the prophets *.

THE septuagint version, followed by Eusebius and others <sup>c</sup>, mention an eighth son of Japhet, named Elixa, who is neither in the Hebrew nor the Chaldee †.

No particulars being mentioned in scripture with reference to the descendants of Japhet, farther than what relates to their founding of nations, we must refer the reader for what may be said of them under that head, to our account of the migrations.

Of Ham and his posterity.

THAT Ham was the youngest son of Noah †, though generally placed the second of the three, is evident by his being expressly called the youngest: he may have been born within a few years after Shem, but as neither his age nor the time of his birth are mentioned, we can determine nothing concerning that point. However, one would be apt to imagine, from Ham's indiscretion as well as wickedness in discovering his father's nakedness, that when he committed that crime he was but a very young man, though he had children; he might probably be about fifty or threescore, an age scarce <sup>d</sup> equivalent in those days to eighteen now.

<sup>1</sup> Num. xxiv. 24.    <sup>a</sup> See below.    * Vid. D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Japhet.    <sup>c</sup> EUSEB. CHRONIC. l. i. p. 8. CHRONIC. ALEXANDR. AUGUSTINUS.

* The common opinion is, that by Eber in this place is to be understood the Hebrews or Jews; but a learned author has offered reasons which seem to prove the contrary. He observes, that to take it in that sense is repugnant to the design of the passage, and makes Balaam bless and curse the children of Israel in the same breath, by prophesying of their destruction (1): and therefore he will have it that Eber has not respect to persons, but to place, and signifies beyond the river (2); in which sense that word is often used in scripture (3). Upon this occasion the same author proposes to amend our translation of the above text (4) by reading it thus; and they shall go forth from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Ashur, and shall afflict the other side of the river (5), that is, the countries beyond Euphrates. There seems to be no need of supposing the last and to be taken conjunctively, or the words following it to be a repetition, or explanatory of the first, as that writer thinks; for Ashur, strictly speaking, lay beyond the Tigris; neither in Balaam's time had the Assyrian empire extended itself westward so far as the Euphrates: and when that prophecy was to be fulfilled, Ashur was reduced to its primitive bounds, and in subjection to Elam, or the Persians; as were also the Babylonians, and the inhabitants of Aram or Mesopotamia, who we think are to be understood by Eber, or the other side of the river, that is, the Euphrates.

† The Persian historians give Japhet eleven sons, viz. 1. Fin, Chin, or Sin. 2. Seklab. 3. Mamlijs. 4. Gomara. 5. Turk (from whom this patriarch is surnamed Abu'l Turk, or the father of Turk) 6. Khalaj. 7. Khorar. 8. Rus. 9. Suffan. 10. Glaz. And, 11. Taraj (6). The Tartarian authors name but eight sons of Japhet, in this order; 1. Turk. 2. Khorar [Akhar]. 3. Saklap. 4. Rus. 5. Maminakh. 6. Zwin [Fin]. 7. Kamar. 8. Tarib (7). The former authors assert, that Japhet married his sons to their own sisters, before they departed to people their countries, to the end they might multiply the easier; and indeed it happened, that the eastern countries, and the greater part of the north, were first peopled.

‡ The Hebrew word חם Ham signifies hot, or heat, or sun-burnt. Though he is expressly said to be the younger, yet numbers of commentators, relying more upon the order wherein he is named, maintain that he was the second son of Noah; and to elude the force of the text, several of them pretend that it is not Ham himself, but Canaan, his son, who is here spoken of: others will have it, that Ham was called the younger, or the youngest, for no other reason but because his conduct was less prudent than that of his brothers (9). But such interpretations, if once admitted, will serve only to render the most clear expressions in scripture obscure.

(1) Vid. HYDE de Rel. Vet. Pers. p. 56. (2) Vid. eund. ibid. p. 57. (3) Idem, ibid. p. 50, &c. (4) MIR KHOND & KHOND AMIR. See D'HERBELOT. Bibl. Orient. Art. Japhet. (7) See ABU'LGAZI KHAN'S Genealogical History of the Tartars, vol. I. p. 6. (8) D'HERBELOT, ubi supra. (9) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patriarch. Exercit. 20. num. 4.

WHEN

- <sup>a</sup> WHEN Noah was acquainted with the irreverent action of Ham*, he cursed him in a branch of his posterity; Cursed, says he, be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren†. This curse, if it be a curse ‡, being pronounced not against Ham the immediate transgressor, but against his son, who does not appear from the words of Moses to have been any way concerned in the crime, though some imagine he had a principal share in it§, hath occasioned several conjectures: some ¶ have believed, that Noah cursed Canaan because he could not well have cursed Ham himself, whom God had not long before blessed‡; others, more reasonably, think Moses's chief intent in recording this prediction, was to raise the spirits of the Israelites then entering on a terrible war with the children of Canaan, by the assurance, that in consequence of the curse, that people were destined by God to be subdued by them¶: for the opinion of those who imagine all Ham's race were here accursed, seems repugnant to the plain words of scripture, which confines the malediction to Canaan and his posterity, and also contrary to fact<sup>**</sup>.

AMONG those who are for extending the curse to Ham and his other race, some have supposed another effect of it, not mentioned by Moses; that Ham became a black-moor, and communicated that colour to his descendants††: but this opinion is a mere chimera, as hath been formerly observed‡.

- <sup>c</sup> IN consequence of this undutiful act of his telling his brothers that he had seen his father's nakedness, Ham has been looked upon as the first introducer of wickedness after the flood; and authors have imputed to him many enormities, some of them ridiculous enough, which they have grounded solely upon this single passage. They have believed, seeing Ham could be guilty of so much indiscretion towards his father, that

† Gen. ix. 25. ¶ CHRYSOST. serm. 29. in Genes. ‡ Genes. ix. 1. § AUGUSTIN. quest. 17. in Genes. THEODORET in quest. 58. Genes. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. I. p. 411. BAYLE cited in the notes below. || Introd. p. 48. a.

* If we enquire by what means Noah came to know that it was Ham who had discovered his nakedness, some Rabins answer, that he inferred so much from Ham's past shameful behaviour, in profaning the ark by lying with his wife (10). Others say, that Ham, by looking on his father's shame, found extraordinary alterations in himself; his eyes became red, his hair and beard burnt, and his lips distorted; and he knew so little what he did, that he stripped himself stark naked, and walked about in that condition. Noah seeing all this, from thence concluded that it was Ham who had dishonoured him. Some say that he could not have known it otherwise than by revelation. St. Chrysostom's opinion is very rational; he believes, that Noah seeing himself covered with a garment which did not belong to him, asked the occasion of it, and learned from Shem and Japhet all that had passed (11).

† Mr. Bayle does not take this passage properly to contain a curse. He says, it is pretty strange that the scripture takes no notice of any thing being done by Noah to Ham: he observes, that there is not one word of censure passed upon Ham; that the patriarch was content to curse Canaan the son of Ham; and that this curse was nothing else but a prophecy of the victories which the descendants of Shem should obtain over the descendants of Canaan under Joshua, that is to say, seven or eight ages after the crime of Ham had been committed (12).

‡ The Jews pretend that Canaan was the person who first discovered the nakedness of Noah, with which he acquainted his father Ham, who made sport of the accident, and went and told it to his brothers Shem and Japhet; and that Noah awaking out of his sleep, cursed Canaan, because he was the first occasion of the scandal (13).

** A learned author hath affirmed, that there hath never yet been a son of Ham who hath shaken a scepter over the head of Japhet; Shem hath subdued Japhet, and Japhet hath subdued Shem, but

Ham never subdued either (14). However, this must be a mistake, if there be any truth in what the Egyptian histories relate of the actions of Sesostris and some others of their kings, who conquered the greatest part of Asia and Europe; and consequently Ham may be said to have subdued both. Besides, we find the Israelites were long the slaves of Ham, or the Egyptians; and we see no reason why the shameful submission which Rehoboam, the son and successor of Solomon, made to Sihon the Egyptian Pharaoh (15), who, after taking all the strong cities of Judah, seems to have had Jerusalem delivered up to him without opposition, to be spoiled with the temple, may not be deemed a servitude; it being expressly said, the Jews should be his servants (16). Ham also appears to have encroached upon Shem very early, for he seems to have driven the Semites out of their first seats in Shinar; and every body knows the Babylonians, who were Hamites, had a considerable share in the destruction of the Assyrian empire. But a stronger instance than any of the preceding is, the Babylonish captivity, in which the Jews themselves were the sufferers. Nay, the very branch of Canaan seems to have had great success against Japhet, not only by the exploits of the Carthaginians (originally Canaanites) in Italy, but by their conquest of Spain.

†† This opinion has been entertained by several Christians as well as Mohammedans, though some of the latter account otherwise for men's different complexions (17). The Arab writers add, that Noah relenting at the sudden change in his son, prayed to God that his posterity might be created gently in their servitude; in consequence whereof the black slaves are not only in great request, but generally have great credit and power with their masters (18).

Some of the same authors pretend, that Noah's curse was inflicted on Ham for his disobedience, because he would not come to prayers one morning when his father called him (19).

(10) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patriarch. tom. I. p. 409. (11) Vid. eund. ibid. (12) BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Cham. (13) BERESHIT RABBA. §. 37. THEODORET. quest. 57. in Genes. (14) See MOSES'S works, p. 358. (15) 1 Kings xiv. 25. 2 Chron. xii. 2, 9. (16) 2 Chron. xii. 5, 8. (17) Vid. Introd. p. 45. d. (18) D'HARBELE. Eibl. Orient. p. 245, & 677. (19) Ibid. p. 677.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 1648.

he was a reprobate, who had committed all sorts of abominations. They take it for granted, that none but he and his posterity were concerned in the building of Babel, which they consider as a very wicked attempt *. They make him the first propagator of idolatry after the flood †, and the inventor of magic, and relate many passages to that effect ‡. They pretend that he set a very unedifying example of incontinence, by getting his wife with child in the very ark †. Nay, it has been imagined, that the crime which he committed against his father was infinitely more enormous than it is represented in scripture: some concluding that Ham castrated Noah **; others, that he rendered him impotent by virtue of some magic charms †; others again, that he committed incest with his father's wife ††; whilst a fourth party accuse him of all sorts * See after.

* Several instances of this the reader will find hereafter.

† Ham is held to have been the inventor of magic, so far only as that it was he who preserved and taught it to the descendants of Noah; for it is allowed it was not Ham who first invented this art, but the angels, who becoming enamoured of the women of the old world, taught it the antediluvians (1). They say, that Ham not daring to carry with him into the ark the books which treated of this subject, engraved the principal rules of the art upon plates of metal and hard stone, able to resist the waters of the deluge; which treasure he carefully hid, and after quitting the ark, went and took them from the place where he had deposited them (2). It is pretended that Mizraim learned of his father Ham all those abominable secrets; and that the pretenders to that science consider Ham as their first founder, and to have been the same with Zerobstres, and honour him as a god. The first author of this opinion seems to have been the counterfeiter Clemens (3).

‡ Though St. Ambrose and others conceive from the words of Moses that the matrimonial duty was superseded and suspended during the time Noah and his family lived in the ark (4); nevertheless it is an opinion which has spread pretty much, that Ham did not observe continency on that occasion, but that his wife brought forth Canaan in the very ark (5).

** Some Jewish doctors have asserted this, and pretend that what prompted Ham to so violent an act, was to prevent Noah's having any more sons; as if he feared his share in the division of the world would be too small (6). Some grave authors have undertaken to refute this fancy very seriously, by these words of scripture: Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him. If he had performed, say they, upon his father so painful an operation as that of castrating must have been, Noah would not have slept till he was sober, but the anguish would quickly have awakened him, and he would have surprised the criminal in the very fact; nor would he have had any occasion to have asked who he was (7). From such conceits as these some have drawn arguments to prove that all the pagan gods were taken from the Jewish traditions. Thus they pretend that Noah is the Saturn and the Uranus of the pagans; and that the stories which are told of Jupiter's castrating his father Saturn, and Cronus castrating his father Uranus, are borrowed from this notion of Ham (8).

Upon this occasion we are tempted to introduce a passage out of the Count de Gabalis. He supposes that Noah, after the deluge, gave up his wife Vesta to the salamander Oromafis, prince of the fiery substances, and persuaded his three children to resign also their three wives to the princes of the three other elements (9). Ham, adds that author, rebelled against the counsel of Noah, and could not resist the charms of his wife; but his want of complaisance marked all his black posterity: the frightful complexion of the inhabitants of the torrid zone, is the punishment of the profane ardour of their father.—You believe, for instance, continues he, that the injury which Ham did his father, was the same as is literally expressed; but it was indeed a very different thing. Noah being come out of the ark, and seeing his wife Vesta's beauty rather improved by the familiarity which she had with her gallant Oromafis, his love for her returned upon him. Ham fearing lest his father might yet people the world with children blacker than his Ethiopians, took his opportunity one day, when the good old man had got his dose of wine, and castrated him without mercy (10). We leave the reader to judge which notion is most agreeable to scripture, or becoming the gravity of a commentator, that of the Jews, or this of the Count de Gabalis.

*† This imagination is taken from the spurious Berosus: he says that Noah, unable to bear the vicious courses of Ham, who particularly addicted himself to magic, became odious to this son; and the rather, because he shewed more tenderness for his other sons who were younger; and Ham finding an opportunity of revenge, did not let it slip: he grasped the genitals of his father, and muttered some words which rendered him impotent for ever after (11).

†† This is the sentiment of Mr. Von der Hart, professor of the oriental languages in the university of Helmstadt. He believes that the injury which that patriarch received from Ham, consisted in the infamous temerity which this brutish son had to lie either with his own mother, or at least with his step-mother. He proves this explanation by divers places of scripture, where the phrase to uncover the shame of a woman, signifies to lie with her. In the same places of scripture it is said, that the nakedness or shame of a woman, is the nakedness or shame of her husband; and by consequence, according to this way of expression, to have seen the nakedness of Noah, is a modest phrase, importing to have had to do with Noah's wife. This author supposes, 1. That Ham watched his time for compassing his design, when Noah was asleep after his debauch. 2. That somebody having discovered the affair, went and gave the other two sons of Noah notice of it. 3. That they, filled with indignation at the horrid affront which

(1) See before, p. 82. in the notes. (2) CASSIAN. Collat. 8. c. 21. PSEUDO-BEROS. lib. 3. p. 80. apud BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Cham. (3) Lib. 4. recognition. Apud BOCHART. Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 1. (4) AMEROS. de Noa & arca, c. 21. apud SALIAN. tom. 1. p. 290. (5) Vid. HEIDEGG. vol. 1.

p. 409. (6) Referente R. LEVI in Gen. cap. ix. apud SALIAN. tom. 1. p. 297. (7) SALIANUS, ibid. (8) Vid. BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Cham, Rem. D. (9) Emretiens sur les sciences secretes, p. 204. (10) Ibid. p. 206. (11) PSEUDO-BEROSUS, lib. 3. p. 80.

a of uncleanness (A). This character is very conformable with what we meet with in the antients concerning Cronus, with whom, among many others (B), Ham is supposed to have been the same. Year of the Flood, 250. Year before Christ, 2648.

If we may judge by the number of persons in the three generations of Ham's line mentioned by Moses*, which exceeds the number of persons descended from both his brothers in the same degree, he must have had the most numerous issue of the three sons of Noah, and a greater part of the earth to his share. But though much mention is made of the latter posterity of Ham in the succeeding part of the Jewish history, Moses has recorded nothing relating to his first descendants, besides their names and some general circumstances, excepting Canaan and Nimrod.

b CANAAN (C) was the fourth son of Ham, if we may be allowed to judge by the order in which we find his name placed in scripture. Neither the length of his life, nor the time of his birth, are mentioned by Moses: however, some will have it that he was born in the ark, and that because he was the fruit of an unseasonable incontinence, therefore he was a wicked man. It has been already observed, that the curse given by Noah to Canaan was peculiar to this son of Ham, and does not seem to have extended to the rest of his brethren. And indeed the prophecy of Noah, that Canaan should be a servant of servants to his brethren, seems to have been wholly compleated in him. It was compleated with regard to Skem, not only in that a considerable part of the seven nations of the Canaanites were made slaves to the Israelites when they took possession of their land, as part of the remainder of them were afterwards enslaved by Solomon†; but also by the subsequent expeditions of the Assyrians and Perhans, who were both descended from Skem, and under whom the Canaanites suffered subjection as well as the Israhelites: not to mention the conquest of part of Canaan by the Elamites, or Persians, under Cbedlaomer‡, prior to them all. With regard to Japhet, we find a completion of the prophecy, in the successive conquests of the Greeks and Romans in Palestine and Phanicia, where the Canaanites were settled; but especially in the total subversion of the Carthaginian power by the Romans, besides some invasions of the northern nations, as the posterity of Tkogarma and Magog, wherein many of them probably were carried away captive.

d IT is believed that Canaan lived and died (D) in the country called after his name; where formerly they shewed his tomb, which was twenty five foot long, in a cave of the mountain of the Leopards, not far from Jerusalem§.

CANAAN seems to have been known to the antient heathens. Sanckoniatho expressly says Chna was the first Phanician, or the first who was called a Phanician¶. The scripture mentions nothing particular with respect to any of his sons, but the trans-

* Genes. x. 6.

† 2 Chron. viii. 7, 8, 9.

‡ Genes. xiv. 4, 7, 8, &c.

§ See CALMET

Dict. de la Bible Art. Canaan.

¶ Apud EUSEB. Prep. Evang. lib. 1. cap. 10. p. 39.

which had been put upon the patriarch, repaired to the place as fast as they could, and having surpris'd their brother in the act, threw their garments over him and his accomplice. 4. That they gave an account to their father of all that they had seen. 5. That Noah, much enraged, ordered by his will, that Canaan, who was to be the issue of that incestuous commerce, should be wholly deprived of the inheritance (1). These hypotheses, says Mr. Boyle (2), are learned and ingenious; but if once it be suffered to suppose, that the narrations of Moses are so disguised, it may be feared that the same liberty will be taken with the history of the temptation, and of the fall of Adam, as some have dared to do.

(A) The reason of Noah's discarding Ham, seems not to have been so much on account of the personal injuries he had received from him, as his other immoralities. That unhappy man, it is pretended, not only taught that men should live as they did before the flood, and commit all sorts of incests, and something worse; but practis'd those abominable lessons himself. We chuse to express them in the words of the author. At vero cum publice corrumpere mortale genus, afferens & se ipsa exequens, comprehendendum esset ante inundationem, cum matribus, sororibus, filiabus, masculis, brutis, & quovis alio genere, ab his ejectus a Jano piissimo & castimonis atque pudicitia, refertissimo (3).

(B) The history of Cronus from Sanckoniatho, whose account of him is the most full, will be given in the next section. Marjham thinks Ham is to be found in profane history under the names of Hammon, Thamus, Thammuz, Adonis, Osiris, Baal, Belus, Jupiter and Saturn the second (4). The same author says, the Hebrew chronology requires that Ham should be the same with Menes, the first king of Egypt, whom almost all other authors make to be Mizraim, his second son (5).

(C) The Hebrew word is כנען, and not pronounced as we commonly do Canaan, making Ca the first syllable, but Chenaan, or rather Chnaan, the Shewah joining the Ch and N into one syllable, and so the Yews pronounce it; which reading brings the word nearer the Chna of Sanckoniatho and Stephanus (6): it signifies a merchant, or trader, as the Canaanites or Phanicians were.

(D) The Mahammedans are not uniform in their opinions concerning Canaan; some agreeing with the account given of him in scripture, and others affirming that he was born before the flood, and went not into the ark, but was drowned in the deluge, as hath been already observed (7).

(1) See the book entitled Ephemeridum Philologicarum tonus, in the Leipic Journal for October 1693. p. 466. (2) Dict. Hist. Art. Cham. Rem. F. (3) PSEUDO-BAROEUS, lib. 3. p. 80.

(4) Canon. Chron. p. 23, 30, 31, 32, 33. p. 23. (6) De Urbib. in voce Xra. (7) See chap. 1. sect. 1.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.
Of Nimrod.

actions of the Israelites, with their descendants, make up a great part of the Jewish a history, and will be treated of in their proper place.

NIMROD was the sixth son of Cush (E), and in all appearance much younger than any of his brothers; for Moses mentions the sons of Raamah, his fourth brother, before he speaks of him. What the sacred historian says of him is short, and yet he says more of him than of any other of the posterity of Noah, till he comes to Abraham. He tells us, that Nimrod began to be a mighty one in the earth; that he was a mighty hunter before the LORD, even to a proverb; and that the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh in the land of Shinaar<sup>c</sup>.

FROM this account a great idea hath been conceived of his strength and valour. Some represent him as a giant<sup>d</sup> (F); all consider him as a great warrior. It is generally thought, that by the words a mighty hunter, is to be understood that he was a great tyrant; but some of the Rabbins<sup>e</sup> interpret those words favourably, saying, that Nimrod was qualified by a peculiar dexterity and strength for the chase, and that he offered to GOD the game which he took; and several of the moderns are of the opinion, that this passage is not to be understood of his tyrannical oppressions, or of hunting of men, but of beasts<sup>f</sup> (G). It must be owned that the phrase, before the LORD, may be taken in a favourable sense, and as a commendation of a person's good qualities; but in this place the generality of expositors understand it otherwise (H).

HUNTING must have been one of the most useful employments in the times just after the dispersion, when all countries were over-run with wild beasts, of which it was necessary they should be cleared, in order to make them habitable; and therefore nothing seemed more proper to procure a man esteem and honour in those ages, than his being an expert hunter, as Nimrod probably was. By that exercise we are told the ancient Persians fitted their kings for war and government<sup>g</sup>; and hunting is still, in many countries, considered as one part of a royal education.

THERE is nothing in the short history of Nimrod which carries the least air of reproach, except his name, which signifies a rebel (I); and that is the circumstance which seems to have occasioned the injurious opinions which have been entertained of him in all ages. Commentators being prepossessed in general, that the curse of Noah fell upon the posterity of Ham; and finding this prince stigmatized by his name, have interpreted every passage relating to him to his disadvantage. They represent him as a rebel against GOD, in persuading the descendants of Noah to disobey the divine command to disperse, and in setting them to build the tower of Babel, with an impious design of scaling heaven (K). They brand him as an ambitious usurper, and an insolent

<sup>c</sup> Gen. x. 8, 9, 10. <sup>d</sup> EUTYCH. Annal. p. 63. ARU'LFARAG. p. 12. <sup>e</sup> ABEN EZRA, KIMHI. See also GROT. <sup>f</sup> BOCHART Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 12. PERIZON. Orig. Bib. cap. 12. p. 230. <sup>g</sup> Vid. ALNOPH. Cyroped. lib. 1.

(E) Some Alchammedan authors confound the genealogies of the sons of Noah at a strange rate. One of them says, that Nimrod was the son of Canaan, and brother of Cush, whom the Persians surname Fil dendam, that is, the elephant's tooth (1).

(F) The Hebrew word גִּבּוֹר Gibbor, which our version renders a mighty one, is by the Septuagint translated a giant (2).

(G) A writer of great authority in the East, has a singular notion, that Nimrod by hunting provided food for the builders of Babel (3).

(H) The phrase before the LORD, seems to be in itself perfectly indifferent, and made use of only by way of exaggeration; however, it being often introduced in scripture where wicked actions are mentioned, therefore, instead of before the LORD, St. Austin will have it to be rendered against the LORD (4); in which he is followed by several (5). The Jerusalem Targum, and that of Ben Uzziel, both take this character of Nimrod in an ill sense.

(I) This name is generally derived from מַרְדּוּ marad, to rebel; but if a composition may be allowed of, a more favourable etymology, and more agreeable to Nimrod's occupation, might be offered from מַרְדּוּ marad a leopard, which may by a metonymy denote wild beasts in general, and מַרְדּוּ marad to fell or beat down, or מַרְדּוּ marad to subdue or take. The Arabs make Nemrud, the plural of which is Nemaredab, the same with מַרְדּוּ marad, a rebel. However, a certain Persian author, who makes Nimrod the same with Cay Gaus, a king of the second dynasty of Persia, gives the name a Persian derivation, as if it was Nemurd, that is, immortal; which appellation, he says, was given to him on account of his long reign of above 150 years (6). If the first of the three significations be the right, the name must have been given him by his enemies, not by his subjects (7). The Greeks write the name Nembrod and Nembrodes.

(K) An Arab author says, that Nimrod built this tower, that he might ascend to heaven to see Abraham's God, who had delivered him from the fiery furnace into which that tyrant had cast him. They worked at this building three years, and when Nimrod had gotten on the top of it, he wondered to see the heaven as far from him as it was before; but his astonishment encreased, when this tower, and another, which had been built for the same purpose, were

(1) The author of Lobb al Tarawikh, apud D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Nemrod, p. 668. (2) Gen. x. 8. (3) ARU'LFARAG. Hist. Dynast. p. 12. (4) De civit. Dei, lib. 16. cap. 4. (5) JOH. SARISEUR. Polycrat. l. 1. p. 13, & l. 8. p. 559.

NIC. ABRAM, Pharus V. T. lib. 9. cap. 9. § 16. (6) The author of Mefatih al Olum, apud D'HERBELOT. Bibl. Orient. Art. Nemrod. (7) Vid. HYDE de rel. vet. Persar. p. 35.

a oppressor; and make him the author of the adoration of fire (L), of idolatrous worship given to men, and the first persecutor on the score of religion (M). On the other hand, some account him a virtuous prince, and so far from advising the building of Babel, that they say he left the country and went into Assyria, because he would not give his consent to it (N).

Year of the Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

NIMROD is generally thought to have been the first king after the flood (O); though some authors, supposing a plantation, or dispersion prior to that of Babel, have made kings in several countries before him. Mizraim is supposed by many, who contend for the antiquity of the Egyptian monarchy, to have began his reign a good while earlier than Nimrod<sup>1</sup>; and others, from the uniformity of the languages spoken in Assyria, Babylonia, Syria, and Canaan, affirm those countries to have been peopled before the confusion of tongues<sup>2</sup>.

b THE four cities (P) Moses gives to Nimrod, made a large kingdom in those early times, when few kings had more than one: only it must be observed, that possessions might at first have been large, and afterwards divided into several parcels; and Nimrod being the leader of a nation, we may suppose his subjects settled within those limits. Whether he became possessed of those cities by conquest, or otherwise, does not appear: it is most probable he did not build Babel, all the posterity of Noah seeming to have been equally concerned in that affair; nor does it appear that he built the other three, though the founding of them and many more, with other works, are attributed were successively overthrown. Still persisting in his design, he would be carried to heaven in a chest, born by four monstrous birds: but after wandering for some time through the air, he fell down on a mountain with such a force that made it shake; to which, as this writer imagines, alludes that passage in the Koran, though the stratagems of the impious make the mountains tremble (1).

<sup>1</sup> Vid. MARSH. Chron. Can. p. 18, 23.

<sup>2</sup> HORNIUS ad Sulpit. Sever. p. 21.

Nimrod, by this disappointment, finding he could not make war with God in person, instead of acknowledging his power, proceeded to persecute those who adored any besides himself; but God, by dividing Nimrod's subjects, and confounding their language, deprived him of the greater part of his people, and plagued those who continued to adhere to him, by a cloud of gnats, which destroyed almost all of them.

Another author adds, that one of those gnats having entered into the nostril, or ear of Nimrod, penetrated to one of the membranes of his brain, where, growing bigger every day, it gave him such intolerable pain, that he was obliged to cause his head to be beaten with a mallet, in order to procure some ease; and that he suffered this torture for the space of four hundred years, God being willing to punish, by one of the smallest of his creatures, him who insolently boasted himself to be the lord of all (2).

(L) The orientals make Nimrod the author of the sect of the Magi, or worshippers of fire; they tell us, that accidentally seeing fire rise out of the earth at a great distance from him in the east, he worshipped it, and appointed one Andesham to attend the fire there, and throw frankincense into it (3).

(M) The person persecuted by Nimrod, according to several Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan authors, was Abraham, who by the Hebrew chronology might have been his contemporary.

(N) Jonathan ben Uzziel paraphrases the passage (4) thus; Nimrod going out of that land, reigned in Assyria, because he would not come into the measures of those who were concerned in the division, therefore God gave him another country, where he built four other cities, viz. Nineveh, Platashkarta, Parioth, and Telsar.

(O) The eastern writers make him not only the first king of Babel, but of all the world; and say he was the first who wore a crown, the model of which he took from the figure of one he had seen in the sky: for being pleased with the appearance, he sent immediately for an artist, and had a crown of gold cast in the same form, which he put upon his head; from whence his subjects took occasion to say, that it came down to him from heaven (5).

(P) We might be able to make some judgment concerning the extent of the first Babylonish kingdom, could we fix the situations of these four cities: but this is very difficult; all of them having been long since destroyed, and authors differing so much in opinions about them. There are even two traditions with regard to the ruins of Babel; some placing them at Felugia, a village on the Euphrates, about thirty six miles to the south-west of Baghdad, on the Tigris; others, about the same distance from Felugia southward, on the first of those rivers: how much more uncertain then must be the situation of the rest, which were towns not so famous, and whose ruins, if any remain, are seldom enquired after?

According to the eastern authors, Erech, or Arach, is Hadas, or Edeffa (6), called by the Syrians Urhoi, by the Arabs Roka, and by the inhabitants Orsa; Accad, or Akhar, as some write it, is Nislin; and Calneh, Calanne, or Calya, is Ctesiphon, or Medain (7); and if they are not mistaken, the distances of these cities from each other will give Nimrod's kingdom a great extent, as do some traditions concerning him (8); but the Asiatics, in many things relating to their own antiquities, are not to be relied on more than the Europeans. We are of opinion, the Babylonian kingdom, under Nimrod, was much more limited; and rather agree with those who believe Erech to have been a city of Chaldea, which from thence took its present Arak name of Erak (9). This seems to be the Aracca of Ptolemy, and Aracca of Marcellinus, who places it in Susiana (10). Neither can Erech be Urhoi, or Edeffa, in the opinion of those who hold Ur of the Chaldees

(1) Cap. 14. ver. 46.

(2) Vid. D'HERBELOT.

Bibl. Orient. Art. Nimrod.

(3) Vid. EUTYCH.

Annales, p. 63, 64. EBN AMID, p. 29.

(4) Gen.

x. 11.

(5) EBN AMID, p. 29. EUTYCH.

Annal. p. 63.

(6) Vid. Targum JONATHAN.

112 & Hierogl.

(7) EPHREM SYRUS

Comment. in Genes. ubi de Nimrod, apud ASSERMANI Bibl. Orient. tom. I. p. 26. ARULFARAO. p. 18.

(8) See THEVENOT'S Travels, Part II. Book 1. chap. 9, & 13.

(9) HYDE in notis ad Perisfol. Itinera Mundi, p. 64. D'HERBELOT Biblioth. Orient. Art. Erac.

(10) Lib. 23.

Year of the Flood, 250.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

to him (Q). It may seem also a little strange, that Nimrod should be preferred to the a regal dignity, and enjoy the most cultivated part of the earth then known, rather than any other of the elder chiefs or heads of nations, even of the branch of Ham. Perhaps it was conferred on him for his dexterity in hunting; or, it may be, he did not assume the title of king till after his father Cush's death, who might have been settled there before him (R), and left him the sovereignty: but we incline to think, that he seized Shinaar from the descendants of Shem, driving out Asbur, who from thence went and founded Nineveh and other cities in Assyria.

Year before
Christ, 2567.

THE scripture does not inform us when Nimrod began his reign (S). Some<sup>1</sup> date it before the dispersion; but such a conjecture does not seem to suit with the Mosaic history: for before the dispersion we read of no city but Babel, nor could there well be more while all mankind were yet in a body together; but when Nimrod assumed the regal title, there seem to have been other cities built, which shews it was a good while after the dispersion. We have placed the beginning of his reign thirty years from that event, that is, in the year of the flood 431; and in all likelihood it should be placed rather later than earlier.

AUTHORS have taken a great deal of pains to find Nimrod in profane history: some have imagined him to be the same with Belus<sup>m</sup>, the founder of the Babylonish empire; others, with Ninus<sup>n</sup>, the founder of the Assyrian (T): some think him the same with Erech<sup>o</sup>, the first Chaldean king after the deluge<sup>o</sup>; and a fourth sort perceive a great resemblance between him and Bacchus, both in actions and name<sup>p</sup>. Some of the Mohammedan writers suppose Nimrod to have been Zobak, a Persian king of the first dynasty<sup>q</sup>; others, Cay Caus, the second king of the second race<sup>r</sup>; and some of the Jews say he is the same with Amraphel, the king of Shinaar, in Moses<sup>s</sup>. But there is no certainty in these conjectures, nor have we any knowledge of his immediate successors (U).

THE scripture mentions nothing as to the death of Nimrod; but authors have taken care that such an essential circumstance in his history should not be wanting. Some of the Rabbins pretend he was slain by Esau (W), whom they make his contemporary.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. NIC. ABRAM, Pharus V. T. lib. 5. § 7. <sup>m</sup> PETAV. Doct. temp. l. 13. p. 283. <sup>n</sup> HYDE de rel. vet. Pers. p. 43, 44. <sup>o</sup> SYNCCELL. p. 90. <sup>p</sup> Vid. CALMET Dict. de la Bible, Art. Nemrod. BENFORD Script. Chronol. p. 265, 266. <sup>q</sup> TARIKH MONTAKHAB apud D'HERBELOT, Art. Nimrod & Norh. <sup>r</sup> See before, p. 122, in the notes. <sup>s</sup> BEN UZZIEL, YAKHI, R. DAV GANZ in Zemach David.

Chaldees and Uthoi to be the same; for Erech and U are distinguished in scripture as two different cities. Cahs we admit to be Grisphen, or Medain, nearer either of the aforesaid ruins of Babel than is Bagdad; and as for Acad, we may suppose it to have been some city in the neighbourhood of the other three, long since ruined, and the memory of it lost: and thus will this early monarchy be reduced to such dimensions, as, in all probability, the first could not exceed.

(Q) Abulfarag says Nimrod built three of these cities, mentioned by Moses, viz. Erech, Acad, and Cahs (1), or Cahs. Others ascribe to him the building of Babel, Nineveh, Resin, and several other cities, among which was Adherbijan (2), in the Persian province of the same name. An Arab author mentions a city called Takharat, or Takharan Sar, where Nimrod coined money (3). Others write, that he dug several rivers in Erak, derived from Euphrates, of which that of Cutha, in the way [from Babel] to Cutah was one (4).

(R) A Persian author of great authority affirms, that Cush, or Cutha was king of the territory of Babel, and resided in Erak; and attributes to him the making of the river Cutha (5). Dr. Hyde places the original seat of Cush in the same country, which he calls the most ancient Cush (6); and says, that his posterity removing into Arabia, it thence took the name of Cush also (7).

(S) The Arabs say, that Nimrod reigned in al Secwad, that is, the black country; for so they call Irak Arabi, from the black tents of the Sienite Arabs scattered over the province (8). They suppose his father Cush resided at Erac, in the province of Babel (9); though Babel is generally thought, by christian authors, to have been the regal seat of Nimrod.

(T) Many have confounded the Babylonian and the Assyrian empire together, by mistaking the sense of the text (10), as if both of them had been founded by Nimrod; but this point will be discussed hereafter, when we come to speak of the foundation of the Assyrian empire.

(U) Some christian and Mohammedan historians call the most ancient kings of the Babylonians, who succeeded Nimrod, Nimaredab, that is, Nimrod's (11). Some of the latter say he reigned in al Secwad 400 years; and that he was succeeded by a prince of the same family, called Nabat Ebn Koud, who ruled 100 years (12); and some of the former tell us, that Pokhtanser [or rather Bakht Nasr, which is the name the orientals give to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon] was of his race (13).

(W) They tell the following story, as the occasion of this accident: that the coat which God made Adam, was with his body in the ark; and that when Noah and his sons quitted that vessel, Ham took it, by which means it afterwards fell to Nimrod, who putting it on, all kinds of beasts and birds came and fell down before him, as thinking him to excel in strength, and made him king over them, according to the text, where he is said to be a mighty hunter before the Lord. Esau seeing the coat upon Nimrod, conceived so strong a desire for it, that he slew him, and stripped him of it (14).

(1) ABU'LFARAG. Hist. Dyn. p. 18. (2) EUTYCH. Annal. p. 64. (3) SAFIODDIN. apud HYDE de rel. vet. Pers. p. 74. (4) AHMED EBN YUSEF, apud HYDE, ibid. p. 71, 73. (5) AL TABARI in cap. de morte Sarz, apud HYDE de rel. vet. Pers. p. 40. (6) HYDE ibid. p. 38. (7) Id. ibid. p. 37. (8) ABU MOHAMMED

MUSTAFA apud HYDE de rel. vet. Pers. p. 42, 43. (9) Vid. HYDE ibid. p. 40. (10) GEN. x. 11. (11) Vid. D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. Art. Nemrod. (12) ABU MOHAMMED MUSTAFA apud HYDE de rel. vet. Pers. p. 42, 43. (13) ABU'LFARAG. Hist. Dyn. p. 72. (14) ELIEZER Pirke, cap. 24.

There

- a There is a tradition, that he was killed by the fall of the tower of Babel, which was overthrown by tempestuous winds while Nimrod was in it*. Others say, that as he led an army against Abraham, God sent a squadron of gnats, which destroyed most of them; and particularly Nimrod, whose brain was pierced by one of these insects*.

Year of the Flood, 350.
Year before Christ, 2648.
Of Shem and his posterity to Abraham.

WE now come to the history of Shem and his posterity, which for convenience we have placed last, though he was the second son of Noah by birth, and by prerogative the eldest, the right of primogeniture seeming to have been lodged in him.

THE posterity of Shem are twice related by Moses. In the first place* he only mentions the names of such of his descendants as were concerned in the first dispersion. In the other*, he deduces the genealogy in the line of Arphaxad down to Abraham.

- b But the sacred writer having been more brief in the history of these patriarchs, than in that of the branch of Ham, relating nothing farther of any of them than their ages, and the year of their lives wherein they begot their sons (from whence we are enabled to collect the chronology of this period, and no more) for the rest we must have recourse to the traditions and conjectures of the Jewish and Christian writers, where we shall not want for matter.

SHEM was born ninety eight years before the flood; for two years after it, at the birth of Arphaxad, he was one hundred years old*. We shall have given the reader all that is to be found in scripture concerning this patriarch after the deluge, when we have acquainted him, that he assisted his brother Japhet in covering the nakedness of their father*, and shared in his blessing for so doing: Blessed be the God of Shem, said Noah, and Canaan shall be his servant†.

IT hath already been observed in what manner this prophecy was accomplished: but there is one thing peculiar in these words of Noah, which ought to be taken notice of; and that is, that he blest the God of Shem, and says nothing of that kind with regard to Japhet: by which circumstance is plainly intimated, that the knowledge and worship of the true God was to be found in the branch of Shem; and that though Japhet himself did at that time believe in the true God, yet his posterity should quickly fall away from the faith, and worship such gods as did not deserve to be blessed; and therefore Noah, who foresaw what would happen, suppressed that short chronology, in giving his blessing to Japhet. However, this prophecy seems to have no farther prospect than till the coming of the Messiah in the line of Shem, which was the prime prerogative of that patriarch; for since that time most of Japhet's posterity have received the knowledge of the true God.

- THE Jews suppose the tradition of theological truths to have passed from Noah to Shem, who communicated them to his children, by which means the true religion was preserved in the world. The Rabbins pretend that Shem was entrusted with the will of Noah, whereby he divided the earth among his three sons; that he went to school to Methuselah for threescore and eighteen years, and kept on himself, after the deluge, upon mount Tabor, where he taught morality; that he instructed Abraham in the ceremonies relating to sacrifices, which that patriarch afterwards observed. They say farther, that God gave him the spirit of prophecy a hundred years after the flood, and that he discharged the function of a prophet for the space of four hundred years, without reaping much fruit of his labour, mankind being become greatly corrupted. They attribute also to him the invention of astronomy, together with the manner of computing by months and years*, and of intercalating the former, having learned these secrets from Noah†. Those who confound Shem with Melchizedec (X), ascribe to him the * ABU'LFARAG. Hist. Dyn. p. 12. * HYDE de Rel. ver. Pers. p. 74. See before p. 125. in the notes.

† Gen. x. 21. * Gen. xi. 10. * Ibid. † Gen. ix. 27. * Gen. ix. 26. * SCIP. SGAMBAT. Archiv. Vet. Test. lib. 1. p. 165. apud CALMET Dict. de la Bible, Art. Sem. † ELIZER Pirke, c. 8.

(X) The Jews, followed by many christian authors, ancient and modern, are of this opinion, which has nothing to countenance it in scripture: nor is it likely so eminent a patriarch would divest himself, as it were, of the sovereignty which he held over his own branch, to settle in Canaan, and become a petty prince within the dominions of another, who was to be his servant (1), namely Ham. The learned, who were of this opinion, have been led into it by adhering too strictly to the Hebrew computation (2), and perhaps looking on the tradition of the Jews as some authority (3). Yet it is since the time of Josephus, who speaks of Melchizedec only as a Canaanite king (4), that they have made him the same with Shem; which seems to have been a notion altogether unknown to St. Paul (5). The oriental christians make Melchizedec the son of Phaleg (6); for the Syriac chronology, which is generally received among them, will not allow him to be the same with Shem. A learned Syrian author, who holds a middle opinion between them and the Jews, will have Melchizedec to be the son of this last mentioned patriarch (7).

(1) Gen. ix. 26. (2) CUMBERL. on Sancton. p. 47. (3) Id. ibid. p. 1-4. (4) Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 11. (5) Heb. vii. 2. (6) EBN ASID p. 13. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 50. (7) ABU'LFARAG. Hist. Dynast. p. 10.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

109th Psalm, and a treatise of physic<sup>c</sup> (Y). Some make him to have been the first<sup>a</sup> king in the world, and to have founded three cities, one in each of the three parts of the earth known to the antients (Z).

THE Eastern writers say, that Shem, in pursuance of the directions of Adam and Noah<sup>d</sup>, together with Melchizedec, the son of Phaleg, took Adam's body out of the ark, and being conducted by an angel, carried it to mount Calvary, where they buried it: after which Shem constituting Melchizedec the priest of God, left him behind to attend at the sepulchre; and pretended on his return that he died by the way, and was buried<sup>e</sup>. Some say, Shem interred there no more than the skull of Adam, which had been given him by Noah<sup>f</sup>.

THOSE who seek to reconcile the heathen mythology with the Mosaic history, are greatly at a loss to find among the gods, or heroes, one who in name or character hath any resemblance to Shem; and therefore are reduced to that ridiculous shift of making him the god of hell (A).

SEEM having lived 502 years after the flood, died at the age of 600. He left five sons, Elam, Ashur, Arphaxad, Lud and Aram<sup>g</sup>. The more moderate Persian historians say, their first king Cayumarras was a son of Shem<sup>h</sup>, meaning probably Elam, whom Moses makes the founder of that nation.

THE scripture has recorded no one action of any of these sons of Shem, except Ashur; and the passage relating to him is a very material one, as it fixes the true time of the foundation of the Assyrian kingdom. This remarkable fact is related by Moses in these words; Out of that land [namely Shinaar] went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rhoboth, and Calah<sup>i</sup>, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah; the same is a great city<sup>k</sup>. We are sensible this text is by many applied otherwise, and rendered according to the marginal reading of our translation, He went out into Assyria; as if Nimrod was the person spoken of; but we shall shew hereafter, that such a sense puts a manifest force upon the words. As to the epoch of this Assyrian kingdom, we suppose it might have been founded about the same time with that of Babel, that is, thirty years after the dispersion, in the year of the flood 431.

As to the situation of the cities built by Ashur, in order to determine the extent of this first Assyrian kingdom, we find ourselves more at a loss than we were with regard to those which composed the kingdom of Babel. However, we may venture to draw this inference, that as the number of cities, of which each monarchy consisted, was equal, so it is probable their dimensions were much the same; and that the other three cities lay at no great distance from Nineveh, whose situation has been in some measure preserved by tradition (B).

<sup>c</sup> SCIP. SGAMBAT. Archiv. V. T. lib. I. p. 164.
AVID, p. 13. EURYCH. Annal. p. 30.
D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Sam.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 80. in the notes.

<sup>e</sup> ERY

<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 80. in the notes.

<sup>g</sup> Gen. x. 22.

<sup>h</sup> Vid.

<sup>i</sup> Gen. x. 11.

<sup>k</sup> Ib. ver. 12.

(Y) The Hebrew manuscript of this book, we are told, is to be found in the elector of Bavaria's library (1).

(Z) These three cities are Setta [or Centu] a maritime town in Africa [on the coast of Barbary], Salernum in Italy, and Salem in Judea (2). Others say he only laid the foundations of [this last, supposing it to be] Jerusalem (3).

(A) As those authors, who fancy a resemblance between Saturn and Noah, have on account of the supposed similitude of names, made Ham Jupiter, and Japhet Neptune, Shem must of consequence be Pluto (4); but such an hypothesis, we think, is not for the honour of that patriarch, any more than another which supposes him to be Typhon: we should have been glad therefore to have known what reasons Calmet had to believe, that profane historians intend Shem by Typhon, whom he owns to have been a famous giant, or maleficent deity (5); and, indeed, was had in great detestation by the Egyptians, as a monster of wickedness, having embroiled the nation in a rebellious war, and murdered his brother Osiris.

(B) Nimrod is supposed to have stood on the east side of the Dijlat or Tigris, opposite to Misul; at least, the tradition of the country will have it so; but there are no ruins to be seen there, as there are at old Babel (6). Though a certain traveller pretends to have discovered and thoroughly viewed some remains, by which he judged the city to have been built in form of a long square, in length 150 furlongs, and in breadth 90; which, at eight furlongs to an Italian mile, make threescore miles in compass (7).

The city Rehoboth, is by many supposed to be Rebeboth on the Euphrates, the same probably with that called Rahabath Malek, not many miles below the place where the Ababur falls into the Euphrates (8); and Resen to be the Resaria of the antients, in Mesopotamia, still in being, and called Ras alam, that is, the head of the fountain, on account of the many springs rising thereabouts; and among the rest that of the Ababur: It is also called Am M'ardab. But others endeavour to find Rebeboth and Resen nearer Nineveh; and also object, that they cannot be Rahabath and Ras alam, because these last are

(1) CALMET Dict. de la Bible, Art. Sem. (2) Vid. SCIP. SGAMBAT. Anh. Vet. Test. lib. 1. pag. 164.
(3) SHALSH. HAKK. p. 93. 2. (4) Vid. BOCHART Phaleg. lib. 1. cap. 1. (5) See his Dict.

de la Bible, Art. Sem. (6) See THEVENOT's Travels, part 2. chap. 11. p. 52. RAUWOLF's Travels, part 2. chap. 9. p. 188. (7) See the Preacher's Travels, p. 89. (8) Geog. Nub. Clim. 4. part 6. p. 199.

- a ARPHAXAD, or as the Masoretes read the name Arpachshad, the third son of Shem, had one advantage above the rest of his brethren, namely, of having the patriarchal line continued through him. Many derive the name, as well as the nation of the Chasdim or Chaldeans from Arphaxad (C), which opinion seems more reasonable than that which makes Chefed, the son of Nabor, Abraham's brother, to be the founder of them; though possibly the Chasdim had another original; for nothing is mentioned in scripture concerning it. Some Mohammedan authors make Arphaxad both a prophet and an apostle, and lodge the chief sovereignty over the nations of the world in his descendants (D). Arphaxad was born in the hundredth year of his father, two years after the flood<sup>1</sup>; and having begat the succeeding patriarch in the 135th year of his age<sup>m</sup>, b died after he had lived in all 438 years<sup>a</sup>; which is the sum of what the scripture relates concerning him, though writers have added several conjectures of their own (E). Year of the Flood, 350. Year before Christ, 2648.

<sup>1</sup> Gen. xi. 10.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ver. 11.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. ver. 12.

are not in Affyria, which lies to the east of Tigris. They suppose, that Rebboth is the same with the Birtha of Ptolemy, or Virtha of Ammianus Marcellinus (1), situate at the mouth of the river Lycus, from which the present ruins of Nineveh are not many miles distant to the north: and the reason they give is, because Birtha signifies in the Chaldee the same which Rebboth does in the Hebrew, that is, streets. And as a confirmation that these names are the same, Ptolemy also places a Birtha on the Euphrates, about the place where we have supposed the other Rebboth to have stood; nor does his placing it above the confluence of the Alabur and Euphrates, instead of below it, lay any good objection in the way, since Ptolemy is full of such faults. It may rather be objected, that Moses seems to have given all the cities he mentions the names they went by in the country where they stood, as near as the Hebrew orthography would allow: but in such doubtful cases, we must always make allowances; so that Birtha or Virtha may stand for Rebboth, since we cannot find a more likely place.

Calab, the next city, is supposed to be the Calach, situate about the springs of the river Lycus (2), mentioned by Strabo as the capital of a province called Calachene, which seems to be the same with Ptolemy's Calacine, above Adiabene towards mount Niphates. Borhart thinks it is the same with Halab, whither the Israelites were carried captives (3); the Heb being sometimes changed into the Kaf, of which that author produces some instances (4).

Could we be sure of being right as to the situation of Calab, that of Resen would be found of course; for Moses says it lay between it and Nineveh, which is enough for our purpose, without supposing it to be the Larissa of Xenophon, according to whose description it was a great city (5), as Resen is likewise said to have been. The difference of the names may be easily accounted for, from the usage of the Greeks, who either could not, or would not write exotic names properly. But we must own Larissa seems to lie too much out of the way to be Resen, for it stood on the Tigris to the south of Nineveh; whereas it should rather have been situate to the northward of that city, and at a distance from the river, to lie in the way between Nineveh and Calab. We may, however, suppose Resen to have been some city in the neighbourhood of those other two, long since destroyed.

(C) Some Rabbins are of this opinion (6). And if the authority of Josephus be of any weight, he affirms the same: Arphaxad, says he, gave name to the Arphaxadzeans, as present called Chaldeans, whose prince he was (7). He certainly does not mean, as Dr. Wells observes (8), that the name Chaldeans is derived directly from the name Arphaxad; but perhaps he meant, that the true name Chasdim is derived thence, that is to say, from רשדן, the three last letters of Arpachshad, (9); and from Chasdim the Greeks have made Chaldai instead of Chasdai, by changing the s into l. And this opinion is more probable, because the Chaldeans were not only called Ahasdim (10) before Chefed was born (11), but appear to have been a nation when Abraham came out of Ur of the Chasdim (12); at which time Chefed was neither old, or considerable enough to have built towns and founded a nation. And this argument is so cogent, that Borhart and others, at the same time that they treat this etymology as a chimera, are obliged to fly to the common subterfuge on this occasion, and say, that the city of Ur is called Ur of the Chaldees by a prolepsis (13), which will hardly serve in this case, for the reasons already alledged. After all, nothing can be determined as to this point, nor will it be repugnant to scripture to deny the derivation of the name of Ahasdim, either from Arphaxad or Chefed.

Some compound Arphaxad's name of רשדן Rafa Ahasdim, that is, the healer, or prelate of Chaldea; supposing it to have been given to Gaiman as a name of dignity (14).

(D) According to a curious, though fabulous Mohammedan tradition, ascribed to Ebn Abbas, Shem being called by Noah, at day-break, to assist at morning prayer, arose and awakened his children, of whom only Arphaxad got up and attended his father to Noah, who gave them his benediction, and prayed for them: whereupon God revealed to him, that the gift of prophecy, together with the apostleship, should be granted to the children of Shem, and in an especial manner to the family of Arphaxad his eldest son; which gift should neither be taken from him, nor transferred to any other: and that the same family should also enjoy the prerogative of sovereignty and empire over the other nations, which should be divided successively between the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, and the Arabs, to the end of the world (15).

(E) A certain author makes him one of the Rephaim, (in consequence of the etymology he has given of his name) supposing them to have been believers, and sent by Noah to recal mankind to the worship of God; wherefore they were named Rephaim, that is, healers and restorers, to wit, of souls. He farther advances, upon no better grounds, that Gaiman or Arphaxad, (whom he makes

(1) Lib. 20. (2) Geog. lib. 11. (3) 2 Kings xvii. 6. and xviii. 11. (4) Ibid. PHALEG. lib. 4. cap. 12. (5) ANABAS, lib. 3. (6) GEDAL. in SHALIL. HAKKAP, p. 93. (7) Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7. (8) Geog. of the Old Test. vol. 1. p. 187. (9) Ibid. LIGHTFOOT Oper. vol. 1. p. 13. (10) Gen.

xv. 7. (11) Gen. xxii. 22. (12) Gen. xi. 31. (13) Ibid. PHALEG. lib. 2. cap. 2. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. 1. p. 458. § 43. (14) Ibid. BOLDUC de Eccles. ant. legem, lib. 2. cap. 2. (15) See D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Nonh, p. 677.

Year of the
Flood, 350.
Year before
Christ, 2648.

WHO this son so begotten by Arphaxad was, has occasioned no small dispute among a the learned: according to the Hebrew and the Samaritan, Salah was his son; but in the Septuagint version we find Cainan put in between the two, as the son of the first, and father of the latter. This variation not only adds another link to the chain of succession, but alters the chronology of this period, making that of the Septuagint to exceed the Samaritan by one hundred and thirty years, the age fixed for Cainan to have begotten his son. Those who adhere to the Septuagint, draw their chief argument from St. Luke's ° mentioning Cainan in his genealogy of CHRIST, which has been already answered ¶ (F). However, the Septuagint version having been received over a great part of the christian world, Cainan passeth for one of the patriarchs, as well as a founder of nations (G), in many countries, and there are more traditions concerning him (H) b than of Salah, the true son and successor of Arphaxad.

SALAH is the only patriarch concerning whom the christian writers have observed an equal silence with Moses. He hath been thought by some to be the same with the prophet Saleh, sent to preach the true religion to the tribe of Thamud in Arabia-Petrea¶; but this person appears to have been much later than the patriarch (I).

It is the general opinion, that the Hebrews derive their name from the patriarch Eber (K), the son of Salah; and many of the Jews (as well as Christians) attribute to ° Luke iii. 36.

Orient. Art. Salah.

¶ Pag. 113. b.

¶ HYDE de Rel. vet. Persar. p. 58. D'HERBELOT. Bibl.

makes to be the same) was the founder of the empire of China; that the fict of the Bonzes was introduced into Japan by him or his disciples; and that the Brachmans took their rise in Chaldea soon after the arrival of that patriarch in the country of Etham, (where he was sent with a colony by Noah) about the year of the deluge 68, the chief of which colony was called Yar ha, which in the Hebrew is Rapha, that is, a curator or healer (16).

(F) To the arguments already produced by us on this head (17) may be added; 1. That Cainan was unknown to Origen, the Chaldee Paraphrast, Phil, and Jacopus, and to the Syriac, Persian, and Arab translators, as well as to the author of the Vulgate. Berosus also placing Abraham in the tenth generation after the flood (18), leaves no room for Cainan. Zoeptolus Antiochenus, (19) and Leontius (who was contemporary with the apostles themselves) do also omit him, as do the more correct Greek writers (20). 2. He is wanting in the Roman and Paris editions of the Septuagint, in a place (21) from whence omissions of this kind are usually supplied; which would scarce have happened in case there had been such a person. Nor is he to be found in that edition of the Septuagint itself, which having been placed in the Alexandrian library of Cleopatra, and received in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, was inserted by Origen in his Hexapla; and which, according to Jerom, was formerly reckoned the only faultless and uncorrupted copy, the other copy, called the Vulgar, having been corrupted at the pleasure of ancient writers (22). It is true, Origen mixed Theodotian's version with the other, but took care to mark with an asterisk what it had left, and with an obelisk what it had more than the Alexandrian MS. which method we see observed by Procopius Gazens (23). 3. The various readings in the several Greek copies, as well with regard to the years of Arphaxad after the birth of Cainan, as to those of Cainan after the birth of Salah, are no small evidence of corruption in this point (24).

Some of the moderns, to reconcile St. Luke with the Hebrew, make Cainan and Salah (25), others Arphaxad and Cainan to be the same person (26).

(G) The Alexandrian chronicle (27) derives the Sarmatians from Cainan; Eusebius Antiochenus (28) the Sacordians; George Gyncellus (29) the Gassperi; Epiphanius the Cajani (30); Salmasius (31) thinks the river Gana in India takes its name from him.

(H) Besides the particulars already mentioned, it is said Cainan was the first after the flood who invented astronomy, and that his sons made a god of him, and worshipped his image after his death. The founding of the city of Hirran in Alypota is also attributed to him, which, it is pretended, he so called from a son he had of that name (32).

(I) An Arab writer makes the prophet Saleh to be the son of Ajal, the son of Cisseki, the son of Haaver, the son of Abaler, the son of Thamud, [the son of Gatber] the son of Aram, the son of Sem (33); so that he was five generations later than the patriarch Salah, who was the third in descent from Noah. Besides, the destruction of the tribe of Thamud was subsequent to that of the tribe of Ad, to whom the prophet Hud, or Eber, was sent, as we learn, from one of the commentators (34) on the Aran; and consequently Saleh, the prophet of the Thamudites, must be posterior to Eber.

(K) The Hebrew word עֶבֶר Eber signifies beyond, or simply, a passage; for what reason he was so called is uncertain: but if the Hebrews were so called from him, as most imagine, why might it not have been given him prophetically by Salah, to denote the future passage of his posterity over the Euphrates into the land of Canaan, in the same manner as many suppose Eber gave his son the name of Peleg, foreseeing the division of the earth which was to happen towards the middle, or end of his life? This patriarch's name is in some versions confounded with that of עֶבֶר Eber, which both occur in one chapter (35).

(16) BOLDUC. de Eccles. ant. legem, lib. 2. cap. 2. See before, p. 84. in the notes. (17) Pag. 113. b. (18) Apud JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 1. c. 8. (19) Lib. 3. ad Autolye. (20) Vid. MASSÆUM, lib. 2. PERER. in Genes. cap. x. (21) Vid. MASSÆUM, lib. 2. PERER. in Genes. c. x. (22) HIERONYM. Epist. 135. (23) Vid. PROCOPIUS in Genes. xl. (24) Vid. HEIDECC. Hist. Patr. tom. 2. §. 10. p. 8. (25) HERMAN. CONTRACT. JOH. LUCIDUS LUD. DE DIEU. FR. GOMARUS, Escc. (26) BOLDUC. ubi sup. (27) Pag. 70. ED. RADERI. (28) Apud HEIDECC. tom. 2. exerc. 1. §. 12. (29) Chronogr. p. 46. (30) Apud HEIDECC. ubi supra. (31) Apud eundem, ibid. (32) ABULFARAG. Hist. Dyn. p. 11. (33) TARIKH MOSTAKHAR. apud D'HERBELOT. Art. Salah. p. 740. (34) HOSSEIN WAFDH, apud D'HERBELOT, ibid. p. 741. (35) 1 Chron. viii. 12, 17, 23.

- a him the honour of being the founder of their name and nation' (L). But there is much more appearance that the name of Hebrews was given to Abraham and his descendants, on account of his passing over the rivers in his way from Irak, or Chaldea, into Syria: so that a Hebrew should signify nothing else in the original sense of the word, than a man from beyond the Euphrates. Year of the Flood, 350.
Year before Christ, 2648.

IN consequence of the same opinion, it has been commonly believed by the ancients as well as moderns, that the Hebrew language also took its name from Eber, and that at the confusion of tongues it remained solely in the family of that patriarch and his descendants' (M): but as the first part of this assertion hath no better ground than the former opinion, so the latter is false in fact, the Hebrew language having been b common to people who had no affinity with the family of Eber; as the Phœnicians, or Canaanites, who in the time of Abraham spoke Hebrew, or a language differing very little from it.

THE building of Babel is properly referred to the time of Eber, just before the birth of his son Peleg, in the 134th year of his age, and of the flood four hundred and one. Some of the Rabbins and christian fathers, who refer that event to a subsequent part of Peleg's life, say Eber gave him that name prophetically, to denote a division of the earth which was to happen some time after, and accordingly reckon Eber a prophet chiefly upon that account". Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before Christ, 2597.

TILL this time all mankind lived in a body together, and spoke one language; but c GOD being offended at the building of that city and tower, confounded their speech, and dispersed them abroad, in order to people and plant the earth. But what particular language the first was, in what manner it was confounded, together with an account of the whole transaction relating to the building of Babel and the dispersion of mankind, must hereafter be the subject of different sections.

* JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7. SHALSH HAKK. p. 803. EUTYCH. Ann. p. 47. Vid. ARU'LFARAG. p. 11. HYDE de Rel. vet. Persar. p. 47, &c. Vid. EBN ANID, p. 14. SHALSH HAKK. p. 803. ZENACH DAV. part 1. p. 6. SEDER OLAM. cap. 1. p. 1. YAKHI ad Genes. x. 25. HILTON, in quest. Hebr. in Genes. CHRYSOST. Hom. 30. in Genes.

(L) The maintainers of this opinion bring many arguments to support it, of which two only seem to be of any weight: 1. That a patriarch of that name being found among the ancestors of the Jews, it is reasonable to believe they derived their name from him. 2. That Shem is expressly said to be the father of all the children of Eber (36).

To the first of these it is answered, that as Moses intimates nothing that way, the bare affinity of the name is not sufficient to determine the point in favour of that opinion. And as for what they alledge, either of the superior piety and merit of Eber above the other patriarchs, or of the Hebrew language being peculiarly spoken or preserved by him and his posterity, it is not only begging the question, there being no foundation in scripture for those suppositions, but may be presumed to be false as to the first (since he cannot be supposed to have been more pious than Shem) as it appears to be with regard to the last (37), the Hebrew having been spoken by nations which were not of his posterity.

To the second argument it is replied, that the word Eber in the before-mentioned text, has not respect to a person, but to place, and consequently that the words do not signify the children of the patriarch Eber, but the people who dwelt on one side or the other of the river, meaning thereby either the Euphrates or Tigris, or both, which parts were the seat of Shem's posterity. To enforce which acceptance, it may be farther observed, that if Eber be taken here as a proper name, then under the designation of his children must be comprehended not only the Hebrews properly so called, descended from him by Peleg, and the Arabs, who were Joktan's posterity, and settled on this side of the river, but also those who remained on the other side of the river, either in Mesopotamia, Chaldea, or Elymais: but it could never be Moses's meaning to make Shem the father of Eber's children in this sense, which seems to have nothing in view; being too extended to illustrate any thing relating particularly to the Hebrews or Jews, and too limited to reflect any honour on Shem, who was the father of many nations, and of some more considerable than those descended from Eber. Nothing therefore seems to favour this opinion, unless it may be said that Moses in this place had a mind to pay a compliment to all the posterity of Eber in general, on account of the relation they bore to the Jews, as being collateral branches of the same ancestor. But this point we shall more critically examine when we come to the history of Abraham.

(M) The confusion of tongues having been considered as a punishment of the temerity of those who undertook to build Babel, many authors, possessed with high sentiments of Eber, have presumed that the posterity of that patriarch, who was destined by GOD to be the stock of the holy people, and the depository of the true religion, had no share in that enterprize, nor consequently in the punishment which attended it. But if Eber's children were not concerned in it, it must have been because none of them were grown up to an age capable of assisting in that work, the dispersion having happened at the birth of Peleg, who is by many supposed to have been Eber's eldest son: for it seems to be incontestable that all the descendants of Shem, Ham and Japhet, were concerned in that building (38). However, it is plain Eber's posterity shared in the punishment, for their language was divided; witness the difference between the Arabic (the language of Joktan's posterity) and the Hebrew; not to mention the Chaldees.

(36) Genes. x. 21.

(37) See the next note.

(38) See sect. 4.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

THE original of idolatry by image-worship is by many attributed to the age of a Eber (N), though most of the fathers place it no higher than that of Serug; which seems to be the more probable opinion, considering that for the first hundred and thirty four years of Eber's life all mankind dwelt in a body together, during which time it is not reasonable to suppose idolatry broke in upon them; then some time must be allowed after the dispersion for the several nations, which were but small at the beginning, to encrease and settle themselves: so that if idolatry was introduced in Eber's time, it must have been towards the end of his life, and could not well have prevailed so universally, and with that obstinacy which is imagined by authors. However, the Arabs have a tradition that Hud (O), who is generally supposed to have been the same person with Eber, was sent to preach to one of their ancient tribes, b named Ad, who had corrupted themselves with the worship of idols, and were afterwards almost totally destroyed for not hearkening to him. They also say, he ended his days in the province of Hadramaut, where they still pretend to shew his sepulchre, near Merbat, and within two miles of Hafec, a port on the Indian sea: there is a small town built about it, which is now called Kabr Hud, or the Sepulchre of Hud.*

EBER is supposed by many to have built Hebron in Canaan, and Tanis in Egypt; but those are groundless imaginations. Some refer the golden age to the time of him and his son Peleg: and indeed if we can suppose there ever was such a pacific and innocent state on this side the flood, it is most likely to have been in the days of Noah c and his three sons, that is, during the time their posterity continued in their first habitation, before their removal to Shinaar, and a while after the dispersion, which probably gave it a short interruption.

EBER had two sons, Peleg and Joktan; Peleg was born just after the dispersion happened, on which occasion that name (P) was given him. Venerable Bede affirms, that temples were first built in his days, and that several of the chiefs of nations were worshipped for gods. On the death of this patriarch we are told that contention arose between his sons and those of his brother Joktan, whereupon men began to build castles for their defence<sup>b</sup>.

THE scripture mentions only one son of Peleg's, besides which the orientals have d given him another mentioned in scripture, though not as Peleg's son, namely, Melchizedec. They say he begat him two hundred and nine years after the birth of his brother<sup>a</sup>, which is a more rational opinion, though perhaps no better grounded, than that of the Jews, who make him to be the same with Shem. Of this person we have already related some particulars, and may have occasion to say more hereafter.

JOKTAN is generally supposed to have been Peleg's elder brother, upon a presumption that he and his thirteen sons were leaders of colonies at the dispersion of Babel. They are indeed mentioned at the same time with the other heads of nations, and are doubtless to be included amongst those by whom, it is said, the nations were divided in the earth after the flood<sup>e</sup>: but we do not think it follows from thence, that they must e have been leaders in that first dispersion, in case their ages would allow it. Besides, by that means we should not only postpone the time of that transaction, which seems * Vid. Pocock. Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 36. D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. Art. Houd. * Vid. D'HERBELOT, ibid. Art. Cabar Houd. † Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. 2. p. 11, 13. * Vid. GORDON, Chron. lib. 2. cap. 3. * Vid. BOCHART. Phaleg. lib. 1. cap. 1. † AB'ULFARAG. p. 12. * EBN AMID. p. 28. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 48. * EBN AMID. ibid. † EBN AMID. p. 28. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 48. † Genes. 1. 32.

(N) Dr. Hyde thinks idolatry may by numerous arguments be proved to have begun as high as the times of Eber and Salah, who preached to their countrymen, the idolatrous Arab tribes of Ad and Thamud (39). But we have already observed, that the apostle of the Thamudites was much later than the patriarch Salah; and the mission of Eber is not an authority to build upon.

(O) It seems as if the Arabs had some notion of the Hebrews being so called from Eber; and therefore from the other name of that nation, viz. Jews, which they pronounce Hud and Tebud, they have given this prophet the name of Hud also.

Shickard, on the credit of two authors, one an Arab, who places Hud between Salah and Eber; and the other a Turk, who sets him between Arphaxad and Eber; conjectures Hud is Cainan (40). But this is against the current of Mohammedan writers, who make him the son of Salah (41), and the same with Eber (42).

(P) The name Peleg, or Phaleg, signifies division. The division of the earth and dispersion of mankind, was doubtless the same transaction; though several authors, especially those who follow the Hebrew chronology, make two of them, as we shall observe hereafter.

(39) HYDE de Rel. vet. Pers. p. 58. (40) SCHICKARD Tarikh regum Persia. (41) Tarikh Montakhab apud D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. Art. Houd. (42) Vid. EBN AMID, p. 14. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 46.

<sup>a</sup> to be necessarily connected with the birth of Peleg (Q), but introduce five generations in the line of Sbem as concerned in it, which are two more than we find of the descendants of Ham and Japhet, and therefore we have reserved them for a second remove or plantation.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

THE scripture gives to Joktan thirteen sons; whereas the Arabs, who derive their original from Joktan, or, as they more usually call him, Kabtan, assign him one and thirty by the same mother, of whom all but two leaving Arabia (R), went and settled in India<sup>1</sup>. Tarab, the elder of the two who staid, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Yaman, or Arabia Felix, and gave his name to that country, as well as to the Arabic language, which he first spoke<sup>2</sup>. Jorham, the younger, founded the kingdom of Hejaz<sup>3</sup>, which contained part of Arabia Petraea, and other territories.

WE find little said concerning the three succeeding patriarchs, Ren (S), Serug, and Nabor: however, some authors refer the founding of certain kingdoms and cities (T); the invention of several arts (U); the spreading of idolatry (W); and

<sup>1</sup> AHMED BEN YUSEF apud POCOCK. Spec. Hist. Arab. p. 40.

<sup>2</sup> POCOCK. ibid. p. 40, 55, 151.

<sup>3</sup> Idem, ibid. p. 40, 78.

(Q) Those who follow the Hebrew computation are at a great loss for an expedient to make Joktan and his thirteen sons leaders of colonies at the dispersion, supposing it to have happened at the birth of Peleg. For Eber having been but thirty four years old when he begat the latter, there cannot reasonably be allowed above half that space for Joktan's age at that time, granting him to be the elder: so that we cannot well conceive him to have been the father of more than one son before the dispersion. Upon which account many postpone that transaction to a succeeding part of Peleg's life, supposing Eber imposed that name prophetically (40). But the great Cyber thinks himself obliged to refer it to his birth, though he knows not how to get over the difficulty just now mentioned (41); which may be solved well enough by the Samaritan chronology, according to which time sufficient may be allowed for Joktan and his sons to propagate.

(R) D'Herbelot mentions four other sons of Kabtan, namely, Hadramaut (the same with Hazarmaut), Saba, Osir, and Khawilah, or Havilah (42).

(S) According to the different pronunciation of the ש, this patriarch's name is variously written, Ren, and Ragan; and, by prefixing an א, sometimes En and Argan.

(T) The building of Babel is by some placed in the seventieth year of Ren (43), and the beginning of Nimrod's reign in his hundred and thirtieth (44). About the same time others fix the founding of the kingdom of Egypt and the city of Memphis by Mizraim (45); of the city of Saba, in Arabia Felix, by a certain queen (46); of the kingdom of Bohemia, and its metropolis Prague (47); and of the kingdom of the Amazons (48); but these last are idle imaginations of the Jews. With more probability, though perhaps equal foundation, others attribute the building of Rages in Media to Ren himself (49), as that of Sarnj, the capital of Diwar Madar (50), might be to his son Serug, who is supposed to have dwelt in the place where that city now stands (51). In Nabor's time we are told, that Armures, a king of Canaan, built Sodom and Gomorrab, and Zoar; to the two first of which he gave the names of his two sons, and to the last that of their mother (52).

(U) It is pretended, that the first mint for coining, and the first foundery for gold and silver ornaments, were erected in the days of Ren (53). Others attribute this invention to Terah (54), as that of coining gold and silver is ascribed to Serug (55). Weights and Measures are said to have been invented by Samirus, king of the Chaldeans, in the days of the same patriarch (56), tho' the use of them seems not to have been instituted till Nabor's time (57). The art of weaving silks, and of dying, is also attributed to the said king (58).

(W) Though the generality of authors, and particularly of the fathers, agree to place the origin of idolatry in the time of Serug (59), whom some suppose to be the introducer of it, erroneously making him (if he be not a different person from the patriarch) of the race of Japhet (60); yet others make it more early (61), and it is said, that in Ren's days mankind was fallen into various kinds of false worship; some adoring the heaven, others the celestial bodies, others animals and plants, others the images of their deceased friends (62). About the same time also the custom of mens sacrificing their children to devils, is pretended to have been introduced on the following occasion: A certain rich man dying, his son made a golden statue in representation of him, and placed it on his tomb, setting a servant to watch it. Some time after the son was robbed of all he had, and coming to make his complaints at his father's sepulchre, the devil spoke out of the image, and promised to restore him all he had lost, if he would offer his youngest son as a sacrifice to him, and bath himself in his warm blood; which he did, and thereupon the devil coming out of the image, entered into the young man, and taught him magic. But at length this practice of human sacrifices growing frequent, God sent a violent earthquake,

(40) See above, p. 129. (41) Chronolog. Sacra, part 1. cap. 5. p. 26. (42) D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Saba & Hegiaz. (43) ABU'LFARAG. p. 12. (44) EBN AMID, p. 29. (45) Idem, ibid. MIDRASH, sect. נִמְרוֹד. (46) EBN AMID, ubi supra. (47) R. DAVID GANZ, in Zem. Dav. p. 4. JUCHASIN, p. 135. (48) SHALSH. HAKKAB. p. 94, 95. (49) HYDE de rel. vet. Perf. p. 55. (50) GEOR. NUBIENS. p. 203. (51) HYDE, ubi sup. p. 57. (52) ABU'LFARAG. p. 13. (53) EBN AMID, p. 30. (54) SHALSH. HAKKAB. p. 94. 2. (55) ABU'LFARAG. p. 12.

(56) Idem, ibid. (57) EBN AMID, p. 30. EUTYCH. Annales, p. 63. (58) ABU'LFARAG. ubi supra. (59) JON. DAMASC. EPIPHAN. Panar. l. 1. CHRONIC. ALEX. p. 113. ABU'LFARAG. p. 12. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 56. Vid. etiam HYDE de rel. vet. Perf. p. 57. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. II. exerc. 1. § 32. GURTNER. Hist. Univ. p. 93. (60) EUSEB. Chron. Grac. p. 13. CEDREN Compend. Hist. p. 36. SUIDAS in voce Σαρδύχ. MALLA Chron. p. 94, &c. (61) See the preceding page. (62) EBN AMID, p. 29. EUTYCH. p. 59.

some

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

some other particulars of less moment (X) to their times.

TERAH, the son of Nahor, was the father of Abraham, the founder of the Hebrew or Jewish nation. The scripture informs us, that Terah, after the seventieth year of his age, begat three sons, Abram, Nahor, and Haran*. But of these sons, Haran only, who was the eldest, at least much older than Abram, was born in that year; and the other two probably much later†, and, as is supposed, by a different mother‡. Haran died in his native country, in Ur of the Chaldees (Y), before his father, leaving a son named Lot, and two daughters, one named Milcab, and the other Israb§. Nahor married Milcab his niece, and Abram Sarai his half sister||.

TERAH, who is generally supposed to be the same whom the Asiatics call Azer (Z), is on all hands allowed to have been an idolater; nor can this be denied, since he is expressly said in scripture to have served other gods¶. The eastern authors unanimously agree that he was a statuary, or carver of idols; and he is represented as the first who made images of clay, pictures only having been in use before‡, and taught that they were to be adored as gods¶: however, we are told his employment was a very honourable one, and that he was a great man (A); that at length he was converted by the * Genes. xi. 26.

† See before, p. 112.

‡ Vid. Herodotus, Hist. Patr. tom. II. Exerc. 3. § 3.

¶ Genes. xi. 27, 28, 29.

§ Ibid. ver. 29, and xx. 12.

|| Joth. xxiv. 2, 14.

¶ EPIPHAN. advers.

Heret. lib. 1. p. 7, 8.

¶ SUIDAS in Lexico, voce Σιπυρχ.

earthquake, the first of the kind, with a whirlwind, which broke all their idols in pieces, and overthrew their temples (63). The rise of the Sabian religion, is by some referred to the age of Nahor (64).

(X) The oriental authors mention a king called Karnu, who reigned in the days of Ren, but say not where. They pretend he was a famous chymist, and built a city called Uksh (65), or Ukin (66) with bricks of gold. But this seems to be the same person whom the Mohammedans make coeval with Miser, and the Carab of the scriptures. We are also told, that in the time of Sereu, a king of Egypt, called Affanur, built a ship, and invaded the inhabitants of the sea-coast; and that he was succeeded by Pharach, the son of Sanes, from whom the Pharachs were denominated (67): that the giants began to encrease in Nahor's time, of whom one was Ad, a famous king of the Arabs (68), and another Hellen, who assisted at the building of the tower of Babel, and was worshipped by the Greeks (69); and that the troubles of Joh happened in the twenty fifth year of the last mentioned patriarch (70).

(Y) Several writers taking Ur, which signifies fire, for an appellative, pretend that Haran was burnt; some saying that that accident happened as he endeavoured to take the images of Terah out of the fire, unto which Abraham had thrown them (71). Others, as he attempted to quench the flames of an idol temple which Abraham had set on fire (72). A third party say, that Abraham being thrown by Nimrod into a burning furnace, Haran was intent upon the event, resolving to follow the religion which prevailed; and seeing his brother come out unhurt by the flames, upon Nimrod's demanding who he believed in, Haran replied, in the God of Abraham; whereupon he was cast into the furnace, and died in the presence of his father, as the Rabbins express (73) what our translation renders before his father. It is said the fire had power over him, because his faith was not so strong as Abraham's, nor was he destined to so great things (74). Epiphanius says, that Te- rah's surviving Haran, was a punishment for his daring to make images of clay; and that before him no father had seen his children die a natural death (75). Jos. phus affirms, that Haran's sepulchre was to be seen at Ur in his time (76).

(Z) Some of the Mohammedan authors write, that Azer was the father of Abraham, and son of Terah (77); and D'Herbelot says, that the Arabs always distinguish them in their genealogies as two different persons; but that because Abraham was the son of Terah according to Moses, it is therefore supposed, [by European writers:] that he is the same with the Azer of the Arabs (78). How true this observation may be in relation to some authors, we cannot say, but we are sure it cannot be true of all; for several Arab and Turkish writers expressly make Azer and Terah the same person (79). Azer, in ancient times, was the name of the planet Mars, and the month of March was so called by the most ancient Persians; for the word originally signifying fire (as it still does) it was therefore given by them and the Chaldeans to that planet (80), which partaking, as was supposed, of a fiery nature, was acknowledged by the Chaldeans and Assyrians as a god or planetary deity, whom they anciently worshipped under the form of a pillar: whence Azer became a name among the nobility, who esteemed it honourable to be denominated from their gods (81), and is found in the composition of several Babylonish names. For these reasons, a learned author supposes Azer to be the heathen name of Terah, and that the other was given him on his conversion (82).

(A) The Eastern authors say Azer was a great lord, and in high favour with Nimrod, whose son-in-law he was (83), because he made his idols for him, in which art he excelled all others. This employment was very honourable among the Chaldeans, the person who followed it being considered as the maker of gods: for it required profound skill in astrology to chuse the proper materials, and fix the proper time for that work, every

(63) EUTYCH. p. 63. EBN AMID, p. 30.

(64) EUTYCH. p. 63.

(65) EBN AMID, p. 30.

(66) EUTYCH. Annales, p. 60.

(67) ABULFARAG. p. 12.

(68) EBN AMID, ubi supra.

(69) SUIDAS in voe Σιπυρχ.

(70) ARUDH. CANANEUS apud

ABULFARAG. p. 12.

(71) CERREUS

apud BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Abraham, Rem. B.

(72) ABULFARAG. Hist. Dyn. p. 13.

(73) BEN

UZZIEL ad Gen. xi. 28. MAIMON. Yad Hitzak.

Et de Idolat. cap. 1. SHALSHEL. HAKKAB. p. 8.

(74) Judai apud Iyranum & Tostatum citante SA-

LIANO Annal. Tom. I. p. 401.

(75) EPIPHANIUS

de Heret. lib. 1. p. 8.

(76) Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(77) TARIKH MONTAKHAB apud D'HERBELOT Bibl.

Orient. Art. Abraham, p. 12.

(78) D'HERBELOT

ibid.

(79) EBN SHOHNAN, MIRAT KAINAT, etc. MSS. See also PHARHANG GLHANGHURI apud

HYDE de rel. vet. Pers. p. 68.

(80) HYDE,

ibid. p. 63. (81) Idem, ibid. p. 64.

(82) Idem,

ibid. p. 62. (83) D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient.

Art. Abraham.

- a earnest persuasions of Abraham (B), and prevailed upon to leave Ur. Josephus says, he quitted Chaldea, being not able to endure the country after the loss of his son Haran<sup>a</sup>. Some would have it that he did not become an idolater till he was settled at Haran<sup>b</sup>, which is absurd<sup>c</sup>; and others say he never was converted<sup>d</sup>, any more than his son Nabor, who afterwards left Ur to join his father at Haran<sup>e</sup>, which seems from him to be called the city of Nabor<sup>f</sup>: but there is more probability, that both Nabor and Haran were converted; seeing Lot was bred in the true religion, and Abraham chose Isaac a wife out of the family of Nabor, not caring to marry him to the idolatrous daughters of Canaan<sup>g</sup>: wherefore a learned author supposes Nabor and Haran to have been the names given to those two brothers at the time of their conversion<sup>h</sup>.
- b HOWEVER, Terab, towards the latter part of his life, designing to remove from Chaldea into the land of Canaan, took his son Abram, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, and his grandson Lot, and leaving Ur came to Haran, a city in the north-west parts of Mesopotamia, where having dwelt for some time, he died, being two hundred and five years old.

Thus have we collected, in the best method we could, what we have found worth notice, from writers of various times, religions, and countries, relating to the postdiluvian patriarchs. In the next section we shall proceed to give part of the fragments of a heathen author, whose history is supposed to relate to the earliest times of this period.

SECT. III.

The History of Sanchoniatho after the Flood.

HAVING in a preceding section brought down the Phœnician history of Sanchoniatho to the tenth generation, which probably perished in the flood, though he takes no notice of that great event; we shall here resume the thread of his narration: premising only, that, according to the plausible hypothesis which we have formerly mentioned (C), that writer proceeds to continue the idolatrous line of Cain, by kind of wood, as well as stones and metals, being by the Chaldeans dedicated to its peculiar planet, of whose influence it was thereby believed to participate more than any other; and an idol thus formed under a happy position of the heavens, and of the matter appropriated to such a planet, was conceived to be rightly prepared and made according to art (84). Some of the Rabbins say Terab was a priest, and the chief of them (85).

<sup>a</sup> Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7. <sup>b</sup> TOSTAT. apud PERRINUM in Genes. cap. 11. <sup>c</sup> Vid. BAYLE Dict. Art. Abraham, Rem. C. <sup>d</sup> CHRYSOST. Hom. 31, & 37. <sup>e</sup> St. AUGUST. de Civit. Dei, lib. 16. cap. 13. <sup>f</sup> Compare Gen. xxiv. 10. with Gen. xxvii. 43, and xviii. 10. <sup>g</sup> Gen. xxv. 3. <sup>h</sup> HYDE de Rel. vet. Pers. p. 62.

(B) Mohammedan authors relate, that Abraham often advised his father to forsake the worship of images, asking how he could worship that which neither heard, nor saw, nor did him any good (86): that this offending Terab, he was often ready to fall from words to blows; but that at length Abraham got the better of his father's obstinacy, refusing to pray for him until he promised to become a convert (87): for while he was an enemy to God, he was an enemy also to Abraham (88). The Jews say he repented (89); and it is thought to have been owing to the merit thereof, as well as of his son Abraham, that the chain of the oral law descended from Adam to him, and thence to his son Abraham (90). There is some ground to think Terab was converted by Abraham's persuasions, because he travelled with him from Ur to Haran, in order to go into Canaan (91).

(C) Bishop Cumberland, suspecting the Phœnician records to have been corrupted in this place, has proposed an amendment of them (92): He supposes a dislocation in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth generations, either through neglect in transcribers, or rather purposely made by the Cabiri, who wrote those records, to conceal the great judgment of the flood, which swept away the race of Cain (93), and of which for that reason they have suppressed all mention (94). To support this opinion, he alleges, 1. That Sydye and Misor could not be the children of Amyrus and Magnus, because the tenth generation in the line of Genus or Cain, wherein those two last persons are placed, must have been drowned in the flood, together with such children as might then be born of them (95), answering to Sbem, Ham, and Japhet. 2. That Sydye being Melchizedec, whom he takes to be Sbem, and Cronus Ham, it was necessary to join them both together under the line of Uranus, which Sanchoniatho owns to be distinct from that of Genus (96). 3. That Misor being manifestly Mizraim, the son of Ham or Cronus, there is a necessity of placing him one generation lower than he is placed in Sanchoniatho, viz. in the twelfth (97); and that without this change, the beginning of the Egyptian kingdom would be placed too near the flood (98). 4. That Japhet being still wanting to make up the three sons of Noah, and Nerens being the only person in Sanchoniatho's genealogies which answers the Scripture account of him, in Smegm. Orient. lib. 1. p. 280. (91) HYDE ubi sup. p. 59. (92) CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 43. (93) Ibid. p. 49. (94) Ibid. p. 47, 177. (95) Ibid. p. 41, 677. (96) Ibid. p. 47. (97) Ibid. p. 48. (98) Ibid. p. 49.

(84) D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Abraham, p. 63. (85) Shalshel. Hakkab. p. 94. (86) SHAH-KISTANI ex Alkorano, c. 19. ver. 39. apud HYDE de Rel. vet. Pers. p. 68. (87) Al Koran, c. 9. ver. 216. (88) HYDE, ubi sup. (89) Shalshel. Hakkab. p. 94. (90) ZOAR apud HOTTINGER.

persons taken out of the line of Noah, and annexing them as sons to Amyrus and Ma-gus, the last of that race.

Generation XI. FROM these men, says he, were begot Misfor (D) and Sydyc (E), i. e. Well-freed, and Just: these found out the use of salt.

Generation XII. FROM Misfor came Taantus (F), who found out the writing of the first letters; whom the Egyptians called Tboor, the Alexandrians Thoyth, and the Greeks Hermes: but from Sydyc came the Dioscouri, or Cabiri (G), called also Corybantes, and Samo-thraces. These first invented the building a compleat ship.

Generation XIII. OF these others came, who found out herbs, the cure of bitings, and charms.

URANUS, whose parents lived in these mens age, as hath been already mentioned, succeeding his father Eliun in the kingdom, had by Ge, his sister, four sons; 1. Ilus b or Cronus; 2. Betylus; 3. Dagon or Siton; and 4. Atlas (H); besides much issue by him, he has joined him to Sydyc and Cronus in the line of Uranus (99). But the alterations will better appear, by giving the reader a table of Sanchoniatho's genealogies, from the place where the bishop's corrections begin; referring him for our remarks on the scheme itself to the succeeding notes.

The two Lines, as they stand in SANCHONIATHO.

SETH'S Line.	CAIN'S Line.
9. Eliun or Hypsisus ,	Agrus , Agronurus ,
10. Uranus ,	Amyrus , Migus ,
11. Cronus ,	Misfor , Sydyc ,
12.	Thoth , Cabiri or Dioscouri ,
13.	The sons of the Dioscouri .

SETH'S Line, in SANCHONIATHO, corrected.

9. Eliun or Hypsisus ,
10. Uranus ,
11. Sydyc	Cronus	Nereus
or Stem ,	or Ham ,	or Japhet ,
12. Cabiri or Dioscouri ,	Misfor ,	Pontus ,
13. The sons of the Dioscouri .	Thoyth ,	Posidon or Niptum .

(D) This person Dr. Cumberland takes to be the Mizraim of the Scripture, and the Amenes of the Egyptians, for these reasons; 1. He supposes Misfor to be the singular of Mizraim, the first king of Egypt according to the Hebrews, as Menes is according to the Egyptians (1). 2. That Eratostratus, in Synellus and Saliger's Eusebius (2), affirms Menes to be Misraim, as the Greeks write the name of Mizraim (3). 3. That Thoth was the son of Menes, as well as of Misfor, and the second king of Egypt (4). 4. That Misfor and Menes lived at the same time; and, 5. Died the same violent death (5). We shall consider this opinion, which we take to be absolutely untenable, in another place; and shall only observe at present, that we cannot find Eratostratus has affirmed any such thing, as that Menes is Misraim; which is the mere imagination of those authors who have transcribed him.

As to the translation which Philo gives of the name Misfor, "Ευλυσις, or well-freed, Bochart derives it from the Syriac ܡܫܝܪܐ Misro; but bishop Cumberland rather thinks the notion of freedom to be consequent to his name, which he supposes to signify a prince, from the root ܡܫܝܪ asar, to rule or restrain, by addition of the servile ܡܝܡ im (6) [though to effect this the first radical must be thrown out] freedom from any coercive power being the consequent of his dominion and superiority (7).

(E) Sydyc the bishop supposes to be Melchizedec, and Melchizedec Stem (8). All the arguments he brings in favour of the first supposition, is, that Gotius (9) affirms Melchizedec to be Sydyc (10), probably on account of the similitude of the names, Sydyc or Sedec signifying just, and Melchizedec the just king. Nor does he bring any proof that Melchizedec is Stem: he only says, that he thinks the objections against that opinion are sufficiently answered (11) by other authors; so that he produces no reason to support these two opinions, on which his system is chiefly grounded. If it be objected, that Misfor and Sydyc were the sons of Amyrus and Migus, he answers, that Sydyc was not the son of those persons, but brother to Ilus or Cronus, and son to Noah (12); and that the Cabiri who had corrupted the records by suppressing all mention of the flood (13), have taken the righteous king Sedec or Melchizedec (14), with Misfor, and their children the Cabiri and Thoth, and placed them in Cain's line, being willing to transfer all the honour gained by them to the family in which their false religion began; for which Sydyc's [or Melchizedec's] living in Canaan, might furnish a pretence (15).

(F) Taant or Thoth is thought to be Athoth, the son of Menes, and the second king of Egypt, according to Eratostratus, upon a presumption that Misfor and Menes are the same; and because he was also a king of Egypt, and son of a king [though it does not appear from Sanchoniatho that Misfor was a king] as Athoth was (16). It is observed also, that as Sanchoniatho's line ends with Misfor and Thoth, so Eratostratus's line of Theban kings begins with Menes and Athoth (17), as does the first dynasty of the Thebanes in Manetho. And the difference between the names Thoth and Athoth is no objection, the bishop producing several instances of proper names in the eastern languages, where the initial A was frequently left out (18).

(G) Of the Dioscouri, or Cabiri, the sons of Sydyc, we shall speak hereafter when we come to the Grecian mythology. According to Dr. Cumberland's scheme, they were a little branch of Sydyc or Stem's race, that lived with Ham, or near him (19).

(H) We shall consider these four sons of Uranus in their order. 1. Cronus is in all probability the same with the Ham of Moses; the last seems to have been his proper name, and the other, which may be derived from ܟܪܢ Keren, a horn, or power, and importing regal dignity, might have been his Phœnician title, as Belus, or ܒܠܝܐ Baal, signifying a lord, was his Chaldean title (20); for the Babylonians are said to have called the first Baal Cronus (21). Moloch and Asitum, names of the same signification, are also frequently used to design

(99) CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 257, 258, 259.
 (1) Ibid. p. 45, 55. (2) Chron. Græc. p. 17.
 (3) CUMBERL. ubi sup. p. 54, 185. (4) Ibid.
 p. 44, 55. (5) Ibid. p. 55. (6) Ibid. p. 98.
 (7) Ibid. p. 179. (8) Ibid. p. 47, 173. (9) In not. ad Heb. vii. 1. (10) CUMBERL. on Sanchon.
Chron. p. 174. (11) Ibid. p. 175. (12) Ibid.

p. 47. (13) Ibid. p. 47, 177. (14) Ibid. p. 47.
 (15) Ibid. p. 178. (16) Ibid. p. 44, 54, 186.
 (17) Ibid. p. 46. (18) Ibid. p. 127. Vid. BOCHART.
Canaan. p. 826. (19) CUMBERL. on Sanchon.
 p. 261. (20) Ibid. p. 111, &c. (21) EU-DOLEMIUS in Alex. Philist. apud EUSEB. de Præp.
Evangelic. lib. 9. cap. 17.

a other wives: wherefore Ge being grieved at it, and jealous, reproached Uranus, so that they parted from each other. But Uranus, though he parted from her, yet by force invading her, and lying with her when he listed, went away again; and he also attempted to kill the children he had by her. Ge also defended, or avenged herself, gathering auxiliary powers unto her.

But when Cronus came to man's age, using Hermes Trismegistus as his counsellor and assistant (for he was his secretary) he opposed his father Uranus, avenging his mother: but Cronus had children, Persephone [Proserpina] and Athena [Minerva]: the former died a virgin, but by the counsel of Athena, and of Hermes, Cronus made of iron a scimeter and a spear. Then Hermes speaking to the assistants of Cronus with b enchanting words, wrought in them a keen desire to fight against Uranus, in behalf of Ge. And thus Cronus warring against Uranus, drove him out of his kingdom, and succeeded in the imperial power or office.

In the fight was taken a well-beloved concubine of Uranus, big with child. Cronus gave her in marriage to Dagon, and she brought forth, at his house, what she had in her womb by Uranus, and called him Demaroon.

AFTER these things Cronus builds a wall round about his house, and founds Byblus, the first city (1) in Phœnicia. Afterwards Cronus suspecting his own brother Atlas, with the advice of Hermes, throwing him into a deep hole of the earth, there buried him.

Sign the same man (22): and Baal-Berith (23) probably signifies this Cronus, worshipped antiently at Beatus (24). That Cronus is the Ham of Moses, appears from the authority of Eusebius, whose words are these: πρώτον γενέσθαι Βῆλον. ὃν εἶπαι Κρόνον ἐν τῇτε δὲ γενέσθαι Βῆλον καὶ Χαναάν, τῶτον δὲ τὴν Χαναάν γενέσθαι τὴν πατέρα τὴν τοιούτων τῇτε δὲ Χάμ ὡς γενέσθαι, ὃν ἐπὶ τὴν Ἑλλάδα ἀνέγετο Ἀσβολόν, πατέρα δὲ Αἰθιοπίων, ἀδελφὸν δὲ τοῦ Μισραὴμ πατέρα [πατρὸς] Αἰθιοπίων (25); which bishop Cumberland renders thus: There was at first Belus, who is Cronus; but of him came another, 1. Belus, and, 2. Canaan, who was, or begot the father of the Phœnicians; his son too was, 3. Chum, whom the Greeks call Asbolon, the father of the Ethiopians, the brother of, 4. Misraim, the father of the Egyptians. It is easy, says that author, to adjust this translation to the four sons of Ham (26); for two of their names are plainly the same, Canaan and Misraim; the third, Chum, is but slightly altered from Cush, the ω being changed into μ only to express the accusative case, as Bochart has well noted [though, by the way, this is an odd manner of accounting for that variation, the Greeks having no accusative in m, nor indeed any word ending in m] wherefore it only remains that Belus, the successor of Ham in his dominions in Africa, be allowed to be the same with Phut in Moses; and it is reasonable to admit that he who succeeded his father in that large empire, should bear his title among the Babylonians, as he is here called by the Chaldean title of honour Belus, whereas Moses calls him properly by the name given him at his birth (27). We find several footprints of Cronus in that passage of the Mosaic history where Chedorlaomer and his confederates are recorded to have smitten the Rephaim in Ashteroth Carnaim, and the Zuzims in Ham. Ashteroth will easily be admitted to be Asarte, and Carnaim being derived from Keren, the root of the name of Cronus, may relate to him. And as Raphas is acknowledged by the learned to have been a title of Cronus, both from the Coptic name of his Star, and from the Septuagint, who translate Chim (Cronus's known name) by Raphas, written in some copies Rempias, which is the clearest account of that passage in Isaïas (28), so from him some of his posterity, who were most like him, and other antediluvians, of long life, great strength and stature, were called Rephaim; especially those who dwelt in his city Ashteroth Carnaim, and seem to have been his children, and their cities to have taken their father's name (29). As to Ilus, or Il, it seems to be no other than Il El, which signifies strong, and is therefore in Hebrew one of the names of God.

2. Betylus, bishop Cumberland does not find mentioned by any other writer, his name seems to be of eastern original, from the root בטל Betel, which, though it often signifies dishonourable idleness, yet sometimes denotes that quiet spirit which serves religious duties and study. And in Arabic it signifies a hero, who by successful wars procures to himself and subjects rest and peace (30).

3. Dagon is called, agreeably to Philo's skill in the eastern languages, Siton, because he was the inventor of sowing bread-corn; and Jupiter Aotrinus, from his contriving of ploughs. He was worshipped by the Phœnicians in Canaan, and his name, which the bishop supposes was given him at his canonization, suggests to us the reason of the divine honours they gave him (31) [being derived from דגן Dagon, bread-corn.]

4. Atlas is also reckoned one of the most celebrated sons of Uranus in the Atlantian theology; the Atlantii in Africa are derived from him. The bishop supposes the reason of his being cruelly buried alive by his brother (as Sanhoniatio tells us presently) was to secure to him and Thoth the dominion over the western parts of Africa where the Atlantii were seated; though that design was not effected but by Hercules, or Arles, called Assis (the purling of Egypt) in the reign of Amans the son of Atlas (32). The bishop chuses rather to consider Atlas as the brother, than the son of Japetus, as the Greeks represent him, because Sanhoniatio reports him to be the brother of Cronus, whom the Greeks also agree to be brother to Japetus.

(1) It is urged as an objection to the veracity of this fragment, that Byblus is here said to be the first city in Phœnicia, after mention has been made of Tyre in the fifth generation (33); but no more can be made of what is said there, than that it was a place inhabited, perhaps by people living

(22) Vid. THEOPHIL. ANTIOCHEN. ad Autlyc. lib. 2. DAMASCIUM in vita Isidori, & SUIDAM in voce Koi: &c.

(23) Judg. viii. 31. (24) CUMBERL. on Sancton. p. 142.

(25) Apud EUSEB. de prep. Evangel. lib. 9. cap. 17. p. 419. (26) Gen. x. 6.

(27) CUMBERL. on Sancton. p. 145.

(28) Chap. v. 26. Vid. etiam POCOCK. specim. Hist. Arab. p. ult.

(29) CUMBERL. ubi sup. p. 120, 121. (30) Idem, ibid. p. 326. (31) Idem, ibid. & p. 327.

(32) CUMBERL. Sancton. p. 327, 328.

(33) See before, p. 87. b.

AT that time the descendants of the Dioscuri having built some tumultuary and a other stronger ships, went to sea, and being cast on shore near mount Cassius, there consecrated a temple (K).

THE auxiliaries of Ilus, or Cronus, were called Eloim (L), which is as much as to say Cronii, for so were they named who were under Cronus. But Cronus having a son called Sadid (M), dispatched him with his own sword, having a suspicion of him, and deprived his son of life with his own hand. So also he cut off the head of his own daughter, so that all the gods were amazed at the mind of Cronus.

IN process of time, Uranus being in flight, or banishment, sends his virgin daughter Astarte, with two other of her sisters, Rhea and Dione, to cut off Cronus by deceit, whom Cronus taking, made those sisters his wives. Uranus understanding this, sent Eimarmene and Hora [Fate and Beauty] with other auxiliaries, to war against him: but Cronus having gained the affections of these also, kept them with him. Moreover, the god Uranus devised Betylia, contriving stones that moved as having life (N).

Cronus begat on Astarte seven daughters, called Titanides, or Artemides; and he begat on Rhea seven sons, the youngest of which, as soon as he was born, was consecrated a god (O). Also by Dione he had daughters, and by Astarte two sons, Pothos and Eros [Desire and Love.]

DAEMON, after he had found out bread-corn and the plough, was called Zeus Aro-trius.

To Sydye, or the just, one of the Titanides bare Asclepius (P). Cronus had also in c living in tents, or scattered huts: for building with sun-dried bricks was not found out till three generations after. Besides, if it had been called a city, the expression would have admitted of an explanation by prolepsis. Byblus seems to have been the imperial seat of Cronus; as it was of Mizraim for some time, according to the bishop (34).

(K) Dr. Cumberland observes, that this is the first navigation we have any account of in history after the flood (35); and perhaps this is the first temple founded also; for before they used itinerant temples, carried about on carts (36). Mount Cassius lay on the coast forty miles from Pelusium in Egypt eastward, in the road to Palesine (37).

(L) Eloim is עֲלֹיִם the plural of עֲלֹהִים Eloah, and signifies the gods, as they are called just after. The bishop renders the word in this place Ilus's men, or those that were for Cronus (38); in which sense it may be understood, considering the persons who assumed it were the auxiliaries of Il, and took their name from him on that account.

(M) شَدِيد Shadid in Arabic signifies a strong man, and seems to be of kin to Shaddai.

(N) Bochart conceives that by the transposition of a letter by the transcriber of Sanchoniathe writing עֲלֵיִם for עֲלֹיִם, animated stones, have been transformed into animated stones. Jacob seems to have set the example of anointing stones, when he poured oil upon the top of the pillar which had been his pillow, calling the place Beth-el (39). The Jews say the Phœnicians worshipped that pillar of Jacob, withal consecrating and anointing stones in imitation of it, which they called Betylia, and Betyli, in memory of the stone erected at Beth-el. Hesychius says, the stone was so called which Rea gave Saturn to devour instead of Jupiter. Priscian says, the same stone is called Abadir, or Abaddir, and that it is the Betylus of the god Abaddir. But that name taken for the stone, seems to be corrupted from the Phœnician אבן אבן Aban dir, signifying a spherical stone, which was the figure of the Betylus. Damascius, a superstitious heathen writer in Justinian's time, says, he saw several of these Betylia, or Betyli, of which many wonders were reported, in mount Libanus, near Heliopolis of Syria (40): nay, and pretends he saw one of these stones moved in the air (41), and describes it to be round, about a span in diameter, and whitish, though it often appeared of different colours (42); which shews there was a popular notion in those days of the Betylia being moving stones. They were generally consecrated to some god or other, as Saturn, Jupiter, the Sun, &c. (43).

(O) Dr. Cumberland supposes this son of Rhea was Muth, because afterwards mention is made of a consecrated son of Rhea, called Muth; but the 1st seems to be a different son from him spoken of in this place; for Muth was not consecrated till his death, the other as soon as he was born.

(P) He was surnamed Esmunus from עֲשְׂמוֹנִי Esmini, which signifies the eighth. His mother was one of the daughters of Cronus. This is hard to believe, yet it is not impossible that Sydye in his latter time dwelling in Canaan, might, to secure his quiet life (for we read of no warlike action of Sben) marry a daughter of Ham's, and by her have this son Asclepius; whom alone of all the sons of Sydye, Sanchoniathe, chiefly regarding his own country, hath taken notice of, probably because he only might have settled in Phœnicia, among the issue of Ham (44): and that he did settle among them appears from Apuleius's saying that Apollo (whom Sanchoniathe makes Cronus's son) gave to Æsculapius, as he calls him, the herb Solanum (45), or night-thade, called from his Phœnician name, Astr Esmuni in Punic (46). Asclepius is also called Momphites by Clemens Alexandrinus, and passed for a god in Egypt (47). And Pausanias (48) mentions a temple to Æsculapius, Apollo and Hygiea, Egyptians. This is the eldest account the bishop meets with of skill in physic or medicines (49).

(34) CUMBERL. Orig. Gent. Antiquiss. p. 174.

(35) Ibid. p. 368.

(36) See before, p. 88. b.

(37) Vid. Itiner. ANTONINI.

(38) CUMBERL.

Sanchon. p. 31. (39) Genes. xviii. 18, 19. and

xxi. 13. (40) Apud PHOTIUM Bibl. p. 1047.

(41) Vid. PHOTIUM ibid. p. 1062. (42) Ibid.

p. 1063.

(43) Idem, ibid. Vid. etiam BO-HART.

Canaan, l. 2. c. 2. (44) CUMBERL. on Sanchon.

p. 200. (45) APULEIUS de virtutib. herbar.

(46) In Auluar. ad Dioscorid. (47) CLEM.

ALEX. Stromat. lib. 1. (48) In Crinitiaz.

(49) CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 201.

2 Peræa (Q) three sons: 1. Cronus, of the same name with his father. 2. Zeus Belus. 3. Apollo (R).

CONTEMPORARY with these were Pontus and Typhon, and Nereus the father of Pontus (S). From Pontus came Sidon, who by the exceeding sweetness of her voice, or singing, found out first the hymns of odes or praises; and Posidon [or Neptune]. But to Demarion was born Melicartus, who is also called Hercules (T).

THEN again Uranus makes war against Pontus, and being separated from him, joins with Demarion. Demarion invades Pontus, but Pontus puts him to flight, and Demarion vows a sacrifice for his escape.

BUT in the thirty second year of his power and reign, Ilus, who is Cronus, having laid an ambuscade for his father Uranus in a certain midland place, and having gotten him into his hands, cuts off his privities (U) near fountains and rivers. There Uranus was consecrated, and his spirit or breath was separated, and the blood of his secrets dropped into the fountains and waters of the rivers; and the place is shewed unto this day.

THEN our historian, after some things interposed, goes on, saying, But Astarte called the Greatest, and Demoroon surnamed Zeus, and Adodus the king of the gods, reigned over the country by Cronus's consent or authority (W): and Astarte put on her

(Q) Peræa being the Greek name of the country of Byzhan, beyond Jordan, the bishop supposes these three sons of Cronus to have been born at Asteroth Carnaim (50), a noted city thereof, from the relation already mentioned, which that place hath to Cronus. The names of these sons are well known to belong to heathen deities by ancient writers; but it does not appear from such writers that they were the sons of Cronus; only Eupolemus says something to the purpose in the fragment above-mentioned; though neither Moses, nor Eupolemus, who writes the Babylonian traditions about them, do use or own the names given them by the Canaanites: and indeed the same man was deified in one place, who was not honoured so in another; and often the same person was worshipped in several places under several names (51).

(R) The first of these sons, Cronus the second, the bishop conjectures to be Misraim, from a passage of Nonnus, where Apis, the living image of Osiris, whom he supposes also to be Misraim, is said to be likewise called Cronus, Belus, Hammon, and Zeus, all acknowledged to have been names belonging to Ham his father, and therefore he must be the second in them all (52). By Belus, the bishop supposes Gust, the son of Ham, to be intended by our author (53); and that the third, whom he calls Apollo, was the Phut of Moses, known among the Greeks sometimes by the name of Pytkius, which in radical letters agrees with Phut; and sometimes by that of Apollo Carnens, which he takes to signify the elder Apollo, the son of Cronus, from קרן Keren; from which root also his town was called Carnaim (54), or, as it is elsewhere (55) written, Carnion (56).

(S) Bishop Cumberland has made another alteration here in Sanhoniatho's successions, placing Nereus and his descendants, whose line is uncertain, in the line of Uranus, and supposes Nereus to be Japhet: 1. Because being contemporary with Ham and his issue, and having found Skem under the name of Sydyr, it remains, that he takes Japhet and his issue to be here pointed at (57). 2. Because every one knows Nereus, Pontus, and Posidon or Neptune, relate to the sea, its illes and shores, which in scripture fall to Japhet's share (58). 3. Because this author never mentions Japhet and his line if it be not here (59); and it would be strange, if an historian, writing of that age wherein mankind was repaired, should omit him who peopled a third part of the world (60). 4. Because though Nereus and his issue are not said to be descended from Uranus or Noah, yet we know by scripture, that they must come from him; and there is no other line known, in which they might come from Noah, but Japhet's. 5. Because Sanhoniatho, being a Canaanite, has taken no care to clear other pedigrees, but only that of Ham and Cain (61).

(T) This is the old Phœnician Melcartus or Hercules (62), whose temple at Gadira or Gades had no images in it, and continued to the time of Silius Italicus (63). Bochart supposes this way of worship, practised in this temple, was taken from the Jews; not considering that Hercules Phœnicus was long before the Jewish law, and that the patriarchal religion used no images (64).

(U) It may be presumed, that this circumstance gave occasion to that notion of some, already mentioned (65), that Ham castrated Noah.

(W) It is conceived that Adodus or Adod, which signifies among the Assyrians, the one, by way of eminence (66), was a title belonging either to Gush the son of Ham, or to Nimrod, who, as his kingdom extended even to Assyria, might well have many subordinate kings under him, who are called gods, as Cronus's confederate princes were called Elom. Agreeably hereto, we find that Hadad was antiently a kingly name in Edom (67) and Syria (68), sometimes written Hadar (69). Adar, or Adir is the magnificent, or mighty potentate, and therefore may also be a title. Adodus reigning over many gods or kings, can only be understood of the large dominion allowed him by Ham (70); and we may see what sort of gods they were, when the king of them seems to have been but a delegate of Cronus, and could not reign without his consent.

This Adodus may possibly be the Adid Josephus mentions, whom, together with Azazel, the Syrians worshipped as gods, boasting much of their antiquity; whereas that author observes, they were no other than Hadad and Hazael, kings of Syria (71), who reigned at Damascus in the time of Joram king

(50) Gen. xiv. 5. (51) CUMBERL. on Sanhoniatho, p. 335. (52) Ibid. p. 336. (53) Ibid. p. 337. (54) Gen. xiv. 5. (55) Macc. xii. 16. (56) CUMBERL. on Sanhoniatho, p. 116, 337. (57) Ibid. p. 257. (58) Ibid. p. 259. (59) Ibid. p. 257. (60) Ibid. p. 258. (61) Ibid. p. 259. (62) Ibid. p. 265. (63) SIL. ITAL. lib. 3. (64) CUMBERL. on Sanhoniatho, p. 265. (65) See

before, p. 120. (66) MACROB. Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 31. BOCHART. Chanaan. lib. 2. cap. 8. (67) Gen. xxxvi. 35. 1 Chron. i. 50. (68) 2 Sam. viii. 5, 6. Vid. etiam NICOL. DAMASCEN. apud JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 7. cap. 5. (69) Gen. xxxvi. 39. 1 Chron. xviii. 5, 7. See also CUMBERL. Orig. Gent. Antiquiss. p. 171. (70) Ibid. p. 173, 236, 256. (71) 2 Kings viii. 7, &c.

head, as the mark of her sovereignty, a bull's head. But travelling about the world, <sup>a</sup> she found a star falling from the air or sky, which she taking up, consecrated in the holy island Tyre. And the Phanicians say, that Astarte is she, who is among the Greeks called Aphrodite [or Venus].

CRONUS also, going about the world, gave to his own daughter Athena the kingdom of Attica: but when there was a plague and mortality, Cronus made his only son a whole burnt-offering to his father Uranus<sup>c</sup>. This fact our author relates more particularly in another place, saying, that it was established as a custom among the antients, that in all extraordinary calamities of the public, the rulers of a city or nation should give up their most favourite child to be slain, as an expiation to appease the avenging <sup>b</sup> dæmons; and the victims in these cases were butchered with much mysterious ceremony. Cronus therefore, called by the Phanicians Israel, who reigned there, and was after his death consecrated into the planet Cronus [or Saturn], having an only son by a certain nymph of the country named Anobret, and whom therefore he called Jeud, which in the Phanician tongue, at this day, signifies only-begotten; and the country being involved in a dangerous war, he adorned this only son with royal attire, and sacrificed him on an altar which he had prepared for that purpose<sup>d</sup> (X). Cronus was also circumcised in his privities, and forced his auxiliaries to do the same. And not long after he consecrated, after his death, another son, which he had by Rhea, called Muth; so the Phanicians call death, or Pluto.

AFTER these things Cronus gives the city Byblus to the goddess Baalhis, which is <sup>c</sup> Dione; and Berytus he gave to Pofidon, and to the Cabiri, and to husbandmen, and to fishermen, who consecrated the remains (Y) of Pontus in or unto Berytus.

BUT before these things, the god Taautus, having formerly imitated or represented Uranus, made images of the countenances of the gods Cronus and Dagon, and formed the sacred characters of the other elements. He contrived also for Cronus the ensign of his royal power, four eyes partly before and partly behind, two of them winking as

<sup>c</sup> SANCHONIATHO apud EUSEB. de Præp. Ev. lib. 1. cap. 10. p. 36, &c.
1. 1. c. 10. p. 40. & 1. 4. c. 16. p. 156.

<sup>d</sup> Idem, apud eundem,

king of Israel (72); the first of whom had thirty two kings serving under him in his army (73), from whence he might have acquired the title of king of the gods, kings antiently having been called gods.

(X) This is thought by some men of learning not to be a true account of any sacrifice really performed, but only a misrepresentation of Abraham's intended sacrifice of his son Isaac, with some additions and mistakes, which the heathen writers frequently made in all their relations (74). The reasons alledged for this opinion are; 1. Cronus sacrificed his only son; so was Abraham reported to have done. 2. That son was called Jeud, and יְהוֹדָה Yehid, or only son, is the epithet given to Isaac by Moses (75). 3. The mother of this only son is the same with Sarah; Anobret, or אֲנוֹבֶרֶת Ann-oberet signifying conceiving by grace, as Sarah did. 4. Cronus and his followers were circumcised; so was Abraham and his household. 5. Cronus was called Israel, which name the Canaanites gave to Abraham, from the nation of which he was the father.

To these reasons it is answered: 1. That the sacrificers in Moses and Sanchoniatho are two different persons; Cronus being plainly Ham, and here called Israel by a mistake of transcribers, who took Is, the surname of Cronus, to be an abbreviation for Israel (76), as the letters is frequently are. 2. The occasion of the offerings, and of the circumcisions of Cronus and Abraham were also different; Cronus sacrificed his son to remove a war and plague on the country, according to a settled custom, and circumcised himself for the same purpose, to appease an angry deity; but what Abraham did was by a special command from God, as an instance of his faith and obedience. 3. The persons to be sacrificed were different: Cronus's son was his only son by Anobret, a Canaanitish concubine; but Abraham's son was the only child of his wife Sarah, who was of Chaldea; and the name of Anobret, even according to the above-mentioned derivation, rather signifies a passing fair one. 4. The deities to whom the two sacrifices were offered were not the same; Abraham certainly offered to none but the true God, Cronus to his father and the avenging dæmons (77).

Bochart (78), besides this notion, that Cronus (whom he elsewhere makes to be Noah) was Abraham, imagines also, that the Canaanites misunderstanding that passage of Moses, where Abraham is called a great prince, or as the Hebrew אֲדֹנֵי אֱלֹהִים a prince of God, made a deity of him, dedicating the seventh day of the week, and sacrificing their children to him; which is a mere fancy, and without the least ground. A late writer (79) has endeavoured to prove Cronus, at least the second of that name (which last he supposes to be the person that sacrificed his only son, though Sanchoniatho expressly says it was the son of Uranus) was not more ancient than Abraham, from the order of Sanchoniatho's genealogies, placing Elium's birth in the time of the Dioscuri, who were a generation younger than Misor or Misraim; but even in this case, the elder Cronus could not be later than Ren, who was four generations older than Abraham, and therefore much earlier than that patriarch: notwithstanding that, according to the Hebrew chronology, they might possibly have lived at the same time; for the same chronology is absurd enough to make Ham himself contemporary with Abraham.

(Y) This is supposed to be the oldest consecration of relics to be met with in history (80).

(72) JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 9. cap. 4. (73) 1 Kings xx. 1, 24. (74) Vid. BOCHART Canaan. l. 2. c. 1. SHUCKFORD's Connec. vol. II. p. 30, &c. and DODWELL's Disc. on Sanchon. p. 49. (75) Gen.

xxii. 2. (76) Vid. GROT. de veritat. rel. Christ. l. 1. §. 16. not. 50. (77) Vid. CUMB. on Sanchon. p. 134, &c. (78) Ubi sup. (79) SHUCKFORD ubi sup. (80) CUMB. on Sanchon. p. 262.

a in sleep; and upon his shoulders four wings, two as flying, and two as let down to rest. The emblem was, That Cronus when he slept yet was watching, and waking yet slept: and so for his wings, That even resting he flew about, and flying yet rested. But the other gods had two wings each of them on their shoulders, to intimate that they flew about with, or under Cronus. He also had two wings on his head, one for the most governing part the mind, one for the sense.

But Cronus coming into the south country, gave all Egypt to the god Taautus, that it should be his kingdom. These things, saith he, the Cabiri, the seven sons of Sydyce, and their eighth brother Aesclepius, first of all set down in memoirs, as the god Taautus commanded them.

b ALL these things the son of Thabion, who was the first hierophant [or director of sacred rites] that ever was among the Phanicians, allegorized; and mixing the facts with physical and mundane phenomena, he delivered them down to those that celebrated Orgia, and to those prophets who presided over the mysteries, who always contrived to improve their fables, and so delivered them down to their successors, and to those that were afterwards introduced among them. One of whom was Isiris (Z), the inventor of three letters, the brother of Ckna, the first Phanician; as he was afterwards called*.

c THUS we have presented the reader with the small remains which are left of the Phanician antiquities, collected by Sanckoniatho; wherein a free and open confession is made of the beginning of idolatry, and their gods ingenuously acknowledged to have been once mortal men; a thing the Greeks were ashamed to do, and therefore turned all the stories of the gods into allegories and physical discourses†. A late learned prelate (A), who has endeavoured to explain this fragment, and reconcile it with scripture, has for that purpose made several corrections and alterations therein; supposing that the records from which Sanckoniatho extracted his history, were corrupted in those instances by the Cabiri, the first writers of them, who in particular suppressed all mention of the deluge for the reasons already given (B). The principal corruptions which the bishop observes, and would amend, are; 1. That Sanckoniatho and those he transcribes have removed several persons out of the line of Uranus, and placed them under that of Cain, in order to do honour to it: particularly Mysor and Sydyce, who are placed in the eleventh generation, as sons of Amynius and Magus, the bishop takes to be Mizraim and Shem, both of the line of Uranus; and he accordingly places Sydyce in the same generation with Cronus, supposed to be Ham, and Mysor a generation lower, as the son of Cronus. 2. That they have introduced Nereus and his issue, as belonging neither to the line of Noah, nor to that of Cain, and as contemporaries with Cronus's children: but the bishop finding Nereus to answer the description of Japhet better than any of the sons of Uranus mentioned by Sanckoniatho, he raises him to or three Bp Cumberland's amendments of Sanckoniatho considered.

* Idem, apud eund. p. 40, 41.

† STILLINGFLEET Origin. SACR, book 1. chap. 2. §. 7.

(Z) Isiris being here called the brother of Clns or Canaan, the bishop concludes him to be Mysor or Mizraim, the father of Thoth (81). He observes also, that Hellanicus, an author older than Herodotus, often heard the Egyptian priests pronounce the name Osiris, Hysiris (82); and says, that Sanckoniatho represented Isiris or Abram, and Thoth, as Phanicians, to do honour to his country. And the reason why our author calls the same person in this place Isiris, whom he before called Mysor, was because in the preceding part of the work he wrote his name as he found it, thinking he ought not to recede from the records; and here he wrote it as it was spoken in his time, thinking he ought to comply with custom (83). To the objection, that Isiris cannot well be Mizraim, because it is not likely that he should make the doctrines of religion allegorical, and his son Thoth set them down in a different historical manner; it is answered, Thoth might cause the Cabiri to write this historical account or explanation before he went to reign in Egypt, for a help to his memory, or to shew the Egyptians the Phanician form of worship was elder than their fabulous representations; and that this was not to abolish, but to explain the religion established by his father. Lastly, all that allegorical scene of Egyptian solemnities delivered by Plutarch, cannot be so old as Mizraim's establishment, since much of it relates to his death, and is owned by Plutarch (84) to have been added by Isis (85).

(A) Bishop Cumberland, whose notes on this author we have hitherto given, intermixing very little of our own, having reserved our observations for this place.

(B) But after all, it seems not necessary to suppose the Cabiri purposely omitted to mention the flood, in order to suppress the memory of that judgment on the idolatrous race of Cain; because they might have retorted the reproach on their adversaries, and pretended their religion to have been that false one for which the world was punished: and this might have been the easier, considering the tradition concerning that religion must have been much more uncertain than that of the deluge, to which a considerable part of mankind, then living, was able to bear testimony. It is more probable, that the writers of those records were entirely ignorant of the deluge; and consequently that they are not genuine, or of that antiquity which is pretended.

(81) CUMBERL. on Sanckon. p. 94, 99, &c. (82) Vid. PLUTARCH. de Iside & Osiride, p. 364.

(83) CUMBERL. on Sanckon. p. 101, 102. (84) Ubi supra. (85) CUMBERL. on Sanckon. p. 103, &c.

generations higher, and makes him the son of Uranus; in which two alterations this <sup>a</sup> author's scheme principally consists. But however plausible his hypothesis may be, on a nearer examination it seems liable to several objections.

FOR as to the reason given for the Cabiri's making these dislocations, viz. to do honour to the line of Cain, it may be asked, why they who were of Uranus's line (for they could be descended from no body else, supposing him to be Noah) should desire to do honour to that of another, by renouncing their ancestors? why in doing this did they separate Misor from his father, and deny Cronus the honour which they did his son? or rather were they afraid Cronus would disgrace the line of Cain, and would not have it thought Misor and Thoth were descended from him, whom yet they acknowledge to be the founder of the Phœnician and Egyptian nations? how happened it when <sup>b</sup> they separated Nereus, or Japhet, from Cronus, that they did not make him the same honourable amends as they did his brother Sydyc (C), but drop him by the way two or three generations lower? was he a reprobate not fit to keep company even with Cronus? To be serious, it is not to be imagined that Thoth, who directed the Cabiri to write those records <sup>c</sup>, could think it a greater honour to be descended from a person in another line, who makes no figure in the history, than from Cronus, so renowned in the antient world: nor could he, as the case stood, have any prospect of concealing his true pedigree, if he were so minded, or the Cabiri be supposed to have so little regard to themselves, or their father Sydyc, if he were Shem, and in all probability still living, as to place themselves in the hateful line of Cain. The dislocation of Misor is opposed by a circumstance which seems to require that he should belong to the generation where he is placed in the history; for its being said that Cronus, when he came to man's age, used the council of Hermes, or Thoth, who was his secretary, seems to imply that Thoth was a man of more years and greater experience than Cronus himself, and consequently could not be his grandson. It is also unlikely that Sydyc, if he were Shem, should marry a daughter of Cronus, or Ham; which the bishop supposes he did to secure his quiet in Canaan, upon the presumption that Shem was Melchizedec <sup>d</sup>: which notion we have already shewn to be groundless <sup>e</sup>, and shall consider farther hereafter.

NOR can we approve of another supposition of the bishop's, viz. that Ifiris is the same with Misor, because said to be the brother of Chna or Canaan; for they are certainly designed to be two persons, differing as well in age as other circumstances. Thoth was king of Egypt when the Cabiri wrote these records at his command; which shews that his father Misor, whom the bishop supposes to have been Menes, the first king of Egypt, who reigned but sixty two years, was dead; as the bishop himself confesses <sup>f</sup>: the son of Thabion, who turned the history into allegory, and mixed it with physical matters, came after the Cabiri, and delivered it in the new form he had given it to those who presided over the sacred mysteries, from whom it passed to their successors, and to those that were afterwards introduced among them, of whom Ifiris was one. So that Ifiris seems not only to have been some generations later than the Cabiri and Thoth, <sup>e</sup> who reigned but sixty two years; but also to have been no more than one of the Phœnician priests, and not a king of Egypt. Nor is this in the least repugnant to the scripture account; it being very probable that the nation properly called Canaanites, or Phœnicians, did not take their name immediately from Canaan the son of Ham, but from some later descendant of his of the same name, since we do not find the Canaanites among his children or descendants in the place set apart for giving an account of them <sup>g</sup>; nor do we hear of them, or the Perizzites, another branch descended from Canaan, before Abraham's arrival in the land of promise <sup>h</sup>.

MANY more objections arise against the bishop's scheme; but we think it enough to have considered the fundamentals of it, leaving the reader to make his farther remarks from the hints we have given. Upon the whole, we think the history of Sanchoniatho will in no wise admit of the corrections the bishop has made; it may be confuted by scripture, but it can never be reconciled with it; the plan is quite different from that of Moses, and seems to be grounded upon a very different tradition relating to the first ages; if it be not rather a history framed long after the facts spoken of happened, by mixing fable, or invention, with some vulgar notions and glimmer-

<sup>a</sup> CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 104: Sanchon. p. 95.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 200.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 125.

<sup>d</sup> CUMBERL. on

<sup>e</sup> Genes. xii. 6. and xiii. 7.

(C) The first writers of these memoirs seem to have nothing more in view, by the particulars relating to Sydyc and Nereus, and their descendants, than to account for the original of the Cabiri, and of navigation, and to do honour to Berytus, a Phœnician city, by making it the prime seat of their religion and trade.

- a ings of ancient transactions, which still remained in the time of the author, or editor, when the genuine and more perfect tradition of things had been lost.
- BUT before we close this section, we must not omit mentioning a word concerning the chronology of this history of Sanckoniatho, in which the bishop seems to vary from himself. In one place he says, it is bounded within the three first centuries after the flood, as ending with the beginning of Tboth's reign in Egypt<sup>a</sup>: in another that it ends within four or five hundred years after that event<sup>b</sup>. But the repugnancy is more obvious with regard to Cronus, or Ham. The bishop allows in several places, and thinks it but reasonable, that Ham and the other children of Noah should live to near about the same age, though he thinks Ham did not live altogether so long as Shem<sup>c</sup>.
- b He says, it appears plain enough from Sanckoniatho, as in fact it does, that Cronus, or Ham, out-lived his father Uraus, or Noah<sup>d</sup>: and as Noah's death is determined in scripture to have happened three hundred and fifty years after the flood, he concludes the life of Ham must be above four hundred and fifty years<sup>e</sup>. And elsewhere, from the circumstance of Chedorlaomer's invasion of Canaan<sup>f</sup>, concluding Ham to be then dead, he fixes his death in the fifth year before Abraham's entrance into Canaan, A.M. 2078; that is, in the year of the flood 422<sup>g</sup>. Notwithstanding all which, in another place, speaking of the age of Ham, he supposes him and his descendants to have shortened their days by debauchery, and that he only lived about three hundred years after the flood; and this, says the bishop, may well be granted, because his father lived fifty years longer, as it is certain his brother Shem out-lived him two hundred years<sup>h</sup>. Such contradictions and mistakes may the greatest men run into, when they have set their minds on an hypothesis; notwithstanding which, to do this learned writer justice, he has, in his remarks on our author, given great light into the history of those ancient times, and made many valuable observations.

S E C T. IV.

- d Of the removal of Mankind from about Mount Ararat to the Plain of Shinaar, and of the Building of Babel.

AS there fall two or three very remarkable events within this period, namely, the building of Babel by the posterity of Noah, the confusion of languages, and the dispersion of mankind; it is incumbent upon us to give the reader some account of those important facts, the effects of which are felt to this day, and were doubtless of great benefit to mankind.

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before Christ, 2597.

- AFTER the death of Noah, his sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet thought fit to remove with their families from the plains near Ararat, where we suppose they till then continued, and travelling from the east, found a plain in the land of Shinaar, and dwelt there<sup>a</sup>. The wording of this passage has occasioned some doubt whether by Ararat could be meant Armenia, since then their journeying would have been from the north-west. Wherefore others, instead of from the east, render it eastward. But there is no need to strain the text to explain a geographical difficulty. Moses spoke according to the belt of his knowledge, or perhaps with reference to the wilderness where he wrote; from which Shinaar lying eastward, he might judge Ararat lay eastward too, as lying farther off: or the difficulty may be easily solved by supposing with Kircher<sup>b</sup> and others, that as mankind multiplied they spread themselves in the country south-eastward of Ararat, and made small removes between the time of their descending from Ararat, and their coming to the place from whence they are mentioned to have moved towards Shinaar, which might have lain westward of that place. But after all, the mistake seems to lie on the side of the critics, and not of Moses; for even the mountain which at present passes with us for Ararat, lies above two degrees more east than the city of Shinaar, or Senjar, from whence the plain in all probability took the name: and if the sons of Noah entered Shinaar on the north side, they must of necessity have journeyed from the east, or, which is the same thing, have travelled westward, in order to arrive there; though at the same time they must have travelled southward too, for Ararat lies about north-east by north of Senjar; but all the geographers (De Lisle excepted) having drawn that mountain a good way out of its place to the westward, the commentators and historians, who relied upon them, have been embarrassed to recon-

The first migration of the sons of Noah to Shinaar.

<sup>a</sup> CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 95.
p. 119.
Orig. Gent. Antiquall. p. 172.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 119.
<sup>c</sup> Genes. xiv.
<sup>d</sup> Genes. ix. 2.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 103, 119, 120, 123.
<sup>f</sup> CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 123.
<sup>g</sup> Turris Babel, p. 12.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid.
<sup>i</sup> Idem,

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

The extent and situation of the land of Shinaar.

cite the words of scripture with what they took for certain fact, viz. that Ararat lay a to the westward, and not at all to the eastward of Senjar.

IT is hard to determine what were the limits of the land of Shinaar (D) in the early times. We are informed from scripture, that the city and tower of Babel were built in a plain within that province<sup>7</sup>, and that Nebuchadnezzar carried the vessels of the temple into the land of Shinaar into the house of his God<sup>8</sup>, which in all probability was the temple of Belus in Babylon. Besides Babel, there are three other cities mentioned in scripture to have been situate in Shinaar, viz. Erec, Accad, and Calneh<sup>9</sup>; but as all the four seem to have stood at no great distance from each other<sup>b</sup>, we cannot thence judge of the extent of the country. Thus far in general may be presumed, that it took in more to the north of Babel than to the south, and that it lay for the most part, b though not entirely, between the Euphrates and Tigris; for Babylon, if it was the same with Babel, stood on the east side of Euphrates (E), which passed along the west side of it, before Nebuchadnezzar built the new city on this side that river, which thenceforth ran through the middle of the whole.

We meet with footsteps of the name of Shinaar in those parts, both in antient and modern authors; Sennaar of Babylon is mentioned by Heftæus the Milesian<sup>c</sup>, and the city of Singara in Mesopotamia by several<sup>d</sup>. Some speak of a territory of that name in the same quarters<sup>e</sup>; Ptolemy places both the city and mountain of Singara there<sup>f</sup>: all which seem to be the same city, mountain (F) and territory, which still bear the name of Senjar in the east<sup>g</sup>. The part of Mesopotamia chosen out by the astronomers in the time of the Kalifa al Mamun, for measuring the content of a degree of a great circle, was the desert of Senjar<sup>h</sup>; which the nature of the experiment shews to have been large, as well as a level country: and this we take to have been at least a part of the antient plain of Shinaar.

THE city of Senjar stands, or stood, in the northern borders (as we conjecture) of its territory, in the desert, at the foot of a certain mountain (perhaps that of the same name) twenty one miles from Balad, and twenty seven from Misof, which two last are situate on the Tigris twenty one miles asunder<sup>i</sup>. It is said to lie to the southward of Nisibin, almost three stages west of the Tigris<sup>k</sup>, or more particularly of Misof<sup>l</sup>; so that Ptolemy is in the wrong to place Singara on that river. As for the difference d between the words Shinaar and Singar it is very small, considering in the Hebrew the same character stands for the Ain and the Ghain (G). We find Senjar called also by another name, viz. al Samara<sup>m</sup>, which seems to be the contraction of Sarra-man-rai, a city on the east of the Tigris, three stages above Baghdad, and for a time the seat of the Khalifa<sup>n</sup>.

The building of Babel began.

THE sons of Noah, upon their arrival in this plain, began to think of building a city and tower. The learned are divided in their opinions about the sense of the passage which gives an account of this enterprize: And they said, go to, let us build us a

<sup>7</sup> Genes. xi. 2, &c. x. 10.

<sup>8</sup> Dan. i. 2.

<sup>9</sup> Genes. x. 10.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 123. in the notes.

<sup>c</sup> Apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 5. & EUSEB. de Pr. Ev. l. 9. c. 15.

<sup>d</sup> PLINIUS, Hist. Nat. AMMIAN. MARCELLINUS. EUTROPIUS. ATHANASIUS, in Epist. ad solitar. Vit. agent.

<sup>e</sup> SEXT. RUFUS, POMF. LATUS. <sup>f</sup> Tab. 4. Afie. <sup>g</sup> Geogr. Nub. p. 201. THEVENOT'S

Voyages, part 2. c. 10. <sup>h</sup> Vid. GOL. Not. ad Alfragan. p. 72. <sup>i</sup> Geogr. Nub. p. 201.

<sup>k</sup> GOLIUS, ubi supra. <sup>l</sup> HYDE de Relig. vet. Pers. p. 64. <sup>m</sup> ABU'LFARAG. Hist. Dyn. p. 18.

<sup>n</sup> Vid. GOL. ubi supra, p. 130. Geogr. Nub. p. 203.

(D) The name in Hebrew is שִׁנְאָר Shinaar, or Sennaar; in Arabic سنجار Senjar. Bochart says it is derived from שִׁנְאָר naar, which signifies to scatter or dissipate (86): and if so, it could not have been imposed by the Noachides on the plain where they first fixed, as Jesephus affirms (87), without supposing them to have foreseen the dispersion; to which that etymology, if it be right, plainly alludes.

(E) Among other circumstances it may be observed, that the modern travellers represent the Euphrates a mile and half broad in those parts; whereas Strabo says the breadth of the branch of that river which passed through Babylon was but a furlong (88), or the eighth part of a mile; though the bridge, according to Diodorus (89), was five furlongs in length, if he does not mistake: but supposing the river as broad as the bridge was long, it will be but little more than one third of the present breadth of the Euphrates; which yet lower down, at Hilla, becomes more narrow.

(F) Haitbo, the Armenian, writes, that in Mesopotamia there are two mountains of great length, abounding with fruit-trees, the more easterly of which is called Sinjar, the other Lesson (90); probably the desert or plain of Sinjar lay between these two ridges of hills. We cannot conceive upon what ground Heiderger charges Haitbo with a mistake, as if he made Sinjar a mountain of Chaldea (91): on the contrary, that author seems to have mistaken Haitbo, and placed what he found in the chapter concerning Mesopotamia, as belonging to the foregoing chapter which treats of Chaldea.

(G) Thus שִׁנְאָר may be written either Gomorrah, or Amorrah: שִׁנְאָר, either Ga'ah, or Azzab, as we find it in the margin of our Bibles (92).

(86) PHALEG. lib. 1. cap. 9.

(87) Antiq.

nov. orb. p. 373.

(91) HIDEBO. Hist. Patr.

lib. 1. cap. 4.

(88) Lib. 16.

(89) Lib. 2.

tom. I. p. 419.

(92) Genes. x. 19.

(90) HAITBO de Tartaris, cap. 12. apud GRINÆUM,

- a city and tower, whose top may reach unto heaven, and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth". Many imagine that the motive which induced them to undertake this building, was their apprehension of a second deluge, and therefore they resolved to raise a structure of sufficient height to fly to in case of danger<sup>o</sup>. Others think there is no room for this suggestion, for in that case they would rather have built it on an eminence than a plain; and the scripture expressly assigns the reason of their setting about it, viz. to make them a name, or leave a memorial of themselves, lest they should be scattered, or, as it is otherwise rendred (perhaps to serve the purpose) before they should be scattered abroad<sup>p</sup>; which implies they knew they should be dispersed before they began to build, being warned by God, according to some, to separate themselves into colonies<sup>q</sup>. But a third sort, to whom the text appears altogether unintelligible as it now stands in the several translations, will have it that the word Shem should not be rendred name, but sign; and so the passage will run, let us make us a sign, lest we be scattered; that is, as Perizonius explains it, the tower was to serve them as a beacon, or mark, by the sight of which, or of a signal made from the top of it, they might avoid straying in the open plains with their flocks (the first men being shepherds) and be brought back to the city which they had built for a place of abode, being unwilling to disperse themselves<sup>r</sup>.

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before Christ, 259.

- But whatever the motives of the chiefs were, which seem to be dubiously expressed in the text, the effect of their consultation was, that they set on foot the building of the city and tower of Babel. But this enterprize being displeasing in the eyes of God, as tending to frustrate or delay the execution of his design, which was, that mankind should not always continue together in one place, he obliged them to give over their project before they had finished it (H), by confounding their language, so that one could not understand what another said; from whence the city took the name of Babel<sup>s</sup>, which signifies confusion: whereupon the dispersion and planting of nations ensued.

- This great event happened just before the birth of Peleg, in the year of the flood four hundred and one, when the work, according to some, had been carried on twenty two years<sup>t</sup>, and according to others forty<sup>u</sup>; so that the foundation must have been laid ten, or at most, but twenty eight years after Noah's death.

- MANY, considering the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion of mankind thereupon, as a divine judgment, have deemed the building of Babel an evil attempt (I); and being concerned for the honour of Shem and his race, will not allow them to have been present at it, supposing that undertaking to be set on foot wholly by the unbelieving part of mankind<sup>v</sup>, in which sense they understand the words the children of men<sup>w</sup>. On the contrary, others will have it, that not only Shem, but Noah and Abraham (who, according to one way of computing the Hebrew chronology, were contemporary) assisted in the raising of that structure<sup>x</sup>; while some say, Nimrod, who is generally looked on as the chief promoter of that work<sup>y</sup>, retired into Assyria, because he would not give his assent to it<sup>z</sup>.

THAT the building of Babel was a thing indifferent in itself, and no way sinful, seems evident from the silence of scripture, which does not condemn that attempt as bold or presumptuous, or intimate any revelation of a previous command to the contrary, which only could make it criminal. And that the family of Shem were concerned in the work as well as the rest, appears from their sharing in the punishment, if it be a

<sup>o</sup> Gen. xi. 4. <sup>p</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 5. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 50. BASNAGE, Antiq. Judaïques, tom. II. cap. 2. § 27. p. 419. <sup>q</sup> Vid. the vulgat. translat. <sup>r</sup> USHER'S Annals in English, ad ann. mundi, 1757. <sup>s</sup> Vid. PERIZON. Origin. Babylon. cap. 11. p. 193. <sup>t</sup> Gen. xi. 7, 8, 9. <sup>u</sup> TORRIELLUS, SALIANUS, PERRIUS, &c. <sup>v</sup> SYNCEL. Chronogr. p. 80. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 53. <sup>w</sup> MORIN. Exercit. de Ling. cap. 8. p. 47. SCOTANUS Hist. Sacr. p. 48, &c. MARSHAM Chron. Canon. scul. 17. p. 478. VON DER HART Ephemer. Philol. Disc. 3. USHER. Chronol. Sacra, part 1. cap. 5. p. 26. GURTNER. Hist. Universal. cap. 9. p. 93. BOHMART. Phaleg. lib. 1. cap. 10. AUGUST. de civit. Dei, lib. 17. cap. 5. <sup>x</sup> Genes. xi. 5. <sup>y</sup> ABEN EZRA apud R. GEDAL. in SHALOM. HAKKAB. p. 7. b. <sup>z</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 5. VON DER HART ubi supra. AUGUST. de civit. Dei, lib. 17. cap. 4. CONSTANT. MANASS. Annal. p. 14. <sup>aa</sup> See before, p. 123.

(H) Some pretend that the tower was thrown down by tempestuous winds on the builders heads; and that the city of Babylon was built out of the ruins (93).

(I) A learned divine of our nation, being of this opinion, supposes that this tower (whose pyramidal form, he says, resembles fire, or the conic shape of its flame) was a monument erected to the honour of the sun, as the most probable cause of drying up the flood (94). But of this there is not the least footing in scripture.

(93) ABYDEN. apud EUSEB. de Prep. Ev. l. 9. c. 14. & SYBILLA, apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1.

c. 4.

(94) TENISON of idolatry.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

punishment, that is, the confusion of tongues; though this is denied by several<sup>b</sup>: for a the languages of Elam or Persia, and of Assyria, and Mesopotamia, were different, as were also those even of the descendants of Eber, the Arabs and Jews, whatever others<sup>c</sup> may pretend; and if speaking the Hebrew language be a proof, then the Canaanites were not concerned in the building of Babel any more than Eber and his descendants, for their language was the same with the Hebrew.

BUT this supposed absence of the Shemites, as also another common opinion, current amongst those who adhere to the Hebrew chronology, that several nations were planted before the dispersion, are overthrown by the authority of scripture, which strongly intimates that all mankind then in being, without exception, were assembled in the plain of Shinaar (H); and it is probable, that after the building of Babel, Shem and his descendants chose or accepted of the adjacent country for their settlement<sup>d</sup>. So that the most we can allow, with Buxtorf<sup>e</sup> and others, is that they dissuaded the rest from that enterprize.

A description of Babel.

THE reader must needs have a curiosity to see some account of a city and tower which employed all the men in the world for so many years in building them. The scripture informs us, that they made use of burnt bricks instead of stone, and slime instead of mortar<sup>f</sup>. According to an eastern tradition, they were three years employed in making and burning those bricks, each of which was thirteen cubits long, ten broad, and five thick<sup>g</sup>. The slime with which these bricks were cemented, was a pitchy substance or bitumen<sup>h</sup>, brought from a city, in the neighbourhood of Babylon, called Is<sup>i</sup>, or Hit (I). The oriental authors say, that the city built by the sons of Noah was

<sup>b</sup> BUXTORF. in Dissertat. Philologico-theolog. p. 70. CHRYSOSTOM. Homil. 30. in Genes. FULLER. Miscell. Sacr. lib. 4. cap. 4. SCOTANUS. Bibl. Aet. sec. p. 91. HEIDEGGER. Hist. Patriarch. tom. I. Exercit. 16. § 16. STEPH. MORIN. ubi sup. p. 44, & 68. <sup>c</sup> EPIPHAN. apud GLYCAM. Annal.

p. 3. CONSTANT. MANASS. Annal. p. 14. See § 6. <sup>e</sup> Dissertat. Philologico-theol. p. 70.

<sup>f</sup> Gen. xi. 3. <sup>g</sup> EBN ARAB. p. 14. EUTYCH. Annal. p. 53. <sup>h</sup> JOSEPHUS Antiq. lib. 1.

cap. 4. <sup>i</sup> HERODOTUS Clit. p. 32.

(II) There is not a fact in all the Mosaic history, which seems to be more firmly established than this. As soon as Moses hath brought the three sons of Noah out of the ark, he takes care to inform us, that of them was the whole earth overspread (93). And after giving us the names of their descendants at the time of their dispersion, he subjoins, and by those were the nations divid'd in the earth after the flood (94). Then proceeding to give an account of that memorable transaction, he tells us, That the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech (95). That as they, namely the whole earth, journeyed from the East, THEY found a plain in the land of Shinaar, and dwell there; and they said, let us make brick, and build a city and a tower; and the LORD came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men builded, and said, behold the people is one, and they have all one language (96). These seem to be convertible terms, and import, that as all mankind collected there in one body, had but one language, so all those who had but one language, were assembled in one body; which argument is the more cogent, because it is allowed on all hands, that there was but one language in the world at the time of the building of Babel, which city was so called, because the LORD did there confound the language of all the earth, and from thence did scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth (97).

From the beginning to the end of this narration, the connection is so well preserved between the antecedent and the relative, that there is no room to suppose that any less than all mankind were gathered together in the plain of Shinaar, and assisted in the building of Babel; and Moses seems to have made those unusual repetitions to inculcate the certainty of that fact, and take away all ground for supposing any branch of Noah's posterity were in any other part of the earth at that time. Wherefore the arguments used by some, that the phrase all the earth, is often taken in a restrained and improper sense elsewhere in scripture, to signify only a part of the earth (98), and sometimes no more than the land of promise (99); as also, that the expression, the children of men, confines the builders to the unbelieving part of mankind only, because that phrase is also used in such a sense in other places of scripture (1), are of no force here; the sense of the whole (by which that of a part is always to be governed) being directly against such a meaning, and this last expression being evidently used only to vary the diction: besides, those who urge this last argument, do not seem to consider, that before the dispersion, infidelity could not well have crept in amongst mankind; who, it is but reasonable to conclude, while they kept together, were united in one faith as well as government.

(I) It is much no modern author that we know of, excepting Bochart (2), out of the many who have occasionally or professedly spoken of Babylon, have taken notice of this nice circumstance in Herodotus. That prince of historians observes, that by the city Is, eight days journey from Babylon, there runs a small river of the same name into Euphrates, whose waters carry along with them many lumps of bitumen, which are conveyed thence to the walls of Babylon. Diodorus says, the quantity of bitumen in those parts is so great, that it suffices the inhabitants not only for their buildings, but for fuel, being dried and burned like wood (3). Hit is called Æliopolis by Ipsidore of Charax (4), who mentions the springs of bitumen near it, and places it on the Euphrates, about two hundred and fifteen miles west of Selucia on the Tigris, which agrees better with Herodotus than the account of modern authors, who place Hit thirty one parasangs, or about one hundred twenty eight

(93) Genes. ix. 19. (94) Ibid. x. 32. (95) Ibid. xi. 1. (96) Ibid. ver. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. (97) Ibid. ver. 8, 9. (98) Jerem. li. 7, 49. Dan. ii. 39. (99) Judg. vi. 37. 1 Sam. xvii. 46. Isai. x. 14.

(1) 1 Sam. xxvi. 19. 2 Sam. vii. 14. Psal. xii. 1. (2) PHALEG. lib. 1. cap. 11. (3) Lib. 2. p. 100. (4) Inter Geogr. Vet. Græc. Ed. HUDSONI, vol. II.

a three hundred and thirteen fathoms in length, and one hundred and fifty one in breadth, that the walls of it were five thousand five hundred and thirty three fathoms high, and thirty three broad, and the tower ten thousand fathom, or twelve miles high *; which dimensions bear no manner of proportion to each other. Even Jerom affirms, from the testimony of eye-witnesses who examined the remains of the tower carefully, that it was four miles high <sup>1</sup>; but Ado raises the height to no less than five thousand miles <sup>m</sup>: but these are shameful extravagancies. The only account we can depend upon, as to the dimensions of this tower, supposing it to be the same tower with that which stood in the midst of the temple of Belus, afterwards built round it by Nebuchadnezzar, must be taken from profane authors. Herodotus tells us it was a furlong in length, and as much in breadth <sup>a</sup> (K); and Strabo determines the height to have been a furlong <sup>o</sup>, that is, the eighth part of a mile, or six hundred and sixty foot, which is itself prodigious; for thereby it appears to have exceeded the greatest of the Egyptian pyramids in height one hundred seventy nine foot, though it fell short of it at the basis by thirty three <sup>p</sup>. It consisted of eight square towers one above another, gradually decreasing in breadth; which, with the winding of the stairs from the top to the bottom on the outside, gave it the resemblance of a pyramid, as Strabo calls it <sup>q</sup>. This antique form, joined to the extraordinary height of the structure, easily induces us to believe it to be the same tower mentioned by Moses; Nebuchadnezzar finishing the design which the sons of Noah were obliged, by the confusion of tongues, to leave unexecuted.

* EBN AMID & EUTYCH. ubi supra.
Chronica. <sup>a</sup> Lib. 1. p. 33. <sup>o</sup> Lib. 16. p. 1073. <sup>m</sup> In
p. 68, 69. <sup>1</sup> Lib. 16.

<sup>1</sup> Hieron. lib. 5. Comment. in Esaiam.

<sup>m</sup> In
<sup>p</sup> See GREAVES Descr. of the Pyramids,

eight miles west of Baghdad (supposed to stand near, if not in the place of Seleucia) and twenty one parasangs west of Ambar, once a famous city on the Euphrates (5), not far north from Felusiab, and eight to the north of Kadesia, a town no less remarkable for the battle wherein the Arabs gained the victory which decided the fate of Persia (6).

These springs of bitumen are called Oyun Hit, the fountains of Hit, and are much celebrated by the Arabs and Persians; the latter call it Chejmeb kir, the fountain of pitch. This liquid bitumen they call nafta; and the Turks, to distinguish it from pitch, give it the name of kara sakiz, or black mastice. A Persian geographer says, that nafta issues out of the springs of the earth, as ambergrease issues out of those of the sea (7). All the modern travellers, except Rawwolf, who went to Persia and the Indes by the way of the Euphrates, before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, mention this fountain of liquid bitumen as a strange thing. Some of them take notice of the river (8) mentioned by Herodotus, and assure us, that the people of the country have a tradition, that when the tower of Babel was building, they brought the bitumen from hence (9); which is confirmed by the Arab and Persian historians (10).

Hit, Heit (11), Eit (12), Att (13) or Ida (14), as it is variously written by travellers, is a great Turkish town (15), situate upon the right, or west side of the Euphrates (16); and has a castle, to the southwest of which (17), and three miles from the town, in a valley, are many springs of this black substance (18), each of which makes a noise like a smith's forge, incessantly puffing and blowing out the matter so loud, that it may be heard a mile off; wherefore the Moors [Arabs] call it Bab al jebenmam, that is, bell gate (19). It swallows up all heavy things, and many camels from time to time fall into the pits, and are irrecoverably lost (20). It issues from a certain lake, sending forth a filthy smoke, and continually boiling over with the pitch, which spreads itself over a great field that is always full of it. It is free for every one to take; they use it to caulk or pitch their boats, laying it on two or three inches thick, which keeps out the water (21); with it also they pitch their houses made of palm-tree branches. If it was not that the inundations of the Euphrates carry away the pitch, which covers all the sands from the place where it rises to the river, there would have been mountains of it long since (22). The very ground and stones thereabouts afford bitumen, and the fields abundance of salt petre (23).

(K) The words of Herodotus are; 'Εν μέσῳ δὲ τῷ ἱερῷ πύργῳ τεταγμένον ἔκτισται. καθύψω δὲ τὸ μὲν καὶ τὸ ὑπὸ, καὶ ἐπὶ τούτῳ τῷ πύργῳ ἄλλῳ πύργῳ ἐτίθεισαν, καὶ ἐπὶ τούτῳ μάλιστ' ἐπὶ τούτῳ, μέχρις ὅπου πύργον. In the midst of the temple a solid tower is built, of a furlong in length, and as much in breadth; and upon this tower another tower is erected, and another again upon that, and so on to the number of eight towers. It is true the word μὲν, which we here translate length, may also signify height; but some authors having thence supposed, as the construction seems to require, that the first tower was a furlong high, and concluding the other seven to be of equal height, have made the whole a mile high; to avoid which extravagant consequence, it seems more reasonable to understand Herodotus as we have rendered the passage, unless the furlong be taken for the height of all the eight towers.

(5) Vid. GOLII Not. ad Afragum. p. 124, 125. GEOGR. NUBIENS. p. 199. (6) D'HERBELOT Bibl. Orient. Art. Hit, Ambar, & Cadesia. (7) Apud eundem, ibid. Art. Hit. (8) ELDRED. See HACKLUIT'S Collection of Voyages, vol. I. (9) Vid. le Voyage de Perse en ann. 1598 & 1599, par un Gentilhomme de la suite du Seigneur Siberley, a la p. 110. des relations veritables & curieuses. (10) Vid. D'HERBELOT ubi supra. (11) NEWBERRY. (12) BALBI. Viaggio dell' Indie Orientale, cap. 4. l'id. eundem, apud de Brie, India Orientalis, vol. VII.

(13) CARTWRIGHT & FITCH. (14) RAWWOLF. (15) Idem, in his Travels, part 2. chap. 6. p. 163. (16) ELDRED, BALBI, &c. ubi supra. (17) NEWBERRY'S Travels. See PURCHAS'S Pilgrims, vol. II. p. 1412. (18) ELDRED ubi supra. (19) CARTWRIGHT'S, or the Preacher's Travels, p. 105. ELDRED ubi supra. FITCH'S Travels. See PURCHAS ubi supra, p. 1730. (20) ELDRED & NEWBERRY ubi supra. (21) FITCH & BALBI, ubi supra. (22) BALBI, ibid. (23) Voyage de Perse, ubi supra.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

WHAT this most wonderful city was in its flourishing state, and the several changes of fortune which befel it, till at length it was totally destroyed, the reader will find remarked in the course of this history. In the mean time, we would willingly gratify his curiosity with some account of the ruins of this celebrated antiquity, which are so defaced, that the people of the country are not certain of their situation; and this has occasioned travellers to differ concerning it. Most of them, led by a tradition of the inhabitants, have judged a place about eight or nine miles to the west or northwest of Baghdad, to be the tower of Babel (L). Rauwolf supposes he found the ruins of Babylon upon the Euphrates, near Felugia (M), about thirty six miles to the south-west

(L) The name of this monument is variously written by travellers, Carcassate Nimeru (24), Karkuf (25), Akaruf (26); all who mention it call it the tower of Nimrod, and we are told that the common people of the country believe it to be such (27), and that it is at present called the remains of the tower of Babel (28). It is situate, according to some, seven or eight miles from Baghdad (29), according to others nine miles (30) towards the west-north-west (31); it is conspicuous at a vast distance (32), standing by itself in a wide plain between the Euphrates and Tigris, with nothing great or high about it; which is the reason that, contrary to what is generally observed in other objects, it appears greater at a distance than when one draws near it (33). It is fallen to ruin on all sides, and hath thereby made, as it were, a little shapeless mountain (34), which it resembles more than a tower (35), only it is rather square than round (36).

It is built of sun-burnt bricks, each a foot square, and six inches thick (37); some say three quarters of a yard long, and a quarter thick (38); others but ten inches square, and three thick (39). Authors differ as to the manner in which these bricks are ranged, and the materials made use of for setting and binding them together. They observe, first, that there is laid a bed consisting of canes or reeds bruised to pieces, mixed with wheat-straw, and spread an inch and half thick (40); some call them mats made of canes and palm-tree leaves (41); others say only straw the thickness of three inches (42), which appear as yellow and fresh as if they were but newly laid (43), and are still very durable (44). Upon this bed lie seven ranges of bricks; then another bed of reeds, and six rows of bricks; then a third bed with five rows of bricks, decreasing in that manner till you come to the top (45). Some say the ranges of bricks are interchangeably six and seven upon a bed (46); and others place a bed betwixt every course of bricks (47); but that is probably a mistake, though between each course of bricks there is laid a little straw (48), or rather they are set in bituminous mortar (49), consisting of pitch and earth, for which an inch may be allowed; which is at present the fashion of building at Baghdad, there being not far off a great lake of pitch (50), probably that of Hit before mentioned. There are fifty of these ranges of seven and six bricks, in so much that the whole height may amount to one hundred and thirty eight feet (51). Others say

'tis reduced to one hundred and eight, or one hundred and twenty feet (52). This heap is in compass a quarter of a mile (53), or at most three hundred paces (54), not a mile, as one writes (55), the rains having washed it away on all sides. It has no entrance (56), being a solid mass, only at the foot of it one sees a magbara or lion's cave; and towards the middle there is an opening, which passes quite through the building about a foot and a half square, besides a great window towards the top, into which our author threw a grapple, in order to ascend it; but the bricks giving way, had like to have killed him with their fall (57).

Travellers disagree in their sentiments of this tower: one says it has been so well described by Moses, that the sight of the remains and ruins would make one admire the veracity with which the writings of that great prophet are penned (58); but another declares, that, according to Moses's description, there is no likelihood that this should be the tower of Babel; and therefore, rejecting the vulgar opinion of the country, he looks upon that of the Arabs to be more probable, who say it was built by one of their princes for a beacon to assemble his subjects in time of war (59): and this seems to be the truth of the matter.

(M) Rauwolf, a German physician, who in the year 1574. passed down the Euphrates in his way to Bagdad, being come to a village by him called Elugo, and by others, more properly, Felugia, which was the landing-place for that city, writes thus; "The village of Elugo is situated where formerly Babylon stood; but, at present, there is not an house to be seen for the shelter of passengers. The country is so dry and barren, that it cannot be tilled; and so bare, that I should have doubted very much, whether this potent city (which once was the most stately and famous in the world, seated in the pleasant and fruitful country of Stinar) did stand there, if I had not known it by its situation, and several delicate antiquities, which still are standing in great desolation; first, by the old bridge over Euphrates, whereof there are some pieces and arches still remaining a little above where I landed, built of brick, and of wonderful firmness. It is admirable also how they could build a bridge here, where the river is so deep, and at least half a league broad; yet in all the way from Bir [near Aleppo] where the river is much

(24) BALBI Viaggio della Ind. Orient. cap. 9. p. 22.

(25) TEIXEIRA Viage de la India kasia India, p. 130.

(26) TAVERNIER Voyage de Perse, l. 2. c. 7.

(27) Idem, ibid.

(28) Idem, ibid.

(29) CASAR FREDERIC. See HACKLUIT, vol. II. p. 25, & 269. FITCH's Travels. See PURCHAS's Pilgrims, vol. II. p. 1730. BALBI ubi sup. cap. 7. p. 26.

(30) TEIXEIRA ubi sup.

(31) LA BOULLAYE LE GOUZE Voyage, chap. 55. p. 312.

(32) LA BOULLAYE LE GOUZE, ibid.

(33) TAVERNIER ubi sup.

(34) FITCH & BALBI ubi supra.

(35) LA BOULLAYE ubi sup. p. 314.

(36) TAVERNIER, ubi sup.

(37) LA BOULLAYE ubi sup.

(38) CASAR FREDERIC, & ELDRED, apud HACKLUIT ubi sup.

(39) TAVERNIER ubi sup.

(40) Idem, ibid.

(41) CARTWRIGHT.

(42) LA BOULLAYE ubi sup.

(43) Idem, ibid.

(44) BALBI ubi supra.

(45) TAVERNIER ubi supra.

(46) BOULLAYE ubi sup.

(47) CARTWRIGHT ubi supra.

(48) TAVERNIER ubi supra.

(49) CARTWRIGHT ubi sup.

(50) BOULLAYE ubi sup.

(51) Idem, ibid.

(52) TAVERNIER ubi sup.

(53) CARTWRIGHT ubi supra.

(54) BOULLAYE & TAVERNIER ubi supra.

(55) BALBI ubi supra.

(56) FITCH ubi supra.

(57) BOULLAYE ubi supra.

(58) Idem, ibid.

(59) TAVERNIER ubi supra.

THE TOWER OF BABYLON.

a of Baghdad. And della Valle was directed, by another tradition, to look for it about two days journey lower (N), near an ancient city called Hilla, situate upon the same river. Here

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before Christ, 2597.

"much narrower, we saw no bridge. Near the bridge are heaps of Babylonish pitch to pay vessels withal; and just before the village is the hill whereon the castle did stand, in a plain, whereon may still be seen some remains of the fortification, which is quite demolished and uninhabited. Not far off, behind it, stood the tower of Babel, still to be seen, half a league in diameter; but so entirely ruined, so low, and so full of venomous beads that have made holes through it, that one dare not approach within half a mile of it, except in two months of the year, when those animals do not stir out (60).

"In the way to Baghdad the road at first was very rough and full of large and stately buildings, arches, and turrets standing in the sand, whereof many were decayed, and lay in ruins; others pretty entire, very strong, and adorned with artificial work, well deserving a more exact inspection. The steeple of Daniel is entire, built of black stone, and still inhabited. It hath some resemblance for height and building to that of the Holy-Cross church, or St. Maurice in Augsburg: from it may be viewed all the ruins of the old Babylonian tower, the castle hill, together with the stately buildings, and the whole situation of the old town, very exactly. We rested, after twelve hours march, near two ascents, one behind the other, extending themselves like two parallel walls with openings in some places, which I take to have been the gates of the old town (61); and the rather because I saw in some places, under the sand, wherewith the two ascents were almost covered, the old wall plainly appear."—Our author saw several other antiquities afterwards; but night coming on, in which he groped his way to Baghdad, he lost them (62); and, in all probability, among the rest, the tower of Nimrod, described in the preceding note, which lies in this road. A late author has given some account of these ruins, but is much out as to the situation of them, as he generally is in his geography (63).

(N) Della Valle, who was at Baghdad in the year 1616, was above five days travelling between that city and the ruins of Babel, which he went to see, taking the way, by the river side, through Rufsumin, a village in Thevenot's time the landing-place for Baghdad (64) instead of Felugia, which is not far off; though in his return, taking the short cut through the plain, he arrived at Baghdad in two days, from which city this ruin lies south-westward, or more to the south. "In the middle of a vast and level plain, says that excellent traveller, about a quarter of a league from Euphrates, which in that place runs westward, appears a heap of ruined buildings like a huge mountain, the materials of which are so confounded together, that one knows not what to make of it. Its figure is square, and rises in form of a tower or pyramid, with four fronts, which answer to the four quarters of the compass; but it seems longer from north to south than from east to west; and is, as far as I could judge by my pacing it, a large quarter of a league. Its situation and form corresponds with that pyramid which Strabo calls the tower of Brutus, and is in all likelihood the tower of Nimrod in Babylon or Babel, as that place is still called. In that author's time, it had nothing remaining of the stairs, and other "ornaments mentioned by Herodotus, the greatest part of it having been ruined by Xerxes; and Alexander, who designed to have restored it to its former lustre, was prevented by death. There appear no marks of ruins, without the compass of that huge mass, to convince one so great a city as Babylon had ever stood there; all one discovers within fifty or sixty paces of it, being only the remains here and there of some foundations of buildings, and the country round about it so flat and level, that one can hardly believe it should be chosen for the situation of so great and noble a city as Babylon, or that there were ever any remarkable buildings on it: but for my part I am astonished there appears so much as there does, considering it is at least four thousand years since that city was built, and that Diodorus Siculus tells us it was reduced almost to nothing in his time. The height of this mountain of ruins is not in every part equal, but exceeds the highest palace in Naples; it is a misshapen mass, whereon there is no appearance of regularity; in some places it rises in points, is craggy and inaccessible, in others it is smoother, and is of easier ascent; there are also tracks of torrents from the top to the bottom, caused by the rains, and both within and upon it one sees parts, some higher and some lower. It is not to be discovered whether ever there were any steps to ascend it, or any doors to enter into it; whence one may easily judge that the stairs ran winding about on the outside, and that being the less solid parts, they were soonest demolished, so that not the least sign of any appears at present.

"Within one finds some grottoes, but so ruined that one can make nothing of them: and it is a doubt, with regard to some of them, whether they were built at the same time with that work, or made since by the peasants for shelter; which last seems to be the most likely. The Al-Hammians believe that these caverns were appointed by God as places of punishment to Harut and Marut, two angels, who they suppose were sent from heaven to judge the crimes of men, but did not execute their commissions as they ought. It is evident from these ruins, that the tower of Nimrod was built with great and thick bricks, as I carefully observed, causing holes to be dug in several places for the purpose; but they do not appear to have been burnt, but dried in the sun, which is extreme hot in those parts. In laying these bricks neither lime nor sand was employed, but only earth tempered and petrified; and in those parts which made the floor, there had been mingled with that earth, which served instead of lime, bruised reeds, or hard straw, such as large mats are made of, to strengthen the work. Afterwards one perceives at certain distances in divers places, especially where the strongest buttresses were to be, several other bricks of the same size, but more solid, and burnt in a kiln, and set in good lime or bitumen; nevertheless, the greater number consists of those which are only dried in the sun. I make no doubt but that this ruin was the ancient Babel, and the tower of Nimrod; for besides the evidence of its situation, it is acknowledged to be such by the people of the country, being vulgarly called Babel by the Arabs (65)."

Th.

(60) See his Travels, part 2. chap. 7. p. 164.
(61) Ibid. p. 166. (62) Ibid. p. 167. (63) MAC GREGORY, in his Sepulchres of the antients, p. 48.

(64) See THEVENOT'S Travels, part 2. book 1. chap. 9. p. 40. (65) Ibid. Vingtième de PIETRO DELLA VALLE, part 2. lett. 17.

also also must be placed the ruins described by a late traveller (*) into these parts. We a

This is the account of that curious traveller, whose painter, by his directions, had drawn the plan, and several prospects of the ruins, which we do not find were ever published in any edition of his works; but Kircher, in his Turris Babel, has given two of them. However, after all, this seems to be only such another modern structure, built by the Arabs for a watch-tower, as that already described.

(*) This gentleman (66) hath, by his penetration, made something of this rude mass, and discovered a great resemblance between it and the tower of Belus, as described by Herodotus, though it does not answer in dimensions. He distinguishes between the first original design upon which it was antiently begun, and the second different design upon which it was continued; it being built partly after one design, and partly after another. The original design our author describes to be a high tower, exactly square, in form of a pyramid; the length of one of whose sides at the base being two hundred and forty three Babylonish foot, each of which is equal to a London foot and two inches, it must be in compass two hundred and twenty six geometrical paces and four foot, or a little more than the fifth part of an English mile. The perpendicular height was intended to be likewise two hundred and forty-three foot, equal to the root of the square, and the oblique height 271½ foot. The whole being a mass, or heap of brick and bitumen work, inclosing a solid hill and rock. The execution of this first design (so far as it was executed) is in this manner: it is divided into nine parts, which are, as it were, so many square towers, in form of parallelepipeds, or flat cubes, one raised above another pyramidically, each twenty seven foot in height, but gradually diminishing in breadth as many foot, so as to make a gallery, or walk, quite round on the top of the tower below, and by the sides of the other above, 13½ foot broad. The last and highest tower was to have been an exact cube twenty seven foot square, and as many high.

This structure is built with bricks of earth, hardened with fire, each nine Babylonish inches square, and three thick, laid in bitumen mixed with straw, or reeds, to the thickness sometimes of three quarters of an inch, and sometimes of three inches, in the following order: first there is a bed of bitumen mixed with reeds three inches thick, then a row of so many bricks as make up the square likewise three inches thick: next is another bed of bitumen mixed with straw, three quarters of an inch thick, then a row of bricks as before; and so alternately a bed of bitumen and straw, and a range of bricks seven times more, so as to make up in all from the base the height of three foot: then a new bed of bitumen mixed with reeds three inches thick being laid, the whole is repeated in the same order eight times more, so as to complete twenty seven foot, which is the height of the first tower. The next five towers are raised in the same manner. The structure so far, being one hundred and sixty two foot high, or two thirds of the whole, was built by Nimrod; but it was afterwards continued by Ninus Belus upon a second and different design, which was that of a tower, exactly round, in form of a cone, or round pyramid, of the same dimensions with the former, divided likewise into nine towers gradually diminishing in the above-mentioned proportions, of which the last and highest would be a cylinder, or round tower, twenty seven foot in diameter, and as many in height. In pursuance of this second design, two round towers were built on the sixth square tower; the second of which round towers (the diameter of whose base is fifty four foot) or eighth of the whole, has a temple practised, or contrived in its solidity along with the execution; which temple is likewise round twenty seven foot diameter, and the same in height; with an entry, or door, made in the [west] side towards Babylon, nine foot square, and thirteen and a half long, and a round opening, or, as it were, a window in the top nine foot diameter; the floor both of the temple and entry being plain, the sides perpendicular, and the roof arched; the arching being contrived in the uppermost third part of the height. This was built by Ninus Belus, who died before it was finished, when the structure was raised to the height of two hundred and sixteen foot, or just eight ninth parts of the whole: and though it wanted only one ninth part, which was the last and smallest of all, the completing of it was never afterwards thought on more by any of his successors: so that it ended with a round flat of fifty-four foot diameter, with the aforesaid window of the temple in the middle, and still continues so. And this tower, as well as the temple, has served as a model ever since for all nations to imitate; especially the temple, which has constantly been followed by those of all religions, who have always built their temples round, with an overture at the top, except the Goths, who introduced the figure of Noah's ark in their churches. Though, as to the overture, or window, it is a difficult question among architects, whether it was designed, or happened by the tower being left unfinished, and wanting the last ninth part, which, according to the original design, was to terminate it; and if so, would have stopped, or covered that overture. It is commonly said to have been designed so: and Moses seems to have been of that mind, when, giving an account of what followed upon the confusion of Babel, he says, the further building of the city was given over, but is silent as to that of the tower, because perhaps he reckoned it had been completed. Yet it is certain, from the knowledge of the design, that it never was completed, and that the overture happened by chance, as before observed: besides, there are some temples of the same times to be seen in and about the ruins of Babylon, particularly that of Ninus Assur, done by his wife Semiramis, where there is no such thing; which makes it more probable that it was not designed: though the greatest part of the Babylonian temples of those times, we see, have it, which renders the matter again something doubtful.

Before Ninus Belus began the before-mentioned temple, he made a sepulchre for his father Nimrod at the bottom of the tower, cut out of the rock, at the bottom of the little hill which is inclosed by the tower. This burying-place is a double grot, consisting of two ante-grots one within another, and six sepulchres, or small grots in each, two on each inner side (67); the sepulchres being eight foot long, six foot broad, and as many high; and their doors, or entries, cut upon the same level four foot long, three broad, and three foot high. Within the sepulchres, on the right hand, is a levee, or seat, the whole length of the sepulchre, three foot broad, and 1½ high, left uncut of the rock for laying the dead body on (68). This sepulchre was made by hollowing a passage into the tower after it was built, as appears by the face of the opening, which is irregular, and the bricks and earth broken. This overture was made through the brick-work and earth of the one,

(66) MAC GREGORY in his Sepulchres of the antients, p. 35, &c.

(67) Ibid. p. 18.

(68) Ibid. p. 14, 15.

also must be placed the ruins described by a late traveller (*) into these parts. We a

This is the account of that curious traveller, whose painter, by his directions, had drawn the plan, and several prospects of the ruins, which we do not find were ever published in any edition of his works; but Kircher, in his Turris Babel, has given two of them. However, after all, this seems to be only such another modern structure, built by the Arabs for a watch-tower, as that already described.

(\*) This gentleman (66) hath, by his penetration, made something of this rude mass, and discovered a great resemblance between it and the tower of Belus, as described by Herodotus, though it does not answer in dimensions. He distinguishes between the first original design upon which it was antiently begun, and the second different design upon which it was continued; it being built partly after one design, and partly after another. The original design our author describes to be a high tower, exactly square, in form of a pyramid; the length of one of whose sides at the base being two hundred and forty three Babylonish foot, each of which is equal to a London foot and two inches, it must be in compass two hundred and twenty six geometrical paces and four foot, or a little more than the fifth part of an English mile. The perpendicular height was intended to be likewise two hundred and forty-three foot, equal to the root of the square, and the oblique height  $271\frac{1}{2}$  foot. The whole being a mass, or heap of brick and bitumen work, inclosing a solid hill and rock. The execution of this first design (so far as it was executed) is in this manner: it is divided into nine parts, which are, as it were, so many square towers, in form of parallelopipeds, or flat cubes, one raised above another pyramidically, each twenty seven foot in height, but gradually diminishing in breadth as many foot, so as to make a gallery, or walk, quite round on the top of the tower below, and by the sides of the other above,  $13\frac{1}{2}$  foot broad. The last and highest tower was to have been an exact cube twenty seven foot square, and as many high.

This structure is built with bricks of earth, hardened with fire, each nine Babylonish inches square, and three thick, laid in bitumen mixed with straw, or reeds, to the thickness sometimes of three quarters of an inch, and sometimes of three inches, in the following order: first there is a bed of bitumen mixed with reeds three inches thick, then a row of so many bricks as make up the square likewise three inches thick: next is another bed of bitumen mixed with straw, three quarters of an inch thick, then a row of bricks as before; and so alternately a bed of bitumen and straw, and a range of bricks seven times more, so as to make up in all from the base the height of three foot: then a new bed of bitumen mixed with reeds three inches thick being laid, the whole is repeated in the same order eight times more, so as to complete twenty seven foot, which is the height of the first tower. The next five towers are raised in the same manner. The structure so far, being one hundred and sixty two foot high, or two thirds of the whole, was built by Nimrod; but it was afterwards continued by Ninus Belus upon a second and different design, which was that of a tower, exactly round, in form of a cone, or round pyramid, of the same dimensions with the former, divided likewise into nine towers gradually diminishing in the above-mentioned proportions, of which the last and highest would be a cylinder, or round tower, twenty seven foot in diameter, and as many in height. In pursuance of this second design, two round towers were built on the sixth square tower; the second of which round towers (the diameter of whose base is fifty four foot) or eighth of the whole, has a temple practised, or contrived in its solidity along with the execution; which temple is likewise round twenty seven foot diameter, and the same in height; with an entry, or door, made in the [west] side towards Babylon, nine foot square, and thirteen and a half long, and a round opening, or, as it were, a window in the top nine foot diameter; the floor both of the temple and entry being plain, the sides perpendicular, and the roof arched; the arching being contrived in the uppermost third part of the height. This was built by Ninus Belus, who died before it was finished, when the structure was raised to the height of two hundred and sixteen foot, or just eight ninth parts of the whole: and though it wanted only one ninth part, which was the last and smallest of all, the completing of it was never afterwards thought on more by any of his successors: so that it ended with a round flat of fifty-four foot diameter, with the aforesaid window of the temple in the middle, and still continues so. And this tower, as well as the temple, has served as a model ever since for all nations to imitate; especially the temple, which has constantly been followed by those of all religions, who have always built their temples round, with an overture at the top, except the Goths, who introduced the figure of Noah's ark in their churches. Though, as to the overture, or window, it is a difficult question among architects, whether it was designed, or happened by the tower being left unfinished, and wanting the last ninth part, which, according to the original design, was to terminate it; and if so, would have stopped, or covered that overture. It is commonly said to have been designed so: and Moses seems to have been of that mind, when, giving an account of what followed upon the confusion of Babel, he says, the further building of the city was given over, but is silent as to that of the tower, because perhaps he reckoned it had been completed. Yet it is certain, from the knowledge of the design, that it never was completed, and that the overture happened by chance, as before observed: besides, there are some temples of the same times to be seen in and about the ruins of Babylon, particularly that of Ninus Assur, done by his wife Semiramis, where there is no such thing; which makes it more probable that it was not designed: though the greatest part of the Babylonian temples of those times, we see, have it, which renders the matter again something doubtful.

Before Ninus Belus began the before-mentioned temple, he made a sepulchre for his father Nimrod at the bottom of the tower, cut out of the rock, at the bottom of the little hill which is inclosed by the tower. This burying-place is a double grot, consisting of two ante-grots one within another, and six sepulchres, or small grots in each, two on each inner side (67); the sepulchres being eight foot long, six foot broad, and as many high; and their doors, or entries, cut upon the same level four foot long, three broad, and three foot high. Within the sepulchres, on the right hand, is a ledge, or seat, the whole length of the sepulchre, three foot broad, and  $1\frac{1}{2}$  high, left uncut of the rock for laying the dead body on (68). This sepulchre was made by hollowing a passage into the tower after it was built, as appears by the face of the opening, which is irregular, and the bricks and earth broken. This overture was made through the brick-work and earth of the one,

(66) MAC GREGORY in his Sepulchres of the antients, p. 35, &c.

(67) Ibid. p. 18.

(68) Ibid. p. 14, 15.

have

C
 2
 .
 b n v k
 v f r E tr
 h
 c f
 b ai m b v
 A
 e v
 .
 f e r
 b
 th
 r o h co
 f o
 a f n
 f r e a
 f

a have inserted in the notes abstracts of the several accounts; but must acquaint the reader, that they do not any of them seem to us to be the remains of the original tower, but rather some later structures of the Arabs.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

SECT. V.

Of the Confusion of Tongues.

b B EING in this section to give some account of the confusion of tongues, it may be expected we should first say something about the origin of speech, one of the most distinguishing differences between us and the animal creation; the great bond which holds society together, and the common conduit whereby the improvements of knowledge are conveyed from one man and one generation to another.

If the authority of Moses be conclusive, it seems not to be denied but that speech was the immediate gift of God to the first man: not that we suppose God really inspired him with any distinct or primitive language; but that he made him sensible of the power with which he was endued, of forming articulate sounds (O), and the use he might make of them as signs of his ideas, and then left the arbitrary imposition of them to Adam himself (P), as is intimated by God's bringing the beasts and birds to him to see what he would call them; and whatever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. So that excepting the first impulse of the Almighty, informing Adam of his natural power, we are inclined to think that speech was attained by gradual invention of arbitrary sounds, to denote first the most obvious things, and after the less obvious, as they came to be taken notice of. That it is possible Adam might attain the use of speech by this method, we presume none will deny; and if it be possible, we are sure it must be the most reasonable and probable to all but those who are for multiplying of miracles needlessly.

We cannot therefore approve of the opinion of those who imagine that God himself formed the body of a language, and then infused it into Adam (Q). Besides, the one, to serve as an avenue, or passage, leading to the entry of the other, made through the rock on the same side towards Babylon (69).

* Genes. ii. 19.

This antiquity is defaced somewhat on all the four sides, especially on the north and west, where the corners and edges of the parts are much decayed, and the body of the bricks worn away into a channel, or hollow, between the beds of bitumen, which, with the reeds and straw incorporated with them, continue firm and entire; neither time, weather, nor any other accident having been able to make an impression on them. The people of the country have dug caves in it to retire to, and those who conduct passengers from Baghdad to see it, break off pieces in one place to add to another, in order to make steps and hand-grips, to render the going up and down it safe. So that the face of the antiquity is now very much changed from what it was, the lowermost ninth part (or tower) being entirely hid under ground by the earth and ruins: in short, it is so disfigured, that one must be at a great deal of pains to find out the architecture of it; and travellers, for want of being properly qualified, not knowing what to make of it, have given imperfect and confused accounts of it (70). As to the situation of this ruin, which seems to be the same with that already described by della Valle, whom he mentions (71), he is very much out in it, since he places it twenty seven miles to the south-west of Baghdad, and but twenty nine to the north-west from the castle of Corn, at the confluence of the Euphrates and the Tigris (72), whereas Corn is at least one hundred and eighty miles distant from that city.

(O) We cannot conceive that inarticulate sounds were ever made use of by any nation to communicate their thoughts; nor that there are any instances thereof to be found, notwithstanding what some travellers have related concerning several remote people. We are told the Samojedes, inhabiting the coasts of Siberia and the icy sea, have nothing human about them, except their outward form; and that the uncertain sound they utter has no more the resemblance of speech than the chattering of apes (73): that the natives of Greenland use a sound like bralls, so uncouth, that no Dane or Dutchman could ever yet imitate it (74): and that the speech of the Hottentots comes nearer the gobbling of turkies than a human voice, tho' perhaps it may be intelligible among themselves (75). But it may be questioned whether these authors were proper judges in the case, as not being acquainted with the languages of those nations: and the rather, because, upon enquiry, we are credibly informed, that the language of these last, tho' commonly thought to be the most inarticulate of all others, is not a despicable one; and that those of the Dutch settlement at the Cape of Good Hope understand and speak it tolerably well.

(P) Mohammed in his Koran supposes Adam came by the names of things no otherwise than by revelation. That book pretends that the angels at the creation of man expressing some contempt of him, God taught Adam the names of things, and then demanded of the angels how those things were called; which they confessing to be above their knowledge, God ordered Adam to name them to them, which he did, and the angels afterwards, at God's command, paid their homage to Adam as their superior (76).

(Q) The words which are generally translated, man became a living soul (77), the Chaldees paraphrase

(69) Ibid. p. 28. (70) Ibid. p. 42, 43, 44.
(71) Ibid. p. 35. (72) Ibid. p. 28. (73) Ibid. p. 94.
(74) TEN RUYSE, p. 444. (75) NISU-

HOFF, p. 188. (76) Al Koran, c. 2, ver. 30, &c.
(77) Genes. ii. 7.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 1597.

much greater part of the primitive tongue, whatever that was; and the names of many a things and operations must have been imposed several ages after Adam's creation, as mankind became acquainted with them, and arts and conveniencies of life were invented. The birds and beasts indeed it is natural to suppose Adam might immediately name, the kinds not being many; but we do not think he went so far as to name every species of them, much less all the reptiles, trees, or plants, though some of the most familiar to him no doubt he did. The fish we presume no body will imagine were brought to him to be named; and if they had by miracle appeared before Adam, no doubt Moses would have mentioned it, the fish of the sea being the first part of the creation, the dominion of which was given by God to man<sup>a</sup>.

It has however been thought by great numbers, that the first language was of divine formation; and of this sentiment Plato himself seems to have been, who supposed that the names of things originally had some natural connection or congruity with the things themselves, and that the first names must have been justly imposed, because they were imposed by the gods (R)<sup>b</sup>. And partly from this notion, in all probability, arose those superstitious pretences of the holiness of one tongue above the rest, as being formed by God.

As we cannot see any necessity for supposing the inspiration of a language, so neither can we imagine that Adam could attain the use of speech so soon as is represented to us by Moses, without divine assistance. We might suppose indeed that mankind might of themselves, by degrees, form a perfect language; for when men wanted signs to express their ideas, and convey them to the understanding of others, they could find none more fit for that purpose, or which required less difficulty to invent, or labour to form, than articulate sounds: but to frame a number of them sufficient even for the few occasions of the first men, must necessarily have taken up a considerable time; for which reason those who were unacquainted with the Mosaic writings, have imagined that men were at first no better than mute animals, till at length convenience taught them the use of speech (S). Several of the antients were of opinion, that men in the beginning of the world expressed their thoughts by dumb signs, or gesticulation only, or else by confused sounds of no signification; and afterwards endeavoured at a language by imposing distinct names on things, which was not brought to any tolerable perfection, but by a long course of time<sup>c</sup>.

The first language consisted of few words. If we consider the primitive state of Adam, and the few things he had occasion to name, it cannot be conceived that his language at first was very extensive; for were we to expunge out of our lexicons all words introduced by the gradual invention of arts to serve the convenience of life, by accurate distinctions of the several species of crea-

<sup>a</sup> Genes. i. 26, 28.

<sup>b</sup> PLATO in Cratyl. Vid. eund. in Protagora.

<sup>c</sup> Diodor. Sic. l. i.

p. 8. Vid. LACTANTI. de vero cultu. l. 10.

phrases render it, viz. the breath breathed into him by God, became in man a speaking soul. Most of the Jews suppose the first tongue (which they all imagine was their own) was formed and created by God himself, and so communicated to Adam (78). Some of them think this was done by generally acquainting him with the roots and fundamental parts of the tongue only (79); others in a more special and particular manner, by revealing to him the whole extent and propriety of the language, even the letters, points and accents (80).

This notion, which some christians embraced, and particularly Eunomius, who, because God is introduced by Moses as speaking before the creation, held that there was in words a certain eternal and immutable nature, was strenuously opposed by Gregory of Nyssa, who declared it a silly, ridiculous and blasphemous opinion, to imagine the great God would condescend to turn grammarian, and set himself down subtilly to invent names for things (81).

(R) The words of this philosopher are; "Ὁνόμα-τ' ὁρῶμεν ἅπας ἰδέσθαι τῶν ὄντων φύσιν ἀποκρίναι (82). And after; ὅτι τὰ πρῶτα ὀνόματα οἱ θεοὶ ἔδωκεν, καὶ διὰ ταῦτα ὁρῶμεν ἔχειν (83).

(78) SEPHEN COZEL.

(79) R. IS. ABRA-

VANEL. (80) R. JUDA HALLÉVI. MUSCAT.

EPHODIUS, &c. (81) GREG. NYSSEN. contra

Eunom. l. 21.

(82) In Cratyl. p. 383. Ed. Serrani.

(S) This notion Horace has expressed in the following lines:

*Quum prorepserunt primis animalia terris,
Mutum ac turpe pecus,— Donec verba, quibus voces sensusque notarent,
Nominaque invenere* (84).

When animals crawl'd forth from parent earth,
A vile dumb herd they were—'Till words were found to utter what they thought,
And names were set on things.—

And Lucretius to the same purpose:

*At varias lingua somitus natura subegit
Mittere, & utilitas expressit nomina rerum* (85).

Kind nature pow'r of framing sounds affords
To man; and then convenience taught us words.
Crech.

The latter also ridicules those who suppose speech the invention of one man (86).

(83) Ibid. p. 425.

sw. 3. ver. 99, &c.

nat. l. 5. ver. 1027, &c.

&c.

(84) HORAT. Serm. l. 1:

(85) LUCRET. de rerum

nat. l. 5. ver. 1040,

(86) Ibid. ver. 1040,

- a tures, and metaphysical conceptions about the operations of the mind, we should find the remainder contained in a very small compass; so that it must necessarily be several ages before a language could be compleated to any degree in comparison to our modern tongues. Scaliger, agreeably to this notion, divides speech into three sorts or degrees, as formed either for necessity, use or delight: the first is that imperfect speech, or rather essay towards speech, abovementioned, serving as the means of necessary intercourse between man and man. The second was somewhat more refined and polished, by being adapted and made fit for use and convenience, and by applying certain dimensions, bounds, and lineaments to the first rude sketch; whence arose a certain rule of speaking. The third sort was yet more polite, there being added to the former the ornament of elegance as its dress<sup>a</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

b WHETHER there was more than one language before the flood is a thing about which we are perfectly in the dark; though it is more reasonable to suppose that there was but one, in which it is possible there might be some difference in dialect, but none considerable; for the few ages between the creation and the flood, and the long lives of the antediluvians, would effectually prevent any great alteration. However that be, it is probable only one language, and that the primitive, was preserved by Noah, or at least was spoken by his descendants till the confusion of tongues at Babel (T).

Whether more tongues than one before the
flood.

c IT may be expected that we should here enter into a formal enquiry concerning the primitive tongue, and endeavour to determine what particular language it was that the first progenitors of mankind spoke. But as this is an enquiry rather of curiosity than use, and we cannot be certain whether that language, whatever it was, be now in being<sup>a</sup>; the most we can do will be to shew the vanity of the pretensions of those languages which have laid claim to this honour, as a great number have done, each nation being fond of it, as an undetiable evidence of their own antiquity (U); though they generally argue in a circle, and urge their antiquity as a proof of the former.

Enquiry concerning the primitive tongue.

d BESIDES those kindred languages we commonly call the oriental tongues; the Armenian, the Celtic, the Coptic, the Greek, the Teutonic, and the Chinese have aspired to the preference in this respect. The Armenian, Celtic, and Coptic have little evidence to produce besides the antiquity of their nations; though the former insist, that as the ark rested in their country, and Noah and his children must have continued there for some time before the lower and marshy country of Chaldea could be fit to receive them, it is therefore reasonable to suppose they left their language there. The Greek some writers have fancied to be the most antient, because of its great extent and copiousness<sup>b</sup>. The Teutonic, or that dialect of it which is spoken in lower Germany and Brabant, has found a strenuous patron<sup>c</sup>, who has endeavoured to derive even the Hebrew itself from that tongue. And the pretensions of the Chinese have been supported<sup>d</sup> not only from the great antiquity of that nation, their early acquaintance with arts and sciences, and their having preserved themselves so many ages from any considerable mixture or intercourse with other nations; but also from the nature and singularity of the tongue itself, which consists of few words, all monosyllables, is most

Several languages claim this honour.

<sup>a</sup> SCALIGER in Poetic. l. 1. c. 1.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. GROT. in Genes. xi. 1. & CLUVER. Germ. Antiq. l. 1.

c. 8. p. 59, 60.

<sup>c</sup> EUTYCH. Annal. p. 50.

<sup>d</sup> GOROPHUS BECANUS, in Origina. Antwerp.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. WEBB'S Essay towards the primitive language.

(T) Supposing there were more tongues than one before the flood, and that Noah and his three sons could speak them all, it is most reasonable to believe that they taught but one common tongue to their children, who propagated the same among their descendants; so that the rest expiring with those first patriarchs, there remained but one language amongst mankind at the building of Babel.

(U) Psammetichus, a king of Egypt, appears to have been of this opinion; for wanting to know who were the most antient people in the world, after several fruitless experiments, he at last hit on the following expedient. He took two infants newly born, and gave them to a shepherd to be brought up, commanding him not to suffer any person to speak a word in their hearing, but to nurse them in a solitary cottage, by bringing them goats to suck, till they could take other food. Psammetichus's intention herein, was to find out what word the children would first utter when they began to articulate; imagining, as others have since done, that they would naturally speak the primitive language, if not taught otherwise. At two years end, as the shepherd one day entered the cottage, he had no sooner opened the door, than the children ran to him, and holding out their hands, cried Becar. Of this the shepherd at first took no notice, but afterwards observing they frequently repeated this word at his coming in, he acquainted the king with it, and by his order brought the children into his presence. Psammetichus having himself heard them pronounce the same word, inquired whether any nation made use of it; and finding the Phrygians called bread by that name, he and his subjects allowed this to be a proof that the Phrygians were the more antient people. Herodotus remarks, that the Greeks, among other ridiculous things, reported, that these children were brought up by women, whose tongues had been cut out by the king's order for that purpose (87). The Scholiast of Aristophanes (88) tells the same story of another king of Egypt, named Sesouchis.

(87) HERODOT. Enterp. in hæc. Vid. SUIDAM in verb. BAKCHIDANTH.

(88) In nubel. p. 149, 150.
lumpie

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

simple in its construction, having no variety of declensions, conjugations, or grammatical rules; and so modest, that it is said they have no character to express those parts which we industriously conceal<sup>b</sup>: all which are conceived to be strong marks of its being the first language of mankind; besides the presumption, formerly mentioned, of Noah's being the founder of the Chinese nation<sup>a</sup>.

As to the oriental languages, though they have each of them their partisans, yet the generality of eastern authors allow the preference to the Syriac, or that dialect of it which was spoken in Mesopotamia, Chaldaea and Assyria, in which countries mankind made their first settlements after the flood, and where it is presumed the language of Noah and his sons remained. For which reason the more judicious Arab writers acknowledge Yarah, the son of Kabtan (or Jerah, the son of Joktan) to be the first whose speech deviated from the Syriac to the Arabic; and little regard the pretences of some of their countrymen, that their language was spoken by Adam before the fall, and then changed into the Syriac, but restored again upon his repentance; that notwithstanding in time it degenerated again into the same language, and would have been utterly lost, had it not been preserved by the elder Jokham, who escaped with Noah in the ark, and propagated it among his posterity<sup>d</sup>.

THE patrons of the Syriac tongue have, as another evidence of its right to the precedence, endeavoured to derive the names of persons and places mentioned by Moses from that language<sup>a</sup>, and generally with better success than some writers will allow (X): but this argument, though commonly looked upon as conclusive, yet proves nothing of itself, as will be hereafter observed. However, thus much we must in justice acknowledge, that if any of these tongues in particular may claim to be the original, or mother of the rest, it seems to be the Syriac, which was probably spoken by all the patriarchs from Noah to Abrahah, that being, after the confusion, the tongue of the country where they were born and lived; though it must be confessed it will not thence follow, that it was in use there before the confusion.

The pretensions of the Hebrew tongue considered.

BUT the Jews are they who assert the antiquity of their tongue with the greatest warmth. They pretend that it was immediately framed by God; that he spake it himself, for which reason it is called the holy tongue; that it is the only language understood by the angels, and wherein we can pray and be heard with effect<sup>c</sup>. And several Christian writers<sup>e</sup>, abating these superstitious fancies of the Jews, have acknowledged and maintained, that the Hebrew tongue is the most antient in the world; the very same which was spoken by Adam and Noah, and preserved in the family of Eber, who were not concerned in the building of Babel, nor consequently shared in the punishment inflicted on those that were. But as we have already shewn this to be a groundless imagination, we shall proceed to consider their principal argument, and indeed the only one which deserves any consideration, drawn from the etymologies of the names in Moses; some of which that inspired writer himself derives from the Hebrew, and the rest are generally supposed to have been taken thence likewise.

AND here it cannot be denied, that several proper names of persons and places, before the confusion of tongues, may be very regularly derived from the Hebrew; and that there are some very pertinent reasons given, and allusions made by the sacred historian to evince their propriety, and the relation they have to the person or place designed by them: and this is the most that can be allowed; for though all the names in general, mentioned by Moses before the division, may possibly be forced from some

<sup>a</sup> SEMEDO Rel. de la Cina, parte I. c. 11. <sup>c</sup> See before, pag. 115, &c. <sup>d</sup> Vid. Pocock. Orat. præf. in Carmen Tograi, & Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 38, 40. <sup>e</sup> Vid. THEODORET. quest. 51. in Genes. <sup>f</sup> Vid. Buxtorf. de ling. Hebr. orig. <sup>g</sup> CHRYSOST. Homil. xxx. in Genes. xi. AUGUST. de civit. Dei, l. 17. c. 11. ORIGEN. in Numer. Hom. xi. HIERON. Comment. in Sophon. Vid. etiam SELDEN. de Synedr. vet. Hebræor. l. 2. c. 9. BOCHART. Phaleg. l. 2. c. 15. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patriarch. tom. I. exerc. 16. & alios præc. innumeros.

(X) It is said in particular, that the paronomasia in this passage, she shall be called woman (עֵוָה ishbah) because she was taken (קָחָה me-ish) out of man (89), is not preserved in the Chaldee and Syriac translations, which instead of ish and ishbah, use the words Baal and lita, or Gabro and Atto: whence some have concluded, that the translators were not able to express the allusion in the Syriac tongue (90); but this is a mistake, for the Syrians from the masculine ish regularly form the feminine ishbah; which word is to be found in their lexicons and grammars, though it be antiquated, and therefore not made use of by the translators. It is likewise objected (91) with as little foundation, that Adam does not signify man, nor Crim possession, in that tongue. We may observe hereafter, that some names in Moses are more happily derived from the Syriac than the Hebrew.

(89) Genes. ii. 23. (90) Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. I. exercit. 16. § 13. N. CHOLSON

Dissert. philol. de univ. tit. us oris linguis, p. 4. (91) HEIDEGG. ubi supra.

a Hebrew root or other, yet much the greater part of them seem to be insignificant, at least to have no congruity with the subject; nor can it be expected they should, unless we either imagine all such names as seem to relate to a future part of a person's life were given by the spirit of prophecy; or else allow them to be imposed after the events which occasioned them happen'd, and so to be rather sur-names than proper names; a concession which manifestly weakens the argument drawn from them.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

Thus much being premised, it will be easy to shew, that this demonstrative argument, as it is called<sup>1</sup>, will not bear examination. For, 1. It is not certain that the names used by Moses were the very original names themselves, and not translated by him from the primitive tongue into Hebrew, or at least somewhat alter'd, to accommodate what he wrote to the understandings of the Jews. And how inconsistent soever some may think this method with historical veracity, it has been frequently practised by profane as well as sacred historians, as has been undeniably proved<sup>2</sup>: and Moses himself has given a plain instance of this approbation of such changes, in altering his own name, which was of Egyptian original, to adapt it to a Hebrew etymology (H). 2. Supposing the names given by Moses were the true original ones, it would not be strange at all, if some of them might by accident aptly admit of a Hebrew derivation; such casual conformities sometimes happening in words which are certainly known to be of different origins. 3. Several of those names are more pertinently derived from some other of the oriental tongues than from the Hebrew (I): and not a few of the etymologies which Moses himself gives us, are deduced without any regard at least to the present rules of analogy (K). 4. A few lucky paronomasiae or allusions are no proof in this case, because they may happen by accident; and in fact, some of those mentioned by Moses may be expressed in other tongues as well as the Hebrew (L).

THIS argument has been farther enforced from the significancy of the names of several animals in the Hebrew tongue, which are thought to have been imposed by Adam, because of some peculiar qualities in the animal to which they were given, correspondent to their respective roots<sup>3</sup>: but since the same may be as justly asserted of most other languages as the Hebrew, it will conclude nothing. Besides, we are much

<sup>1</sup> ABRAVANEL.      <sup>2</sup> Vid. PLATON. in Critia. GROTIUS in Genes. xi. 1. & de veritate rel. Christi. lib. 1. HUET. in Demonstr. Evang. prop. iv. c. 13. § 4. CLEREC. dissert. de lingua Heb.      <sup>3</sup> Vid. BOCHART. Hierozoic. & HEBDEGG. Hist. Patr. tom. 1. Exerc. 16. § 16.

(H) The original name is Mouſe, or (as it is in the Coptic version) Mouſes, with the Greek termination, and composed of two Coptic, or old Egyptian words, mor, water, and 'ſe; to preserve. But Moses finding the Hebrew verb מָשָׁה maſha, to draw out, bore some resemblance in sound to his name, and in signification to the occasion of it, writes it מֹשֶׁה Mohſeh; and introduces Pharaoh's daughter giving this reason for her imposing it, because מַשִּׁיתִיו מֵהַמַּיִם maſhitu, I drew him out of the waters (1).

(I) Thus Abel, or Hebel, which in Hebrew signifies vanity, or a vapour, seems a name not very apposite to Adam's second son, and therefore Moses has given no reason for it's imposition. But if it be derived from the Syriac יָהֵב אֵיל Yah il, which answers to the Latin name Deus dedit, it is very proper; and accordingly in the margin of a manuscript copy of Abulſaragius, we find the name of Abel interpreted in Arabic by that of هبة الله Hebatallah, the gift of God.

The name of Babel itself, which the Hebrew text tells us was so called because God did there בָּלַל balal, i. e. confound the language of all the earth (2), may likewise more naturally be derived from the Syriac, in which tongue balbel is to confound, and boblo, or bobel, confusion.

(K) We shall instance in the names of Noah and Abraham. The former was so called, because, said his father, יְנַחֵם אֱנִי yenahemenu, he shall comfort us, &c. (3). But if his name were derived from the root נָחַם niham, to comfort, it should have been Nohem, or Menahem, not Noah, which can regularly come from no other verb than נָחַם nuah, to rest; and the Septuagint have therefore, instead of he shall comfort us, rendered it διαναχόμενος, he shall cause to rest, &c. which has induc'd some learned men (4) to think the ancient and true reading was יָנִיבֵנִי yanibenu. And Philo Judaeus and St. Jerom translate the name Noah, rest.

The name of Abraham was changed from Abram, which signifies high father, by inserting only the letter H, because he was to be made אֲבִי הָמוֹן Ab hamon, the father of a multitude of nations (5): according to which etymon he should rather have been called Abhamon, or Abham (though we know some fancy the letter h was inserted from the word רַב rab, many). But the names of these two persons, especially the latter, being too famous and well known in the east to admit any considerable change, Moses was therefore obliged to retain them; and give the best etymology he could from the Hebrew tongue. We might offer a more plausible one of the name Abraham from the Arabic, wherein أَبُو رَهْمَان Abu roham signifies the father of a multitude, did we not consider that it is one of those casual resemblances we have already mentioned, and most certainly false.

(L) As Adam, which name is an appellative common to all the species, was so called from adamah the earth, so the Latins called man homo, which the best etymologists derive from humus the ground (6). Yet we cannot think any body ever dreamed from hence that the Latin was the primitive tongue.

(1) Exod. ii. 10. (2) Genes. xi. 9. (3) Genes. x. 29. (4) GROTIUS ad loc. & LUD. CAPPEL.

Critic. Sacra. l. 4. c. 8.

(5) Genes. xvii. 5.

(6) Vid. VOSSII Etymol. ling. Lat.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

Whether all other tongues may be derived from the Hebrew.

deceived if we imagine (as has been hitherto generally supposed) that the verbs were <sup>a</sup> really the original roots of the Hebrew tongue; on the contrary, the greatest part of them, at least, were themselves at first derived from nouns, though they be now for grammatical convenience considered as the roots (M). On the whole it must be acknowledged, that no conclusive argument for the antiquity of any language can be drawn from etymologies, which ought, on all occasions, to be urged with great caution, being for the most part uncertain and precarious.

SOME learned men however have endeavoured to derive all languages in general from the Hebrew, which they imagine to be the parent of all others<sup>b</sup>. That they should succeed very well in finding a great conformity between that and the other oriental tongues is no wonder, since they are manifestly sprung from one common original; though it be difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish the mother from the daughters. That they have also given tolerable satisfaction in deducing from the same tongue several words not only in the Greek and Latin, but in some other European languages, is not matter of much surprize, considering the great intercourse several nations of our continent had with the Phœnicians, whose mother tongue was the Hebrew. But when these writers venture out of their depth, and pretend to deduce the more remote languages from the same fountain, they only shew their ignorance, and make themselves ridiculous to all who have but a moderate skill in those tongues; for a proof of which we could produce a multitude of examples from a celebrated and laborious work of that kind<sup>c</sup>. As to the peculiar excellencies found in the Hebrew tongue by some of its patrons, and which they imagine to be an additional proof of the justness of its pretensions, we may say something hereafter, when we come to give an account of this language.

If the Hebrew tongue therefore cannot make good its claim, we may, without taking the pains to refute what has been said in favour of the other pretenders, conclude, that the primitive language was entirely lost at Babel, at least that no one can now tell where it was preserved, which is much the same thing.

The confusion of tongues.

THE speaking one common language (though it might be of advantage to mankind in other respects) yet being the great obstacle to that division of them into distinct nations which God had for most wise purposes resolved on<sup>d</sup>, he thought fit to break this bond which held them so strictly together, and confound their language, that they should not understand one another's speech; the natural consequence of which was, that they were scattered abroad upon the face of all the earth. This event is mentioned by profane historians, who write that mankind used one and the same language, till the overthrow of the tower of Babylon; at which time a multiplicity of tongues was introduced by the gods: whereupon wars ensued, and those whose speech happened to be intelligible to each other, joined company, and seized such countries as they chanced to light upon<sup>e</sup>.

How effected.

As to the degree of this Babylonish confusion, and the manner wherein it was effected, there is great diversity of sentiments. Several learned men, prepossessed with an opinion that all the different idioms now in the world did at first arise from one original language, to which they may be reduced<sup>f</sup>, and that the variety which we find among them is no more than must naturally have happened in so long a course of time, supposing a bare separation of the builders of Babel, have been induced to believe that there were no new languages formed at the confusion, but that the most that was done was only to set those builders at variance, by creating a misunderstanding among them (N). This some think to have been effected

<sup>a</sup> Vid. HEIDECC. ibid. § 18:      <sup>b</sup> THOMASINI Glossar. Universal. Hebr.      <sup>c</sup> Genes. xi. 6.
<sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 7, 8.      <sup>e</sup> ABYDENUS apud Euseb. de prep. Ev. l. 9. c. 14. SIBYLLA & HESTIUS, apud eund. ib. c. 15. & apud Joseph. Ant. l. 1. c. 4.      <sup>f</sup> STERNHILM. prefat. in Evang. Ulalæ, p. 4.      <sup>g</sup> Vid. HEIDECC. ubi sup. Exerc. 21. § 21.

(M) Many examples might be given of the verbs being manifestly derived from, and posterior to the nouns in all the oriental tongues: so in English, dog, duck, &c. were certainly first imposed as names, and afterwards used as verbs, to express actions proper to those creatures.

(N) To support this opinion, it is said, that the Hebrew word שפֹּה shaphah, lip, which we render language and speech (7), rather signifies agreement, or unanimity, and is equivalent to שִׁפְהָא Phe ebhad, i. e. one mouth (8), which is justly translated with one accord. But this latter is an adverbial expression, which the other is not: nor does it follow, that one lip must import the same thing as one mouth; the only passage that has been produced as an instance of its being used in that sense (9), being far from proving any such thing (10). Another text has been alledged which seems to favour this interpretation much more; it is where David praying against his enemies, begs of God to divide their tongues (11), that is, to set them at variance. But this cannot be Idi's meaning here, because he immediately explains what he means by one lip, by adding, and of one speech, or more literally, of the same words (12).

(7) Genes. xi. 1, 6, 7.      (8) Job. ix. 2. 1 Kings      WOTTON'S Disc. on the confusion of languages, p. 9.
xxii. 13.      /sa. xix. 18.      (10) See Dr.      (11) Psal. lv. 10.      (12) Genes. xi. 1.

without

- a without any immediate influence on their language<sup>a</sup>, which seems contrary to the words and obvious meaning of the sacred historian: others have imagined it brought about by a temporary confusion of their speech, or rather of their apprehensions, causing them, while they continued together, though they spake the same language, yet to understand the words differently<sup>b</sup>. A third opinion is, that a variety of inflexions was introduced, and perhaps some new words, which disturbed and perverted the former manner of expression: and this might occasion different dialects, yet could not create new languages<sup>c</sup>. But none of these explications seem fully to answer the apparent design of Moses; which was not only to inform us how mankind were at first dispersed, and broken into so many different nations, but to account for the diversity of their languages; a thing very difficult, if not impossible to do, without having recourse to some extraordinary interposition of the divine power. For though time, intercourse with foreign nations, commerce, the invention and improvement of arts and sciences, and the difference of climates (O), cause very considerable alterations in languages, yet the utmost effect we can imagine them to have, will not come up to the question<sup>d</sup>. We cannot conceive a language can thereby be so much disfigured, that all the general marks and characteristicks should disappear. It is not easy to apprehend how all the words of a language should be entirely changed for others; nor is there any one instance to be given of any such total change: but it is next to impossible to conceive that so great a diversity as we find in the frame and constitution of languages wherein the grand and essential differences between them consist, rather than in the words which compose them, (as may be observed in the accounts we shall hereafter give of the several languages of which we have any knowledge) could ever have been occasioned by the causes assigned above. The present diversity of tongues in the world is prodigious<sup>e</sup>; and considering the time that has elapsed since the building of Babel, and the alterations made in some known languages in the course of one, two, and three thousand years, (which alterations we constantly find greater or less in proportion to the intercourse the nation has had with foreigners) and considering that there are many tongues which when compared with others have not the least affinity, so that a man must be the greatest visionary in the world to imagine them the offspring of the same parent, it seems to us that the variety of idioms now spoken can be no way possibly accounted for, without either approving the preadamite system, or allowing a formation of new languages at Babel<sup>f</sup>. A very learned man, who warmly espouses the notion of deducing all languages from one, is yet so sensible that exceptions must be made, that he himself excludes the languages of America and of the Indian islands out of the number; adding, that some have thence rashly imagined, that the men who speak those tongues are of a distinct species, and not the descendants of Adam<sup>g</sup>: which concession is enough to overthrow the hypothesis he would maintain.

ANOTHER argument against the formation of new languages at Babel, which has been thought to be of some weight, is, that if such a division of tongues be understood, no good reason can be given why those colonies which spoke languages that were near a-kin, were not removed to the greatest distances, and those whose lan-

<sup>a</sup> CLERIC. Comment. in loc. Vid. Pere SIMON, Hist. Crit. du vieux Test. l. 1. c. 14. <sup>b</sup> Judæi apud J. C. SCALIGER. Exercit. in Cardan. 259. § 1. <sup>c</sup> IS. CASAUB. Diatribe de ling. Heb. Vid. M. CASAUB. de quatuor lingg. p. 17, & sub initio. <sup>d</sup> See Dr. WOTTON's Disc. concerning the conf. of languages, p. 57. Dr. BRETT's Essay on the conf. of languages, p. 61, &c. <sup>e</sup> Vid. CALVIN. in Genes. xi. 1, 2. <sup>f</sup> Vid. Dr. WOTTON, ubi sup. p. 36. Dr. BRETT, ubi sup. & DIODOR Sic. l. 2. p. 8. <sup>g</sup> STIERNHJELM. ubi sup.

(O) It has been thought by several that the air or climate of some countries disposes the inhabitants to a peculiar pronunciation, and renders them unapt for the uttering certain sounds or letters: whence, as they imagine, it comes to pass, that some languages are so full of gutturals, or of consonants, while others have scarce any of the former, and comparatively few of the latter; that the Ephraimites could not pronounce the letter Shin (13); and that the Chinise find so much difficulty in the letter R, and the Arabs in P, &c. But we are far from being satisfied that this difference is caused by any quality of the climate; on the contrary, it is much more reasonable to believe, that such varieties in tongues and dialects, are perfectly casual, no one language comprehending all the several sounds, some making greater use of one sound, and some of another; and that a man accustomed from his infancy, for that reason and no other, to a peculiar pronunciation, must needs find it hard to imitate even the easiest and seemingly most natural sound that is not agreeable thereto. Thus the Hurons in America, who have no labials at all in their language, and therefore when they speak, have no occasion ever to shut their lips (14), would not soon be brought to pronounce any one letter of that organ: yet experience shews us how readily and perfectly a child, whose organs are free and not stiffened by long habitude to a peculiar utterance, learns to form strange sounds, which a grown person is not perhaps able to do with the utmost pains and application.

(13) Judges xii. 6.

(14) REZAN Dissert. de lingg. Americanis, p. 219.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

languages were entirely different, placed next one another<sup>c</sup>. To this it may easily be answered, that there is no necessity of supposing every family had a distinct language, or that the several dialects of the mother tongues were formed at the confusion. The dispersion might at first be effected without such an absolute separation of families derived from the same stock: mankind was not then so numerous, but that it would be sufficient to cut off the communication between the three great branches and their prime families by the introduction of new tongues, which alone we contend was the work of God; for dialects we allow might, and necessarily would be formed by time.

UPON the whole, we think we may reasonably conclude, with a very learned person whose sentiments on this head we entirely approve, that upon the confusion of Babel there were new languages framed; which languages have been the roots and originals from which the several dialects that are, or have been, or will be spoken as long as this earth shall last (P) have arisen, and to which they may with ease be reduced<sup>d</sup>.

IN what manner these new languages were formed, is a question hard to be determined; it seems by the Mosaic account, which is so solemn, and represents God as coming down in person to view the work of these builders<sup>e</sup>, that it was the immediate act of God; and some have thence concluded, that he effected it by inducing an oblivion of their former tongue, and instantaneously infusing others into their minds, according to their several nations<sup>f</sup>. The Jews imagine this was done by the ministry of angels, seventy of whom descended with God, and were each of them set over a nation to which they taught a peculiar language; but Israel fell to the lot of his own inheritance, the Lord's portion being his people<sup>g</sup>, and therefore, they say, they retained the primitive tongue<sup>h</sup>. Others have supposed, that God did no more than cause them to forget their first language, leaving them to form new ones as they could<sup>i</sup>; but this must have taken up some time, and could not answer the immediate occasions of mankind. As it would be to little purpose to enquire so curiously into this matter, as some have done<sup>k</sup>, the best we can do is to conclude, that it was effected instantly, in a way and manner of which we can give no account<sup>l</sup>.

The number of languages formed at Babel;
and the consequence of the confusion.

It would be of as little use to collect the several opinions in relation to the number of languages formed at Babel: we may as well allow the number of seventy, just mentioned, as any other. We only know from Moses, that the Canaanitish or Hebrew, the Syriac and Egyptian languages were formed so soon as the time of Jacob<sup>m</sup>. It is most probable that the languages of the chief families were fundamentally different from each other, and that the sub-languages or dialects within each branch, for the sake of immediate intercourse, had a mutual affinity, some more, some less, according as they settled nearer or farther from each other. And this was sufficient to bring about the designs of God to divide mankind into distinct societies, kingdoms, and commonwealths, and thereby to occasion the making of wholesome laws, the keeping of strict discipline, the encouragement of labour and industry, of liberal arts, and all social virtues, and the suppression of such vices as weaken government and introduce a corruption of morals. All which opened a new scene of providence, with a surprising variety of wisdom, in the government of the world<sup>n</sup>.

SECTION VI.

Of the dispersion of mankind, and the planting of nations in the two first general migrations.

Of the dispersion.

COMING now to speak of the dispersion of mankind, which was the consequence of that confusion of tongues we considered in the last section, we beg leave to premise something as to the time, order, and other circumstances of that event.

THE primitive fathers distinguish between the division of the earth, and the dispersion of mankind, and make them two different transactions. They suppose that Noah,

<sup>c</sup> RELAND apud WOTTON, ubi sup. p. 61. See also STILLINGF. Orig. Sacr. l. 3. c. 5. § 3. <sup>d</sup> WOTTON, ubi sup. p. 29. <sup>e</sup> Genes. xi. 5, &c. <sup>f</sup> PERERUS in Genes. lib. 16. disp. 9. <sup>g</sup> Deut. xxxii. 9. <sup>h</sup> ELIEZER Pirke, c. 24. SHALSH. HAKKAB. p. 93, &c. <sup>i</sup> Vid. HEIDEG. Hist. Patr. tom. I. exerc. 21. § 19. <sup>k</sup> Vid. BUXTORF. Dissert. de Ling. Hebr. confusione & plurium lingg. origine. <sup>l</sup> MERCER. in loc. <sup>m</sup> Vid. Genes. xxxi. 47. xlii. 23. <sup>n</sup> See STACKHOUSE's Body of Divinity, p. 332.

(P) Perhaps we should except those languages, which, it is said, have been invented and made by mutual agreement, such as the Chinse and that of the Tuca's of Peru; of which more in a proper place.

- a to whom the earth was well known before the flood, as proprietor of the whole world, divided it among his three sons (A) before any of their posterity removed to Shinaar (B), from whence they were afterwards dispersed to take possession of their respective shares<sup>a</sup>. This Noachical division, as groundless as it is, was so firmly believed, that one author condemns the contrary opinion as heretical<sup>b</sup>. Salianus<sup>c</sup>, according to this distinction of the fathers, makes the dispersion happen about the middle of Peleg's life, though he places the division in his first year.

Year of the Flood, 401. Year before Christ, 2597:
Not different from the division in the days of Peleg.

- OTHER writers have supposed a double dispersion, one at the birth of Peleg, and the other of the builders of Babel<sup>d</sup>; and an historian of some antiquity seems to have imagined, that mankind increased so very fast, that they had peopled several countries and islands, and built several towns, before they laid the foundation of Babel; absurdly bringing them together again at that place, on purpose to be dispersed a second time according to the Noachical partition<sup>e</sup>. But the more received opinion<sup>f</sup>, and the most agreeable to scripture is, that the division of the earth in the days of Peleg, and the dispersion of mankind at Babel, were one and the same transaction.

- THOSE who follow the Hebrew chronology, are driven to great straits to fix the time of this event. Some, in order to reconcile the sacred history with the profane, or led by some fancies of their own, hold a dispersion or plantation of countries even before the birth of Peleg. Sir John Marsham is of this number; he, to reconcile the Hebrew and Egyptian chronologies, will have Menes to have been the same with Ham, who in the earliest times after the deluge, travelled, as he supposes, into Egypt, settled there with his children, and was the first king of that country<sup>g</sup>. Others on the contrary place the dispersion at Babel towards the end of Peleg's life; for being unable by any fair calculation to find people enough to furnish colonies for a plantation of nations at his birth, which according to the Hebrew falls in the year of the flood 101, they are obliged to maintain that his name was given him prophetically long before the dispersion began, in order to make it fall in such a part of his life as would allow time for propagating a sufficient number of mankind for the purpose. The Jews place it in the last year of his life<sup>h</sup>, wherein they are followed by St. Jerom and several of the christian chronologers. Others fix it at various periods towards the middle of his age<sup>i</sup>: Petau about his 52d year, or 153 years after the flood; Cumberland about his 79th year, or the 180th after the flood<sup>k</sup>; Salianus and Kircher<sup>l</sup> in the year of the flood 275; and Usher in one passage seems to place it after the birth of Reu<sup>m</sup>, which fell out in the 30th year of Peleg's age, or 131st of the flood, without mentioning the precise time; though elsewhere he is of opinion it ought to be referred to the time of Peleg's birth<sup>n</sup>. Thus those who follow the Hebrew account, seem to be agreed only in not connecting the dispersion of Babel with the birth of Peleg; which yet the scripture requires to be placed at that juncture<sup>o</sup>. For if by the days of Peleg are to be understood the whole life of the man, or the middle or the latter end of it, then Peleg will have nothing peculiar to deserve the name; because in that sense the division happened in the days of all his progenitors, and even of Noah himself: therefore it must have been peculiar to Peleg alone, of all the family of Eber or Shem, to be born just at the very time of the

The time of the dispersion fixed.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. HEIDEGG. Hist. Patr. t. I. Exerc. 22. § 9. <sup>b</sup> PHILASTRIUS Brixienf. Hæres. 11. 8. <sup>c</sup> Anal. Ecclef. <sup>d</sup> SPANHEIM. Hist. Ecclef. col. 291, 292. <sup>e</sup> SULPIC. SEVER. Hist. Ecclef. l. 1. Vid. HORNIIUM in eundem. <sup>f</sup> Vid. USSER. PETAV. COCCEIUM. NATAL. ALEX. &c. <sup>g</sup> MARSH. Canon. Chron. Secul. l. p. 23. <sup>h</sup> R. DAVID GANZ. ad ann. 1996. SEDER OLAM RABBA in ipso initio SHALHESEL. HAKKAB. p. 7. <sup>i</sup> CORNEL. A LAPIDE, TORNIELLUS, ABULFARAG. p. 11. <sup>k</sup> Orig. gent. ant. p. 150. <sup>l</sup> See his TURIS Babel, cap. 8. p. 20. <sup>m</sup> Ad ann. mund. 1757, & 1787. <sup>n</sup> Chronol. Sacr. part. 1. cap. 5. p. 26. <sup>o</sup> Vid. JOSEPH. ANTIQ. l. 1. c. 7. AUGUST. de Civit. Dei, lib. 16. cap. 2. MERCERUM & MUSCULUM in Genes. POSTELL. de orig. c. 20. BEROALD. PERKINS, BROUGHTON, PERER. & USSER. Chronol. Sacr. ubi sup.

(A) The opinion of Epiphanius (1) on this occasion is very singular. He maintained that they cast lots for their shares in the city of Rhinocolura or Rhinocollura, in the confines of Egypt and Palestine. He seems to have been led into this notion by the Septuagint translation, where the Hebrew words Nahal Mizraim (2), which signify the torrent of Egypt, are rendered Rhinocolura, expressing (as Jerom observes) not so much the words of scripture, as the sense of the words. Whence he concluded Rhinocolura was in Hebrew called Nahal, which he interprets a Lot; as if that city had taken its name from Noah's dividing the earth by lot among his sons at that place. But he is mistaken in the signification of that word, as a learned man has shewn (3).

(B) What gave occasion chiefly to this notion, was also a wrong understanding of the Hebrew text (4), which the Septuagint, instead of lest we be dispersed, have rendered before we be dispersed; from whence the fathers imagined that Noah not only gave orders to the families sprung from him to separate, but actually gave to each of them a certain portion of the earth; and that before they obeyed his commands, they undertook to build the tower of Babel, as a monument of their having once dwelt together.

(1) In Ancorat. c. 114. Hæres. 66. § 83. SYNCELL. p. 45. b. (2) Isaiah. xvii. 12. (3) HEIDEGG.

Hist. Patr. tom. I. Exerc. 22. § 10. (4) Genes. xi. 4.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

division or dispersion of Babel; from whence, with very good reason, he had that name <sup>a</sup> given him by his father <sup>p</sup>.

PERIZONIUS, who finds himself obliged, by the authority both of scripture and reason, to place the Babylonish dispersion at the time of Peleg's birth, to solve the difficulty, endeavours to prove that neither the scripture supposes any great number of people in being at that juncture, nor did the nature of the transaction require it; the first plantations being made with only a few, and those small families, which removed no farther than the countries in the neighbourhood of Shinaar <sup>q</sup>. But after all, though he thinks the Hebrew copy ought to be followed, yet he acknowledges that the interval between the flood and the age of Abraham seems to be too short according to that chronology <sup>r</sup>; and that is the only interval wherein it differs from the Samaritan <sup>b</sup> after the flood.

IN a word, the dispersion is the Scylla and Charybdis of those who adhere to the Hebrew chronology; according to which, if any regard be had to profane history, that event must be carried higher than the birth of Peleg; and if a proper number of people be required for planting nations, it must be brought down a good way below his birth, if not to the time of his death, which happened within sixty years of the time wherein the Samaritan chronology places his birth (the true epocha of the dispersion): a plain demonstration of the defect of the one, and of the truth of the other computation.

HAVING settled the time of the dispersion at Babel, let us next enquire into the number of mankind then in the world. Some authors imagining that a greater part of <sup>c</sup> the earth was planted in this first dispersion, than we are obliged either by scripture or reason to believe, have endeavoured to swell their calculations as much as ever they can; and several as if the whole earth was to be peopled at once; whilst others would reduce the number of mankind to a smaller sum than the occasion seems to have required: but a medium is to be observed between these two extremes.

IN this enquiry no computation can be made from the number of persons mentioned in scripture as concerned in this first dispersion, which are but fifty three, excluding Noah and his three sons; and if we have recourse to the number of generations, we shall meet with less satisfaction still from that quarter, for they were but three at most; Eber, the father of Peleg, (who could not be a leader in the dispersion, because <sup>d</sup> it happened at his birth) being but the third from Shem; there are likewise only three generations mentioned in the line of Ham, and but two in that of Japhet: so that if we were to confine our calculation to that standard, it would fall vastly short. But as there were certainly many more generations procreated between the flood and the dispersion, the time that intervened ought therefore to be considered, as well as the longevity of those who lived in the first ages after the flood.

THE chronologers (who have drawn this enquiry into their own province) have suited their calculations according to their different hypotheses. Some, relying too much on the profane historians, have taken such a method as might account for the early beginning of monarchies, and the great armies set on foot by Ctesias and his followers in the time of Ninus, whom many take to be Nimrod, or at least his son. But the <sup>e</sup> Hebrew chronology lays them under a difficulty which they cannot get over, by contracting the space between the flood and the birth of Peleg to 101 years; for if the calculation produces at that period such a number of men as they judge necessary, the world will be over-stocked with inhabitants, by the natural increase of the first planters, in a very few ages after; and if it be proportioned to the number of mankind in the succeeding ages, the number procreated at the dispersion must be excessive small: wherefore most of them, as has been observed, agree, contrary to the plain sense of scripture, to remove that event towards the middle or end of that patriarch's life, according as it suited their purpose.

IT is an easy thing when a man is determined upon the number, to find out a way to help himself to it. Petau has made a computation, which in 285 years after the flood (or within seven years of the birth of Abraham, according to his computation) <sup>f</sup> fills the world with above 155 times the number of inhabitants which are supposed to be at present existing in it; and yet he cannot make them rise at the birth of Peleg to many above 32,768 souls <sup>g</sup>. Dr. Cumberland, who hath also strained the calculation to an extravagant height, can yet bring little more than 30,000 men upon the stage in the year of the flood 101; though 40 years after he increases them to above 300,000; and in 40 years more to 3,000,000 <sup>h</sup>.

HOWEVER, others have been much more moderate: Mr. Mede allows there could not be above 7000 men, besides women and children, in the year of the flood 101 <sup>i</sup>;

<sup>p</sup> Vid. PERIZON, Orig. Babylon. cap. 14. p. 314.

<sup>q</sup> Ibid. p. 316.

<sup>r</sup> Ibid. p. 319.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. PETAVIJ doctrin. temp. lib. 9. c. 14.

<sup>h</sup> See MEDÆ's works, book 1. disc. 49.

<sup>i</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. p. 309, 310.

<sup>j</sup> Ibid.

<sup>k</sup> CUMBERLAND, Orig. gent. antiqu.

a late writer, who strenuously defends the Hebrew chronology, and has taken a great deal of pains in his calculations of Noah's issue by his three sons, cannot raise above 1416 males of 20 years old, at the birth of Peleg*; and Mr. Whiston, whose principles seem more to be depended on than any of the others, produces by his computation about 2389, and no more, at that time*; the largest of which numbers must be allowed to be much too small for the purpose: an evident demonstration of the inconsistency of the Hebrew chronology with the circumstances of this first plantation of the earth (C).

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

* See BEDFORD'S Scrip. Chronol. p. 205, &c.
the Old Testament. p. 65, &c.

* WHISTON'S Short View of the Chronol. of

(C) For the readers satisfaction we shall insert tables of the gradual increase of mankind after the flood, according to the calculations of three of the abovementioned authors, with the principles on which they are framed.

kind in the times of Ninus and Abraham. The method seems plausible at first sight; but the excess of its production is a plain argument against it.

I. The Calculation of Father PETAU (5).

II. Bishop CUMBERLAND'S Calculation.

Years of the Flood.	Number of Sons born.
8	8
31	64
54	512
77	4,096
100	32,768
123	262,144
146	2,097,152
169	16,777,216
192	134,217,728
215	1,065,741,824
238	8,525,934,592
261	68,207,476,736
285	545,659,813,888
Total	623,612,358,728
The double	1,247,224,717,456

Years after the Flood.	Couples born in the first Vicennium after the Flood; and the couples which descended from them.
20	30
60	300
100	3,000
140	30,000
180	300,000
220	3,000,000
260	30,000,000
300	300,000,000
340	3,000,000,000
The sum	3,333,333,330

This table shews the number of the male descendants of one only of Noah's sons, in so many years after the flood, and is formed on the supposition that they began to generate at the age of 17, and consequently between that and 24 might each have 8 sons; so that the 8 sons which a son of Noah might have had by the 8th year of the flood, might by the 24th year of the flood have each 8 sons more. Thus adding continually 23 to the number of the years of the flood, and multiplying the next preceding number of sons by 8, you have the number of sons born in each interval. By this scheme one at least of the other two sons of Noah is to supply wives for the males. And because the parents were long-lived, and saw many generations of their own offspring, whereby an exceeding great number of persons multiplied, and were found alive together out of one stock, therefore the whole may be allowed to be cast up into one sum; and if another son of Noah be taken in to propagate males, the third being reserved to furnish wives for both, we shall have double the number which was found by the first calculation. This supputation was made to account for the number of man-

It must be observed that this computation exhibits not quite a tenth part of the inhabitants which are supposed to have been in the world in the 340th year of the flood, which is that of Peleg's death, being only the issue of the 3 sons of Noah, for the first of the 17 vicennia, or spaces of 20 years, into which that period of time is divisible (6); and is grounded on the gradual shortning of mens lives recorded in scripture, and a supposition that the male issue of those 3 brothers began to generate soon after they were 20 years old; the bishop maintaining against Vossius, that they were no longer in those early ages before they came to puberty, than men now are (7). But experience seems to be in favour of Vossius in this point; for the more robust and long-lived creatures are longest rearing; and we perceive, that generally among brutes, the time of generation is proportioned to the length of their lives; and the births of all the patriarchs before, and a good while after the flood, being much later in the fathers lives than the time in which men now a days begin to generate, is some argument that they did not propagate quite so early as they do now.

This calculation was made, like the former, to account for the founding of certain kingdoms, which according to the Hebrew chronology began very early after the flood. Ten times the sum in this table, gives the number of inhabitants upon earth at the birth of Abraham (8) viz. 33,333,333,300, which is a sum 8 times greater than its inhabitants are at present computed at.

(5) D. Astr. tempor. l. 9. c. 14.
Orig. gent. antiq. p. 142, 154.

(6) See his
(7) Ibid. p. 147.

(8) Ibid. p. 154.

III. Mr. WHISTON's Calculation (9).

Number of mankind.	Years after the Flood.	Years of doubling.	Series.
16	4	4	(1)
32	9	5	(2)
64	15	6	(3)
128	23	8	(4)
256	35	12	(5)
512	50	15	(6)
1,024	70	20	(7)
2,048	95	25	(8)
4,096	125	30	(9)
8,192	160	35	(10)
16,384	200	40	(11)
32,768	245	45	(12)
65,536	295	50	(13)
131,072	350	55	(14)
262,144	410	60	(15)
524,288	475	65	(16)
1,048,576	545	70	(17)
2,097,152	620	75	(18)
4,194,304	700	80	(19)
8,388,608	800	100	(20)
16,777,216	1,000	200	(21)
33,554,432	1,300	300	(22)
67,108,864	1,700	400	(23)
134,217,728	2,100	400	(24)
268,435,456	2,500	400	(25)
536,870,912	2,900	400	(26)
1,073,741,824	3,300	400	(27)
2,147,483,648	3,700	400	(28)
4,294,967,296	4,100	400	(29)

This calculation of Mr. Whiston's is less hypothetical than either of the former. It is now generally owned, that the number of souls upon the face of the whole earth, at present, does not exceed four thousand millions, though our author imagines it may come nearer to that sum than many suppose (10). It is also now generally owned, and this from good observations, that mankind do double themselves, at the longest, in four hundred years (11); which therefore is to be supposed the proportion ever since the present period of human life was fixed in the days of David. Mr. Whiston thinks it also evident, that from the deluge till the days of David, the lives of men were six, if not seven times as long as they have been since (though much more and less than that proportion at the earliest and latest times of that interval) whence he concludes, that the period of the doubling of mankind from the deluge till the days of David, in a mean, must have been, at the least, six or seven times shorter than that which has since obtained, by reason of their ancient longer lives in that proportion (though still this period of doubling must have been much shorter and longer in the earliest and latest times of the said interval.) Upon these grounds he has composed the preceding table, taking a series of numbers beginning at eight (for so many souls survived the deluge) and doubling themselves in sixty years at a mean, from the flood till David, i. e. for about 1300 years according to the Hebrew account, and thenceforward to our own times in four hundred years, i. e. for about two thousand seven hundred years (12).

On this table Mr. Whiston makes an observation, of which we are concerned to take some notice. He says, "We thereby see that the number of years, according to the Hebrew chronology, will very naturally account for the present number of souls upon the face of the earth, and afford as many in every age preceding as any authentic accounts of ancient times do require. But if, instead of one thousand three hundred years, in the first interval, we take, with the Septuagint, above one thousand nine hundred, this addition of above six hundred years, at a time when mankind, at a mean, doubled in sixty years, will produce above a thousand times as many as this table, or the earth for certain does contain at present. So that if that longer chronology were allowed, the earth in all probability must have had many more inhabitants in the days of David, than it has in our days, contrary to the certain observations of the increase of mankind. And the like is to be said in due proportion of the Samaritan, or any other chronology, which lengthens the space since the deluge" (13).

However, Mr. Whiston having, since he wrote this, rejected the Hebrew chronology, and declared in favour of the Samaritan, it is to be presumed he has changed his opinion in this respect also, and found a way to get over the objection, though he has taken no notice of it, as it might have been expected, in a later work, where he has made a calculation of the number of inhabitants before the flood (14). We shall therefore ourselves endeavour to solve the difficulty; which we imagine may be done, by observing only, that the space of sixty years, which he takes for the mean period of mankind's doubling, from the flood to David, is much too short, and the least that can be allowed, even for the first 500 or 600 years after the flood, according to his own principles; the age of Shem himself being little more than 7 times, and that of Peleg, the 4th in descent from him, but 3 times as long as the present standard; whereas he reckons mens lives to be 6 or 7 times as long, quite down to the time of David. So that we cannot but think, that for the last 800 years at least of that interval, from the time of Abraham to David, the increase of mankind, by the table, is above twice as great as it ought to be; allowance being made for which miscalculation, we doubt not but the years added by the Samaritan Pentateuch will be thought requisite, instead of excessive.

That the reader may judge whether our objection to so much of Mr. Whiston's calculation be well grounded or not, we shall annex his own table of the ages of all the persons which are mentioned in, or can be collected from scripture, from the flood to the death of David (15).

Gen. ix. 10, 11.	Shem	-	-	-	600
12, 13.	Arphaxad	-	-	-	438
14, 15.	Salab	-	-	-	433
16, 17.	Heber	-	-	-	464
Gen.

(9) See his Short View of the Chronol. of the Old Test. p. 65.

(10) See Dr. NICHOLLS's Conference, part 1. p. 75, 76.

(11) See before, p. 108.

(12) WHISTON's Chronol. of the Old

Test. p. 65.

(13) Ibid. p. 68.

(14) See his Theory of the Earth, p. 249. and this work in the place above quoted.

(15) WHISTON's Chronol. of the Old Test. p. 10. and Theory of the Earth, p. 274.

a BUT if we follow the Samaritan computation, which allows us 300 years more in the interval between the flood and the birth of Peleg than the Hebrew, these difficulties, which are otherwise insuperable, vanish at once; and we may venture to take even the lowest calculation. According to that of the gentleman we last mentioned, the number of mankind, in the year of the flood 401, will be above 240,000; which we think may reasonably be allowed sufficient to begin the dispersion, and furnish fifty three leaders with people enough to form as many colonies.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

It is to be considered also that each of these colonies increased in proportion as they removed farther from the center of their migrations, before they arrived at the countries in which they finally settled; for the earth was not planted at once, but by degrees; so that there is the less occasion for straining to enlarge the number of mankind at the time of the dispersion, as some have done.

As to the order or method wherein these first plantations of the earth were made, some have imagined there was little or none, but that each colony settled where they did by mere chance†, every one seizing on such countries as he casually light upon‡. Yet if we attentively consider the account given of this transaction by the sacred historian, we shall find nothing more foreign to his intention, than a precipitate and confused dissipation: for first we are told, with regard to the sons of Japhet, the eldest branch of Noah's posterity, that by these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations§; in like manner c Moses concludes the account he gives us of the sons of Ham, the youngest branch of Noah's posterity, with these words: These are the sons of Ham, after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, in their nations¶; and that of the descendants of Shem ends thus: These are the sons of Shem after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after their nations‡. From which texts may well be inferred (as the learned Mede§ has observed) that this great division of the earth we are speaking of, was performed orderly, and was not a confused and irregular dispersion, wherein every one went whither he listed, and seated himself where he liked best¶.

Of the order of the first plantations.

We see a twofold order in these first plantations. First they were ranged according to their nations, and then every nation was ranked after their families; so that every d nation dwelt, and had his lot by himself, and in every nation the families also dwelt,

† HEIDECC. Hist. Patr. t. 1. Exerc. 22. § 11. ‡ HESTIÆUS Misc. apud Euseb. prep. Evang. l. 9. c. 15. § Genes. x. 5. ¶ Ibid. ver. 20. ‡ Ibid. ver. 31. § See his works, Book 1. Disc. 49 and 50. ¶ WELLS's Geog. of the Old Test. vol. 1. p. 93.

Gen. xi. 18, 19.	Phaleg - - -	239	Josh. xxiv. 29.	Josbua - - -	110
20, 21.	Reu - - -	239		Rakab about - -	135
22, 23.	Serug - - -	230		Booz about - -	125
24, 25.	Nahor - - -	148		Obed about - -	110
32.	Terah - - -	205	1 Sam. iv. 15.	Eli - - -	98
Chap. xxv. 7.	Abraham - -	175		Jesse about - -	95
xxi. 1.	Sarah - - -	127	2 Sam. xix. 32.	Barzillai above - -	80
xxxv. 28.	Isaac - - -	180	(16) Chap. v. 4.	David - - -	70
xxv. 17.	Ismael - - -	137
xlvii. 28.	Jacob - - -	147
l. 26.	Joseph - - -	110
Exod. vi. 16.	Levi - - -	137
18.	Kohath - - -	133
Job i. 1—4.	Hefron about -	133
with xlii. 16.	Job about - -	180
	Amram - - -	137
	Segub about -	137
	Izhar about -	137
	Pallu about -	137
	Jochabed about -	137
Num. xxxiii. 39.	Miriam about -	130
Deut. xxxiv. 7.	Aaron - - -	123
	Moses - - -	120
	Corah about -	125
	Dathan about -	125
	Abiram about -	125

Mr. Whiston observes from this table, that the gradual decrease of the length of mens lives did not stop, nor was the age of man reduced to the present standard of seventy or eighty years till the days of king David; and that the 90th psalm, where the lives of the Israelites seem to be stated, if it was composed by Moses, as the title informs us, had regard only to the shortening the lives of the murmurers in the wilderness (17), by a divine judgment (when all those were to perish in the space of forty years, who were grown men at the Exodus) without any respect to the common period of human life at that time. Barzillai in the days of David, is the first mentioned in scripture who was reckoned so old, as not likely to live long, at eighty years of age (18); and David himself is the first who is said to have died, and that in a good old age, and full of days (19), so soon as seventy years, which are the particular numbers mentioned in that psalm, and the standard of human life in all succeeding ages (20).

(16) See USSEB. Chronol. Sacra. c. 8 and 12; 2<sup>o</sup> Annal. A. M. 2552. (17) Numb. xiv. 29, 35. (18) 2 Sam. xix. 34. (19) 1 Chron. xxix. 28. (20) WHISTON'S Chron. of the Old Test. p. 9 and 11.
S s and

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

Of the first plantation of the earth.

and had their lots by themselves; for the true import of the before-cited texts seems to be, that the land, or peculiar lot of each family, did lie within the general lot of each nation.

THOSE who have undertaken to give an account of these first settlements of the children of Noah, have founded their conjectures chiefly on the similitude of names, a guide too deceitful to be trusted so far as it has been by some, who on emergencies have ransacked the whole world for names of people, countries, rivers, mountains and cities, which had but the least affinity with those of the planters they were at a loss to fix; others have therefore taken the precaution to lay down some rules for the more sure proceeding in this enquiry, and which we may reduce to two: 1. To suffer ourselves to be directed chiefly by scripture, not neglecting however the light which may be had from profane authors. 2. To seek for the original plantations within a reasonable compass of the earth, and in an orderly disposition; looking for the families where we find the nation; and for the nation where we find the families: and these rules, we think, may be admitted. But another, viz. that those nations whose families were named by Moses, are chiefly to be sought for in the neighbourhood of Judea, we conceive liable to too many exceptions to deserve the name of a rule: for it was plainly the design of that historian to give us an account of the original of all nations in the world, as far as he had knowledge of them; and not only of such as had to deal with the Jews, or were their neighbours.

BUT after all, this is one of those enquiries about which we ought not to be over-solicitous; for the originals of very few nations can be traced so high as the dispersion of Babel, much the greater part being subject to the utmost uncertainty. Since the first migrations of mankind, countries have often changed their names, and people their countries, without being observed by historians (D.) We may form conjectures, and please ourselves with the plausibleness of our schemes, but who can be sure that the principles on which they are built have any foundation? most of the arguments in enquiries of this nature, result from the identity or similitude of the names of people and countries; but, for ought we know, the nations we take to be very ancient, are modern in respect to the times next after the flood; and the names we suppose to have been retained by cities from antiquity, are of late original as well as themselves: perhaps also many of the names of people and countries mentioned in scripture were peculiar to the Jews, since we find them no where else. And it must be observed, that that nation, by having lost the remembrance of the greatest part of their antiquities, are become as bad guides in matters of this nature as the Greeks, who began too late to keep records for us to expect any great assistance from them.

WE shall from these considerations be the shorter in our account of this matter; which we shall begin, as the migrations of the colonies did from Shinaar; about which we find the branch of Shem placed, inclosed by that of Japhet on the north, and Ham on the south. And it is observable that, generally speaking, the nations and families in each of these great divisions took their stations according to seniority, the eldest remaining nearest the center, and the youngest removing outermost.

The countries
planted by the descendants of Shem.

SEEM may be supposed for the few years, viz. eleven, which, according to the Samaritan chronology, he lived after the dispersion of mankind, to have dwelt in Shinaar: his descendants seem to have settled from Media westward to the sea-coast of Aram, or Syria. The number of chiefs of his line concerned in the dispersion were seven, Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud and Aram, the sons of Shem; Salah, the son of Arphaxad, and Eber, the son of Salah.

Elam.

1. ELAM settled in the country of Elam, lying to the south-east of Shinaar; in the time of Daniel Susiana, or Kbuzestân, seems to have been part of it<sup>a</sup>, and before the captivity it does not appear that the Jews called Persia by any other name. Elymæ and Elymais are often mentioned by the antients: Ptolemy, though he makes Elymais a province of Media, yet he places the Elymæi (for which the maps corruptly read Eldimæi) in Susiana near the sea-coast<sup>b</sup>. Stephanus<sup>c</sup> takes it to be a part of Affyria, but Pliny<sup>d</sup> and Josephus<sup>e</sup>, more properly of Persia, whose inhabitants, this latter tells us, sprang from the Elamites<sup>f</sup>, and this seems to have been the most

<sup>a</sup> See MEDE's works, and WELLS's Geogr. of the Old Test. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> Dan. viii. 2. <sup>c</sup> Vid. Tab. 5. ALIX, & BOCHART. Phaleg. l. 2. c. 2. <sup>d</sup> De urb. voce 'Ελυμαί. <sup>e</sup> Nat. Hist. l. 6. c. 25, &c. Vid. STRAB. l. 16. <sup>f</sup> Antiq. l. 12. c. 13. <sup>g</sup> Ibid. l. 1. c. 7. See before, p. 126.

(D) Quotidie aliquid in hoc magno orbe mutatur, nova urbium fundamenta jaciuntur, nova gentium nomina, extinctis nominibus prioribus, oriuntur (21).

(21) SENEC. de consol. ad Albin.

- a easterly bounds of the posterity of Shem; for adjoining on the east was Media, supposed to be possessed by Madia, the third son of Japhet.
- 2. As Ashur was the second son of Shem, so we find his country lying next to Elam's on the west or north-west, called likewise after him Ashur, and by the Greeks Assyria, at present Curdestan, or the country of the Curds. Pezron supposes he was driven out of Shinaar by Nimrod, Ham's grandson <sup>m</sup>, which indeed seems to be the case; though it may be objected, that if he had not settled there originally, he would not have found room in that part, which must have been possessed by some other family. However that be, it was Ashur <sup>n</sup>, and not Nimrod, who went out of Shinaar into Assyria, and built Nineveh and other cities, as Perizonius has clearly
- b proved, is by that text to be understood <sup>o</sup>, and circumstances require.
- 3. ARPHAXAD is placed by some in Arrapachitis, a province of Assyria towards the north part of that country; but others settle him with his family in Chaldea, where indeed we find his descendants till the time of Abraham. And could it be proved that the Chasdim, or Chaldeans, derive their name as well as descent from that patriarch, as Josephus affirms <sup>p</sup>, there would be no doubt of this last being the true opinion. Some who make but one and the same person of Arphaxad and Cainan, who is inserted between him and Salah in the Septuagint version, suppose him to be the founder of the monarchy of China <sup>q</sup>.
- WHERE Salah, the son of Arphaxad, settled, is very uncertain; some suppose it
- c to have been in Susiana, or Kbuzestan in Persia, because they find a town there formerly called Sala; but Morocco, Spain, Phrygia, Armenia, and Hircania may claim this patriarch for their planter upon the same ground; having had each of them a town of the same name; and in Colchis we find a nation called Sale <sup>r</sup>, which seems to have the best pretensions to him of all, since he ought to be considered rather as the founder of a nation, than of a town. But as affinity of names weighs very little with us, except backed by some other proof, we shall not remove him out of Chaldea, where we suppose room enough for all his descendents in the right line till Abraham; for which reason we settle Eber also in the same country.
- 4. WE can see no more reason than Sir Walter Raleigh <sup>s</sup> why Lud, Shem's fourth
- d son, should straggle so far from his friends as Lydia, where Josephus fixes him: besides, there is a strong objection against this opinion, the Lydians having been first called Mæones, as all the antients agree, and Lydians from Lydus, the son of Alys <sup>t</sup>; except we suppose the Greeks were deceived, and at the name of Mæones ceasing, they resumed their old name of Lydians, which often has happened. But even in that case we ought perhaps to consider Lydia as possessed by the Ludim, or posterity of Lud, on a second or third remove, and to look for his first settlement nearer his brothers; but here the very similitude of names, which are generally upon these occasions ready at hand to help out at a dead lift, seem to fail us.
- 5. MESOPOTAMIA and Syria, comprehending the countries westward of Assyria
- e as far as the mediterranean sea, seem wholly (if we except Phanicia and Palestine) to have fallen to the share of Aram, Shem's fifth and youngest son, whose name is given both to the whole and the several regions thereof in scripture.
- WITHIN or bordering on this country of Aram, it is likely the four sons of Aram settled. It is generally agreed that Uz the eldest built Damascus, and gave name to the country about that city <sup>u</sup>, which seems to be different from the land of Uz, where Job dwelt, lying towards Edom. 2. Bochart supposes Hul to have settled in Cholobetene, a part of the greater Armenia, where he finds several places whose names begin with Chol or Col <sup>v</sup>. 3. Gether, according to Josephus, was prince of the Bactrians <sup>w</sup>, but Bactria lay out of Shem's lot, as well as too far for the first plantation; and if we allow him a seat about the river Centrites, between Armenia and the Carduchi, it is not that we think there is the least affinity in the two names to induce us to it, as Bochart does. 4. Mash or Mishek, Aram's fourth son, is supposed to fix in Armenia about the mountain Masius, the same with that commonly held to be Ararat, and called by the Armenians, Masis. The people who dwelt near this mountain are by Stephanus named Masieni. Bochart <sup>x</sup> refutes the notion of Josephus <sup>y</sup>, who derives the Mefanzans near the mouth of the Tigris from them, not considering that they took their name from their situation between the rivers. However, the Arme-

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.
Athur.

Arphaxad.

Silah

Eber.
Lud.

Aram.

Uz.

Hul.

Gether.

Mash.

<sup>m</sup> Antiquite des tems retable, p. 148.

<sup>n</sup> Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7. See before, p. 127. 1.

<sup>p</sup> Vid. PLIN. Hist. Nat. lib. 6. c. 4.

lib. 13. PLINIUS, lib. 5. cap. 29.

cap. 7. <sup>q</sup> Phaleg. lib. 2. cap. 9.

<sup>r</sup> Genes. x. 11.

<sup>s</sup> Vid. BOLDUC. de eccles. ante leg. lib. 2. cap. 2.

<sup>t</sup> Book 1. cap. 8. § 15.

<sup>u</sup> BOCHART. Geog. Sacr. lib. 2. cap. 8.

<sup>v</sup> JOSEPH. ubi supr.

<sup>w</sup> Orig. Babylon. cap. 4.

<sup>x</sup> HEROD. lib. 1. STRABO,

JOSEPH. lib. 1.

<sup>y</sup> Ubi supr.

<sup>z</sup> Ubi supr.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597:
The nations descended from Ham.

nians themselves do not lay claim to any of Shem's line as their progenitor, but say <sup>a</sup> they are descended from Togarmah of Japhet's posterity, as will be seen by and by.

HAM probably removed from Shinaar. Supposing him to be the Cronus of Sanchoniatho <sup>a</sup>, he reigned in Phœnicia. According to others, who make him to be the same with Menes, he must have settled in Egypt <sup>b</sup>, which indeed in scripture is often called the land of Ham; and some from the similitude of Ammon, and other words of the like sound, would infer that he at least dwelt there for some time; but nothing can be concluded from such weak evidence.

Cush.

1. CUSH, his eldest son, according to Josephus and the antients, was the father of the Ethiopiæans, who, he says, were in his time called Cushæans, not only by themselves, but all Asia over <sup>c</sup>. But it is not likely that if Mizraim and Canaan settled themselves <sup>b</sup> in the lands betwixt him and Shinaar, that his son Nimrod would be found erecting a monarchy so early in that country. It is more probable that he seated himself in the south-eastern part of Babylonia, and in the adjoining part of Susiana still called Khu-zestan, or the country of Chuz; from whence his posterity in the succeeding generations might have passed into other countries. That a part of Arabia near the Red-sea was named Cush, appears from scripture. Cushan and Midian are joined together as the same or neighbouring people, dwelling in tents <sup>d</sup>; and in another place <sup>e</sup> the Arabs are made to border on the Cushites, which therefore cannot be the Ethiopiæans; to which may be added other scriptural proofs <sup>f</sup>; in a word, by Cush in scripture is always to be understood Arabia. As for those texts that are alledged to prove Cush <sup>c</sup> is sometimes taken for Ethiopia, they may also be expounded of Arabia <sup>g</sup>. Cush, according to the Arab and Persian traditions, which name him Cutha, was king of the territory of Babel, and resided in Erak <sup>h</sup>, where there were two cities of his name <sup>i</sup>; from whence, among other reasons, Dr. Hyde is of opinion, that Cush reigned in Babylonia, and that his descendants removed into Arabia <sup>k</sup>, though it is hard to fix the quarters of any of them; which has given occasion to those who suppose Cush to be Ethiopia, to spread them all along the coast of Africa to the end of Mauritania <sup>l</sup>.

Seba.

Havilah.

Sabrah.

Raamah.

Sheba and Dedan.

Sabtecha.

Those who place them in Arabia are divided about their situations. To follow therefore the rules we have laid down, we will suppose, 1. That Seba seated himself somewhere in the south of Chaldea or the Arabian Erak; because, 2. His second brother Havilah's country lay thereabouts, watered by the Pison, as we have formerly observed. 3. Sabrah's seat perhaps lay more to the south, where we find a city called Saphika by Ptolemy, not far from the Persian gulph, and another named Sabatba, lower down in Arabia Felix, which comes much nearer Sabrah. 4. Raamah or Rhegma may find a place more south-ward still, about a city called Rhegama by Ptolemy, on the same gulph. Some moderns mention a city not far from it called Dadan <sup>m</sup>, which Dr. Wells does not doubt was the residence of his son Dedan <sup>n</sup>. Though others will have Raamah and both his sons, Sheba as well as Dedan, to people the parts adjacent to the Red-sea <sup>o</sup>. They conclude Dedan to have been near Edom, because Ezekiel joins them together <sup>p</sup>; as Raamah must <sup>q</sup> have been near Sheba, being mentioned as joint-traders to Tyre in spices by the same prophet <sup>r</sup>; and elsewhere <sup>s</sup> Sheba and Seba are joined as neighbours, though distinguished as different kingdoms: they seem to have possessed a larger part of Arabia, for Pliny observes that the Sabæan nations inhabited from sea to sea, that is, from the Arabian to the Persian gulph. A late writer supposes Sheba lived on the borders of the land of Midian, and gave name to the country whose queen in after-ages went to visit Solomon <sup>t</sup>. But the Arabs say the country of Sheba lies a great way more to the south in Yaman, or, as we call it, Arabia Felix, near the Indian sea; the chief city of which was formerly Saba, now called Mareb <sup>u</sup>, and founded, according to their tradition, by a descendant of Jostan or Kaktan. And it must be confessed this seems to be the country of Sheba, mentioned in scripture, for the frankincense grows thereabouts. 5. Sabtecha has puzzled all the geographers to assign his quarters. Bochart <sup>v</sup> not finding a place in Arabia which bore any resemblance to the name, passes over to Carmania in Persia, and presses the city Samydace into the service, observing that the M and B are often changed the one for the other by the Arabs and their neighbours. On

<sup>a</sup> CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 111. <sup>b</sup> MARSHAM Chron. Canon. p. 18, 23. <sup>c</sup> Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7.
<sup>d</sup> Habak. iii. 7. <sup>e</sup> 2 Chron. xxi. 16. <sup>f</sup> Ezek. xxix. 10. 2 Kings xix. 9. 2 Chron. xiv. 9. <sup>g</sup> Ifi.
xviii. 1. Zeph. iii. 10. 2 Chron. xii. 3. Jerem. xiii. 23. <sup>h</sup> ALTABARI in cap. de morte SARR, apud HYDE de Relig. Ver. Pers. p. 40. <sup>i</sup> HYDE, ibid. p. 80, &c. <sup>j</sup> Idem ibid. p. 39, 40. <sup>k</sup> Vid. BO-
CHART Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 3. <sup>l</sup> ORTELIIUS, ONOARDUS BARROZA, nella descriz. di Ormuz. <sup>m</sup> Geog.
of the Old Test. vol. 1. p. 197. <sup>n</sup> SHUCKFORD's Connect. of the sacred and profane Hist. vol. 1. p. 173.
<sup>o</sup> Ezek. xxv. 13. <sup>p</sup> Ibid. xxvii. 22. <sup>q</sup> Psalm lxxii. 10. <sup>r</sup> SHUCKFORD ubi supr. <sup>s</sup> Geog. Nub. p. 16 and 52. POCOCK. Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 57. D'HERB. Bibl. Orient. Art. Saba. <sup>t</sup> Geog. Sacr.
lib. 4. cap. 4.

a the other hand, Dr. Wells * imagines that the Saraceni are the descendants of Saltecha, which nation being stiled at first by the Greeks Saltaceni, that name was afterwards softened into Saraceni; and the rather, he thinks, because alluding to the Arabic verb saraka, to steal, it served for a nick-name. Though indeed the word Saraceni is no other than Sharkiin, which in Arabic signifies Easterlings; as the African Arabs west of Egypt, are called Mogrebins or Westerlings. For our parts, being afraid to meddle in a point of so much uncertainty, we think it the safest way to pass this person by, and proceed 6. To his brother Nimrod, who it is agreed kept possession of Shinar, Nimrod. and erected a kingdom there, making Babel the seat of his empire †.

2. MIZRAIM stands in the place of the second son of Ham; for there is a great Mizraim. dispute, whether this is the name of a single person or of a people, as having a dual termination; though the verb in the text, where he is said to beget Ludim, is in the singular number, which favours the former opinion. However that be, it is plain that the names of Ludim and all the rest of his descendants are plurals, by what we read of the Caphtorim, namely, that they came forth out of Caphtor ‡. Nor do we see any harm in that opinion, which supposes them branches of a large body of people denoted by the name Mizraim, which divided between them the country called after their name by the Hebrews and other eastern people §.

As to the nations descended from Mizraim: 1. The Ludim are judged to be the people above Egypt, called by the Greeks *Ethiopian*s, and at present *Abyssin*s. Bochart endeavours to prove it by no less than ten arguments †. We rarely find them called otherwise in scripture than Lud, either from the name of their founder or their country. In one passage of scripture Lud are called a mixt people ‡: in others § they are said to be very skilful in drawing the bow, which the *Ethiopian*s were famous for; and in two of the abovementioned passages †, Lud is joined with Cush and Phut, as are the Lubims elsewhere with the Egyptians ‡; from whence it may be inferred they were all neighbouring people. 2. The Ananim are thought by Bochart to be the Ammonians, or inhabitants of that part of Lybia where stood the temple of Jupiter Ammon †, descended, according to Herodotus, partly from the Egyptians, and partly from the *Ethiopian*s. 3. The Lehabim are supposed to be the same with the Lubim, who with the Sukkims and Cushites came out of Mizraim or Egypt, with Shishak, to invade Judea †: these therefore may not improbably be judged to be the Lybians of *Cyrenai*ca or proper Lybia, near Egypt. 4. The Naphtubim are thought to have settled in Marmarica, adjoining to *Cyrenai*ca †. It is observed, that the Egyptians called all the skirts of a country and promontories washed by the sea, Nephtys; and Bochart places the Naphtubim rather on the coast of the Mediterranean than on that of the Red-sea, because the Troglodites and Ichthyophagi, who are the inhabitants of the latter, are in the scripture called Zyrim and Sukkim †. Some place the Naphtubim about Neph or Memphis, in Egypt †. 5. Pathrusim are evidently the inhabitants of Pathros, which some wrongly take for Pelusium; others, more justly, for Thebais or the upper Egypt, which is distinguished from the lower Egypt in profane history as well as sacred †. Ezekiel † mentions it by itself; and Isaiah † distinguishes it from Egypt; but from Jeremiah the country of Pathros appears either to be a part of that kingdom, or adjoining to it, being mentioned with Mizdol, Tahpanhes, and Noph †, which are known to be cities or districts of Egypt. 6. The Cassubim are supposed to have settled somewhere towards the entrance of Egypt, about mount Cassius, in that part of the lower Egypt called Cassotis by Ptolemy and others, which places it is thought retain some likeness of the name; but without relying on that argument, they appear to have been planted near the Caphtorim, because the Philistim, as it seems, were descended from both these people †, and consequently in Egypt. Bochart, misled by following the Jewish notion about Caphtor, fancies them to be the inhabitants of Colubis †, at present called Mingreha. As for the Philistim, who in the Mosaic account of the dispersion are derived from the Cassubim †, we shall consider their original settlement in Egypt before they removed into Canaan, when we come to their particular history. 7. Caphtorim, the last of the offspring of Mizraim, are, as Bochart † observes, by all the fathers said to be the Cappadocians, and Caphtor Cappadocia; as the Septuagint have also rendered it †. In this doubtless they follow the Jews, who explain those names the same way, as do the three Chaldee pa-* Geog. of the Old Test. vol. I. p. 198. † See p. 121. ‡ Deut. ii. 23. § Jost phus Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7. † Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 26. ‡ Ezek. xxx. 5. † Isaiah lxvi. 19. Jerem. xlii. 9. ‡ Ezek. xxx. 5. Jerem. lvi. 9. † 2 Chron. xii. 3. ‡ Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 20. † 2 Chron. xii. 3. ‡ Bochart Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 29. † Ibid. † Isaiah xix. 13. † Vid. Bochart Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 37. † Chap. xiv. ver. 14. † Chap. xi. ver. 11. † Chap. xiv. ver. 1. † Compare Gen. x. 13. with Deut. ii. 23. Jerem. xlvii. 4. and Amos ix. 7. † Bochart Phaleg. lib. 4. cap. 31. † Gen. x. 13. † Lib. 4. cap. 33. † Deut. ii. 23.

Year of the Flood, 421.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

raphraſts. But by Cappadocia in theſe writings, is not to be underſtood Cappadocia in a Aſia minor, as Bochart, and perhaps the reſt, judged; but ſome place in Egypt, generally ſuppoſed by the Rabins to be Demyat <sup>1</sup> or Damietta, commonly confounded with Peluſium. One would be inclined to think the Caphtorim derived from Coptus, a noted city of the ſame country (which by many is ſuppoſed to have taken its name from thence) were it not that Caphtor appears to have been an iſland <sup>2</sup>, and more probably ſituate either in the lake of Tennis, or Tanis, which extends from Damietta to Tina, the true Peluſium, or in the Arabic gulf, rather than Crete, as will be obſerved hereafter.

Phut.

3. AUTHORS are not agreed about the country where Phut the third ſon of Ham planted himſelf. Bochart endeavours to prove that Mizraim and he divided Africa between them <sup>3</sup>: what is moſt to the purpoſe is taken from St. Jerom, who affirms Phut to be Libya, and that in his time there was a river in Mauritania, with the adjacent region, named from him Phut <sup>4</sup>. But to this it may be objected, that Ezekiel <sup>5</sup> mentions Phut with Cuſh and Perrya as auxiliaries to the northern enemies of the Jews, and in the army of Gog; and we find Cuſh, Lud, and Phut among the nations, who, according to Jeremiab's prophecy, were to over-run Egypt <sup>6</sup>, as Nebuchadnezzar afterwards did; which looks as if Phut's quarters lay ſomewhere between Cuſh and Babylon. However, in points ſo uncertain, we will not preſume to determine any thing.

Canaan.

4. WE are not ſo much to ſeek for the parts planted by Canaan and his poſterity, viz. Sidon, Heth, the Jebuſites, Amorites, Girgaſhites, Hivites, Arkites, Sinites, Arvadites, Zemarites and Hamathites; of whom we ſhall ſpeak more particularly when we come to treat of Phœnicia, and the land of Canaan, where they undoubtedly ſettled.

The countries
planted by the deſcendants of Japhet.

THE ſcripture leaves us as much in the dark, as to the country where Japhet ſettled, as it does with regard to the particular reſidence of his brothers. All we can collect upon this occaſion is, that he retired from Sbinaar with his deſcendants, and ſettled among them to the north of the countries planted by the children of Shem. Some imagine him, from the affinity of names, to be the Japetus of the Greeks <sup>7</sup>; but there is no likelihood of his having ever been known to them, or that their traditions reach ſo high as this ſon of Noah by many ages.

Gomer.

1. GOMER the eldeſt ſon of Japhet, according to Joſephus, was the father of the Gomerites, called by the Greeks Galatians <sup>8</sup>, who were the Gauls of Aſia minor, inhabiting part of Phrygia. Of this opinion is Bochart <sup>9</sup>; and if it be right, thoſe who derive the Cimmerians or Cimbri from Gomer, have ſome grounds for it, the Cimmerians ſeeming to be the ſame people with the Gauls or Celts under a different name; and it is obſervable that the Welſh, who are deſcended from the Gauls, ſtill call themſelves Kimbro or Cymro, and Cumeri. Be that as it will, the Chaldee paraphraſts muſt be out in placing Gomer in Africa, ſince it is plain from Ezekiel <sup>10</sup> that his country lay northward of Judea; and that it lay alſo to the weſt or north-weſt of Madia or Media, may alſo be gathered from that prophet's making the houſe of Togarmah (one of Gomer's ſons, and conſequently, according to our rules, ſettled in his father's lot or borders) trading to Tyre and Syria; which could not well be, in caſe they had been ſituated beyond Media, through which it is not likely they would have been ſuffered to paſs. We may therefore let Gomer reſt where the learned Bochart ſettles him, viz. in Phrygia <sup>11</sup>, without ſtraining to make that word to be the Greek tranſlation of his name.

Aſſkenaz.

THE plantations of Gomer's ſons may, not without ſome ground, be preſumed to be thereabouts. 1. Aſſkenaz, as it ſeems, ſhould be ſeated near Armenia <sup>12</sup>, in the eaſtern part of Aſia minor; for the ſcripture, among the nations which were to be called by the Medes under Cyrus to deſtroy Babylon, mentions Avart, Minni, and Aſſkenaz: but if regard be had to the footſteps found of the name, the country which he planted ſeems to have been in the north-weſt part of that continent; for in Bitbynia there was the Arcaſian <sup>13</sup> lake, and a river called Aſcanius, with a bay of the ſame name; and there was alſo antiently a city named Aſcania in leſſer Phrygia or Troas, with iſles on the coaſt called the Aſcanian iſlands: and it is obſerved that beſides Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas, Homer mentions a king of that name, who was at the ſiege of Troy. And to prove that the Aſſkenaz mention'd by Jeremiab were the people of theſe parts, it is ſhewn out of Xenophon <sup>14</sup>, that Hæſtaſpes having conquered Phrygia that lies on the Helleſpont, brought thence many of the horſe and other ſoldiers which Cyrus carried with him to the ſiege of Babylon. In a word, the Pontus Euxinus or Asinus, as it was firſt called by

<sup>1</sup> RABBI SAAIDAS, & MAIMONIDES apud Lightfoot. oper. tom. 2. p. 398.

<sup>2</sup> Phaleg. l. 4. cap. 33.

<sup>3</sup> HYFRONYM in tradit. Hebr.

<sup>4</sup> Chap. xxxviii. 5.

<sup>5</sup> Jerem. xlvii. 4.

<sup>6</sup> Chap. xli. 9.

<sup>7</sup> BOCHART Phaleg. l. 3. c. 1.

<sup>8</sup> Antiq. l. 1. c. 7.

<sup>9</sup> Phaleg. l. 3. c. 10.

<sup>10</sup> Chap. 48. 6.

<sup>11</sup> In loco ſuperius citat.

<sup>12</sup> Jeremiab li. 27.

<sup>13</sup> Cyropæd. l. 7.

- a the Greeks, is supposed to be a corruption for the sea of Ashkenaz <sup>1</sup>. 2. Because Riphab Year of the probably settled near his brother Ashkenaz, we may admit the testimony of Josephus, Flood, 401. not always to be depended on, who says the Paphlagemans were originally called Ripba- Year before theaus from Ripba <sup>2</sup>. Bochart finds the river Rhebas, Rhebaus, or Rhebanus near Christ, 1697. Paphlagonia <sup>3</sup>; Stephanus mentions not only the river but also a region of the same Riphab name, whose inhabitants were called Rhebei; and Pliny places here a people called Riphet, which comes nearer the name of Riphab. 3. Togarmah the last son of Gomer Togarmah was probably seated to the east of Riphab; some think to the north of Armenia, among the Iberians, others in Cappadocia and Galatia; which opinions are not out of the way, since these countries lie contiguous to those of the rest of Gomer's family, and are situate conformable <sup>4</sup> to that expression of the prophet, Gomer and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters and all his bands <sup>5</sup>; which seems to be spoken of their situation with respect to Judea. Turcommania, where many have placed this colony, seems too remote, because they are said to have traded to the fairs of Tyre <sup>6</sup>; and what they brought hither, viz. horses, horsemen and mules, confirms their settling in or about Cappadocia; for that country produced excellent horses and mules, which last are supposed to have come first from thence, and was famous for good horsemen, as is attested by several of the ancient profane historians <sup>7</sup>. Besides, in the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia, we find a people called Trocmi <sup>8</sup>, Trogmi or Trocmeni, as Stephanus calls them. In the council of Chalcedon c they are called Trocmades or Trogmades, which names have an affinity with Togarmah, or as the Greeks usually write it, Thorgama.

BUT after all, the Armenians give themselves out to be descended from Togarmah (whom they make the son of Tiras the son of Gomer) by his son Haik, from whom they and their country from all antiquity have born the name of Haikb. They say also that the name of Armenia, made use of by other nations, is derived from Aram, the seventh in descent from Haikb, who much enlarged the bounds of his kingdom on all sides <sup>9</sup>: the Armenians had also numerous breeds of excellent horses, which they paid to Cyrus instead of tribute <sup>10</sup>; and many of those creatures, as a learned author assures us, from the testimony of credible natives, are still bred there for the use of the kings d of Persia, and for presents to them from the governor. Upon these considerations we must leave Armenia to the descendants of Togarmah, or Thurgumai, as they call him.

2. WE come now to Magog the second son of Japhet, with regard to whose settlement the learned have many different and confused opinions; Josephus, Jerom, and most of the fathers held them to be the Scythians about mount Caucasus, which name Bochart supposes was made by the Greeks out of Gog hasan, signifying Gog's fort in Chaldec, a dialect of which he imagines to have been in the language of the Colchi and Armenians <sup>1</sup>; but perhaps it is rather a wrong pronunciation of Cub Kaf, which in Persian signifies the mountain of Kaf, as the Arabs also call it: that his plantation adjoined upon those of Meshech and Tubal appears from Ezekiel's <sup>2</sup> making Gog, king of Magog, to e reign over the other two. And it is thought we should come nearer still to a discovery of his quarters, if those words, the chief prince, or (as it is in our marginal translation) the prince of the chief of Meshech and Tubal <sup>3</sup>, be rendered, according to the Septuagint, the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal, because in the isthmus or neck of land between the Euxine and Caspian seas there formerly dwelt two sorts of people; the one called Rhossi, on the river Cyrus, as Joseph ben Gorion has it, or rather on the Ros, Ras, or Aras, called by the Greeks Araxes; the other called Moschici, inhabiting a long chain of mountains, stretching, according to Ptolemy, along the northwest part of Armenia, and separating it from Colchis and Iberia. From which two people, migrating or driven over Caucasus, it is supposed the Russians and Muscovites are descended.

f BOCHART also thinks the name of Magog is preserved in a country of these parts called Gogarene <sup>4</sup>, according to Strabo and Stephanus; for Gog and Magog seem to be the same name, the m not being a radical letter. But we cannot strain the matter so far as to suppose the name of Georgia, a well known country in this quarter, derived thence; much less that the Palus Meotis, and Comagene in Syria, draw their names from Magog <sup>5</sup>, through such a distorted course of changes, as to repeat them would put one quite out of conceit with etymologies.

THE Arabs, who have borrowed the best part of their religion from the Jews, are acquainted with Gog and Magog, whom they call Tajuj and Majuj, and make them to

<sup>1</sup> BOCHART Phaleg. l. 3. c. 9.

<sup>2</sup> JOSEPHUS Antiq. l. 1. c. 7.

<sup>3</sup> BOCHART ubi supr. c. 10.

<sup>4</sup> Idem, ibid.

<sup>5</sup> Ezek. xxxviii. 6.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid. xxvii. 14.

<sup>7</sup> Vid. BOCHART ubi supr.

<sup>8</sup> PROL.

STRAB. l. 12. CICERO de divin. l. 2. &c.

<sup>9</sup> MOSES CHORENENS. Hist. Armen. l. 1. c. 4.

<sup>10</sup> XENOPH.

<sup>11</sup> SCHROEDER Dissertat. de ling. Armen. p. 30.

<sup>12</sup> BOCHART Phaleg. l. 3. c. 13.

<sup>13</sup> Chap. xxxviii. 2.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid.

<sup>15</sup> BOCHART ubi supr.

<sup>16</sup> Geog. of the Old Testament, vol. I. p. 164.

inhabit

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

inhabit the mountain of Kaf or Caucasus, but remove them at a great distance to a the farther end of Tartary towards the north or north-east *.

WE are inclined to think the parts above mentioned, between the Euxine and Caspian seas, are most likely to be those in which Magog settled; however we can by no means omit this occasion of taking notice of an error which many of the modern writers have fallen into, who place Magog in Syria. Bochart's great judgment would not suffer him wholly to come into it, however he supposes Magog himself gave his name to a town there †. Dr. Wills more cautiously suggests that the name was long after taken from the Scythians when they made an excursion into Syria and took the city, as Bethsan in Judea was also called after them Scythopolis ‡. But Mr. Shuckford fixes Magog himself there, with Gomer, Tubal, Togarmah, and Meshech about him §. What gave rise to this opinion, is a passage in Pliny ¶, where he observes that Bambyce, otherwise Hierapolis, is called by the Syrians Magog †; but this proves to be a palpable mistake of the transcriber, who has written Magog instead of Mahog, as has been observed by Dr. Hyde, who wonders no body had corrected that error in Pliny *. Affemani has taken notice of it since †; yet it still remains uncorrected in Hardouin's last pompous edition of that author.

Madai

3. IT is generally agreed that Madai planted Media, and the Medes are always called by this name in scripture *. To this a learned author †, who makes Macedonia the settlement of Madai, objects, 1. That the Madai or Medes are not mentioned in scripture till the latter ages; but it may be answered that the Jews always retained the name, and it is plain they made use of it as soon as they had occasion. 2. That this situation removes Madai too far from the rest of his brethren, and takes him out of their general lot, which were the isles of the Gentiles, to put him into that of Skem. But according to our hypothesis, their plantations hitherto have been contiguous, for the western Media was bounded on the north by the river Ros, or Aras; to which, as we have observed above, the dominion of Magog extended; and perhaps those words, by these were the isles of the Gentiles divided ‡, relate only to Javan and his sons, and not to Gomer and his sons, or to a future plantation; the passages in scripture where these last are mentioned requiring a sense which places them on the continent. 3. Several authorities are produced by this writer to shew there were a people in Macedonia § called Medi or Medi, and a tract called the Medic region in the borders of Pæonia; but even supposing them some later colony of Madai, which is the most that can be allowed, we cannot see how it tends to prove that Macedonia is compounded of Madai and Cetim or Kittim, any more than the Æmatbia, the ancient name of Macedonia, comes from Madai, upon the bare authority of a forced etymology.

Javan:

4. JAVAN may probably be supposed to have settled first near his brothers in the south-west part of the lesser Asia, about Ionia, which contains the radical letters of his name.

Elisba.

HIS four children may find places correspondent with their names in the same parts. 1. The Æoles, who inhabited Æolia to the north of Ionia, are by Josephus made to descend from Elisba, Javan's eldest son; but there is a greater appearance of his name in Hellas, the ancient name of Greece; the isles of which seem to be those called the isles of Elisba by Ezekiel, and most probably supplied Tyre with the purple and blue, † wherewith, as Bochart proves at large, the coast of Peloponnesus and the adjacent islands abounded ‡. Peloponnesus, which may be well comprehended among the isles, as being almost one, contained moreover a city and province, by the name of Elis; and in Attica there was the city Eleusis, and the river Elissus or Ilissus.

Tarsish.

2. Tarsish, according to Josephus, gave name not only to Tarsus but to all Cilicia, of which it was the capital †: it seems also to have been the Tarsish to which Jonas thought to flee from the presence of the Lord ‡, as well as that also mentioned so often by the prophets, on account of its trading with Tyre §. 3. To the west of Tarsish it is supposed Kittim first planted. Homer mentions a people in those parts called Ceti † (from the river Cetius) which is the word by which the Septuagint have rendered Kittim. In Ptolemy we find two provinces in the western parts of Cilicia, one maritime called Cetis, the other towards the mountains called Citis. Josephus will have the island of Cyprus to be the seat of the Kittim, and the town called Citium which belongs to it, to have taken its name from them †; but in the apocrypha Macedonia is plainly denoted

Kittim:

* See D'HERBELOI Bibl. Orient. Art. Jagiouge & Magioug, p. 470. & Geog. Nubiens, p. 247, 267.

† Phaleg. l. 1. c. 2. & l. 3. c. 13.

‡ Geogr. of the Old Test. ubi sup.

§ Connect. of the §  sacred and profane hist. vol. I. p. 152.

¶ Hist. Natur. l. 5. c. 23.

¶ In Notis ad Peritfol. Itiner. p. 42.

¶ Bibliotheca Oriental. vol. II. Dissert. de Monophysi ad voc. Mabug.

¶ Dan. v. 28. Ibid.

¶ vi. 8, 12, 15. Ibid. viii. 20. Elisb. i. 3, 14, 18, 19. Ibid. x. 2. † See MENDI's Works. § Gen. x. 5.

¶ Chap. viii. 7.

¶ Phaleg. l. 3. c. 4.

¶ Antiq. l. 1. c. 7.

¶ Jonas i. 3. ¶ Isa. xxiii. 1, 14. Ibid.

ix. 19. Ezek. xxvii. 12, 25. Ibid. xxxviii. 13. ¶ Odyss. 11. ver. 520. Vid. Strab. l. 13. ¶ Antiq. l. c. 7.

- a by the land of Chetium, Alexander being mentioned as coming from thence<sup>p</sup>, and Perseus, king of Macedonia, is called king of the Cittim<sup>q</sup>. Nor do we see any thing amiss in supposing that country to be the original plantation of the Kittim, at least in the intention of Moses, since it comes under the general denomination of the isles which were to be the portion of Japhet, at least of the posterity of Javan; and their brother Elisha has been already placed in that neighbourhood. 4. It is not so easy to find a place for Dodanim, the youngest of the sons, or rather of the descendants of Javan, except we admit the change of the D into R, (which letters in the Hebrew are scarcely to be distinguished) and call him Rodanim, as the Septuagint have done, in order to settle the island of Rhodes upon him; which, for ought we know, is not a worse shift than to extract the name of Doris, and the Dorians, in Peloponnesus, from Dodanim.

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before Christ, 2597.

Dodanim.

- b As to 5. Tubal, and 6. Meshech, we have already shewn, under the article of Magog, that their lots lay contiguous to his; as may be gathered from the two places of Ezekiel there mentioned<sup>r</sup>; and that is enough, without distorting names of countries in order to provide them settlements in spite of all the rules of etymology. And, 7. That we may shorten this account, which the uncertainty of our evidence has made tedious, we shall in the last place allow Tiras, according to Josephus<sup>s</sup> and the general opinion, to have led his colony into Thrace.

Tubal and Meshech.

Tiras.

- Thus we have given an account of the nations concerned in the first dispersion of mankind, by which it does not appear that they migrated eastward beyond Media, northward beyond the mountains of Caucasus, southward beyond Ethiopia or Habashia, or westward beyond a part of Lybia and Greece, including Macedonia; tho' it is most probable the more distant parts were not planted immediately by these first colonies, but by their posterity afterwards.

It is not our design here to enter into a long detail of future migrations, in order to shew by what degrees, and in what manner the several parts of the world came to be inhabited, as some with more labour than success have attempted to do; but shall reserve what may be gathered from ancient writers in relation thereto, when we enquire into the original of each particular country.

No tracing the original of most nations.

- HOWEVER, we are obliged to say something with reference to the descendants of Joktan; who, if they were not concerned in the first dispersion, seem to have begun their migration sometime within Peleg's life; with regard to which patriarch we shall only observe here, that it is not probable the Pelasgians of Greece and Italy derive their original from him, as some imagine<sup>t</sup>; but it rather appears from scripture, that both he and his posterity remained in Chaldea, within the lot of their great ancestor Arphaxad, till Terah the father of Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees to remove into the land of Canaan.

The countries possessed by the descendants of Joktan in a second migration.

- MOSES* assigns the habitation of Joktan's sons to have been from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east<sup>v</sup>. The want of knowing the situation of these places hath run authors into strange mistakes. Some suppose Mesha to be mount Majus, or Ararat in Armenia (but it seems rather to be a city) and look for mount Sephar beyond Media toward India. Jerom, after Josephus, would have both Mesha and Sephar to be in the East-Indies. In short, the antients have generally peopled all the eastern parts of Asia beyond Media with these sons of Joktan; which is so inconsistent that Bochart might well wonder so many of the moderns have been led by them<sup>x</sup>; and yet some have done worse, and peopled America immediately by Joktan, from whom Arias Montanus imagined the province of Jucatan took its name; and the same author judges mount Sephar to be the Andes, mountains of Peru.

- In all probability the places in question are to be looked for in Arabia; but we cannot agree in opinion with Bochart<sup>y</sup>, that Mesha is Muxa (supposed to be Mekka, a noted port in the Arabian gulf) and Sephar the city Sapphar<sup>z</sup>, any more than with the Arab paraphrasts, that they are Mecca and Medinah. We should chuse out of these two conjectures to form a third, and suppose Mesha and Sephar to be Mecca and Sapphar, or rather (if the Mosaic description would agree with it) Dhagar, a port in the middle of that coast of Arabia washed by the Indian sea, which would take in all the country lying beyond that of Cush, and which the Arabs allow to have been possessed by the posterity of Yarab, the son of Kabtan, or Joktan<sup>a</sup>. We do not indeed find Yarab among the sons of Joktan mentioned by Moses; but it is no difficult matter to set him there by a change of the b in Jerab (the fourth son) into b.

<sup>p</sup> 1 MAC. i. 1.

<sup>q</sup> Ibid. viii. 5.

<sup>r</sup> Chap. xxvii. 13. chap. xxxviii. 2, 3.

<sup>s</sup> Ubi sup.

<sup>t</sup> See CUMBERL. on Sancho. p. 268.

<sup>v</sup> Gen. x. 30.

<sup>x</sup> Phaleg. l. 2. c. 14.

<sup>y</sup> Ibid.

<sup>z</sup> l. 2. c. 30.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. PROL. Tab. 6. ASIE.

<sup>a</sup> Mohammed ebn Yacub Shirazi apud GARR.

SIONIT. de urb. Orient. c. 1. Vid. D'HERBELOT. Bibl. Orient. Art. Saba.

Year of the
Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.

Hazarmaveth.
Jerah.
Hadoram.
Uzal.

Diklah.

Obal.

Abimael.

Sheba.

Ophir.

Havilah.

WE meet with no good signs of the settlement of Almodad and Skeleph, the two first sons of Joktan; but the name of the third, Hazarmaveth, or as it is better written in the vulgat, Hafarmoth, is plainly found in Hadbramaut, a province of Taman or Arabia Felix; both having the same radicals, and signifying the court or country of death. 4. Bochart discovers the name of Jerah in the island Hieracon (or of hawks) in the Arabian gulf, and a town so called within land on the river Lar, near the Omanitæ; and, 5. That of Hadoram in the Drimati of Pliny, towards the Persian gulf<sup>b</sup>. 6. Uzal is the name given to Sanaa, the capital of Taman, by the Jews who dwelt there<sup>c</sup>; and it appears from Pliny to be the same city<sup>d</sup>; its port was Ocela, or Ochis, as Ptolemy calls it, which also bears some resemblance to the name. 7. Diklah, signifying in the Chaldean or Syriac, a palm-tree, or a country stored with palms, may have choice of seats in Arabia. 8. It is with reluctance that we must cross the sea with Obal from the Arabia to the Avahitic port<sup>e</sup> in the Avahitic or Abahitic bay, on the coast of Africa, just without the straits of Bab-al-mandab<sup>f</sup>, for want of a place in Arabia bearing some likeness to his name to settle him in. It is true there is a town called Obollab, towards Basrah, which might serve the turn, if that part had not been already disposed of by us to the family of Ham. Some may think the uncertainty of its antiquity might be another objection against Obollab; but that would be perhaps to call all that we have already done about the migrations in question. 9. We might be obliged to look for a seat on the same coast for Abimael, if Theophrastus<sup>g</sup> did not luckily furnish us with the name of a place in the aromatic quarters of Arabia, called Mali. It is true, other authors seem to write Minci instead of it; and Ptolemy mentions the Minci and Manitæ, but no Mali: but the authority of Theophrastus must go against them all, since it makes for our purpose. This is a rule which has the sanction of most authors who have wrote on this subject. 10. Sheba will not have the same difficulty with the rest of his brethren to find a place in Arabia. Pliny says, the Sabaean nations extended themselves from one sea to the other; that is, from the Arabian to the Persian gulf. Indeed there wants no proof of a people of this name possessing a large share of the south parts of Arabia, most authors mentioning them as very numerous, and their country excellent<sup>h</sup>, but they seem to differ in the name of their chief city; for some call it Saba<sup>i</sup>, others Mariaba, or Maraba<sup>k</sup>. However that causes no difficulty in the matter, since we learn from the Arab authors, that they are both names of the same place, and that it was the ancient regal seat, which was afterwards translated to Sanaa. They also tell us that Balkis, who visited Solomon, reigned there; and CHRIST seems to allude to this country, when he calls her the queen of the south; for yamin with the Jews, as well as yaman with the Arabs, signifies the south; and Saba or Mareb is in that part of Arabia called Taman<sup>l</sup>. 11. We are at a loss again about providing a settlement for Ophir; Arabia furnishes no place which resembles the name, except Copar<sup>m</sup>, a place on the Arabian gulf, near the northern limits of the Cinadocolpitæ, and Ogyris an island in the same sea<sup>n</sup>. Bochart endeavours to squeeze Ophir in among the Cassanitæ or Gassandæ<sup>o</sup>, probably the tribe of Ghassan, consulting the similitude of sense in words, when that of sound fails: and he chuses rather to be put to his shifts, than to run into the common absurdity of planting Ophir in India, where the place which bears his name (so famous in scripture for gold) is supposed to be situate. We shall speak more particularly, with reference to this land, when we come to the reign of Solomon; and shall only observe here that the gold of this place seeming in one passage of scripture to be called the gold of Parvaim<sup>p</sup>, hath occasioned two conjectures: the first, that Ophir is the island of Taprobana<sup>q</sup>; the second, that it is Peru<sup>r</sup> in America. The reader may easily see the latter name comes nearest that of Ophir: but to shew what an ignis fatuus the similitude of names is, Peru, as Sir Walter Raleigh assures, is not the true name of the country, but was given to it by the Spaniards, on their mistaking the answer of the natives to a question they did not understand. 12. Havilah is, by Bochart, supposed to have settled in the land of Khaulan<sup>s</sup>, towards Taman, mentioned by Al Edrisi<sup>t</sup>: but as there seem to be two places (as well as two persons) in scripture called by that name; one near the Persian gulph, possessed by Havilah the son of Cush already taken notice of, and another in the borders of the Analekites, towards the Land of Promise, the reader, <sup>b</sup> BOCHART Phaleg. l. 2. c. 19 & 20. <sup>c</sup> ZACUT. in Juchasin. <sup>d</sup> Nat. Hist. Lib. 12. c. 19. l. 6. c. 28. l. 12. c. 14. <sup>e</sup> PTOLEMY. <sup>f</sup> Vid. BOCHART ubi sup. c. 23. <sup>g</sup> Hist. Plant. l. 9. c. 4. apud BOCHART l. 2. c. 24. <sup>h</sup> AGATHARCHIDES, STRABO, DIOD. SICUL. <sup>i</sup> AGATHARCHIDES, PHILOSTORO. l. 3. THEOPHRAST. STEPHANUS. <sup>k</sup> ERATOSTHENES apud Strab. l. 16. ARTEMIDORUS, PLINIUS, l. 12. c. 14. <sup>l</sup> Geog. Nub. p. 26 & 32. ABULFEDA Descr. Arab. <sup>m</sup> PTOL. <sup>n</sup> PLIN. l. 6. c. 28. <sup>o</sup> Phaleg. l. 2. c. 27. <sup>p</sup> 2 Chron. iii. 6. <sup>q</sup> BOCHART Geog. sacr. l. 2. c. 27. <sup>r</sup> ARIAS MONTANUS Antiquit. Judaic. Phaleg. 5. l. 1. c. 9. <sup>s</sup> Geogr. sacr. l. 2. c. 28. <sup>t</sup> Geogr. Nubicas, p. 49.

- a if he pleases, may fix this twelfth son of Joktan in this last country, and place his brother Jobab, who is the 13th and last, with him for company; unless he rather chuses to quarter him upon the Jobarites, near the Sachalites, in the south-east part of Arabia, upon a presumption that they should be written Jobabites <sup>a</sup>.

Year of the Flood, 401.
Year before
Christ, 2597.
Jobab.

S E C T. VII.

Of the origin of civil government, and the establishment of the first kingdoms.

- b WE have formerly observed, that the first form of government was certainly patriarchal <sup>a</sup>. For though the father had no natural right to govern his children when out of their minority; and though that honour, respect and support which they indispensibly owe to their parents all their life-time, and in all estates, give the father no power of making laws, and enacting penalties on his children, nor any dominion over their properties or actions; yet it is obvious to conceive, how easy it was in the first ages of the world, and still is, in places where the thinness of people gives families leave to separate and plant themselves in yet vacant habitations, for the father of the family to become the prince of it. He had been a ruler from the beginning of the infancy of his children; and since without some government it would be hard for them to live together, it was likeliest it should, by the express or tacit consent of the children, when they were grown up, be in the father; where it seemed, without any change barely to continue; when indeed nothing more was required to it, than the permitting the father to exercise alone in his family that executive power of the law of nature which every freeman naturally hath, and by that permission resigning up to him a monarchical power while they remained in it. Thus it was almost natural for the children to make way for the father's authority: they had been accustomed in their childhood to follow his directions, and to refer their little differences to him; and when they were men, who fitter to rule them? Their little properties, and less covetousness, seldom afforded greater controversies; and when they should arise, where could they have a fitter umpire than he, by whose care they had every one been sustained and brought up, and who had a tenderness for them all? The government they were under continued still to be more their protection than restraint; and they could no where find a greater security to their peace, liberties, and fortunes, than in the rule of a father.
- c THUS fathers of families, by an insensible change, might become politic monarchs of them too, and as they chanced to live long, and leave able and worthy heirs, for several successions or otherwise, lay the foundations of hereditary or elective kingdoms, under various constitutions and manners, according as chance, contrivance, or occasions happened to mould them <sup>b</sup>.
- d NOAH therefore being the common parent of the new world, while he lived we may imagine all his descendants considered themselves to be in a state of dependance on him; and as he was the supreme governor of the whole race of mankind then in being, so his sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet, were in all probability chief governors of their respective branches in particular, as their sons again were heads or rulers of their respective families under their fathers. Each son of Shem, for instance, as head of his own family, not only decided all differences among them, but probably gave laws to them, though his authority extended no farther; for in disputes between their families, their powers being all equal, they were obliged to have recourse to the decision of their common father Shem, whose authority also was limited to his proper descendants; so that in any difference between him and his brothers, Ham and Japhet, the appeal must have been to the judgment of their father Noah, as the only common superior.
- e ON Noah's death the unity of government was dissolved, and mankind became divided into three grand parties, which no longer acknowledged one common head, but had each its own independent ruler in one of his three sons. Upon their deaths the bonds of union were again loosed, and mankind became a second time divided in their political state; so that by degrees mankind became ranged under a great number of independent chiefs; which seems to have been the state of the world for some time after the dispersion.
- f BUT as families increased, and gradually extended their plantations, forming villages and towns, lest their different interests and inclinations might trouble the publick tran-

The first government patriarchal.

Changed into the monarchical.

The policy of the Noachides.

The establishment of kingdoms.

<sup>a</sup> BOCHART Geog. Sacr. lib. 2. cap. 29. tractat. 2. c. 6. &c.

<sup>b</sup> Before, p. 108. b.

<sup>c</sup> LOCKE of Government, quality,

quility, it became necessary to trust the government of each society in the hands of a one or at least a small number of persons, who might reunite all the chiefs under one and the same authority, and execute such laws and regulations as were thought conducive to the well-being of the community. The idea they still retained of the patriarchal government, and the happy experience they had had of it, naturally directed them to the choice of a single person rather than many, and of such as were most conspicuous for paternal care and tenderness. Ambition and intrigue had, it is to be thought, little part in this election, which was rather decided in favour of the most worthy by his known probity and moderation <sup>c</sup>.

IN this first beginning of political societies, almost every town had its own king, who more attentive to preserve his dominions than to extend them, restrained his ambition within the bounds of his native country <sup>d</sup>, till disputes with neighbours, which were sometimes inevitable, jealousy of a more powerful prince, an enterprising genius and martial inclination, the desire of aggrandizing themselves and shewing their abilities, occasioned those wars which often ended in the absolute subjection of the vanquished; whose possessions fell to the conqueror, and by enlarging his dominions, both enabled and encouraged him to push on his fortune by new enterprizes; and thus several cities and territories, united under one monarch, formed kingdoms of larger or lesser extent, as the prince happened to have ambition and success.

THESE first conquerors used their victory in different manners, according to their various tempers and interests. Some, looking on themselves as absolute masters of the conquered, and thinking it was enough to grant them life, stripped them of every thing else, and reduced them to a state of slavery, obliging them to the meanest offices and the most laborious employments; which introduced the distinction between freemen and slaves, which has since been in the world.

OTHERS brought in the custom of entirely transporting the vanquished people with their families into new countries, where they were to settle and cultivate the lands which were assigned them.

OTHERS, yet more moderate, contented themselves with obliging the conquered to purchase their liberty by a ransom, and allowed them the enjoyment of their own laws and privileges on payment of an annual tribute; sometimes even leaving their kings on their throne, on their acknowledging the superiority of their conqueror by certain marks of homage and submission.

THE wisest and most politic gained the affections of their new subjects by admitting them to an equality with their old ones, and granting them the same liberties and privileges; by that means making them one people, and uniting their interests <sup>e</sup>.

Nimrod the first usurper on the rights of others.

IF the Phœnician history be to be credited, and their Cronus be allowed to be Ham, the desire of rule began to make havock in the world even during the life-time of Noah, who was driven out of his settlements, and at last slain by his rebellious son <sup>f</sup>. But the first act of violence and usurpation we find recorded in scripture was that of Nimrod, who, as it seems, dispossessed Abur the son of Shem, who had at first settled in Shinaar, and obliged him to remove into Affryia. The acquisitions he made on this occasion must be allowed to be unjust, though he might have a legal right to govern those who probably chose him for their chief, on account of his personal merit. However, it is to be presumed that this revolution, which we suppose to have happened about thirty years after the dispersion, extended only to some few of the new-planted nations. In the rest, and especially those which lay outermost, we cannot but persuade ourselves that a simplicity of manners continued several ages, and that wars did not arise in the world till the colonies, which were at first separated, by the increase of their numbers began to press upon one another, and grow uneasy for want of room; which inconvenience must have affected those most who were settled nearest the center: and accordingly the first warlike motions we have any credible account of, were made by the kings of Shinaar and Elam <sup>g</sup>.

Great empires not soon formed.

IT is very difficult to settle the rise of the first empires, but it is scarcely possible they should begin so early as historians have represented them. That the first kings were kings of single cities, not of many, much less of large countries, is evident from what we find in history relating to the early state of nations. How long was Greece divided into little states? how many ages did they continue jarring and contending for the mastery? By what slow degrees did Rome enlarge its territories and rise up to empire? and how many centuries passed before it subdued the neighbouring cities which surrounded it? The Israelites found Canaan in the same condition that Italy was, in the

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. L. I. c. I. before, p. 131, &c.

<sup>d</sup> Idem, ibid. <sup>e</sup> Gen. xiv. 1.

<sup>f</sup> ROLLIN. Hist. ancienne, &c. p. 3, &c.

<sup>g</sup> See a time of Romulus, and notwithstanding the great success of Joshua, were above four hundred years in reducing the petty monarchies under their dominion.

THE uniting therefore of many smaller states into one body by force, being apparently a work of time, those authors who place the rise of several great monarchies within two or three ages next after the flood, must be greatly deceived, either by following authors who have attributed too great antiquity to such events, or by adhering to a system of chronology which is too short; and of the two evils this last is the worst. How unfit the Hebrew computation is for adjusting the times of profane history, will partly be seen in that of Egypt, which we are now going to enter upon; we shall only add here, that the first appearance we find of a potent and extensive monarchy is in that of Elam, whose king Chedorlaomer, in the time of Abraham, over-run Canaan and the neighbouring countries as far as the borders of Egypt <sup>a</sup>, some hundreds of years before we hear any thing of an Assyrian monarchy; which could not have had a beginning any number of years before Menahem, when its kings first began to pass the Euphrates at the instigation of that prince <sup>1</sup>.

THOUGH Noah and his sons had doubtless some knowledge of the inventions of the antediluvians, and probably acquainted their descendants with such of them as were most obvious and useful in common life, yet it is not to be imagined that any of the more curious arts or speculative sciences were improved in any degree, supposing them to have been known or invented, till some considerable time after the dispersion. On the contrary, one consequence of that event seems to have been, that several inventions known to their ancestors were lost, and mankind gradually degenerated into ignorance and barbarity, till ease and plenty had given them leisure again to polish their manners, and apply themselves to those arts which are seldom brought to perfection under other circumstances. For on their settling in any country, they found it employment sufficient to cultivate the land (which yet for want of separate property and security in their possessions, in those early times, they improved no farther than barely to supply present necessities) and to provide themselves habitations and necessaries for their mutual comfort and subsistence <sup>b</sup>. Besides this, they were often obliged to remove from one place to another, where they could more conveniently reside; and it was a great while before they came to embody themselves together in towns and cities, and from thence to spread into provinces, and to settle the bounds and extent of their territories <sup>1</sup>. Two or three ages at least must have been spent in this manner; and it is not very likely they should amuse themselves with celestial observations in particular, when they had so many more pressing affairs to mind. So that the astronomical observations of the Babylonians, of which Calisthenes sent an account to his master Aristotle <sup>c</sup>, if they reached so far backwards as we are told, viz. 1903 years, are a further proof of the insufficiency of the Hebrew chronology, according to which those observations must have been made little more than 100 years after the flood.

COMMERCE was in all probability carried on with greater ease before the flood, when there was, as it seems, but one and the same language in the world; yet it was not so necessary then as it is become since, not only because mens wants have been encreased by the ill effects of the deluge on the earth and its productions <sup>a</sup>, but because they dwelt more together, and might supply their occasions by bartering with their nearest neighbours, without being obliged to extend their dealings much farther. And that they had no ships to carry on a traffic to remote parts, seems evident; for if navigation had been then found out, some others might have saved themselves from the flood as well as Noah and his family. But after that destruction, and the dispersion of mankind, as it became more difficult to trade with nations who spake different languages, so their necessities were encreased by this division; the colonies who planted new countries, not only perceiving their own wants by the conveniences they had left behind them, but finding something useful in their settlements, which were before unknown to them or their founders. This engaged them to fetch what they wanted from the parts where they had formerly dwelt, and in exchange to carry what they had discovered thither; which seems to have given the first rise to foreign trade, the gradual advances whereof we may occasionally mention hereafter. The invention of shipping was certainly the greatest step to its improvement, which made the sea, before the greatest obstacle to commerce, of the greatest advantage to it <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xiv. 5, &c.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xv. 19.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. THUCYD. l. 1. sub initio.

<sup>d</sup> STILLINGF.

Orig. Sacr. book I. c. 1. § 16.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. SIMPLIC. de celo, l. 1.

<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 108, &c.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. HURT Hist. du commerce & de la navig. des anciens, c. 2 & 3.

C H A P. III.

The History of Egypt to the time of Alexander the Great.

S E C T. I.

A description of Egypt.Its names.

EGYPT, called by its antient inhabitants Chemia<sup>a</sup>, and by the Copts at present<sup>a</sup> Chemî, was so named, as is supposed, from Ham the son of Noah, being more than once stiled in the book of Psalms, the land of Ham. But the name by which it is generally denoted in scripture, is the land of Mizraim, from whence the Arabians and other oriental nations still call it Misr, which the Greeks write Mesre and Mestrawa. We have already observed that Mizraim is a word of a dual termination<sup>b</sup>, and is by some thought to have been used in that number, because of the twofold division of Egypt hereafter mentioned, and thence given to its first planter, the son of Ham<sup>c</sup>: the singular Misr signifies a fortress, and, according to some, is also used in scripture as a proper name of that country<sup>d</sup>; though others, and our version in particular, translate the word as an appellative. Bochart is of opinion Egypt received this name from the natural strength of its situation<sup>e</sup>.

THIS country is best known to us by its Greek name Egypt, the original of which is variously accounted for by authors. Some say it was so called from one of its kings named Ægyptus<sup>f</sup>; but the contrary seem to have been the case, not only the country, but its famous river Nile also, being antiently called by the same name. Others say it signifies no more than the land of the Copts<sup>g</sup>, the word Aia being Greek for a country, and Ægyptos easily softened into Ægyptus: yet this derivation seems as ill-grounded as the former; the city of Coptus, whence the remains of the antient Egyptians are still called Copts, being situate far up in the higher Egypt, and in all likelihood utterly unknown to the Greeks till long after the name was in use among them. The most probable opinion therefore, to omit some other conjectures still more groundless, is, that this region was so called from the blackness of its soil, and the dark colour both of its river and inhabitants, attested by all relations. For such a blackish colour is called by the Greeks ægyptios, from gyps, and ægypt, a vultur, a bird of that hue; and by the Latins, fulvulturinus. And for the same reason other names of the same import have been given to this country by the Greeks, such as Aeria, and Melambolus. The river itself was also called Melo or Melas; by the Hebrews Shikor, and by the *Ethiopian*s Siris<sup>h</sup>; all which names signify black: and Plutarch seems to intimate, the inhabitants therefore called their country Chemia, because its soil was very black, like the sight of the eye<sup>i</sup>.

Situation and extent.

EGYPT is situate between the 48th and 53d degrees of longitude, and the 24th and 33d degrees of north latitude. Its length from north to south about 600 miles, and the breadth of its coast on the Mediterranean, from east to west near 300 miles; but above the division of the Nile it grows much narrower, so that in some places the two chains of mountains which rise on each side of that river, leave a plain between them of less than a day's journey to cross<sup>k</sup>. It is bounded on the south by the kingdom of Sennar, which is tributary to the king of Ethiopia, and the cataracts of the Nile; on the north by the Mediterranean sea; on the east by the Arabian gulph or Red-sea, and the isthmus of Suez; on the west by a region of Libya called Marmarica.

THE old geographers differ as to the antient bounds of this country; some have thought that the Delta only, or that part encompassed by the arms of the Nile,<sup>c</sup> was properly to be called Egypt<sup>l</sup>; others make it reach westward to the greater Catabathmus<sup>m</sup>, or valley which divides it from Cyrenaica; but this would give it too great an extent, and include Marmarica and Ainacensis, which are generally agreed to be no part of Egypt. The true limits on that side therefore, seem rather to be taken from Phanthine, a town beyond the lake Mariotis, and to extend eastward as far as the lake Serlonis<sup>n</sup>, or more exactly to Ostracine on the Mediterranean sea, and Heropolis at the

<sup>a</sup> PLUT. de Isid. & Osir. p. 364. <sup>b</sup> Before, p. 165. b. <sup>c</sup> Vid. PERIZON. orig. Ægypt. p. 6.
<sup>d</sup> 2 Kings xix. 24. Isai. xix. 6. Micah vii. 12. <sup>e</sup> Phaleg. l. 4. c. 24. <sup>f</sup> DIODOR. SIC. LIB. II. &c.
<sup>g</sup> See WELLS's Geog. of the Old Test. vol. II. p. 5. <sup>h</sup> Vid. PERIZON. ubi sup. p. 13. <sup>i</sup> Ubi
sup. <sup>j</sup> Vid. LUCAS, Voyages, tom. II. p. 195. <sup>k</sup> GOT. in Alfrag. p. 100. <sup>l</sup> JONES apud a head of the Arabian gulph. The southern bounds were Syene, a city situate almost under the tropic of Cancer, and Elephantine and Phila, two others which lie something farther *.
HERODOT. l. 2. c. 15. <sup>m</sup> STRABO. l. 17. <sup>n</sup> Vid. HEROD. ubi sup.

As the antients differ likewise in settling the limits of Asia and Africa, some, who make the Nile the boundary of those two parts of the world<sup>p</sup>, place so much of Egypt as lies east of that river in Asia; but others place it entirely in that part, by removing the limits of Asia so far as Alexandria<sup>q</sup>, or the Catabathmus<sup>r</sup>. But we think the common opinion the most natural, which divides Asia from Africa by the Arabian gulph and the isthmus of Suez. However, we hope the former authorities will excuse our including the Egyptians among the Asiatic nations, whose histories we give in this

b book; which we have done merely for convenience.

ANTIENT Egypt is divided by some into two parts, the upper and the lower Egypt; its division. by others into three, the upper Egypt, properly so called, or Thebais; the middle Egypt or Heptanomis; and the lower Egypt, the best part of which was the Delta.

THEBAIS, which was so named by the Greeks from its principal city Thebes, is in the scripture called Patros, and at present al Said. It is the most southerly part of Egypt next to Ethiopia, and is near as big as all the rest, including the country on both sides the Nile down to the Heptanomis; its last city, according to the antients, being Lycopolis on the western, and Antaeopolis on the eastern side of the river; which agrees pretty exactly with the present extent of al Said, the most northern city of which

Thebais.

c is Manfalut<sup>s</sup>.

THERE were formerly in this part of Egypt a very great number of large and magnificent cities, with temples dedicated to several deities, and the tombs of their ancient princes; and it is said, there are not only several obelisks and colosses still remaining there, more beautiful than those to be seen in the lower Egypt, but also some pyramids higher than those near al Kahira (commonly called Carro) with other stupendous works; some of which we may take notice of hereafter.

ITS metropolis Thebes, called afterwards Diospolis or the city of Jupiter, was situate on the Nile, and deservedly reckoned one of the finest cities in the world. Its hundred gates are mentioned by Homer, whence it had the surname of Hecatompyles (A). It was so d incredibly populous, that it is said it could send out of each gate at one and the same time 200 chariots<sup>t</sup>, and 10,000 fighting men, if the numbers are true. Its length in

Strabo's time was 80 furlongs<sup>u</sup>, or 10 miles: but this was nothing in comparison of its ancient extent before it was ruined by Cambyfes; which, we are told, was no less than 420 stadia, or 52 miles and a half<sup>v</sup> (B). The riches of this city were so very great, that after it had been plundered by the Persians, what was found on burning the remains of the pillage, amounted to above 300 talents of gold, and 2300 talents of silver<sup>x</sup>. Who was the first founder of this city is uncertain: some say it was built by Osiris, who gave it first the name of his mother<sup>y</sup>; but others make it the work of a second Bufris<sup>z</sup>. It may not be amiss to observe, that formerly the name of Thebes was given to all e Egypt<sup>a</sup>, which makes what is said above of its great power more credible.

THE other ancient cities of great note in Thebais, were the lesser Diospolis, This, Aby- dus, Tentyris, Hermontbis, Latopolis, Syene, Coptus, and several others, all which are now either quite ruined, or become small towns and villages. The last deserves particular mention, not only as being a very ancient city, but for having been the chief residence of the native Egyptians for many ages, since their country has been subject to a foreign power, and whence they received their present name of Copts.

HEPTANOMIS, or the middle Egypt, was so called from the seven names or præ-fectures into which it was divided, though Strabo says it contained sixteen<sup>b</sup>; which f comprized, as were in particular those of Oasis, of which name there were two cities, not properly in Egypt, but on the borders of Libya. The Heptanomis comprehended Heptanomia.

* Vid. CELLAR. Geogr. Ant. l. 4. c. 1.    <sup>p</sup> STRABO. l. 11. DIONYS. Perieg. ver. 18. PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 3. c. 1.    <sup>q</sup> HIRTIUS de bello Alex. c. 14.    <sup>r</sup> SALLUST. de bello Jugurth. c. 17. POMP. MELA. l. 1. c. 8.    <sup>s</sup> LUCAS, Voy. tom. IX. p. 209.    <sup>t</sup> HOMER. Il. 10. ver. 387. DION. SIC. l. 1. p. 43. POMP. MELA. l. 1. c. 9.    <sup>u</sup> STRABO. l. 17. p. 1170.    <sup>v</sup> EUSTATH. ad DIONYS. &c.    <sup>x</sup> DION. SIC. ubi sup.    <sup>y</sup> Idem ibid. p. 18.    <sup>z</sup> Ibid. 42.    <sup>a</sup> HEROD. l. 11. ARISTOT. Meteor. 1.    <sup>b</sup> STRABO. l. 16.

(A) Others say this is not the number of the gates of the city itself; but the temples within it having many large porches, the city had thence the name, expressing a definite for an indefinite number (1).

(B) Yet it contained but 1700 aruras (a measure of 100 cubits square); for which reason it is supposed its length much exceeded its breadth, being probably built chiefly on the banks of the Nile (2).

(1) DIONOR. SIC. ubi sup. p. 43.

(2) Vid. VOSSII in Mehem. p. 371.

all the country on each side of the Nile from Thebais to the point of the Delta, where <sup>a</sup> that river divides itself into those branches by which it enters the sea. Some of the ancients make this tract a part of the Thebais; and some of the eastern geographers also give the same extent to al Said <sup>c</sup>.

THIS part of Egypt was also in old times very full of large and noble cities, the principal of which was Memphis, built by Menes their first king, and for many ages the capital of the whole kingdom. Here also were the lake of Maris, the labyrinths, and the pyramids so celebrated by antiquity, of which we shall give some description hereafter.

Lower Egypt. THE lower Egypt, reaching from Heptanomis to the Mediterranean sea, contained not only that part which is encompassed by the arms of the Nile, and from its triangular figure named Delta; but also Mareotis, and Alexandria with its dependencies, to <sup>b</sup> the west; and Casiotis, and Augustamnica, with some other territories towards Arabia, to the east.

SOME have imagined the Delta, or the greater part of it, to have been an accession of land to Egypt; and that the plains between the mountains beyond Memphis were formerly a bay of the sea, which was at length filled up by the soil brought down by the Nile <sup>d</sup>. But this opinion seems very groundless, considering the little alteration which has been in this part of Egypt for above 2000 years past, and the time allowed for this effect by Herodotus, which is no less than 20,000 years, a much longer space than the world has lasted. Some Arabs divide the Delta into two parts, al Rif, and al Babriya. The former being the western part, is supposed by Bochart to be the Rabab <sup>c</sup> of the scriptures <sup>e</sup>, and was so called because of its form resembling a pear, which the Egyptians call rib or ribi <sup>f</sup>. Al Babriya is the eastern part of the Delta, according to several <sup>g</sup>; though a late traveller more truly places al Babriya, or as he writes it Bebeire, beyond the western branch of the Nile <sup>h</sup>. The chief cities of the lower Egypt were Tanis, Sais, and Xois, famous for being the seats of several races of princes; and in later times Alexandria, which was the metropolis of the whole kingdom while in the possession of the Greeks and Romans.

Its division into nomes.

BESIDES this larger division, Egypt was also distributed into several governments or præfectures, called by the Egyptians Tabir, and by the Greeks Nomes; whence that passage of scripture <sup>i</sup> which our version renders, I will set the Egyptians against the <sup>d</sup> Egyptians, and they shall fight kingdom against kingdom, the Septuagint have rightly translated, nome against nome. The number of these are uncertain, being, according to the pleasure of the prince, sometimes more and sometimes less; for which reason ancient authors differ in their accounts of them: but they were about thirty six, and generally named from the chief city of each nome. This division is attributed to Sesostris <sup>k</sup>.

IT is not our purpose here to enter into a particular detail of the cities of Egypt, or any geographical disquisitions as to their ancient and modern states, names, and situations; but we shall in the course of this work occasionally make such observations in relation thereto, as we shall judge curious or necessary.

Climate.

THE climate of Egypt must needs be very warm, from its near situation to the tropic, though the air is generally dry, yet there fall great dews after the swelling of the Nile, which continue for several months; in the lower Egypt it often rains in the winter, notwithstanding what some of the ancients say to the contrary <sup>l</sup>; and even snow has been observed to fall at Alexandria, contrary to the express assertion of Seneca <sup>m</sup>. In the upper Egypt indeed, towards the catadupes or cataracts of Nile, it rains very seldom <sup>n</sup>. The first summer (for they reckon two in Egypt) which is in March, April, and May, is the most inconvenient and sickly season, because of the unequal weather, excessive heats, and hot winds which reign at that time, and cause several distempers: but in return, in their second summer, in June, July, and August, and in their autumn and winter, one breathes a much cooler air, the weather is more constant, and it <sup>e</sup> is then most delightful living in this country. Though the cold is seldom felt there, except only for about seven days, which the Arabs call Berd al ajuz, the old woman's cold, from the 7th to the 14th of February, yet those who are tolerably rich wear furs, because of the uncertainty of the season <sup>o</sup>.

Fertility.

THE fertility of Egypt, and the excellence of its productions and fruits, are greatly celebrated by ancient writers, and by Moses himself <sup>p</sup>, who must needs have been well acquainted with this country. It abounds in grain of all sorts, but particularly rice; inasmuch a that as it was formerly the granary of Rome, while subject to the Roman empire, it is now the principal country which supplies Constantinople.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. GOLLII not. ad Alfrag. p. 100. <sup>d</sup> DIOD. SIC. lib. I. p. 30. HÆROD. l. 2. c. 5. <sup>e</sup> PGI. lxxxvii. 4. and lxxxix 10. Ifa. li. 9. <sup>f</sup> BOCHART Geogr. Sacr. l. 4. c. 24. <sup>g</sup> KIRCHER. Oedip. Egypt. tom. I. p. 8. LUCAS, Voy. tom. II. p. 195. <sup>h</sup> Essai d'une carte d'Égypte par SICARD. <sup>i</sup> Ifa. xx 2. <sup>k</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. I. p. 50. <sup>l</sup> PLATO in Tim. POMPE. MELA: <sup>m</sup> Nat. quæst. l. 4. <sup>n</sup> Vid. GREAVES's Descrip. of the pyramids, p. 74, &c. RAY's Collect. of Travels, tom. II. p. 92. <sup>o</sup> Ibid. & LUCAS, Voy. tom. II. p. 239. <sup>p</sup> Genes. xiii. 10.

. that

THE most plentiful parts of Egypt are the Delta, and that province which is now called al Feyyum, supposed to be the ancient Heracleotic nome<sup>a</sup>; the capital of which bearing the same name, is thought to have been either Heracleopolis, Nilopolis, or Arfinoe, and is said by the natives to have been built by Joseph, to whom they own themselves oblig'd for the improvements of this territory; which being much the lowest part of Egypt, was before nothing but a standing pool, till that patriarch, by cutting canals, and particularly the great one which reaches from the Nile to the lake Meris, drained it of the water, and clearing it of the rushes and marshy weeds, rendered it fit for tillage. It is now the most fertile and best cultivated land in the whole kingdom, containing above 360 villages, and yields linen, grapes, and other fruits in abundance; and it fails not bearing, even in those years when the Nile's not rising to its usual height occasions a scarcity in the other parts of Egypt<sup>c</sup>.

HAVING spoken of the plenty of Egypt, it would be an unpardonable omission not to say something of the river Nile, to which this country is indebted for all its fertility and happiness. The sources or springs of this river were so absolutely unknown to the ancients, that they thought it even impossible to discover them; they are now well known to be in Ethiopia, though modern travellers differ in their accounts of them, as will be seen when we come to describe them in a more proper place. The Nile enters Egypt almost under the tropic of Cancer, violently pouring itself, as it passes, down no less than seven cataracts or falls, from a very considerable height, between ragged rocks and precipices, with so great a noise that it may be heard several miles off. The people of those parts used formerly to entertain strangers with a surprizing spectacle, which some modern travellers say is still continued: two of them get into a small boat, one to guide it, and the other to keep it clear of water; after having born the violence of the agitated waves for some time, they dexterously steer their boat through the narrow channels, thereby avoiding the rocks, and letting themselves be carried down by the falling river, direct their little vessel with their hands, and rushing headlong, to the great terror of the spectators, who think them utterly lost and swallowed up, they appear again on the water, far from the place from which they fell, as if they had been shot out of an engine<sup>d</sup>. The Nile, having passed through the upper and middle Egypt, a little below the ancient Memphis divided itself into two large arms, which afterwards forming seven channels, emptied themselves into the sea by as many mouths. These seven mouths of the Nile, much spoken of by the ancient writers, were, to begin from the west, the Canopic, the Heracleotic, the Bollitic, the Sebennytic, the Phatmic or Pathmetic, the Mendesian, the Tanitic or Saitic, and the Pelusian; which had their names from so many cities standing on their several branches. Besides these, there were the two Pseudestomata or false mouths, as they called them, of Pineptimi and Diolcos, which were too small to carry larger vessels. But the greater part of these mouths have been since stopped up, and others formed, so that there are now reckon'd to be above thirty channels which carry the waters of the Nile into the sea, especially at the time of its overflowing, the greater part of them becoming dry when the waters retire<sup>e</sup>; the two chief, and indeed only considerable arms of that river at present, being that of Rosetta or Rashid to the west, and that of Damietta, or Dimyat, to the east.

THE annual inundation of the Nile, on which the fertility of Egypt depends, is one of the greatest wonders of that country. The ancient writers tell us, that it begins to rise in Egypt about the summer solstice, and continues so to do till after the autumnal equinox, for about the space of one hundred days; and then it gradually decreases for as many days, till it retires within its banks, and overflows no more till the next year. If the river did not rise to the height of sixteen cubits, or fifteen at least, the country was not covered with water, and a dearth ensued<sup>f</sup>. This account comes very near to those given by modern travellers. Though the river begins to swell in May, yet no publick notice is taken of it till the 28th or 29th of June, by which time it is usually risen to the height of six or eight pikes (a Turkish measure of about twenty six inches) and then the publick criers proclaim it through the capital and other cities, and continue in the same manner to publish how much the river increases every day, till it rises to sixteen pikes, and then they cut down the dam of the Kbahi or great canal at Bulak, which passes through the midst of al Kabira, and let in the water on their

Of the river
N.le.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. STRABON. l. 17.

LUCAS, ubi. sup. p. 205.

<sup>b</sup> HEROD. l. 2. DIOD. SIC. l. 1.

<sup>c</sup> GOLLII not. ad Alfrag. p. 157, &c.

<sup>d</sup> SENECA. Nat. quæst. l. 4. c. 2.

Vid. PLIN. l. 5. c. 9.

KIRCHER Oedip. vol. I. p. 8.

<sup>e</sup> LUCAS, ubi. sup. p. 313.

lands, by an artifice we shall mention by and by. If the river want but an inch of this height, they will not cut the dam, because in such case no tribute is due to the prince for the lands which should be water'd by them, the produce being then scarce sufficient to maintain the tillers. And therefore at present, if the Basha or governor of Egypt cut this dam before the river rise to that determinate height, he is answerable for the consequence, and must pay the Turkish emperor his tribute whether the year be plentiful or no. If the water encrease to the height of twenty three or twenty four pikes, it is judged most favourable; but if it exceed that, it does a great deal of mischief, not only by overthrowing houses, and drowning cattle, but also by engendering a great number of insects which destroy the fruits of the earth *.

THE Khalis abovementioned is always opened with great solemnity in the presence b of the Basha, accompanied by all his great officers, and attended by an innumerable multitude of people, this being one of the greatest festivals in Egypt *; and in former times, we are told, the Egyptians used annually at this ceremony to sacrifice a girl, or as others say, a boy and a girl, to the Nile, as a tribute paid to that river for all the benefits they received from it. And this inhuman custom continued, it is said, till the Turks made themselves masters of Egypt (C); the first governor under whom resolved to abolish it, and by his prudent remonstrances prevailed on the Egyptians to omit it; but the river unfortunately did not rise that year to the accustomed height. The year following it was still worse, so that the people, apprehending a famine, began to murmur: whereupon the governor led all the inhabitants of the city, Turks, Jews and c Christians, to a mountain on the east of al Kahira, and after a pathetic exhortation, he obliged all that were present to offer up their prayers to God for the obtaining his mercy; in which exercise they passed all the rest of that day, and the following night. The next morning before day, some women came, with great joy, to acquaint the governor that the Nile had risen in the night no less than twelve pikes; whereupon nothing was heard but the praises of God and acclamations of the people. Coming d down from the mountain, they erected an altar at the mouth of the canal ten foot high, whereon they threw a great quantity of flowers, and a branch of olive, which last, as they say, took root there, as a more agreeable offering to God than the former innocent victim; and they continue still to erect such an altar every year, and when they break d down the dam, and the water enters the Khalis, it carries down the altar and flowers with it. The year when this event happened the Nile rose two pikes higher than it used to do, and there was very great plenty; since which time, a final stop being put to the abovementioned superstitious practice, whenever the waters fail of their accustomed height, they have recourse to prayers on the same mountain *.

Of the Nilometers.

THAT they may the better judge of the daily encrease of the water, and the consequent plenty or scarcity of the ensuing year, the gradual rise of the river is very exactly measured either by wells sunk, or pillars erected and divided for that purpose. There was one of the former, we are told, on the bank of the Nile, in the upper Egypt near Syene *; and one of the latter was set up in Memphis *. A very ancient column, which served for the same use, is also yet to be seen in the castle of old Kahira, e said to be erected in the time of the emperor Heraclius. The present Nilometer (D) or Mykias, as the Arabs call it, is in the same castle; it is a large square reservoir, round which runs a handsome gallery, sustained by twelve marble pillars, which form arches, with a balustrade to lean on when one looks into the water. In the midst of this basin, through which passes a canal drawn from the Nile, is an octagonal pillar of white

* LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 327, &c. Vid. THEVENOT, Voy. part. I. c. 22, 45, 46, &c. * Vid: eosd. ubi sup. * LUCAS, ubi sup. Vid. THEVENOT, ubi sup. * STRABO, l. 17. p. 817.

* DIODOR, Sic. l. 1. p. 33.

(C) It seems very strange that such a practice should be suffered, not only during the time Egypt was subject to the christian emperors of Constantinople, but while the Arabs were masters of it. Amasis, one of the ancient Egyptian kings, is said to have abolished the human sacrifices offered to Juno, as will be observed hereafter; and it might be reasonably supposed he would also have put a stop to those offered to the Nile. Perhaps we may set this matter in a clearer light, when we come to the Arabian and Turkish history.

(D) This Nilometer is different from that built in an island of the Nile, between Fizah and al Fostat

(which from its pleasant situation and being planted with several sorts of fruit-trees, is much celebrated by the oriental writers, and called al Rowd.t, or the Garden) by Awnab bin Yazid (3), collector of the tribute in Egypt, in the reign of the Khalifah Soleyman bin Abd'almalik. Some years after the Khalifah al Mamun ordered it to be pulled down, on account of some defect therein, and a new one to be built in its room, which was at last finished in a magnificent manner by al Motawakkel (4). The eastern histories mention several other structures of this sort, built or repaired by the Khalifas, while masters of Egypt.

(3) ELMACIN, in vita Soleyman. (4) Vid. COLIN Nod. ad Afrag. p. 156. & D'HERBELOT

a marble, divided into twenty two equal parts ; the first is again divided into twenty four inches, but the second is not ; however, the others are all marked to the top of the column. They are very careful, during the time of the inundation, to observe the height of the water by the measure ; and every day proclaim it in the city. This work is so exactly finished and nicely levelled, that the water in the reservoir is neither higher nor lower than that in the river <sup>b</sup>.

As these Nilometers served to measure the overflowing of the river, the Sphinxes, of which there were also a great many in several places, shewed the beginning of the waters rising ; being a symbolic representation or figure, with the head of a woman and the body of a lion, signifying that the Nile began to swell in the months of July and August, when the sun passes thro' the signs of Leo and Virgo <sup>c</sup>. There are several of these Sphinxes still to be seen ; one in particular near the pyramids much spoken of by the antients, being of a prodigious size, and cut out of the rock itself : the head and neck only appear at present, the rest of the body being hid in the sand. It is, according to Thevenot <sup>d</sup>, twenty six foot high, and fifteen foot from the ear to the chin ; but Pliny assures us, the head was no less than one hundred and two foot about, and sixty two foot high from the belly, and that the body was one hundred and forty three foot long, and was thought to be the sepulchre of king Amasis <sup>e</sup>. There is another also at the end of the lake of al Matariya, which lies on its side, the head being separated from the body <sup>f</sup>.

Of the Sphinx.

c As it may easily be conceived this river could not of itself overflow the lands every where in the necessary proportion, the inhabitants have been obliged, with infinite labour, to cut a vast number of canals and trenches from one end of Egypt to the other, to convey the water to every part ; so that each town and village has its canal, which is opened at the proper time, and the water successively conducted to the most distant places. These canals or trenches are not permitted to be opened till the river has rose to a certain height, nor yet all at once, because in such case some lands would have too much water, and others too little ; but they begin to open them first in the upper Egypt, and then gradually lower, according to a publick regulation of the measures made for that purpose. By this means the water is so carefully husbanded, that if it rises to twenty four pikes, it suffices the whole country ; which is so large, and the canals so numerous, that it is thought scarce a tenth part of the waters of the Nile enter the sea for the first three months of its overflowing. However, as some places lie too high to be watered by the canals, they are obliged to raise the waters to cover them by engines. Formerly they made use of Archimedes's screw, thence named the Egyptian pump <sup>g</sup> ; but they now generally use wheels, which carry a rope or chain of earthen pots, holding about seven or eight quarts apiece, and draw the water from the canals. There are besides a vast number of wells in Egypt, from which the water is drawn in the same manner to water the gardens and fruit-trees, so that it is no exaggeration of the matter to say, that there are in Egypt above two hundred thousand oxen daily employed in this labour, without reckoning the men who draw water in wicker baskets, so close and well made, that not a drop runs through. As the land lies perfectly even, they cut their gardens into little square beds, which are all surrounded with trenches higher than the level of the gardens ; so that when they want to water one of these beds, they open one of the trenches, which immediately furnishes as much water as is necessary ; after which they stop it up again, and thus they manage the rest, by which means they have the finest and most fertile gardens in the world. Pomgranates, oranges, lemons, and several other sorts of trees, afford a shade and coolness, which, notwithstanding the heat of the climate, make it delightful walking. When a tree is wanting in any place, they only cut down a branch, which they plant by the side of a little trench, and in two or three years it grows to be a tree big enough to transplant.

The manner of conveying the water on their lands.

f THE Nile, differing in this from other rivers, which generally carry off the heart of the land they overflow, by the mud or slime it brings down with it, fattens the earth and makes it exceeding fruitful, without any other manure. The Egyptians have not the laborious task of plowing, digging, or breaking the clods ; but when the river is retired they have no more to do, than to mingle a little sand with the earth to abate its strength ; after which they sow with little pains, and almost without charge. Antiently, we are told, they used to put in their hogs to tread the seed into the ground, expecting the harvest without any further care ; and when that season came, they let in the hogs again to shake the grain out of the ear, and had no other trouble than to gather and lay up their corn <sup>h</sup>. They sow ordinarily in October and November, as the

The fecundity occasioned by the Nile.

<sup>b</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 313, 321, &c.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. p. 323.

<sup>d</sup> THEVENOT Voy. part. 1. c. 5.

<sup>e</sup> PLIN. Nat. Hist. l. 36. c. 12.

<sup>f</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 30, & l. 5.

<sup>h</sup> p. 313.

<sup>i</sup> HEROD. l. 2. DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 32.

waters fall: within two months the ground is covered with all sorts of grain and pulse; <sup>a</sup> and their harvest is in March and April. The same piece of ground produces the same year three or four different sorts of fruits and garden stuff: first they sow lettuce and cucumbers, then corn; and after harvest, melons, and those sorts of pulse which are peculiar to Egypt.

WHAT is most extraordinary is, that this surprizing fecundity, caused by the inundation of the Nile, reaches not only to the earth, but also to mankind and animals <sup>b</sup>. It is found by constant experience, that the new waters make the women fruitful, whether they bathe in them, or only drink them: they usually conceive in July and August, and are delivered in April and May. As to the cattle, the cows almost always bring two calves at a time; the sheep year twice a year, having two lambs the first time, and but one the second; and a goat is often seen followed by four kids, which she has brought in six months: the pastures of Egypt are most excellent, the grals generally growing to the height of the cattle: on this they feed in winter, during which season great numbers are driven thither from about the Euphrates; in summer, the grounds being either burnt up by the sun, or overflowed by the Nile, they are taken up, and fed with hay, beans, and barley.

Two different appearances of Egypt in two seasons.

THERE is not a more pleasant sight in the world than Egypt in two seasons of the year; for if you ascend some mountains, or one of the great pyramids of al Kahira, about the months of July and August, you see a wide sea, out of which there arise a vast number of villages, turrets and spires, appearing like the isles in the Ægean sea <sup>c</sup>, with some causeways for communication, intermixed with groves and a great number of fruit-trees, whose tops only are seen; all which afford a most enchanting prospect. This view is terminated by mountains and woods, which at a distance forms the most agreeable perspective in the world. On the other hand, in the winter, that is, about January and February, all the country is like a fine meadow, whose verdure, enameled with flowers, charms the sight. You see on every side herds and flocks of cattle scattered over the plain, with an infinite number of husbandmen and gardeners. The air is then embalmed by the prodigious quantity of flowers, furnished by the oranges, lemons, and other trees; and is so pure, that a man cannot breath one more wholesome or agreeable: so that nature, which is then as it were dead in so many other climates, <sup>d</sup> seems to revive only for the sake of so delightful an abode. If there be any places left which are not quite dried, they are covered with water-fowl in great plenty, which afford diversion to the sportsmen, who kill as many of them as they please.

THE cities, towns, and villages in Egypt, to secure them from the inundation of the Nile, are all built either on some rising ground formed by nature, or else, which is generally the case, on mounts raised by infinite labour; the communication between one town and another, while the country is under water, being carried on either by the causeways abovementioned, or boats. When the river is retired within its banks, the canals serve for the same purpose, and to furnish the inhabitants and cattle with water, which the maidens are continually to be seen fetching thence, according to the ancient custom so often taken notice of in scripture <sup>e</sup>.

The cause of the inundation of the Nile.

As the antients were ignorant of the true cause of the inundation of the Nile, which seemed the more unaccountable to them, because, contrary to other rivers, it overflowed in the summer, and was lowest in winter, they made several subtle conjectures to explain this phenomenon <sup>m</sup>. But it has been long since well known to be occasioned by the great rains which fall in Ethiopia, about the springs of the Nile, and swell that river into a sea, which first lays Ethiopia almost intirely under water, as it afterwards does Egypt. Agatharchides of Guidos <sup>n</sup>, and some others, guessed this to be the cause, though they were not certain of it; but it was afterwards confirmed by eye-witnesses; Ptolemy Philadelphus, a very inquisitive prince, having sent some persons on purpose to examine into the matter. It has been thought that this piece of natural history was not unknown to Homer himself, and that he alludes to it when he says <sup>o</sup>, that the Nile came down from heaven <sup>p</sup>. These rains constantly fall in Ethiopia, during the months of April and May <sup>q</sup>; at which time it also rains with the same regularity in the Indies, causing the Indus and the Ganges to overflow their banks in the same manner as the Nile does <sup>r</sup>.

THE divine providence has been justly admired, in sending the rains in Ethiopia so very punctually for the supply of Egypt, where it rains so seldom, and thereby rendering a most dry and sandy soil, one of the most fruitful in the universe. Nor is it

<sup>a</sup> Vid. DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. p. 32.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. HEROD. & DIODOR. SIC. ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. LUCAS,

ubi sup. p. 328, &c.

<sup>m</sup> Vid. HEROD. l. 2. DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 33, &c.

<sup>n</sup> DIOD. SIC. ibid.

p. 39.

<sup>o</sup> HOM. Odyss. 4. vtr. 581.

<sup>p</sup> STRABO. l. 17. p. 1137.

<sup>q</sup> Vid. LUCAS, ubi sup.

p. 321.

<sup>r</sup> BARNIER, Voyage de Cachemire, p. 343, &c.

- a to be omitted, that in the beginning of June and the four following months, the Etesian winds (which some formerly imagined to be the great cause of the inundation<sup>1</sup>) constantly blow from the north-east, and keep back the water from flowing down and emptying itself into the sea too fast<sup>2</sup>. As the fertility of the land of Canaan was owing to a very different method of providence, that is, to the former and latter rains, which regularly fell at two appointed seasons of the year, while the children of Israel continued in their duty, Moses thought proper to acquaint them before-hand with so material a difference between the promised land and that they had lately left; The land whither thou goest in to possess it, says that lawgiver, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs; but
 b the land whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven; a land which the Lord thy God careth for; the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year<sup>3</sup>.

LET us now take a view of the animal and vegetable productions of Egypt. The crocodile, and hippopotamus or river-horse, are, it is to be presumed, too well known to the reader, to need a particular description here<sup>4</sup>: they are both inhabitants of the Nile. The crocodiles are often killed by the natives. One way of taking them is, by a piece of flesh stuck on an iron hook, and let down into the river by a rope, the other end of which is fastened to a stake: when the crocodile has seized the bait, he is drawn to land, and knocked on the head<sup>5</sup>. Herodotus describes this manner with very little variation<sup>6</sup>. Another more dangerous way is sometimes practised, by striking them, as they sleep, under the belly, with a stake armed with a bearded point of iron, and also fastened to a rope<sup>7</sup>. A more extraordinary method still was made use of to catch one of these creatures that had done much mischief: the person who undertook it for a reward, bound his son, a young lad, to a stake in the place where the crocodile used to come, and laid himself flat on his belly with two short clubs in his hand, one of which was wound round at the end with a very large ball of coarse thread dipped in pitch, and so waited for the crocodile; who coming out of the river and smelling the boy, made directly towards him; but as he opened his mouth to seize him, the father thrust the staff with the pitched ball into his jaws, which sticking in his teeth and entangling them as he bit it, the man broke his back, and killed him with the other<sup>8</sup>. The inhabitants of Tentyris are reported to have been very bold and dexterous in hunting these creatures, and that they would even leap on their backs in the water, and clapping a stick across their mouths, as they opened them to bite, manage them as with a bridle, and bring them to land; so that these creatures were terrified even by their voice and smell<sup>9</sup>. The flesh of a crocodile is white and fat, and is a delicious dish when young; the Arabs of the upper Egypt are very fond of it<sup>10</sup>, and formerly the inhabitants of Elephantis used also to eat these animals<sup>11</sup>.

THE hippopotami are common in the upper Egypt, especially near the cataracts, but are scarce to be met with in any part of the lower Egypt. These creatures never go in herds, and it is rare to see two of them together. They are so distrustful, and fly with that swiftness from their pursuers, that they are very seldom taken<sup>12</sup>.

BESIDES wild and tame oxen, camels, asses, goats and sheep, of which there is great plenty in Egypt, and the flesh of the last very delicate food, there are a vast number of antelopes, and a large kind of ape, with a head somewhat like a dog, whence it was called cynocephalus: the Egyptians often used the figure of this beast as a hieroglyphic. The camelion is also common in the hedges near al Kabira.

THE animal called the little, or land crocodile (which we take to be the scincus of Pliny<sup>13</sup>) is about the bigness of a lizard, and has a round tail covered with scales. It is found near the Nile and the red sea, and usually feeds on the most odoriferous flowers: the flesh is of use in physic, great numbers of them being for that reason carried to Venice and other places.

THE Egyptian rat, called by the antients ichneumon, is of the size of a cat, with very rough hair, spotted with white, yellow and ash colour; its nose like that of a hog, with which it digs up the earth: it has short black legs, and a tail like a fox. It lives on lizards, serpents, snails, camelions, rats, and other animals; and is of great service in Egypt, by its natural instinct hunting out and breaking the eggs of the crocodile, and thereby preventing too great an increase of that destructive creature. The naturalists also say, that it is so greedy after the crocodile's liver, that rolling itself in

Of the animals of Egypt

<sup>1</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>2</sup> LE BRUN. Voyag. tom. II.

<sup>3</sup> Deut. xi. 10, 11, 12.

<sup>4</sup> Vid.

HEROD. l. 2. DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. p. 32. STRABO. l. 17.

<sup>5</sup> Lettre du P. SICARD, dans les Mem.

des Missions, tom. VI. p. 252.

<sup>6</sup> Ubi sup.

<sup>7</sup> SICARD, ubi sup.

<sup>8</sup> LUCAN, ubi sup.

tom. I. p. 88.

<sup>9</sup> PLIN. Nat. Hist. l. 8. c. 25.

<sup>10</sup> SICARD, ubi sup.

<sup>11</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>12</sup> SICARD, ubi sup. p. 251.

<sup>13</sup> Nat. hist. ubi sup.

mud, it slips down his throat, while he sleeps with his mouth open, and gnaws its way a out again<sup>f</sup>. This animal is easily tamed, but must not be kept where cats are, with which they are at perpetual enmity<sup>g</sup>.

Of birds there are also great numbers in Egypt, particularly ostriches, eagles, hawks, and a prodigious number of water-fowl, as pelicans, flamingo's or phanicopteri, wild geese, herons, ducks, and various other sorts. Those which are proper to the Nile, are the ibis, the goose with golden feathers, the rice-hen, or hen of Dimyat, and the saksak; which last is the trackilus of the antients<sup>h</sup>, observed by them to be the only creature with which the crocodile is in friendship, because this bird picks and clears his mouth of the leaches which infest it<sup>i</sup>. The ibis deserves particular notice; not only because it is so peculiar to Egypt, that it pines away and dies if carried elsewhere, but for the great use it is of in that country, by destroying the flying serpents, which the south winds bring from the deserts of Libya, and are shaped as the water-snakes, with wings like a bat. In the proper season of the year, these birds in vast numbers, by a peculiar instinct, go and wait on the frontiers for these serpents, and devour them as they fly, before they enter Egypt. There are two kinds of the ibis: One is of a deep black, and about the bigness of a heron; this is the ibis which kills the serpents, and is seldom found except only in the lower Egypt: the other is white, but has the head, neck, and ends of the wings, and tail, as black as the former; and are so common, that one often sees vast numbers of them. The bill and legs of this bird resemble those of a stork; its usual food (besides the serpents abovementioned) are snails, locusts and other insects<sup>k</sup>.

BESIDES the lakes which are in other parts of Egypt, those in the Delta, near the sea, of which there are three pretty large ones between Alexandria and Tinab<sup>l</sup>, the ancient Pelafium, afford great numbers of fish, though not of above seven or eight sorts; two of which they salt, and send large quantities to Syria, Cyprus and Constantinople. The revenues of one of these lakes alone, called Manzalah, bring into the Turkish emperor's treasury no less than forty thousand crowns a year. Those who live near these lakes eat a great deal of fresh fish, and very cheap, as the Israelites formerly did<sup>m</sup>; but the heat of the climate will not suffer them to be carried far; for which reason the inhabitants of al Kabira are obliged to content themselves with the fish which the Nile d affords them. The bed of that river being very full of mud and slime, communicates a muddy taste to all the fish that are fed in it, except four sorts, which are very excellent. These are the kesher or lates, the latos of the antients, which is often so large as to weigh two or three hundred pounds; the casbouc, formerly called the oxyrinchus, from the sharpness of its nose; the bonni, which weigh sometimes twenty or thirty pounds, and is the lepidotus so much esteemed by the old Egyptians; and the karmud, known in ancient writers by the name of phagrus: this last is black, grows to the same size as the bonni, and is a very voracious fish. What makes these fish the more serviceable to the inhabitants of al Kabira, is, that they are to be found in the Nile at all seasons of the year, and are very easily taken<sup>n</sup>.

Of the vegetables of Egypt.

THOUGH woods are very rare in Egypt, yet there are some forests of palm-trees towards the deserts of Libya; and near Dandera, the ancient Tentyra, there is one of doms, or wild date-trees<sup>o</sup>, whose fruits is excessive hard, but much admired by those of the country. Palm-trees are the most common of all others in this country; besides which there are several sorts of fruit-trees, and also some cedars, though not so large, or so frequently to be seen as in Syria; and a great thorny tree called al bilaji, out of which perhaps the ancient Egyptians made those boats mentioned by Herodotus<sup>p</sup>. However Egypt is not a country proper for trees, which thrive not there without great care and cultivation. As to plants, the case is very different; the kinds are so very various, that we shall mention only a few, and chiefly those which may give some light into ancient history<sup>q</sup>.

THE first I shall take notice of is the reed papyrus or byblus, called at present by the natives al berdi. It grows on the banks of the Nile, and shoots out a stalk of nine or ten foot high; the trunk is composed of a great number of long strait fibres, which produce small flowers; the leaves are like the blade of a sword, and they make use of them to keep wounds open; the ashes of the stalk also cure those that are not inveterate. This is the plant whereof the antients made their writing-paper, which thence took its name. The way of making it was, by taking out the pith of the stalk, which they worked into a white paste or glew, and of that made the paper, almost in

<sup>f</sup> Vid. DIODOR. SIC. p. 32, 78. tom. VI. p. 249.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 245.

<sup>h</sup> SICARD Mem. des Mill.

<sup>i</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>k</sup> Vid. HEROD. ibid.

<sup>l</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 246

<sup>m</sup> SICARD, ubi sup. p. 233, &c.

<sup>n</sup> Numb. xi. 5.

<sup>o</sup> Ibid. p. 245, &c.

<sup>p</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 242.

<sup>q</sup> SICARD, ubi sup. p. 157.

<sup>r</sup> Lib. 2.

a the same manner as we do with our linen rags; but others say it was made of the inner rind of the plant. Before agriculture was improved in Egypt, this reed was of great service; for they did not only use it as food, but made clothes, boats, and domestic utensils of it; and also crowns for their gods, and shoes for their priests. But more useful inventions have set all this aside, and the plant is now entirely neglected<sup>1</sup>.

THE flax of Egypt, especially one sort of it, was so exceeding fine, and they dressed and spun it so curiously, that the threads could scarce be seen<sup>2</sup>. It grew in so great plenty, that they had not only enough to cloath their priests (who wore nothing else) and people of condition<sup>3</sup>, and to make shrouds for their dead, but to drive a very great trade with it into foreign parts. The fine linen of Egypt was in great request b over all the east<sup>4</sup>; that superfine sort of it, called byssus, was often dyed in purple, and was so dear, that none but rich people could afford to wear it.

THE lotus, which grows plentifully in the lower Egypt, especially near Rashid or Rosetta, is called by the inhabitants al basbun, and is a species of nenuphar, nymphaea, or water-lily. Its leaves float on the water, and cover the surface of it, producing many flowers, which were formerly wove into the crowns of conquerors. The antient Egyptians made bread of the middle or pulp of this plant dried, which resembled that of a poppy; and the root of it, which is round, and as big as an apple, was also eaten by them<sup>5</sup>. This lotus is different from that fruit of the same name whereon the Lotophagi lived<sup>6</sup>. The Arabs at this day make a drink of the Egyptian lotus, c which is very good for inward heat; and they eat the stalk and heads of them raw, which are very moist and cooling<sup>7</sup>.

THE benna, called alcanna by the botanist, is a shrub which shoots forth a great many branches. Its leaves are like that of an olive-tree, but shorter, broader, and of a more pleasant green. The flowers, which are set like those of the elder, have an agreeable smell, and are thrown by the inhabitants into their baths<sup>8</sup>. The women dye their nails and other parts with a reddish colour extracted from this plant, by way of ornament.

OTHER plants, the fruits and roots of which are eaten by the inhabitants, are in so great abundance, and so excellent in their kind, that they are almost sufficient to maintain them without the use of corn<sup>9</sup>; and formerly the labouring people scarce lived d on any thing else. It is not therefore so surprising, that the Israhelites in the wilderness regretted the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick<sup>10</sup>, which they used to eat so freely in Egypt.

THE buildings and other works of the antient Egyptians, which have raised the admiration of all succeeding ages, deserve a more particular view.

THE first enquiry generally made by those who would be acquainted with this country, is concerning the pyramids, those stupendous structures, which were deservedly reckoned by the antients among the wonders of the world. Of the artificial rarities of Egypt. The pyramids.

THERE are many of them in several parts of Egypt, and particularly in the upper e Egypt, as we have already observed; but those which have been chiefly taken notice of and described by travellers, stand on the west side of the Nile, not far from Fyzah, which succeeded the antient Memphis. The number of these pyramids is about twenty, of which three, standing pretty near together, are most remarkable, and are those which have been so often described. The other lie far scattered in the Libyan desert, and are lesser models of the other, though some of them are very considerable, particularly one, which stands south-and-by-west from them, at about twenty miles distance more within the desert, and has been undeservedly neglected both by antient and modern writers, though it be as worthy of memory, and as near a miracle as any of the former three.

f IT is the common opinion, that the word pyramid is derived from the Greek pyr or W hence so pyr, fire; and that these structures were so called from their shape, ascending from named. a broad base, and ending in a point like a flame of fire. Others, whose opinion Vossius<sup>11</sup> seems to approve, say they took the name from pyros, which in the same language signifies wheat, because they will have them to be the granaries of the antient Egyptian kings; but a late writer, versed in the Coptic tongue, has given us another etymology from that language, wherein puoro signifies a king, and nusi, a race or generation: and the reason why the pyramids had this name given them was, as he tells us, because they were erected to preserve the memory of those princes and their families; and that those

<sup>1</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 249, &c. Vid. ROLLIN. Hist. anc. vol. I. p. 106. Vid. PLIN. l. 13. c. 11.

<sup>2</sup> Vid. PLIN. Nat. Hist. l. 19. c. 1.

<sup>3</sup> Vid. Genes. iv. 42.

<sup>4</sup> Prov. vii. 16. Ezek. xxvii. 7.

<sup>5</sup> HEROD. l. 2. DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 30.

<sup>6</sup> HEROD. l. 4.

<sup>7</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 257.

<sup>8</sup> Idem, ibid.

<sup>9</sup> PLIN. l. 21. c. 15.

<sup>10</sup> Numb. xi. 5.

<sup>11</sup> Etymol. ling. Lat. voce Pyramid.

Vid. STEPH. de urb. voce Πυραμίδες.

who were descended from them, had therefore recourse to those pillars to prove their pedigree<sup>b</sup> (E).

By custom built.

Who were the builders of these pyramids has been matter of much dispute. Josephus<sup>c</sup>, followed by some modern writers<sup>d</sup>, supposed they were erected by the Israelites during their heavy pressure under the tyranny of the Pharaohs. The scriptures however seem to be against this opinion, for they expressly make the slavish employment of that people to have been the making of bricks, whereas all these pyramids are of stone. Others pretend they were built by the patriarch Joseph, for granaries to lay up the corn of the seven plentiful years<sup>e</sup>; and to support this imagination, alledge the abovementioned derivation from pyros, wheat: but this opinion is much more groundless than the former; for besides that their figure is the least capacious of any regular mathematical body, and therefore improper for such a purpose, the straightness and tenuity of the rooms within (the rest being a solid fabric of stone) do utterly overthrow such a conjecture.

HERODOTUS says, the first or greatest of the three most remarkable pyramids was built by Cheops, whom Diodorus names Ckemmis; for that they were the same person will appear hereafter. The second, both those historians agree to have been erected by Cephren, brother and successor to the former prince. And the third was the work of Mycerinus, the son of Cheops<sup>f</sup>. This last, some of the Greeks pretended was built by Rhodopis<sup>g</sup> or Rhodope, a courtesan whom Sappho called Doricka, mistress to her brother Charaxus<sup>h</sup>. But this is very improbable, if we consider either her condition or the vastness of the expence; though some, to mend the story, say several governors of provinces, who were in love with her, built it for her by contribution<sup>i</sup>: besides Herodotus has shewn that she lived long after these pyramids were in being<sup>k</sup>. Yet, after all, Diodorus confesses that there is little agreement as to these pyramids, either among the natives or historians; some saying that the largest was built by Armaeus, the second by Amasis, and the third by Inaron<sup>l</sup>; and this uncertainty Pliny mentions as a just reward of the vanity of the undertakers<sup>m</sup>.

THE Arab writers assign other founders of these three pyramids different from those mentioned by the Greeks. To omit the fancy of those who thought them built by Jan ebn Jan, universal monarch of the whole world before Adam<sup>n</sup>, and the abovementioned opinion, which attributes them to Joseph; some say they were erected by Nimrod; some by queen Daluka; and others, by the Egyptians before the flood. The Copts report, that the east pyramid is the sepulchre of king Saurid, the western of his brother Hujib, and the coloured pyramid of Fazfarsim the son of Hujib. The Sabians pretend that one of them is the sepulchre of Seth, the second of Hermes (or Enoch) and the third of Sabir, from whom this sect say they are denominated: it is also said they go in pilgrimage thither, and sacrifice at them a cock and a black calf, and offer up incense<sup>o</sup>. But the general opinion is, that they were built by Saurid before the flood; and the Copts mention an inscription engraven on them to this effect: I Saurid, the king, built the pyramids in such and such a time, and finished them in six years: let that comes after me, and says he is equal to me, let him destroy them in six hundred years; and yet it is known, that it is easier to pluck down than to build; and when I had finished them I covered them with satten, and let him cover them with mats<sup>p</sup>.

As the antients have omitted speaking of several pyramids still remaining in the Lybian desert, so have they on the other hand mentioned the names and founders of fact. l. 1. c. 6. PERIZON. Orig. Egypt. p. 387, &c.

<sup>b</sup> WILKINS Dissert. de ling. Copt. p. 108.

NONNUS, &c. apud Greaves, ubi infra.

ubi sup.

ubi sup.

<sup>o</sup> MFRAT ALZEMAN. apud Greaves, ubi infra.

AL HORM.

<sup>c</sup> Antiq. l. 2. c. 5.

<sup>d</sup> SPONDANUS de creat.

<sup>e</sup> STAPH. de urb. ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. HEROD. l. 2. DIODOR. Sic. l. 1.

<sup>g</sup> HEROD.

<sup>h</sup> HEROD.

<sup>i</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>j</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>k</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>l</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>m</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>n</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>o</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>p</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>q</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>r</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>s</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>t</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>u</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>v</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>w</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>x</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>y</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>z</sup> DIODOR.

(E) This gentleman endeavours to support his assertion by the authority of Herodotus, as if he affirmed that the Egyptians preserved their genealogies on pillars, and that those pillars were called pyramids; but we do not remember any such thing in that author. The passage quoted is no more than this; that when Hecataeus the historian acquainted the priest of Jupiter with his genealogy, and derived himself from no less than sixteen gods, the priests would by no means admit that a man could be begotten by a god, but shewed him three hundred and forty five large wooden images of their high priests in a spacious edifice, which stood in regular order, the son being placed after the father; and told him, that none of them had been reputed either a god or a hero; but that each image which he saw represented a piromis begotten by another piromis; the word piromis signifying no more in their language, than an honest man. (1). It may be observed, that romi, and, with the article, piromi, signifies a man in the present Coptic.

(1) HEROD. l. 2.

some

- a some others, not much inferior to these three in magnitude, which have been long since ruined and defaced by time. Herodotus says there was one of forty fathoms, or two hundred and forty feet, which stood at the end of the labyrinth, with large figures of animals in sculpture, and a subterraneous passage to it <sup>a</sup>. This seems to be that pyramid wherein Strabo tells us Imandes, or, as Diodorus names him, Osymanduas was buried, and therefore probably built by him; though he differs from Herodotus as to the dimensions, making each side of it to be four hundred feet, and the height as much <sup>a</sup>. Pliny, who agrees with Herodotus in this last particular, mentions several pyramids built near the labyrinth, but if his expression <sup>a</sup> be not mistaken, describes them to be sexangular. Meris, who lived after Osymanduas, but long before Cheops, also built two pyramids, one for himself, and the other for his wife, in the midst of a lake which he dug, and which we shall take notice of by and by. These pyramids were each a furlong in height, and stood one half above the water, and the other half under the water; and on the top of each there was placed a marble statue or colossus sitting on a throne <sup>a</sup>. It is said that Cheops, having exhausted his treasures in building the first and largest pyramid, prostituted his own daughter, commanding her to get as much money as she could; and that she, at the same time she obeyed her father, contrived to leave a monument of herself also, and asked every one that came to her to give her a stone towards the structure she designed: by which means she built a pyramid, which stood in the midst of the three, within view of the great pyramid, and extended to the length of a plethron and a half (or about one hundred and fifty foot) on every side of the basis <sup>a</sup>. This story has some resemblance to that of Rhodopis abovementioned, and might perhaps have given occasion to it. After all these, Alychis, the successor of Mycerinus, built a pyramid of brick, with this inscription cut in stone: Compare me not with the pyramids of stone, for I as far excel them as Jupiter does the other gods: for, striking the bottom of the lake with long poles, and gathering the mud which stuck to them, thereof they made bricks, and formed me in that manner <sup>a</sup>. Diodorus mentions three other pyramids, each side of which contained two hundred feet, and says that Chemmis, Cephren, and Mycerinus were reputed to have erected them for their wives <sup>a</sup>. These likewise are not now to be seen, unless they should be some of those in the desert, which well answer the measure assigned by Diodorus; but if those princes built them for their queens, it may be wondered why they placed them so remote from their own sepulchres, or at such large and unequal distances of several miles from one another <sup>a</sup>.

SINCE it is uncertain who were the founders of the pyramids that are now standing, it would be in vain to endeavour to determine the time when they were built. The ages of the several princes to whom they have been attributed, will best appear when we discourse of the Egyptian chronology: in the mean time, we shall observe, that the least antiquity which can be allowed these structures, seems to be near three thousand years; since Herodotus, who lived two thousand two hundred years ago, was able to find so little satisfaction in his enquiries after them; and Diodorus, who lived before the birth of our Saviour, supposes the great pyramid to have been built at least one thousand years before his time <sup>a</sup>.

NOT to mention a second time the improbability of their conjecture, who imagine these buildings were designed for granaries, it is the constant opinion of most authors who have wrote on this subject, that they were intended for sepulchres and monuments of the dead. Diodorus expressly tells us, that Chemmis and Cephren designed those built by them for their sepulchres, though it happened that neither of them were buried in them <sup>a</sup>; and Strabo judges all those near Memphis to have been royal sepulchres <sup>a</sup>: to which the writings of the Arabs are consonant, as has been observed above. And if none of these authors were extant, the tomb which stands at this day in the first pyramid, puts it out of controversy.

WHY the Egyptian kings should have been at so vast an expence in building of these pyramids, is an enquiry of a higher nature. Aristotle makes them to have been the works of tyranny <sup>a</sup>: and Pliny conjectures that they built them partly out of ostentation, and partly out of state-policy, to divert the people, by this employment, from mutinies and rebellions <sup>a</sup>. But the true reason depends on higher considerations, and sprang from the theology of the Egyptians; who not only believed the resurrection, but that as long as the body endured, so long the soul continued with it; which last was also the opinion of the Stoics <sup>a</sup>. And hence it was, that this nation took that excessive care to preserve the corps from corruption, and were at so great costs in raising a monuments for them, as will be specified hereafter.

The time when the pyramids were built.

The end for which they were erected.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. l. 2.    <sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 44.    <sup>a</sup> STRABO, l. 17.    <sup>a</sup> Senas radicem oras obtinentes. PLIN. l. 36. c. 13.    <sup>a</sup> HEROD. & DIOD. ubi sup.    <sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.    <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. ubi sup. p.    <sup>a</sup> GREAVES descr. of the pyramids, p. 113.    <sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 47.    <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. p. 58.    <sup>a</sup> STRABO, l. 17.    <sup>a</sup> ARISTOT. pol. l. 3.    <sup>a</sup> PLIN. l. 36. c. 12.    <sup>a</sup> Vid. SERVIVM in Virgil. Æn. 3.

THE reason why they frequently made use of the pyramidal figure for these monuments (for they were not always of that shape) to omit several philosophical fancies of little solidity<sup>a</sup>, seems to have been, because it is the most permanent form of structure; for by reason of the gradual contracting and lessening of it at the top, it is neither overpressed with its own weight, nor is subject to the sinking in of rain, as other buildings: or else they might thereby intend to represent some of their gods; pyramids and obelisks, which are but a lesser sort of pyramids, being both by them and other heathens, antiently made use of and worshipped as images of several deities<sup>c</sup>.

THIS practice of the Egyptians of erecting pyramids, or columns of that shape, b for sepulchres, was also sometimes, though not very frequently, imitated by other nations. That of Porfena, king of Etruria, built by him near Clusium in Italy, was accounted almost miraculous; though it was more to be admired for the number and contrivance of the pyramids, which were fourteen, than for any excessive magnitude<sup>e</sup>. The tomb of C. Cæstius, now standing at Rome near the mons testaceus, or il Dolio, is built after the model of those of Egypt, but is much less.

Their description.

THE dimensions and descriptions of the three greatest of the pyramids of Memphis have been given by several writers, both antient historians and modern travellers. They differ pretty much from one another as to the dimensions. A countryman of our own, who measured them with great care, and wanted not ability to do it with the greatest accuracy, seems to have been the most exact; for which reason we shall chiefly adhere to his observations.

The dimensions of the first pyramid.

THE first and fairest of these three pyramids is situated on a rocky hill, in the sandy desert of Lybia, about a quarter of a mile from the plains of Egypt; above which the rock rises 100 feet, or better, with a gentle and easy ascent. Upon this advantageous rise and solid foundation is the pyramid erected; the height of the situation adding to the beauty of the work, and the solidity of the rock affording it a stable support. The north side, near the basis, being measured by a radius of 10 feet in length, taking two several stations, was found by our author to be 693 English feet. The other sides were examined by a line, for want of an even level, and a convenient distance to place the instruments. The altitude, if measured by its perpendicular, is 481 feet; but if it be taken as the pyramid ascends inclining, then is it equal, in respect of the lines subtending the several angles, to the latitude of the basis (F). Whereby it appears that though several of the antients have excessively magnified the height of these pyramids, yet the biggest of them falls short of the height of St. Paul's church in London; which from the ground to the top of the lanthorn only, is no less than 470 feet. If we imagine on the sides of the basis, which is frequently square, four equilateral triangles

<sup>a</sup> Vid. Auctor. anonym. ad calcem Hieroglyph. PIERIJ.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. GREAVES, ubi sup. p. 62.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. p. 64.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. SOLIN. Polyhist. c. 45. AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. 23.

(F) According to Herodotus, each face of this pyramid contains 8 plethra, or 800 Grecian feet, in length (1). Diodorus Siculus (who comes nearest the truth) makes this dimension but 7 plethra, or 700 feet (2); and Strabo, less than a furlong (3); that is, less than 600 Grecian, or 625 Roman feet. Whereas Pliny equals it to 883 (4). As to the height, Herodotus says, it is equal to the breadth of one of its sides; which is true, if taken for the inclining, and not the perpendicular altitude. By Strabo's computation, the height exceeds the breadth: but Diodorus rightly acknowledges it to be something less. The altitude of this pyramid was taken by Tales, the Milesian; but his admeasurement is not preserved. The method proposed by him to do it, must be very uncertain; for it was by observing the hour when the shadow of the body is equal to its height (5).

Of the modern travellers, Belon, or rather Gyllius (for the other it is said was a plagiarism, and published the observations of Gyllius in his own name) (6) makes the breadth of each side 324 paces; and

(1) HEROD. l. 2.

(2.) DIOD. SIC. l. 1.

p. 37. (3) STRABO, l. 17. p. 1161. (4) PLIN. l. 36. c. 12.

(5) PLIN. ibid. Vid. DIOD.

LAERT. in vita Talesis. (6) Vid. THUAN. Hist. l. 16.

(7) BELON. Observ. l. 2. c. 44.

(8) Apud Kircher. Oedip. vol. III. p. 294. (9) RAD-the height 250 steps, each step being 45 inches high (7). Marcus Grimani, patriarch of Aquileia, and afterwards cardinal, computes it to be 270 paces broad, and as much in height (8). Prince Radzevil says, it is reported to be 300 cubits every way (9). Della Valle sets down nothing precisely, but acquiesces in the measures of Belon (10). Thevenot tells us it is 320 feet high, on a square base of 682 feet (11). And Le Bruyn calculates the height to be 112 fathom, which, at 5 feet and a half to the fathom, is 616 feet; and the breadth 300 paces, or 128 fathom; that is, according to the same proportion, 704 feet (12). Wansleb says, the sides of the pyramids are not equal; it being visible in the largest, and so in the others, that the north side is longer than that which stretches from east to west; (which expression perhaps the reader may understand, but we do not;) the dimensions he gives us, are those of Thevenot (13). The Arab writers make the perpendicular height 317 cubits, and the breadth of each side 460 (14).

ZIVIL. Ierosol. peregr. p. 161.

(10) DELLA

VALLI, Lett. II. p. 359.

(11) THEVEN.

Voy. l. 1. c. 5.

(12) LE BRUYN. Voy.

(13) WANSLEB, apud Ray, Collection of travels, vol. II. p. 137, 138.

(14) Vid. KIRCHER.

ubi sup. p. 300.

mutually

a mutually inclining till they meet in a point (for so the top seems to those who stand below) then we shall have a just idea of the true dimensions and figure of this pyramid; the area of whose basis contains 480,249 square feet, or something more than eleven English acres of ground; a proportion so monstrous, that did not the antients attest as much, and some of them more (G), it might appear incredible.

THE ascent to the top of the pyramid is contrived by degrees, or steps, the lowest of which is near 4 feet in height, and 3 in breadth; and running about the pyramid in a level, made a narrow walk, when the stones were entire, on every side. The second degree is like the first, benching in near 3 feet. In the same manner is the third row placed on the second; and the rest in order, like so many stairs rising one above another to the top; which ends not in a point, as mathematical pyramids do, but in a little flat, or square of 13,280 English feet broad, and consisting of 9 stones, besides two which are wanting at the corners (H). This pyramid, by reason of the stones being worn by the weather, cannot be conveniently ascended, except on the south side, or at the north-east angle. The steps are made of massy and polished stones, said to have been hewn out of the Arabian mountains<sup>a</sup>, which bound the upper Egypt on the east; and are so vast, that the breadth and depth of every step is one single stone. Herodotus makes the least stone to be 30 feet<sup>a</sup>; and this may be granted in some, but not in all, unless his words be understood of cubical feet; which dimension, or a greater in the exterior ones, may, without difficulty, be admitted. It is also to be observed, that the steps are not all of equal depth; for some are near 4 feet, and others want of 3, diminishing the higher one ascends; and the breadth of them is proportionable to their depth; so that a right line, extended from the basis to the top, will equally touch the outward angle of every degree. The number of these steps is not mentioned by any of the antients; but modern travellers differ very much in their computaion (I). Our author and two others counted them very carefully, and found them to be 207; though one of them in descending reckoned 208.

HENCE it may be considered, how far we may credit what some say, viz. that an arrow shot from the top of this pyramid cannot fly beyond the basis, but will fall on some of the steps; it being certain, that an indifferent arm can easily shoot an arrow much further than one half of the breadth of this pyramid: it is confessed, however, that a man, unless he be very strong, cannot throw a stone from the top, so as to make it fall beyond the steps<sup>c</sup>. Some of the antients have reported, that these pyramids cast no shadow<sup>b</sup>; which if taken strictly, must be also a mistake: it is true, for almost three quarters of the year they cast no shadow at noon; but in winter they certainly do.

As to the inside of this pyramid, the antients are altogether silent; except only that Herodotus says, there were subterraneous vaults built within the hill on which it stands; and that the founder of it conveyed the water of the Nile thither by a trench, and formed a little island in the midst of the water, designing to place his sepulchre on that ground<sup>d</sup>. Strabo also mentions an oblique entrance into this pyramid, to be seen on removing a stone which covered it; and Pliny takes notice of a well of 86

The outside of the pyramid.

The inside of it.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. & DIOD. ubi sup.
Voy. Yet see LUCAS, tom. I. p. 45.
L 22. CASSIODOR. var. 7. form. 15.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi sup. POMP. MELA. l. 1. c. 9. <sup>b</sup> LE BRUYN.
<sup>c</sup> SOLIN. Polyhist. c. 45. AUSON. Idyll. 3. ANN. MARCELL.
<sup>d</sup> HEROD. ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> STRAB. ubi sup.

(G) The area, according to Herodotus, must be 640,000; and according to Diodorus 490,000 square feet. Pliny assigns the basis to be but 8 Roman jugera, which is probably a mistake of the transcriber; for the square of the side, by his admeasurement, must be no less than 779,689 Roman feet, almost equal to 28 jugera (1).

(H) Herodotus gives no dimensions of this flat; Diodorus says, it is 9 feet (2); but Pliny seems to make it 25 feet, if we rightly understand the passage of that author; for Hardouin is surely mistaken, in supposing him to mean that the pyramid was 25,000 feet high (3). Belon says, the diameter is 2 paces (4), Radzivil 10 cubits (5), and Thevenot about 16 feet and 2 thirds (6). They differ also in the number of stones which cover it: one will have it a single stone (7); another counts 3 (8); and a third 11 or 12 (9).

(1) Vid. PLIN. l. 16. c. 32. (2) DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 57. (3) PLIN. ubi sup. Vid. HARDUIN. in loc. (4) BELON, ubi sup. (5) RADZIVIL. Itrof. peregr. p. 162. (6) THEV. ubi sup. (7) Voy. de VILLAMONT. (8) SANDYS Trav. p. 100.

On this platform Proclus supposed the Egyptian priests made their astronomical observations (10); but it is far from being probable, that these structures were designed for observatories. And it is scarce to be conceived, that the priests would take the pains to ascend so high, when they might make the same observations with more ease, and as much certainty, below; having as free and open a prospect of the heavens, and over the plains of Egypt, from the rock itself as from the tops of the pyramids (11).

(1) Belon counts 250, Sandys 255, Leuvenstein 260; Helfricus 230, Grimani and Le Bruyn 110, Lucas 243, and Thevenot 208 (12). This last author observes, it is very difficult to count them exactly; not only because a man may miscount, but because several of the lower steps are, in some places, covered with sand.

(9) THEVEN. ubi sup. (10) PROCL. in Tim. (11) GREAVES, ubi supr. p. 73. Vid. CICERO. de divinat. l. 1. (12) See the places quoted above, and LUCAS, Voy. tom. I. p. 45.

cubits in depth, into which he supposes the water of the Nile was brought by some a secret aqueduct*. What the Arabs relate of the inner parts of these buildings, is no better than a romance; for which reason we shall proceed to those accounts that may be better depended on.

THE entrance into the pyramid is by a square narrow passage, which opens in the midst of the north-side on the 16th step, or ascending 38 feet (K), on an artificial bank of earth. The stone that is over it is very big, being near 12 feet long, and above 8 feet wide. This entry goes declining with an angle of 26 degrees, and is in breadth exactly 3,463 English feet, and in length 92 feet and a half. The structure of it has been the labour of an exquisite hand, as appears by the smoothness and evenness of the work, and close knitting of the joints, a property long since observed by Diodorus to b have run through the whole fabric of this pyramid. At the end of this passage there is another like the former, but goes a little rising: at the meeting of these two passages, the one descending, and the other ascending, the lowermost stone of the roof, perpendicular to it, forms a sharp ridge, between which and the sand there is sometimes not a foot space to pass through; so that a man must slide on his belly close to the ground, and yet grate his back against the abovementioned stone, unless he be very slender. However, this difficulty is occasioned chiefly by the sand which the wind drives into this place; for if the passage be cleared, it is of the same dimensions there as at the entrance. There being no window, or other opening in this pyramid to admit the light, it may easily be conceived, that those who would view the inside c must carry lights with them.

HAVING passed this streight, on the right hand there is an ugly broken hole of about 89 feet in length, the height and breadth various, and not worthy consideration: whether this part be decayed by time, or has been dug away for curiosity, or hopes of discovering some hidden treasure, is uncertain. On the left hand, adjoining to the narrow entrance, climbing up a steep and massy stone, 8 or 9 feet in height, one enters on the lower end of the first gallery; the pavement of which rises with a gentle acclivity, consisting of smooth polished marble, and where not smeared with dust and filth, appearing of a white and alabaster colour; the sides and roof of unpolished stone, not so hard and compact as that of the pavement; the breadth of this gallery d is almost 5 feet, the height about as much, and the length 110 feet. At the end of it there are two passages, one low and horizontal, or level with the ground, and the other high and rising like the former. At the entry of the lower passage, on the right hand, is the well mentioned by Pliny, which is circular, and a little above 3 foot diameter: the sides are lined with white marble, and the descent is by fixing the hands and feet in little open spaces cut in the sides within, opposite and answering to one another in a perpendicular; which is the contrivance for descending into most of the wells and cisterns at Alexandria. This well might lead to the vault abovementioned; but it is almost now stopped up with rubbish, and not above 20 feet deep.

LEAVING the well, and going strait on the distance of 15 feet, one enters another e passage opening against the former, and of the same dimensions, the stones of which are very massy, and exquisitely joined. This passage runs in a level 110 feet, and leads to an arched vault or chamber, standing due east and west, of a grave-like smell, and half full of rubbish; its length not quite 20 feet, the breadth about 17, and the height less than 15; the walls are entire, and plaistered over with lime; the roof is covered with large smooth stones, not lying flat but shelving, and meeting above in an angle. On the east side of this room, in the middle of it, Greaves says there seems to have been a passage leading to some other place; but neither Thevenot nor Le Bruyn could discover any such.

RETURNING back through the narrow horizontal passage, you climb over it, and f enter into the other, or second gallery, on the left, divided from the first gallery by the wall, in which is the entrance to the last-mentioned passage. This second gallery is a very stately piece of work, and not inferior, either in curiosity of art or richness of materials, to the most sumptuous and magnificent buildings: it rises with an angle of 26 degrees, and is in length 154 feet from the well below; but if measured on the pavement, somewhat less, by reason of a little vacuity of about 15 feet, before described, between the well and the square hole: the height of it is 26 feet, and the breadth 6,870 feet, of which one half is to be allowed for the way in the midst, * PLIN. ubi sup.

(K) In the following description we have only given the measures of Greaves, though other travellers vary both from him and one another therein.

But we did not think those variations considerable enough to be particularly set down.

- a there being a stone bench on each side of the wall, a little more than a foot in breadth, and as much in depth. On the top of these benches, near the angle where they close with the wall, are little spaces, cut in right angled parallel figures, set in each side opposite to one another; intended, no question, for some other end than ornament. The stone of which this gallery is built, is a white and polished marble, very evenly cut in large tables; and the joints are so close, that they are scarce discernable by a curious eye: but what adds grace to the whole structure, though it makes the passage the more slippery and difficult, is the acclivity and rising of the ascent. However, the going up is not a little facilitated by certain holes made in the floor, about six hands breadth from one another, into which a man may set his feet, while he holds by the
- b bench with one hand. In the ranging of the marble tables, in both the side walls, there is one piece of architecture very graceful; and that is, that all the courses, which are but seven, do set and flag over one another about three inches, the bottom of the upper course oversetting the higher part of the next below it, in order as they descend.

HAVING passed this admirable gallery, one enters another square hole, of the same dimensions with the former, which leads into two small antichambers, or closets, lined with a rich and speckled kind of Thebaic marble. The first of these is almost equal to the second, which is of an oblong figure, one side containing 7 feet, and the other 3 and a half: the height is 10 feet, and the floor level. On the east and west sides, within 2 feet and an half of the top, which is somewhat larger than the bottom, are three semicircular cavities, or little seats.

THE inner antichamber is separated from the former by a stone of red speckled marble, which hangs in two mortices (like the leaf of a sluice) between two walls, more than 3 feet above the pavement, and wanting 2 of the roof. From this second closet you enter another square hole, over which are five lines cut parallel and perpendicular; besides which, no other sculptures or engravings are observed in the whole pyramid (L). This square passage is of the same wideness as the rest, and in length near 9 feet, being all of Thebaic marble most exquisitely cut, and landing you at the north end of a very sumptuous and well proportioned room. The distance from d the end of the second gallery to this entry, running upon the same level, is 24 feet.

THIS magnificent and spacious chamber, in which art may seem to have contended with nature, the curious work being not inferior to the rich materials, stands as it were in the heart and centre of the pyramid, equidistant from all the sides, and almost in the midst between the basis and the top. The floor, the sides, and the roof of it are all made of vast and exquisite tables of Thebaic marble, which, if they were not obscured by the steam of torches, would appear glittering and shining. From the top of it descending to the bottom there are about six ranges of stone, all which being respectively sized to an equal height, very gracefully in one and the same altitude run round the room. The stones which cover this chamber are of a stupendous length, like so many e huge beams lying flat and traversing the room, and withal supporting that infinite mass and weight of the pyramid above. Of these there are nine which cover the roof; two of them are less by half in breadth than the rest, the one at the east end, and the other at the west. The length of the chamber on the south side, most accurately taken at the joint or line where the first and second row of stones meet, is 34,380 English feet; the breadth of the west side, at the joint or line where the first and second row of stones meet, is 17,190 feet; and the height 19 feet and a half.

WITHIN this glorious room stands the monument of Cbeops or Ckemmis, of one piece of marble, hollow within, uncovered at the top, and sounding like a bell; which last particular is mentioned not as a rarity, but because some authors have taken notice

f of it as such. Some write that the body has been removed hence; but it has been already observed that the founder was not buried in it. This monument is of the same kind of stone with which the whole room is lined, being a speckled marble, with black, white and red spots, as it were equally mixed, which some call Thebaic marble; but Mr. Greaves rather conceives it to be that sort of porphyry which Pliny calls Leucostictos, of which there were, and still are an infinite number of columns in Egypt; though Burretini, who accompanied him, imagined this kind of marble came from mount Sinai, where he affirmed the rocks to be of the same colours, and that he had seen among them a great column of the same marble left imperfect, almost as big a as that called Pompey's pillar, near Alexandria.

(L) It may therefore be justly wondered whence the Arabians borrowed those vain traditions, that all sciences are inscribed within the pyramids in hieroglyphics; and also upon what authority Cornelius (or rather Ælius) Gallus is said to have therein engraven his victories (1).

(1) XIPHIL. in Cæs. Aug.

THE figure of the tomb is like an altar, or two cubes finely set together; it is cut smooth and plain, without any sculpture or engraving. The outward superficies is in length 7 feet 3 inches and a half, and in depth 3 feet 3 inches and 3 quarters. The hollow inside is in length on the west side 6,488 feet, in breadth at the north end 2,218 feet, and in depth 2,860 feet. As this monument could not have been brought hither thro' the abovementioned narrow passages, it is supposed to have been raised and placed there before the roof of the chamber was closed. It stands exactly in the meridian, or due north and south, and as it were equidistant from all sides of the chamber, except the east, from whence it is doubly remoter than from the west. Under it there is a little hollow space dug away, and a large stone in the pavement removed at the angle next adjoining to it, which Sandys imagined to be a passage into some other apartment, but more probably done in hopes of finding some treasure hidden there; it being a superstitious prodigality practised by the antients, and continued to this day in the East-Indies, to conceal money in their sepulchres. In the south and north sides of the chamber there are two inlets opposite to one another, seven tenths of a foot broad, four tenths of a foot deep, evenly cut, and running in a straight line 6 feet and farther into the thickness of the wall: that on the south side is larger and somewhat round, not so long as the former, and by the blackness within seems to have been made use of for setting of lamps in.

THIS is all that is to be seen within this first pyramid; but there is one thing more to be observed, and that is a very surprizing echo, which Plutarch takes notice of, and says, that it answers four or five times<sup>a</sup>; but a late traveller assures us, that it repeats no less than ten or twelve times very distinctly<sup>b</sup>. If we consider the narrow entrance of the pyramid, and the length of the two galleries, which all lie as it were in one continued line, and leading to the middle of the pyramid, we need not be at a loss to account for this effect; for the sound being shut in, and carried in those smooth passages, as in so many pipes or trunks, finding no issue out, reflects on itself, and causes a circulation of the air, which by degrees vanishes as the motion ceases<sup>c</sup>.

The second pyramid.

SCARCE the flight of an arrow distant from the first, toward the south, stands the second pyramid, of which, besides the miracle, both antient and modern writers have delivered very little. Herodotus says it falls short of the other in magnitude, he having measured them both, but he does not give the dimensions: he adds, that it has no subterraneous chambers, neither is the Nile conveyed into it by a channel, as into the former, but that it is of equal altitude<sup>d</sup>. Diodorus is somewhat more particular, and tells us, that for the architecture it is like the former, but much inferior to it in respect of magnitude, each side of the basis containing a stadium, or 600 Grecian feet, in length<sup>e</sup>; so that, by his computation, each side should want 100 Grecian feet of the former pyramid. Pliny makes the difference to be greater by 46 feet<sup>f</sup>. Most of the modern travellers do also agree this pyramid to be less than the other<sup>g</sup>. Thevenot makes it but 631 feet square<sup>h</sup>. However Strabo supposes these pyramids to be equal<sup>i</sup>; and Mr. Greaves, on the credit of a person who measured the second with a line, assures us the bases of both are alike; and that the height taken by a deliberate conjecture (which it is easy to do by reason of the nearness of this and the former, and their standing on the same plain) is not inferior to that of the first. This pyramid has no entrance, and is built of white stones, not near so vast as those of the first; the sides rise not with degrees like that, but are smooth and equal; the whole fabric (except where it is opposed to the south) seeming very entire, free from any deformed breaches<sup>j</sup>.

The priests lodgings near it.

ON the north and west sides of this second pyramid are two very stately and elaborate pieces about 30 feet in depth, and above 1400 in length, cut out of the rock in a perpendicular, and squared by the chissel; being designed, as is supposed, for lodgings of the Egyptian priests. They run parallel to the two sides of the pyramid, at a convenient distance from it, and meeting in a right angle make a very fair prospect. The entrance is by square openings hewn out of the rock, much of the same size with the narrow passages of the first pyramid, each leading into a square chamber, arched above with the natural rock. In most of them was a passage opening into some other apartments, but dark, and full of rubbish. On the north side without, there is a line engraven in sacred Egyptian characters<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> PLUT. de placitis Philos. l. 4. c. 20.

<sup>b</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. tom. I. p. 43.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. GREAVES;

ubi sup. p. 67—101. THEVENOT, part. 1. c. 5. LE BRUYN, tom. II. DELLA VALLE, lit. 11. p. 359, &c.

<sup>d</sup> HEROD. l. 2.

<sup>e</sup> DIODOR. SIC. l. 1.

<sup>f</sup> PLIN. l. 36. c. 12.

<sup>g</sup> RADZIVIL. p. 163. LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 46. SANDYS, p. 102, &c.

<sup>h</sup> THEVEN. ubi sup.

<sup>i</sup> STRABO, l. 17.

<sup>j</sup> GREAVES,

ubi sup. p. 103, &c.

<sup>k</sup> Idem ibid p. 106, &c.

- a The third pyramid stands at the distance of about a furlong from the second, on The third pyramid. an advantageous rising of the rock, whereby afar off it seems equal to the former, though the pile be much less and lower. Herodotus says it is 300 feet on every side (M), and to the middle built of Ethiopic marble<sup>1</sup>. Diodorus gives the same dimensions of the basis, and adds, that the walls were raised fifteen stories with black stone, like Thebaic marble, and the rest finished with such materials as the other pyramids are built with; that this piece of work, though it be exceeded by the two former in magnitude, yet for the structure, art, and magnificence of the marble, it far excels them; and that in the side towards the north, the name of Mycerinus, the founder, is engraved. Pliny writes to the same effect, except only that he makes this pyramid 363 feet between the angles<sup>2</sup>. Belon tells us, that it is but a third part greater than that of Cæsius at Rome; and that it is still perfect, and no more decayed than if it had been newly built, consisting of a kind of Ethiopic marble called Basaltis, harder than iron itself<sup>3</sup>. The descriptions of others of the moderns agree with this in substance, only differing as to some circumstances; so that they all seem to have copied Herodotus, or one another, and surfeited with the view of the two other pyramids, not to have been near this, since they so constantly agree in what is most evidently false; for they have mistaken both the quality of the stone, and the colour of the pyramid, the whole appearing to be of a clear and white stone, somewhat choicer and brighter than that in either of the two other pyramids: there are indeed the ruins of a pile of buildings on the east side of it, of a sad and dusky colour, which might be the occasion of the error. But Belon, and those who follow him, are more inexcusable in making this pyramid but a third part greater than that of Cæsius, which exactly measured, on that side which stands within the city, is completely 78 English feet in breadth, to which if we add a third part, the result will be 104, which should be equal to this Egyptian pyramid. An unpardonable oversight, of no less than 200 feet in a very little more than 300. For so much, besides the authority of Herodotus and Diodorus, Mr. Greaves takes the side of this pyramid to be, and the altitude to have much the same proportion. The name of Mycerinus is not now to be seen on it, the engraving having been defaced by time<sup>4</sup>.
- d To the descriptions of these three pyramids, we shall add that of a fourth, which A fourth pyramid. stands near the mummies, and which we take to be that remarkable one mentioned above. This pyramid would fall nothing short of the beauty of the first, if it had been finished: it has 148 steps of large stones like the first pyramid; the platform of it is not even, the stones being set together without order, which shews that it has not been finished, and yet it is much more antient than the other; as is evident by the stones which are all worn out and crumbled into sand. It is 643 feet square, and has its entry at the fourth part of its height on the north side, as the former, being distant from the east side 316 feet, and by consequence 327 from the west. There is but one passage into it, 3 feet and a half broad, and 4 feet high, which reaching 267 feet downwards, ends in a hall with a sharp arched roof 25 feet and a half in length, and 11 in breadth. In the corner of the hall there is another passage or gallery parallel to the horizon, 3 feet square within, and 9 feet and a half long, which leads to another chamber, 21 feet in length and 11 in breadth, with a very high arched roof also, having at the west end a square window raised 24 feet and two thirds from the floor, by which one enters into a passage, indifferent broad, and of a man's height, parallel to the horizon, and reaching in length 13 feet and 2 inches. There is a great room or hall at the end of this passage, with an arched roof, containing in length 26 feet 8 inches, and in breadth 24 feet and one inch: the floor of it is the natural rock, which on all sides is rough and unequal, leaving only a little smooth and even space in the middle, encompassed round with the rock, and much lower than the entry into the room or the foundation of the wall<sup>5</sup>.

In what manner these wonderful structures were erected, and by what contrivance the stones, especially those vast ones in the first, were raised to that height, has been the subject of much speculation. Herodotus, whose expressions are not very clear, supposes, that when they had laid the first range, they raised other stones thither from the

<sup>1</sup> HERODOT. l. 2.

<sup>2</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 57. Vid. STRAB. ubi supr.

<sup>3</sup> PLIN. ubi supr.

<sup>4</sup> BELON. Observ. l. 2. c. 44. part 1. c. 6.

<sup>5</sup> GREAVES, ubi supr. p. 108, &c.

<sup>6</sup> THEVENOT. Voy.

(M) Yet he tells us that it wants but 20 feet on each side of the first pyramid, which must be a mistake; unless we charge it rather on the copies, and instead of 20 read 500 feet. Mr. Littlebury, in his translation of Herodotus, supposes the meaning to be, that this pyramid was 20 feet lower than the former. As great a mistake as the other.

ground, by short engines made of wood; that when the stone was lodged on this row a it was put into another engine standing on the first step, from whence it was drawn up to the second row by another, there being as many engines as orders of stone; or else there might be but one engine, which they might remove as there was occasion. He says also, that the highest parts were first finished, and the rest in order, but last of all those that are lowest and next the ground<sup>m</sup>. Diodorus imagines the work was erected by the help of mounds, which he says the Egyptians pretended were raised of salt and nitre, and that they were dissolved and washed away by letting in the river<sup>n</sup>. With this writer Pliny agrees, adding, that others were of opinion that bridges were made of bricks, which, the work being ended, were distributed into private houses; conceiving that the Nile being much lower, could not come to wash them away<sup>o</sup>. Greaves b thinks it was done none of these ways; but that they first built a large tower in the midst reaching to the top; to the sides of which he conceives the rest of the building to have been applied, piece after piece, like so many buttresses, still lessening in height, till at last they came to the lowermost degree. A difficult piece of building taken in the easiest projection.

If what the antients deliver be true, that the stones made use of in the building of these pyramids, were fetched either from the quarries in the Aralian mountains, Thebais, or Ethiopia, we need not be surprized when we are told, that Cheops employed 100,000 men in this labour, 10,000 every three months<sup>p</sup>. But some modern travellers observing that these structures are built not with marble, but with a white sandy stone, and very hard, rather believe it was dug out of the rock whereon they stand<sup>q</sup>. We think a middle opinion the most probable; that the aforesaid rock indeed supplied them with great part of the materials, but that the marble of the inner rooms and passages was brought thither from some other place. Wansleb imagines the greatest pyramid to be nothing but a rock cut in that shape, and covered with a wall of stone<sup>r</sup>; a piece of work to our apprehension full as difficult as erecting a like mass of stones from the quarry.

Diodorus makes the number of men employed in building the first pyramid 360,000, and Pliny 366,000. It is agreed that twenty years were spent in the work: and Herodotus adds, that there was in his time an inscription on the pyramid, though it be since worn out, declaring how much was expended in radishes, onions, and garlic for the workmen, which his interpreter told him amounted to no less than 1600 talents of silver, or about 413,333 l. 6s. 8d. sterling<sup>s</sup>. d

SOME late writers think there is no beauty in these structures, except their prodigious size<sup>t</sup>, though they might formerly be reckoned among the wonders of the world, when they were, as is supposed, cased with marble, before the latter kings of Egypt took it away to adorn their palaces<sup>u</sup>; which is a piece of history we cannot warrant. However, a very intelligent traveller judges them, in their present condition, worthy the magnificence of the old Egyptian kings; adding, that no prince now in the world (without disparagement to any) is able to raise such a pile of building<sup>v</sup>: and antient writers say, that they were magnificent beyond expression, and singly comparable to many of the greatest structures in Greece considered together; that they exceeded all other works in Egypt, not only in the massiness of the building, and in the expence, but also in the industry and skill of the workmen; the Egyptians themselves, thinking (very justly) that the architects were more to be admired than the kings who were at the expence; for the former erected them by their own abilities and contrivance, the latter by their wealth received by inheritance, and the labours of others<sup>w</sup>. e

ONE thing more remarkable in the first pyramid is, that the sides of it do stand exactly facing the four quarters of the world, and consequently mark the true meridian of the place (N); which precise position could not well have been owing to chance, but was in all probability the effect of art and design; and that it was really f so, is confirmed by the same position of the tomb within. A permanent proof of the early progress made by the Egyptians in astronomy<sup>x</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> HEROD. l. 2.

<sup>n</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. i. p. 57.

<sup>o</sup> PLIN. ubi supr.

<sup>p</sup> HEROD. l. 2.

<sup>q</sup> THEVENOT, part I. c. 5. WANSLEB, ubi supr.

<sup>r</sup> WANSLEB, ibid.

<sup>s</sup> Vid. HEROD.

DIODOR. & PLIN. ubi supr.

<sup>t</sup> FIGUEROA Emb. di Persia. SICARD Mem. des. Mus. tom. II.

p. 281.

<sup>u</sup> SICARD, ibid.

<sup>v</sup> THEVENOT, ubi supr.

<sup>w</sup> HEROD. & DIODOR.

ubi supr.

<sup>x</sup> Vid. FONTENELLE, Elog. de M. DE CHAZELLES, p. 91. LUCAS, tom. I. p. 336

(N) M. de Chazelles, who made this observation, and was on the spot in the year 1693, being an excellent mathematician, we shall here set down the dimensions of this pyramid as taken by him, and the rather, because they come the nearest to those of Mr. Greaves. The side of the base is, according to this gentleman, 110 toises, which is, as we compute, 704,880 English feet; and the perpendicular height 77 toises and 3 quarters, or 498,122 English feet (1).

(1) Vid. ROLLIN. Hist. anc. tom. I. p. 20.

L
a a r n
it is ik
th le nus
b he din ng g of
is, 300 ob-
and ink with was to be ce of ary.
amid rk:
ugh gar-1600 ordi-
the ys of innoc tion,
the an-araed-ex-
es,
who cti-
and cri-
to lay
the
:
oi
II.
A. renrs

J. Clark sculp. 1775.

<sup>a</sup> HERODOTUS mentions a bridge near this pyramid, and little less considerable than the pyramid itself: but there are now no remains of it to be seen. It was 40 stadia, or about 5 miles in length, 60 feet broad, and in the highest part 80 feet in altitude; all of polished stones, and carved with the figures of various animals. This was the work of ten years<sup>1</sup>.

HAVING been so diffusive in the description of the pyramids of Memphis, we may be excused taking notice of those which are to be seen in other parts of Egypt; <sup>Other pyra- mids.</sup> observing only that they are not all of the same form, some being round and almost like a sugar-loaf, and others rising with a lesser inclination, and not so pointed at the top<sup>2</sup>. Lucas assures us, that there are no less than twelve pyramids near the cataracts, <sup>Of the laby- rinth.</sup> and two in al Fezzum, nothing inferior to those of al Kabira<sup>3</sup>.

THE Egyptian labyrinth, from whence Dædalus is supposed to have taken the model of that which he afterwards built in Crete, though he therein imitated but the hundredth part of it<sup>4</sup>, was a celebrated structure; and yet Herodotus, who saw it, says that it far surpassed the report of fame, being, in his judgment, even more admirable than the pyramids<sup>5</sup>. As there were at least three buildings of this kind, ancient writers not distinguishing them, generally speak of but one, and consequently with great confusion and disagreement.

THEY tell us it stood in the Heracleotic nome, near the city of Crocadiles, or Arfinoe, a little above the lake Maris<sup>6</sup>. Pliny says it was built by Petefuccus, or Tithoes, one of the demigods, 4600 years before his time; but that Demoteles would have it to be the place of Motherudes; Lyceas the sepulchre of Maris; and others the temple of the sun<sup>7</sup>. It is recorded by Manetho, that Lachares or Labares, the successor of Sesoftris, provided a labyrinth for his monument<sup>8</sup>. And Diodorus writes, that Mendes or Mauris also built one for the same purpose, which was not so considerable on account of its magnitude, as for the artificial contrivance of it<sup>9</sup>: but this seems to be a different building from that described by him a little after, which is in all probability the same with the labyrinth of Herodotus; for they both agree in the situation, that it was the work of twelve kings, among whom Egypt was at one time divided; and that they built it at their common charge, as a publick monument of their reign, and were <sup>d</sup> buried there<sup>10</sup>.

THIS structure seems to have been designed as a pantheon, or universal temple of all the Egyptian deities, which were separately worshipped in the provinces. It was also the place of the general assembly of the magistracy of the whole nation, those of all the provinces or nomes meeting here to feast and sacrifice, and to judge causes of great consequence<sup>11</sup>. And for this reason every nome had a hall or place appropriate to it; the whole edifice containing, according to Herodotus, twelve; Egypt being then divided into so many kingdoms. But Pliny makes the number of these palaces sixteen, and Strabo, as it seems, twenty seven<sup>12</sup>. The first of these writers tells us, that the halls were vaulted, and had an equal number of doors opposite to one another, six opening to the north, and six to the south, all encompassed by the same wall; that there were three thousand chambers in this edifice, fifteen hundred in the upper part, and as many under ground; and that he viewed every room in the upper part, but was not permitted by those who kept the palace, to go into the subterraneous parts, because the sepulchres of the holy crocodiles, and of the kings who built the labyrinth were there. He reports, that what he saw seemed to surpass the art of man: so many ways out by various passages, and infinite returns, afforded a thousand occasions of wonder, as he passed from the spacious hall to a chamber; from thence to a private cabinet; then again into other passages out of the cabinets, and out of the chambers into the more spacious rooms. All the roofs and walls within were incrusted with marble; but <sup>f</sup> the walls farther adorned with figures of sculpture. The halls were surrounded with pillars of white stone finely polished; and at the angle where the labyrinth ends, stood the pyramid formerly mentioned<sup>13</sup>, which Strabo will have to be the sepulchre of the prince who built the labyrinth<sup>14</sup>.

To this description of Herodotus others add, that it stood in the midst of an immense square, surrounded with buildings at a great distance; that the porch was of Parian marble, and all the other pillars of marble of Cyene; that within it were the temples of their several deities, and galleries, to which one ascended by 90 steps, adorned with many columns of porphyry, images of their gods, and statues of their kings,

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> LUCAS, Voy. tom. II. p. 10.

<sup>c</sup> Idem, tom. I. p. 99, and II. p. 75.

<sup>d</sup> DIODOR. SIC. l. I. p. 55.

<sup>e</sup> HEROD. l. 2.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>g</sup> PLIN. l. 36. c. 13.

<sup>h</sup> PLIN.

<sup>i</sup> SYMCELL. Chronogr. p. 59, 60.

<sup>j</sup> DIOD. ubi sup.

<sup>k</sup> Idem, ibid. p. 59. HEROD.

<sup>l</sup> ubi sup.

<sup>m</sup> STRABO, l. 17. p. 1165.

<sup>n</sup> See the places above quoted.

<sup>o</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>p</sup> See before, p. 185 a.

<sup>q</sup> STRAB. ubi sup.

of monstrous size; that the whole edifice consisted of stone, the floors being laid with a vast tables, and the roof appearing like a field of stone; that the passages met, and crossed each other with so much intricacy, that it was impossible for a stranger to find his way either in or out, without a guide; and that several of the apartments were so contrived, that on opening of the doors, there was heard within a terrible noise of thunder<sup>a</sup>.

WE shall subjoin part of the description given by Diodorus of a fabric, which though he does not call it a labyrinth, but a sepulchre, yet it appears to be the same we are now speaking of. He says it was of a square form, each side being a furlong in length, built of most beautiful stone, the sculpture and other work of which posterity could not exceed; that when one had passed the outer enclosure, a building presented itself b to view surrounded by a piazza, every side consisting of 400 pillars; and that it contained the ensigns or memorials of the country of each king; and was in all respects a work so sumptuous, and of such vast dimensions, that if the twelve princes who began it, had not been dethroned before it was finished, the magnificence of it could never have been surpassed. Whence it seems, that Pjammetichus, one of the twelve, who, expelling his associates, made himself master of all Egypt, finished the design, but not with a grandeur answerable to the rest of the structure; though Mela attributes the glory of the whole to that king<sup>c</sup>.

THE solidity of this wonderful building was such, that it withstood for many ages not only the rage of time, but that of the inhabitants of Heracleopolis, who worshipp- c ing the ichneumon, the mortal enemy of the crocodile, which was the peculiar deity of Arfinoe, bore an irreconcilable hatred to the labyrinth, which served also for a sepulchre to the sacred crocodiles, and therefore assisted to demolish it. Pliny says it was remaining in his days, and that about 500 years before Alexander, Circummon, eunuch to king Nectabis, was reported to have bestowed some small reparations on it, supporting the building with beams of Acacia, or the Ægyptian thorn boiled in oil; while the arches of square stone were erecting<sup>d</sup>.

THOUGH the Arabs have also, since the days of Pliny, helped to ruin this structure, yet a considerable part of it is still standing almost at the south end of the lake Marris, a little to the east, and about ten leagues from the ruins of Arfinoe. The people of the d country call it the place of Charon, of whom we shall say something by and by.

THE remains we speak of retain yet some marks of the antient splendor of the whole. The first thing one sees is a large portico of marble, facing the rising sun, and sustained by four great pillars of marble also, but composed of several pieces: three of these pillars are still standing, and one of the two middle ones is half fallen. In the middle is a door, whose sides and entablature are very massy; and above is a frieze, whereon is represented a head with wings stretched out along the frieze, and several hieroglyphics underneath. This head is covered with a kind of vail, and surrounded with four points of marble, like rays; over this first entablature runs a frieze, the stones e of which are cut into the figures of serpents, very big below the head, but growing insensibly less to the tail. On this frieze are the ruins of several doors, in different stories, by which probably they entered into the apartments that were above, but they are at present entirely ruined: on each side of that in the middle there is an Anubis full of hieroglyphics.

THIS edifice resembles none of the four orders of architecture which we received from the antients. Having passed through the portico, one enters into a fine large hall, all of marble, the roof consisting of twelve tables of marble, exquisitely joined, each 25 feet long and three broad, which cross the room from one end to the other. The roof, being not arched (as Herodotus says) but flat, strikes one with admiration at the boldness of its architecture; it being scarce conceivable, how it could continue so f many ages in a position so improper to support so prodigious a weight. This hall is at present 40 feet high, without making any allowance for the dust and rubbish with which the floor is covered. At the end of this hall, over against the first door, there is a second portico, with the same ornaments as the first, but less, by which one enters into a second hall, not so big as the first, which is covered with eight stones. At the end of this room, strait forwards, there is a third portico, still less than the second, as well as the hall into which it leads, though it has thirteen stones to roof it. At the end of this third hall there is a fourth portico, set against the wall, and placed there for symmetry only, to answer the rest. The length of these three halls is the whole depth of the building in its present condition: it was on the two sides, and especially g a under ground, that the prodigious number of rooms and avenues, mentioned by the antients, were built; the halls we have described having several openings made in them, through which one may go into other rooms on the same level, from whence there are stair-cases to go up into those above, and down into those under ground. Our author having first taken the precaution which Ariadne taught Theseus, and provided himself with above 2000 fathom of thread, and some chopped straw to strew in his way, went into above 150 of these chambers, and was often obliged either to creep on his belly, or to remove the rubbish which choaked up the passages; but with all his endeavours he was not able to go very far.

<sup>a</sup> PLIN. & STRABO, ubi sup.<sup>b</sup> DIOD. SIC. ubi sup. p. 59, 60:<sup>c</sup> POMPE. MELA. l. 1. c. 9.<sup>d</sup> PLIN. ubi sup. Vid. STRABO, p. 1166.

b To have a perfect idea of the construction of this edifice, you must imagine that you go from one chamber into another, sometimes into an alley, which has apertures in several places answering to other avenues, from which often, without perceiving it, you may come to the place from whence you set out. All these chambers and passages, where a perfect obscurity reigns, are not of equal dimensions, nor of the same figure; some being long, some square, and others triangular.

c THE disagreement which may be found between this relation and the accounts of the antients, and even among the several descriptions of the antients themselves, in a building of so great variety and extent, need not be wondered at. What is now remaining of it, seems to be no more than a fourth part of the inner edifice, which, in all probability, had four fronts, and twelve halls answering to them; the rest being decayed by time, or demolished by design, as appears from the prodigious ruins which are to be seen all round it.

How admirable soever the labyrinth was, yet the lake Maris, by which that monument stood, is said to be yet more wonderful. The antients make it no less than 3600 stadia in circumference*, which is somewhat incredible (O); but later relations assure us, that it is not above half a league broad and a day's journey in length, being in circuit about 12 or 15 leagues†: which is prodigious enough, if we consider that it was the work of mens hands, as appeared from the two pyramids built in the midst of it, which were standing in the time of Herodotus. In the deepest parts it has 50 fathom of water. This lake stretches from north to south, and is not fed by the sea, d the adjacent country being excessively dry, but by water derived from the Nile, by a channel cut for that purpose, 80 stadia long and 300 feet broad, through which the water flowed into the lake six months of the year, and back again to the river the other six months: yet we are told, by a modern traveller, that there are two considerable springs in the lake, which keep it from becoming ever quite dry; though in those years that the Nile encreases but little, it has not much water, and then several fine ruins are discovered, which at other times are not to be seen‡.

e THIS lake was dug by a king of Egypt, called by Herodotus Maris, and by Diodorus Myris, whose name it afterwards received, to correct the irregularities of the Nile, by receiving the superfluous waters when that river rose too high, and thereby preventing their stagnation in other places to the detriment of the land, and by supplying water for the lands when the river failed; which was effected by many canals and ditches cut from the main channel§. These canals are still subsisting, and almost entire at this day, their number and structure being worthy admiration. And as they were of the greatest benefit to the antient inhabitants, so are they no less serviceable to the present, who, as has been observed, attribute these works, and indeed almost all other ancient works of public utility, to Joseph¶.

f THE canal of communication between the Nile and the lake, had antiently large sluices to let the water in or out as occasion required; and whenever they were either to be opened or shut, the charge of doing it was no less than 50 talents, or about 12,916 l. 13 s. 4 d. On the other hand, the lake brought in a very considerable revenue to the prince; the fishery, during the six months of the river's retreat, yielding a talent of silver, or about 258 l. 6 s. 8 d. every day to the royal treasury; and the rest * LUCAS, Voy. tom. II. p. 18, &c.

† HEROD. ubi sup. DIODOR. Sic. l. I. p. 49.

‡ LUCAS

Voy. tom. III. p. 63.

§ LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 53.

¶ DIODOR. ubi sup.

‡ LUCAS, ubi sup.

See before, p. 179, 2.

(O) Pomponius Mela makes the circuit of this lake no more than 20 miles; which being so very dissimilar from what Herodotus and Diodorus have delivered, the critics will have it to be a mistake in Mela's copy, and have corrected it by those authors (1); but, as we imagine, without reason:

though we must not dissemble the tradition of the people of the country, who say the lake was formerly much larger than it is now, and one place in particular, which the water has left, is become a dangerous quicksand, wherein men and cattle are sometimes lost (2).

(1) Vid. VOSSIIUM & alios in Melam, l. I. c. 9.

(2) LUCAS, ubi sup. p. 64, 71.

of the time 20 mine, or a fourth part of that sum; there being twenty two sorts of <sup>a</sup> fish in this lake, and in such plenty, that though a great number of people were employed in salting them, yet there wanted hands for the work. Maris, it is said, gave these revenues to his wife, to buy her ointments, or, as we express it, for pin-money. The earth dug for the making of the lake, was, as the Egyptians told Herodotus, carried to the Nile, and dispersed by the current of that river <sup>b</sup>.

THERE is an isle in the middle of the lake Maris, of about a league in circumference: but nothing is now to be seen of the two pyramids which were built here, though they say there are several ruins of temples and tombs in the isle, with large figures of men and animals. On the farther side of the lake there are some little <sup>c</sup> mountains with grottos in them, which were formerly made use of for sepulchres <sup>d</sup>.

THE inhabitants, at present, call this lake, the lake of Charon, concerning whom they tell the following story; that being a person of mean extraction, and resolved to get money by any means, he planted himself by this lake, and exacted of every corps that was ferried over to be interred a certain sum: though he did this without any authority from the prince, yet he carried on the imposition for several years, till refusing passage to the dead body of the king's son, unless the usual sum were paid him, the cheat was discovered: however, he made the king so sensible of the great advantage it would be to him to continue this duty by his royal authority, that he ordered it to be constantly paid for the future, appointing Charon his first minister, and confirming him in his old employment, which he made the first post in the kingdom. And Charon got such vast riches in it, that he became powerful enough to assassinate the king, and mount the throne in his stead <sup>e</sup>. There is so much correspondence between this fable and what the antients say of Charon, that we could not omit it.

TIME would fail us if we should go through an exact description of the other buildings and admirable works of the antient Egyptians, though perhaps they deserve it equally with what we have already mentioned; the very spoils of them making at this day the principle ornament of Rome; where is scarce a column or an obelisk worthy of note, but what has been formerly brought thither out of Egypt. We may, however, have an opportunity in the progress of this work to speak of what we here omit; and shall only take notice, as briefly as we can, of two or three things more, <sup>d</sup> which we judge extraordinary, and for which, we apprehend, we may not hereafter find a more proper place.

A palace near the Cataracts.

ONE is a most magnificent palace in the upper Egypt, not far from Aswan, the antient Syene; the ruins whereof are enough to strike a spectator with astonishment. It is as large as a little city, having four avenues of columns, leading to as many porticos. At each gate, between two pillars of porphyry, there stand two gigantic figures of fine black marble, armed with maces. The avenues consist of columns, set three and three together in a triangle on one pedestal; on the chapter of each triangle is placed a Sphinx and a tomb alternately. Every column is 70 feet high, all of one stone. There are in the whole, in all the four avenues, above five or six thousand of these <sup>e</sup> columns, a great many of which are fallen down.

THE first hall of this palace is painted with fine pieces of history, and it seems as if the painting had not been long finished. In some places they have represented the hunting of antelopes, in others feasts, and a great many young children playing with all kinds of animals. From hence you go into other apartments, encrusted with marble, the roofs being supported by pillars of porphyry and black marble. Notwithstanding the vast quantity of rubbish, our author made shift to get up to the top of this building, from whence he had a prospect of the ruins of the greatest city that had ever been, as he thought, in the world. He supposes it might be the antient Thebes <sup>f</sup>, though that city probably stood much lower.

Grots near Osyut.

THE grots near Osyut ought not to be omitted. One of them is large enough to contain above 600 horse in battle array: it is cut out of the rock by the chisel, and supported by vast square pillars of the same rock. In this grotto several little seats are made to rest on; and it seems, by some footsteps which still remain of them, that formerly the figures of several deities were painted there; but they are now almost entirely defaced. There are a great many other grots in the same mountain, more beautiful than this. They are ranged in order, with doors answering one another, on which there are several images of the antient gods of Egypt in basso relievo; some having a staff in their hand, as if they guarded the entrance. In these grottos various apartments have been made, and some well sunk; but, what is most wonderful of all, <sup>g</sup>

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. & DIODOR. ubi supr.
p. 98, &c.

<sup>b</sup> LUCAS, ubi supr.

<sup>c</sup> Idem.

<sup>d</sup> Idem. tom. I.

a at the farther end there are catacombs hollowed in the rock, where there are a great number of mummies, and tombs adorned with sculptures in basso relievo, which have been almost all disfigured by the Arabs. Our author went into above two hundred of these grotts, each of them more singular than the other; and he assures us there are above a thousand of them. It is surprizing to consider the time and number of men that must have been employed in a work of such difficulty; there being scarce a monument in any other part of the world, which carries such evidence of the power of those who executed it; for which reason the people of the country believe these grotts the work of dæmons, who have hid immense treasures in them. As to the time when they were cut, and for what purpose, it is in vain to expect any light from history<sup>d</sup>.

b AMONG the antiquities of Dandera, the antient Tentyra, there is standing part of a temple, or palace, of surprizing height and dimensions. The back-part of this structure is a vast wall, without any windows, built of large stones of greyish granite, covered with basso relievo's bigger than the life, representing the antient Egyptian deities, with all their attributes in different attitudes. Two lions of white marble, as big as horses, stand above half the length of their bodies out of the wall. The side is about 300 paces long, fill'd also with sculptures of the same kind, and has three lions jutting out, of the same size with the former. The front of this glorious edifice exposes to view, in the midst, a porch, sustained by square pilasters of a prodigious size; a large piazza supported by three rows of columns, one of which eight men can hardly fathom, extends itself on each side the porch, and bears up a flat roof, made of stones of 6 or 7 feet broad, and of an extraordinary length. This roof appears to have been formerly painted, and some colours, which time has spared, are still to be perceived. The columns, made of great stones of granite, and full of hieroglyphics in relief, have each, on their cornish, a capital composed of four womens heads, with their head-dress, set back to back, and appearing like the faces of a double Janus: these heads are of a proportion suitable to the columns: there is above them an abacus of a square stone, of about six feet high, somewhat longer than it is broad, which supports the roof. A kind of cornish, of a singular construction, runs all round this piazza; and in the middle, over the porch, there are two great serpents interwoven, whose heads rest on two large wings extended on each side. Though these columns are above half buried in the ruins, yet one may judge of their height by their circumference; and according to the proportions of architecture, they ought to be, at least, 44 or 45 feet high, and 120 including the basis with the capital. From this porch one enters directly into a large square hall, where there are three doors, opening into different apartments which lead still into others, supported also by a great many fine columns, though dark and full of rubbish.

A magnificent structure at Dandera.

As this edifice is almost entirely buried on one side under the ruins and heaps of stones, which have formed a kind of mountain, one may easily get up to the top; and to give some idea of its dimensions, it is sufficient to say that the Arabs had formerly built a very large town upon it, the ruins of which are still to be seen. At some distance from the front, there is a large arch of a beautiful order of architecture, and above 40 feet high, which seems to have been the first gate.

c THE tradition of the country is, that this was a temple of Serapis; which seems to be confirmed by a Greek inscription on the frize, wherein the name of that deity appears: but the whole is so imperfectly taken, that there is no making any certain judgment of it. They also pretend, that this temple had as many windows as there are days in the year, and that those windows were so disposed, that each answering to one of the degrees of the ecliptic, the sun every day saluted the deity who presided there, through them in order, one after another*.

f WE shall conclude this section, which perhaps is already too long, with a reflexion made on occasion of this structure: That if in such cities as Tentyra, and some others of inferior note, there are found monuments of such exquisite beauty and grandeur, what ought we to think of those erected in the principal cities, which were the ordinary residence of the kings; as Thebes, Memphis, and Alexandria? and how great an idea ought we to entertain of the power and magnificence of the antient inhabitants of Egypt?

<sup>d</sup> LUCAS, ubi sup. tom. II. p. 76, &c.
tom. II. p. 133, &c.

* SICARD, Mem. des missions, tom. II. p. 158. LUCAS, <sup>f</sup> LUCAS, ibid. p. 139.

S E C T. II.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, arts, learning, and trade of the antient Egyptians.

The antiquity of the Egyptians.

THERE are few nations in the world which can pretend to an equal antiquity with the Egyptians. Their country is the only one in the world which has born the name of a son of Noah; though it be uncertain whether Ham himself made any settlement there. However, his son Mizraim certainly peopled Egypt with his own issue, which inhabited several parts of it, under the names of Mizraim, Patrusim, Casluhim, and Caphthorim.

AND yet the Egyptians themselves, being ignorant of their true descent, pretended even to a greater antiquity than this, asserting themselves to have been the first men in the world, which, (as well as animals) they imagined must have been originally produced in their country, rather than in any other part of the world, because of the benign temperature of the air, the natural fecundity of the Nile, and its spontaneous bringing forth several kind of vegetables, as proper food for the newly-produced men and animals. And to support this opinion by fact, they instanced in the great numbers of mice which were every year bred out of the mud left by the Nile on its retreat, some of them, as they say, appearing alive, and formed so far as the fore-part of the body only, the other part being inanimate and without motion, as having not yet quite put off the nature of earth<sup>b</sup>. That the concurrence of proper causes, in certain seasons, will occasion a prodigious encrease of those vermin, is observed in other countries; but as to the other part of the relation, it is not improbable, that the mice which are generated at that season in Egypt, are of the same kind with those mentioned by antient authors to breed in that country, and some other parts which have but two legs<sup>c</sup>, and which an incurious spectator might therefore easily take to be imperfect animals, and but half formed. On this mistaken notion of their original, the Egyptians built their history, reckoning an extravagant number of years, during which they pretended they had the most flourishing kingdom in the world, under the administration of their own native kings. However, we are told, that in the time of Pjammethicus they acknowledged the Phrygians to be more antient, yielding that nation the priority, and challenging only the second rank to themselves<sup>d</sup>.

Their government and laws.

THE Egyptians are said to have been the first who found out the rules of government, and the art of making life easy, and a people happy; the true end of politicks. Their laws and institutions were not only highly revered by those who lived under their immediate influence, but by other nations, and particularly the Greeks, whose first sages and law-givers travelled into this country to acquaint themselves therewith, and borrowed thence the best part of those which they afterwards established at home.

Their king's manner of life.

THE crown of Egypt was hereditary; their first kings did not live after the manner of other monarchs, or govern by their own arbitrary will and pleasure, subject to the controul of none; but they were obliged to conform themselves to the established laws of the land, not only in the management of publick affairs, but even in their private way of life. No slave bought with money, or servant born in their own house, was admitted into their service; but they were attended by the sons of the priests of most distinguished birth; who, after having had a suitable education, were at the age of twenty placed about the king's person; that being waited on both day and night by men of such extraordinary merit, he might learn nothing unworthy of the royal majesty, and be in the less danger of falling into any vicious excess; which princes seldom do, unless they find, among those who approach their persons, encouragers of their debauchery, and ministers of their passions.

THERE were stated hours of night as well as day, when the king could not do what he had a fancy to, but was indispensably obliged to give attention to business and serious employment. When he arose early in the morning, the first thing he did was to peruse the publick dispatches and letters which came from several parts of his dominions, that so he might be well acquainted with the state and affairs of his kingdom. Then bathing himself, and putting on splendid attire, and assuming the ensigns of his regal office, he went to the temple to sacrifice, the victims being brought to the altar,

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 165.

<sup>b</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 9.

<sup>c</sup> THEOPHRAST. in fragm. de animalibus.

PLIN. nat. hist. l. 10. c. 65. HEROD. l. 4.

<sup>d</sup> HEROD. l. 2. sub. init. See before p. 151. not. U.

a the chief priest, in the presence of the king and the assistants, prayed with a loud voice for the health and prosperity of the king, who governed according to justice and the laws of the kingdom. And on this occasion he enlarged on his royal virtues, observing that he was pious towards the gods, tender towards his people, moderate, just, magnanimous, of strict veracity, liberal, master of himself, punishing below, and rewarding above desert. He then spake with execration of the faults which the king might have committed thro' surprize or ignorance; but withal absolving him, and laying the guilt on his ministers and council. And this method they took to win their kings to the practice of virtue; not by sharp admonitions, but by the pleasing praises due to good actions. The sacrifices being duly performed, the scribe read out of b the sacred records such of the counsels and actions of the most famous men as might be of use in life and fit for imitation; that the king might thereby be instructed to govern his state by their maxims, and regulate his administration, in every respect, according to the established laws.

Now was the king obliged to this exactness in public affairs only; but he was so little master of himself in private, that he could not take the air, lie with his queen, bathe, or do the most indifferent thing, but at certain times, which were particularly appointed and set apart for this or that purpose. He was not permitted to chuse what he would eat, but his table was furnished with the most simple food, generally veal or goose; and he was allowed but a certain quantity of wine to drink. And this regulation was so moderate, that it seemed not to have been the institution of a legislator, but the prescription of an experienced physician for the preservation of health; c to which it was so conducive, that one of the kings of Egypt, named Tachos, who had the best of constitutions while he lived after the frugal manner of his own country, retiring into Persia, soon ruined it by the luxurious diet of that nation*. It is said, that there was, in a certain temple in Thebes, a pillar, with an inscription on it, containing imprecations against a king, who had first introduced luxury among the Egyptians†.

So great a restraint laid on the prince in matters seemingly of little consequence, is indeed extraordinary; but what deserves greater admiration is, that it was not in his d power to satisfy more dangerous appetites, by wronging or oppressing the subject; for he could not punish any person out of passion or caprice, nor give judgment in any case otherwise than as the laws ordained. And all this was so far from being thought hard or dishonourable by the kings, that on the contrary they esteemed it a singular blessing, that while other men were subject to the ill consequences of indulging their natural passions, themselves were exempt from such dangers, by living up to a rule of life approved by the most prudent persons. While the princes behaved themselves with this justice and moderation, they were infinitely dear to their people; not only the colleges of priests, but the whole Egyptian nation, being more solicitous for the king's safety, than that of their wives, children, or possessions. Wherefore, so long as e these laws were observed, their state was flourishing, and the people happy; they extended their dominions by the conquest of several nations, became exceeding rich and populous, and enabled to adorn the several provinces of the kingdom with works of inimitable magnificence‡.

THE affection of the Egyptians to their king appeared in nothing more than in The Honours the lamentations they made for them, and the honours they paid them when dead; for upon the death of any of their kings, the whole kingdom went into mourning, rendering their garments, shutting up their temples, and putting a stop to all sacrifices, feasts, and solemnities, for the space of seventy two days. Companies of 200 or 300, both men and women, having thrown dirt on their heads, and being girt with linen f girdles, marched solemnly in procession twice a day, singing his praise in mournful dirges, calling on the virtue of the deceased. All this while they abstained from flesh and wheat, as also from wine and all delicacies; they neither bathed nor anointed themselves, nor slept in their beds, nor used the company of their wives; but every one mourned both night and day, as for the loss of a beloved son. In the mean time, the funeral pomp being prepared with great magnificence, on the last day, the body was exposed in a coffin at the entrance of the sepulchre, where, in pursuance of a law, the actions of his life were recited, and every one was at free liberty to accuse him. The priests pronounced his elogy; and if it so happened that the deceased had reigned worthily, the numerous multitude assembled on the occasion, seconded the applause of the priest; but if he had governed unworthily, they boldly expressed their * ÆLIAN. var. hist. l. 5. c. 1.

Sic. l. 1. p. 63, &c.

† PLUTARCH de Isid. & Oirid. p. 345.

‡ DIODOR.

disapprobation. It even depended on the inclinations of the people, whether the deceased prince should be honoured with a solemn burial, which through their dislike was denied to several. Upon which account (among others) and lest their dead bodies should be abused, and their memory blasted with eternal infamy, they did their utmost to deserve the good opinion of their subjects by an unblamable conduct.

The political division of the kingdom.

As to the administration of public affairs, each nome or province had its peculiar governor, who ordered and took care of every thing within his jurisdiction. The lands were divided into three parts; of which one was allotted to the priests, and the revenues thereof were employed not only for the maintenance of them and their families, but for the providing sacrifices and all other expences of public worship. The second belonged to the king, and was appropriated to defray the charges of his wars, and for the support of the regal dignity with splendor. By such an abundant provision, he was enabled liberally to reward men of distinguished merit; and had no occasion to lay any burdensome taxes on his people. The third part was the soldiers, who having so handsome a maintenance, were thereby encouraged to venture their lives in defence of their country: for they thought it absurd to trust the safety of the whole nation in the hands of those who had nothing dear or valuable at home to fight for.<sup>a</sup>

HERODOTUS says the Egyptians were distinguished into seven orders of men; priests, soldiers, herdsmen, hogherds, traders, interpreters, and seamen; who took their names from the professions they exercised.<sup>b</sup> But Diodorus mentions no more than five; priests, soldiers, shepherds, husbandmen, and artificers, including probably some of the former denominations under some of these.

Of the prie?<sup>ts</sup>.

THE king, priests, and soldiery made as it were the three estates of the kingdom. The priests were held in great reverence and esteem, not only for their attendance on the worship of their gods, but because by their learning and prudence they were of great service to the state; being for that reason always near the king's person, as the chief of his council, to assist him with their advice, to give their judgment as to the event of any enterprize, by their skill in astrology, and in divination by inspection of the sacrifices; and to read useful points of history out of the sacred commentaries. These were exempt from all taxes, and were the next in power and dignity to the king.<sup>c</sup>

THE priests wore linen garments and shoes, being not permitted to dress in any other manner; they took particular care to wash them often, and have them always clean: and for greater neatness, they shaved all parts of their bodies once in three days, and bathed constantly twice by day, and twice by night in cold water, with a great deal of superstition. The service of every god was performed, not by one, but by many priests; and they had a chief-priest over them, in whose room, when he died, his son was substituted. The priesthood enjoyed very great advantages, being never disturbed with domestic cares; for they eat the consecrated bread, and were daily furnished with beef and geese in abundance, and had also an allowance of wine; but they might not taste of fish. Beans, which were never eaten by the other Egyptians, the priests abhorred the sight of, accounting them impure and abominable: whence Pythagoras took the aversion he had to that kind of pulse.

Of the soldiery.

THE military men were called Calasirians, or Hermotyrians, according to the different nomes they inhabited. Those of the latter were the nomes of Bufris, Sais, Chemmis, Papremis, and one half of the island Prosopis, from whence 160,000 men might be drawn, when they were most numerous. The nomes of the Calasirians were those of Thebes, Bubastis, Aphthis, Tanis, Mendes, Sebennytus, Atkribis, Pharbatbus, Thmuis, Onuphis, Anytis and Myecphoris; which last was situate in an island over-against the city of Bubastis. And these nomes of the Calasirians might furnish 250,000 men at the most. The soldiers of both denominations were not permitted to learn or exercise any mechanical art, but were obliged, from father to son, to apply themselves to the art of war only<sup>d</sup>; wherein it may be supposed they therefore made a more than ordinary proficiency: But their great excellency seems to have been in horsemanship, and the skill of guiding chariots; for which they were particularly and early famous, as appears from scripture.<sup>e</sup> For neglect of duty, flying in battle, or cowardice, they were punished only by marks of infamy; it being thought more advisable to keep them in order by the motive of honour, than the fear of chastisement.<sup>f</sup>

THE lands conferred on the militia were exempted from publick taxes, as well as those of the priests. The portion assigned to each man was 12 arura, every one con-

<sup>a</sup> DIONOR. ubi sup. p. 66.
ubi sup.    <sup>b</sup> Idem ibid.
l. 1. p. 70.

<sup>c</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.    <sup>d</sup> DIONOR. ubi sup.
<sup>e</sup> Exod. xiv. 7, &c. Cant. i. 9. Isa. xxxviii. 9.

<sup>f</sup> HEROD.
<sup>g</sup> DIONOR:

a taining a square of 100 Egyptian cubits (A). The king's guard consisted of 1000 Hermotybians, and as many Calasirians, who were changed every year, that they might all have that honour and advantage in their turn. For besides the revenues of their lands, those that were on duty at court had a daily allowance of five pounds of bread, two pounds of beef, and two pints of wine. This liberal provision for the militia, was also an encouragement for them to marry, helping to people the country, and leaving behind them a succession of troops sufficient for the defence of the kingdom<sup>1</sup>.

But after all, the Egyptians cannot be said to have been a warlike nation; it being real and not imaginary combats that form a soldier. They rather extended their dominions by sending out colonies, than by their arms: however, we shall find some b conquerors of great fame among their kings.

We had almost forgot to observe, that if the Egyptians at any time created a new king by election (which sometimes happened) he was always chosen either out of the priests, or the soldiers; and if out of the latter, he was immediately received into the order of priests, and initiated in their learning and mysteries<sup>2</sup>.

THE husbandmen taking the lands from the king, priests, and soldiers, at an easy rent, and employing themselves wholly in their tillage, and the son continually succeeding the father in the same occupation, they became the most expert in agriculture of any people in the world. The shepherds, in like manner, were always shepherds from generation to generation; and, by the observation of their fore-fathers, and their own experience, arrived at great skill in their way; endeavouring to vie with one another in contrivances to encrease the breed of the animals they fed. One thing in particular deserves to be mentioned, which was practised by those who fed hens and geese. For not contented with the ordinary way of natural encrease, they did not suffer them to sit, but themselves hatched the eggs by an artificial fecundation; and by that means raised prodigious flocks of those fowls<sup>3</sup>. The method was most probably by ovens, which are still used in Egypt for the same purpose, and much spoken of by travellers (B).

Of the inferior classes.

P HEROD. & DIODOR. ubi sup. / 2 PLUT. de Isid. & Osirid. p. 354. / 3 DIODOR. SIC. ubi sup.

(A) The Egyptian Arura must therefore have been somewhat more than three quarters of an English acre.

(B) It may not be amiss to give a short account of this method; which perhaps might be practicable in other countries as well as Egypt.

The houses built for this use have a long entry, on each side of which are fourteen ovens on the ground (some places have more, and some less;) the bottoms and sides of which are all of sun-dried bricks; upon them they put mats, and on the mats eggs. The tops of these ovens are flat, and covered with sticks, except two long channels or hearths of sun-dried bricks, three or four inches deep, wherein the fires are made, to heat the eggs lying under them in the lower ovens.

Above these lower ovens are so many other, also of sun-dried bricks, and arched at the top; where are some holes, which are stopped, or left open, as they please, to govern the heat in the ovens below. These upper ovens have not only mouths opening into the long entry, but mouths of communication with each other, and every one of them has two of the abovementioned hearths. The depth of the lower oven is about two feet and a half English; that of the upper above four.

They begin to heat the ovens in the middle of January, burning every morning one hundred kintars (or hundred weight) of camels or buffaloes dung, and the like proportion at night, till the middle of February; about which time the ovens are so hot, that one cannot well endure to lay his hand upon the walls.

After this they put the eggs into the ovens to hatch the chickens; which they continue successively to the end of May. The eggs are at first put on mats in the lower ovens, seven or eight thousand eggs in number, and laid only double, one upon another. In the upper ovens the fire is made in the long channels or hearths, from whence the heat is conveyed into the lower ovens. The eggs which are directly under these hearths, lie treble one upon another; the rest, as was said, only double.

At night, when they make new fires in the hearths, they remove the eggs that were directly under them, and lay treble into the place of those which lay on the sides, and double only; and these being now removed lie treble under the hearth, because the heat is greater there than on the sides.

These eggs continue in the lower ovens fourteen days and nights; afterwards they remove them into the upper ovens, which are just over the lower. In those (there being now no more fire used) they turn all the eggs four times every twenty four hours. The twenty first, or twenty second day, the chickens are hatched; which the first day eat not; the second day they are fetched away and fed.

The master of the oven has a third part of the eggs for his cost and pains; out of which he is to make good unto the owners (who have two thirds in chickens for their eggs) if any happen to be spoiled or miscarry.

The fire in the upper ovens, when the eggs are placed in the lower, is thus proportioned. The first day the greatest fire; the second less than the first; the fourth less than the third; the fifth less; the sixth more than the fifth; the seventh less; the eighth more; the ninth without fire, the tenth a little fire in the morning; the eleventh they stop all the holes with flax or straw, making no more fire; for if they should, the eggs would break. They take care that the eggs be no hotter than the eye of a man, when they are laid upon it, can well endure.

When the chickens are hatched, they put them into the lower ovens, which are covered with mats. Under these mats is bran to dry them: and upon the mats straw for them to stand on.

(1) GREAVES'S Manner of hatching chickens at Cairo. Phil. Transf. N<sup>o</sup> 137. Id. LUCAS Toy. Vol. I. p. 279, &c.

THE law which obliged the son of the husbandman and shepherd to follow the a vocation of his father, extended to all arts and trades: for amongst the Egyptians a man was under an indispensable necessity of taking up his father's employment, and of applying himself wholly to that, without meddling with any other. Thus being cut off from all hopes of rising to the magistracy, and having no room left for popular ambition, they stuck closely to what they professed. They were never permitted to concern themselves with civil affairs; and if they happened to attempt it, or undertook any business that did not belong to their hereditary profession, they were severely punished.

Of their courts of justice.

THE Egyptians were very careful in the administration of justice; for they rightly b judged the sentences pronounced from the tribunals, to be of the greatest consequence to the public; and that as nothing could conduce more to the reformation of mens manners, than the punishment of offenders, and the relieving the oppressed; so nothing could be more destructive of society, or a greater cause of confusion, than the suffering of bribery or favour in such cases. For this reason, they were very scrupulous in the choice of their judges; who were men of the best reputation, and taken from the three chief cities, Helopolis, Thebes, and Memphis, ten from each; so that their whole number was thirty. This tribunal was thought to be inferior neither to that of the Areopagus at Athens, nor to the Lacedæmonian senate.

THIS venerable assembly chose a president out of their own number, whose place, c as an inferior judge, was upon his election supplied by the city that sent him. Their salaries were paid by the king, who allowed the president a stipend proportioned to his superior rank; and that he might be more visibly distinguished from his brethren, he wore a chain of gold about his neck, from which hung an image of precious stones, which they called truth. Whenever the president assumed this ensign of his office, it signified that he was prepared to hear causes. The court being seated, and the eight books which contained all the laws, laid before them, the plaintiff preferred his complaint clearly and distinctly set forth in writing; a copy of which being granted to the defendant, he gave in his answer. To this the plaintiff replied, and then the defendant rejoined. Each party having given in two writings, the court took them in- d to consideration; and after consulting together, proceeded to sentence; and the president turned the effigies of truth towards the party in whose favour judgment was given. All this was done without the clamorous harangues of lawyers, who are too apt to disguise truth, or falsehood, to serve their turn, and pervert judgment by their specious rhetoric. The Egyptians therefore, sensible of the falacies of oratory, and the evil arts of public pleaders, banished them from the tribunal; nor would they even suffer a man to speak in his own cause, well knowing the advantage one person might have over another by more artful speaking, or greater confidence; but contented themselves with a simple and intelligible state of the case in writing, which being readily understood, was as readily decided. By which means every man stood upon the level with his antagonist, and nothing but the merits had any weight in the determination e of a cause.

Their remarkable laws.

HAVING spoken of their courts of judicature, it may not be amiss briefly to mention such of their laws as are most remarkable for their antiquity or use.

I. PERJURY was punished with death; it being looked on as sinful in the sight of the gods, and destructive of human society.

II. HE that saw a man killed, or violently assaulted on the highway, and did not endeavour to rescue him if he could, was punished with death. If it appeared that he was unable to give assistance, he was nevertheless obliged to discover and prosecute the offenders according to law; which if he neglected, he received a certain number f of stripes, and was kept without food for three days.

III. FALSE accusers underwent the same punishment as the accused should have undergone in case of conviction.

IV. EVERY Egyptian was enjoined to give in his name, and by what means he gained his livelihood, in writing, to the governor of the province where he lived. But if it could be proved that he had given in a wrong information, or got his living in an unlawful way, he was punished with death. This law was made by Amasis, and Solon is said to have introduced it, from Egypt, among the Athenians g.

V. HE that wilfully killed any person, whether freeman or slave, was condemned to die.

g Vid. HEROD. ubi sup.

a VI. PARENTS that killed their children were not adjudged to die; but were obliged to embrace their dead bodies for three days and three nights together; a guard being set over them to see that they punctually obeyed this law.

VII. BUT parricides were put to a most cruel death; first they had their limbs mangled and their flesh cut into small pieces with sharp reeds, after which they were laid upon thorns and burned alive.

VIII. WOMEN with child were not executed till they had been delivered; that the innocent might not be involved in the punishment of the guilty.

IX. MUTINY and desertion were punished only by degradation and disgrace; which could never be wiped away but by brave actions and amendment.

b X. THOSE who betrayed their secret designs to the enemy, had their tongues cut out.

XI. COINING false money, using false weights, and forgery of all sorts, were punished by cutting off the offending parts, both the hands.

XII. HE that committed a rape on a free-woman, had his privities cut off; for they held a ravisher guilty of three most enormous crimes, having besides the injustice of the action, brought infamy on the woman, and bastardized her issue.

XIII. ADULTERY by consent, was punished in the man by giving him a thousand lashes with rods; and in the woman by the loss of her nose.

c XIV. ACCORDING to the commercial laws, which are said to have been made by Bocchoris, if a man borrowed money without giving a note in writing for it, he was discharged from the debt, provided he would make oath that he was no ways indebted to his creditor. The oath in this case was very solemn, and preceded by sacrifice.

XV. IN cases where the debt was acknowledged by proper instruments, the interest was not to exceed the double of the capital or sum lent. The debtor's goods, and not his body, were answerable for the debt; for his body was claimed by the city or place where he lived, which had the greatest interest in him, and had a right to his service both in peace and war. In short, they did not apprehend wherein the policy lay of sacrificing an useful member of the republick to the cruelty and avarice of a private person. This law, or one very like it, is said to have been established by Solon.*

d XVI. To help the circulation of money, Apyckis made a law that a man might borrow on the pledge of his father's dead body, which was to be put into the hands of the creditor; and if he did not redeem it, he was to be deprived of the honour of a funeral himself, nor could he have the liberty of burying any person descended from him; which was accounted the greatest ignominy†.

XVII. THE Egyptian priests were allowed no more than one wife, but all others might marry as many as they pleased: nor was any child reckoned a bastard, though begotten on a slave bought with money; for they held the father to be the sole cause of generation, and that the mother only provided nourishment and lodging for the infant‡.

e XVIII. BY the laws of Egypt, brothers were permitted to marry their sisters; because they had an instance of the happiness of such marriages in that of Isis with her own brother Osiris; for having vowed, on his death, never to suffer the embraces of any other, she revenged his murder, and governed the kingdom during her widowhood with great prudence, being the author of infinite benefits to mankind. For which reason, in Egypt, the queen had more power, and more honour shewn her than the king; and in private contracts the greater authority was given to the woman, the husbands thereby promising to be obedient to their wives in all things§.

f XIX. THERE was a very remarkable law, or rather a custom which had the sanction of law, with regard to the Egyptian robbers and sharpers. Whoever entered himself of their gang, gave in his name to the chief, promising to deliver him all the booty he should from time to time purloin. Upon this account it was customary for such as had any thing stolen from them to apply themselves to the chief of the gang, and give him a very particular account and description, in writing, of what they had lost, as also of the day, hour, and place when and where they lost it. This information being given, the stolen goods were easily found, and restored to the right owner, upon his paying a fourth part of their value. The institutor of this extraordinary law, thought that since it would be impossible to prevent thieving entirely, it would be more tolerable for the injured party to lose a fourth, by way of redemption, than the whole¶.

g As much as the Egyptians seemed to excel other nations in the wisdom of their laws and constitutions, they yet surpassed them more in bigotry and superstition.

Of the religion of the Egyptians.

* DIOD. SIC. ubi supr. p. 69, &c.

† HEROD. ubi supr.

‡ DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. p. 72.

§ Idem ibid. p. 23.

¶ Idem ibid. p. 69.

IDOLATRY was so antient among them, that the Grecians confessed they borrowed not only their religious ceremonies, but the names of almost all their gods from Egypt. For the Egyptians are said to have been the first people who erected altars, images, and temples, and the first inventors of festivals, ceremonies, and transactions with the gods by the mediation of others; and also to have first given names to the twelve gods<sup>a</sup>.

THE Egyptians had a great many deities of different ranks and orders. Those who were chiefly honoured in Egypt, were Osiris and Isis; by which it is most probable they originally meant the sun and the moon (C), whose influences governed and preserved the world; those two planets being reckoned by them to be the great causes of nutrition and generation, and as it were the sources from whence the other parts of nature, which also they looked upon as gods, and to which they gave distinct names, were derived. These were Jupiter, or spirit, the vis vivifica of living creatures; Vulcan, or fire; Ceres, or the earth; Oceanus (by which the Egyptians meant their Nile) or moisture; and Minerva (called also by that nation Neith) or air.

BESIDES these celestial and eternal gods, they had also terrestrial and mortal deities, who had merited the honours paid them by the benefits they conferred on mankind in their life-time; several of them having been kings of Egypt: some of these bore the same names with the celestial gods, and others had proper names of their own. Such were the Sun, Cronus or Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter (called by them Ammon) Juno, Vulcan, Vesta, Hermes or Mercury, Orus, Venus, Pan, Arueris, Nephthys, Harpocrates, and others<sup>b</sup>. Serapis is said to have been an upstart deity, introduced by one of the Ptolemies at Alexandria<sup>c</sup>; but others suppose it to be only another name for Osiris<sup>d</sup>, who was also called Bacchus. As Osiris was supposed to have been of a good and beneficent nature, so his brother Typhon was esteemed the reverse, and held in universal detestation for the evils brought by him on his family and nation, as will be mentioned hereafter. The other names of Typhon were Seth, Bekon, and Smey.

THOUGH the bodies of these mortal deities remained in their sepulchres on earth, yet they believed their souls shone in the stars in heaven; the soul of Isis in particular in the dog-star, called by them Sothis; the soul of Orus in Orion; and that of Typhon in the Bear<sup>e</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING this polytheism of the Egyptians, there are yet said in reality to have acknowledged one supreme god, the maker and ruler of the world, whom they sometimes denoted by the name of Osiris, or Serapis, sometimes by that of Isis, and at other times by that of Neith, on whose temple at Sais was the following remarkable inscription; I am all that hath been, is, and shall be; and my vail hath no mortal yet uncovered<sup>f</sup>. There is also an inscription to Isis still remaining at Capua, to this effect; To thee who, being one, art all things, the goddess Isis<sup>g</sup>. The inhabitants of Thebais are reported to have worshipped only the immortal and unbegotten god Cneph, or Emeph; for which reason they were exempt from all contributions towards the maintenance of the sacred animals which were worshipped in the lower Egypt<sup>h</sup>. From this god Cneph, they supposed a secondary god proceeded, representing the world, and was called Phtha, which word is at present used among the Copts to signify the divine being<sup>i</sup>.

HOWEVER, the idolatrous humour which prevailed at first, perhaps only in some parts of Egypt, appears at length to have entirely over-run it, and, which seems scarcely credible, they came at length to give divine honours to several animals, nay even to vegetables themselves, as leeks and onions; and that with so great variety and disagreement among themselves, that except some of the principal gods who were honoured all over the kingdom, the worship of every deity was confined to one or two cities or provinces; whence it came to pass that the names of a great number of

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi supr.
Vid. TACIT. Hist. l. 20.

<sup>d</sup> Idem. ibid. p. 359.

<sup>e</sup> PLUT. ubi supr. p. 359.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. DIOD. SIC. ubi supr. p. 11, &c.

<sup>c</sup> PLUTARCH. de Isid. & Osir. p. 362.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid. p. 354.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. IAMBlich. de myst. § 8. c. 3.

<sup>h</sup> ORIGEN. cont. Cels.

<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. p. 367.

<sup>j</sup> Vid. CUDWORTH, Intell. Syst. p. 412, &c.

<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 13.

(C) Agreeable hereto, the name of Osiris, we are told, in the Egyptian tongue signifies many-eyed; an epithet very proper for the sun; and Isis antient (1).

There are several other mythological interpretations of these two deities. Sometimes Isis is the earth in general; sometimes only the land of Egypt; and Osiris is the moon, or else the Nile, which is lost or destroyed in the sea, which they call Typhon. At other times Osiris is Pluto and Bacchus, and Isis Ceres, Proserpine, Cybele, &c. One supposes Osiris to signify the efficient cause of things, and Isis matter; and another thinks Isis denotes nature in general (2).

(1) DIOD. SIC. ubi supr. p. 10, 11.

(2) Vid. PLUT. de Isid. & Osirid. APULIUM, Metam. l. 2.

a the chief cities of Egypt were by the Grecians named after the gods or animals that were worshipped there; as Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter, Heliopolis, or the city of the sun; and in the same manner others bore the names of Pan, Apollo, Latona, Hermes, Hercules, and Venus; and also of the Dog, the Lion, the Wolf, the Crocodile, the fishes Latos, Oxyrynchus, and Phagrus, and other animals.

THIS diversity of worship was sometimes attended with very ill consequences, especially if their deities happened to be such as were naturally enemies to one another; the inhabitants of one place often paying their adoration to that kind of animals which were held in the greatest abhorrence by their neighbours. Hence proceeded inveterate quarrels, and dangerous wars; as happened in particular between b those of Heracleopolis, who worshipped the ichneumon, and those of Arfinoe, who worshipped the crocodile; and to mention no more, between the cities of Oxyrynchus and Cynopolis, the former of which sacrificed and eat dogs, the deity of the latter, in revenge for their eating that sort of fish which was the object of their own worship<sup>1</sup>. It was thought, however, that the kings themselves, out of policy, first occasioned, or at least encouraged and fomented these dissensions, to prevent the peoples attempting any thing against the state; for Diodorus tells us, that one of their first and most prudent kings, finding the Egyptians very prone to sedition, enjoined to each province the worship of some particular animal different from all the rest, and likewise to use a different diet; so that the Egyptians, being by this means divided into c so many distinct societies, prejudiced against each other in religious matters, and mutually despising one another on account of their different customs in the ordinary affairs of life, there was no likelihood of their ever uniting again<sup>2</sup>.

It would be rather tedious than entertaining, to set down all the fables and uncertain traditions, which might be found in antient authors concerning the Egyptian gods; some of them may perhaps be occasionally taken notice of hereafter: wherefore we shall immediately proceed to give an account of the images by which they represented those deities which were most peculiar to this nation, and of their sacrifices, festivals, and religious ceremonies.

OSIRIS was variously represented; sometimes by a sceptre and eye, to express d his power and providence; at other times by the image of a hawk, because of its sharp sight, swiftness, and other qualities; and in later times in a human form, in a posture not very decent, signifying his generative and nutritive faculty<sup>3</sup>. But the greatest adoration was paid to his living image, the bull, as we shall observe by and by.

THE image of Isis was usually in the form of a woman, with cow's horns on her head<sup>4</sup>, representing the appearance of the moon in her increase and decrease, and holding the Sistrum (a kind of slymbal) in her right hand, and a pitcher in her left; the former signifying the perpetual motion there is in nature, and the other the fecundity of the Nile. But sometimes she was represented as Cybele, having her body e full of breasts, to express her nourishing of all things<sup>5</sup>.

THE statue of Serapis was of a human form, with a basket or bushel on his head, signifying plenty; his right hand leaned on the head of a serpent, whose body was wound round a figure with three heads of a dog, a lion, and a wolf; in his left hand he held a measure of a cubit length, as it were to take the height of the waters of the Nile<sup>6</sup>.

JUPITER, or Ammon, was by the Egyptians represented by an image with the head of a ram; the reason of which they say, was this; Hercules being very desirous to see Jupiter, did not without great difficulty obtain his request, for the god was unwilling to be seen: but at length Jupiter yielding to his importunity, and having f separated the head from the body of a ram, and flayed the whole carcass, he put on the skin with the wool, and in that form shewed himself to Hercules. And in this manner of representing Jupiter, the Egyptians were imitated by the Ammonians, who were a colony of them and the Ethiopians<sup>7</sup>.

THE other more famous deities of the Egyptians were Anubis, Harpocrates, Orus, and Canopus. The first was usually painted with the head of a dog, because he accompanied Osiris in his expedition clothed in a dog's skin<sup>8</sup>, and was the guard of him and Isis<sup>9</sup>. Sometimes this deity is confounded with Hermes, and then the dog's head may denote his great sagacity. Harpocrates was the son of Isis, begotten, as is

<sup>1</sup> PLUTARCH. ubi sup. p. 380. Vid. JUVEN. Sat. 15. & ATHANAS. orat. cont. Julian ubi sup. p. 80.

<sup>2</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. p. 371.

<sup>3</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>4</sup> DIOD.

<sup>5</sup> Vid. PLUT. ubi

sup. p. 376. SERV. in Virg. HORAPOLL. l. 1. c. 3. APULIUM, Metam. l. 2.

<sup>6</sup> Vid. MACROB.

in Saturn. l. 1. c. 20. SUIDAM in Sagennis.

<sup>7</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>8</sup> DIOD. Sic. p. 15.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid. p. 77. PLUT. ubi sup. p. 357.

said, by Osiris on her after his death; for which reason he was weak in his lower limbs<sup>a</sup>. This was the god of silence, being therefore usually represented with his finger on his mouth; he was always placed near the statues of Osiris and Isis, to intimate that they having been once mortals, was not to be spoken of<sup>b</sup>. Orus is often confounded with Apollo; he was the son of Isis and Osiris, and was generally represented as a child wrapped up in swadling-cloaths; and sometimes, by those of Coptos, as holding in one hand the privities of Typhon<sup>c</sup>. Canopus was the pilot of Osiris's ship, whose soul, after his death, migrated into the fixed star of that name<sup>d</sup>, which is one of the first magnitude, but not visible in Europe<sup>e</sup>. This god became famous for the victory obtained by him over the Chaldean god, Fire; the story of which in brief is this: The Chaldeans carried about their god, to combat with those of other provinces, all which it easily overcame and destroyed, none of their images being able to resist the force of the fire, till at length the priest of Canopus devised this artifice; he took an earthen water-pot full of holes, which he stopped up with wax, and having filled it with water, painted it over, and placed the head of an old image upon it, and produced it as a god. In the conflict, the wax being soon melted, the water rushed out at the holes, and quickly extinguished the fire. In memory of this victory, Canopus is usually represented in the manner we have just described, without arms, and having scarce any feet to be seen<sup>f</sup>. Yet others suppose these were really no more than vessels filled with the water of the Nile, which the ancient Egyptians used also to worship.

Of the sacred animals adored by the Egyptians, none was held in so great reverence as the bull, by which they represented Osiris. There were two of this kind kept in Egypt, one at Memphis, called Apis, by the Grecians Epaphus, and the other at Helopolis, called Maenris: this last was black, and the honours paid to him were inferior to those due to Apis<sup>a</sup>. The Apis was to be the calf of a cow incapable of bearing another, and no otherwise to be impregnated (as the Egyptians imagined) than by thunder. The marks which distinguished him from all others were these: his body was black, except one square of white on the forehead; he had the figure of an eagle on his back; a double list of hair on his tail, and a knot like a beetle under his tongue<sup>b</sup>. And others reckon no less than twenty nine marks peculiar to this beast<sup>c</sup>. They sacrificed bulls to Apis, but were so nice in the choice of them, that if they found but one black hair upon them, they judged them to be unclean. This search was made by the priest with the utmost precaution; after which he drew out his tongue, to see if he were clean in that part; and in the last place he examined his tail, to see whether the hairs were natural, and as they ought to be. The beast being found without blemish, the priest tied a label about his horns, and sealing it with his signet, ordered him to be taken away and secured; for it was death to sacrifice any beast of this kind that was not marked with such a seal. The order and ceremony of the sacrifice was thus: the victim being brought to the altar, they immediately kindled a fire, and pouring wine upon him, they offered their prayers to the god. Then killing the beast, they flayed him, and struck off his head, which they carried, with many imprecations, to the market, or other publick place, and sold it to some Grecian, if they met with any; but if no such person were to be found, they threw it into the river, with this form of execration; May the evils impending over the persons now sacrificing, or the Egyptians in general, fall upon this head. This ceremony of libation, and the manner of devouring the head of the victim, was an universal practice over all Egypt; for which reason no Egyptian would eat of the head of any animal. But in the choice of their victims, there were different customs in different places<sup>d</sup>.

When the Apis died, and his funeral pomp was over, the priests who had this office, sought out for another with the same marks, and when they had found one, the lamentations immediately ceased; and the priests lead the calf first into the city of Nile, where he was fed for forty days: from thence he was transported in a vessel with a gilded cabin to Memphis, as their god, and turned into the grove of Vulcan. For the abovementioned forty days women only were admitted into his presence, who standing before him, lifted up their coats, and shewed him their privities; after which time they were not permitted to see the new god. The reason they gave for this worship was, because the soul of Osiris, as they pretended, migrated into a bull of this sort, and by a successive transmigration passed from one to p. 373. Vid. KIRCHER Oedip. ver. 1. p. 214.

<sup>a</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. p. 358.<sup>b</sup> VARRO apud August. de civit. Dei.<sup>c</sup> PLUT. ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> PLUT. ibid. p. 359.<sup>e</sup> Vid. PLIN.

l. 6. c. 22.

<sup>f</sup> SUIDAS in Canop. RUFFIN. Hist. Eccles. l. 11.<sup>a</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. p. 364.<sup>b</sup> HEROD. l. 3. Vid. PLIN. l. 8. c. 46.<sup>c</sup> ÆLIAN. Hist. anim. l. 11. c. 9.<sup>d</sup> HEROD. l. 2.

another,

a another, as often as one died, and another was found. But others say, that it was because when Osiris was killed by Typhon, Isis threw his limbs into a wooden cow, covered with fine linen, from whence the city of Busiris received its name <sup>a</sup>.

THE festival of Isis was celebrated with the utmost solemnity; for on the vigil thereof they fasted, and having prayed, sacrificed a bullock, taking out the bowels, and leaving the fat and vitals in the carcass; then cutting off the legs, rump, neck and shoulders, and filling the body with fine bread, honey, dried raisins, figs, incense, myrrh, and other perfumes, they proceeded to the consecration, pouring in great quantities of oil. They sacrificed fasting, and beat themselves all the while the flesh lay on the fire, and afterwards they feasted on the remainder. The offerings of this b kind of cattle, whether young or old, were to be unblemished males; for the females being sacred to Isis, could not be offered. Whence it was that the Egyptians paid the first degree of veneration to that creature, and abominated the Greeks for not doing the same. When a cow died, they threw her into the river; but a bull was buried without the cities, leaving one horn, and sometimes both, sticking up as a mark of the grave. The flesh being perfectly consumed, and nothing but the bare bones left, they were transported to an island of the Delta, called Protopitis, from whence vessels were dispatched to several parts of the kingdom, to collect the bones, and carry them away, and bury them together: the same was observed in relation to other cattle, the Egyptians being forbidden to kill any <sup>c</sup>.

JUPITER was principally worshipped at Thebes, thence named Diospolis; they esteemed the ram sacred on that deity's account, and abtaining from sheep, sacrificed goats only; only once a year, at the festival of Jupiter, they killed a ram, and flaying the carcass, put the skin on the statue of the god, bringing at the same time an image of Hercules into his presence, in memory of the abovementioned passage between those two deities: after which, every one present gave the ram a blow, and he was buried in a consecrated coffin.

THE inhabitants of Mendes, on the other hand, sacrificed sheep and no goats, because they worshipped Pan, whom they took to be one of the eight most antient gods, and always represented him with the face and legs of a goat, just as the Greeks did. d Not that they imagined him to have been really of that shape (for as to that they deemed him to be like other gods) but for some mystical reason. Though the Mendesians had a religious veneration for goats of both sexes, yet they esteemed the male above the female, and paid great reverence to goat-herds; and particularly to one, who at his death was universally lamented. In the Egyptian tongue, Mendes signified both Pan and a goat <sup>e</sup>.

TO the moon it was their custom to sacrifice when she was at the full. The victims offered to her were swine, which the Egyptians held to be impure animals, and were forbidden to offer them to any other deities, than to that planet and Bacchus. When they made their sacrifice to the moon, and had killed the victim, they put the end of e the tail, with the spleen and fat, into the cauld, and burned them on the sacred fire, and eat the rest of the flesh on the day of the new moon, though they would not have tasted it at any other time. Those whose poverty would not admit of the expence of this sacrifice, moulded a bit of paste into the shape of a hog, and offered up that.

AT the festival of Bacchus, though every one was obliged to kill a hog before the door of his house in the evening, yet they instantly returned the carcass to the swine-herd of whom it was bought. The rest of this festival was celebrated in the same manner in Egypt as in Greece; excepting that instead of the Phallus, the Egyptian women carried about little images of a cubit in height, each of which had a priapus almost as big as the rest of its body, and so contrived with strings as to move. With f these the women marched in procession, all the while singing the praises of Bacchus, and preceded by a flute <sup>g</sup>.

THEY did not think it sufficient in Egypt to solemnize the festivals of their gods at annual periods only; but they had several times in the year appointed for that purpose, when they visited the several cities where the particular deities were worshipped with great devotion.

THOSE of Isis at Busiris, and of Jupiter at Thebes, we have already mentioned; only in respect to the former, we must add, that after the sacrifices were duly performed, the men and women who met together on that occasion, amounting to many thousands, disciplined themselves with an instrument our author dared not discover. g In which devotion the Carians who lived in Egypt surpassed all others, cutting their foreheads with swords. The other most remarkable festivals were those of Diana,

<sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. ubi sup. p. 76.

<sup>c</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

at Bubastis, which was the Egyptians name of that goddess; of Minerva at Sais; of the sun, at Heliopolis; of Latona, at Butus; and of Mars, at Papremis. Those who assembled on such solemn occasions at Heliopolis and Butus, offered sacrifices only, without any farther ceremony: but the other deserve a more particular description.

THE festival of Diana, in the city of Bubastis, was observed after this manner: great numbers of men and women embarked promiscuously together, and during the voyage some of the women beat on the tabor whilst some of the men played on the pipe; the rest of both sexes singing and striking their hands together at the same time. They stopped at every city they came to; where during their stay, the women were partly employed in their music, and partly in railing at the women of the place where they had stopped, or in dancing and shewing themselves naked. At length being arrived at Bubastis, they celebrated the festival with numerous sacrifices, and consumed more wine than in all the rest of the year; for the concourse of people upon this occasion was reported to have usually amounted to 700,000 men and women, besides children.

WHEN they met to sacrifice to Minerva at Sais, they hung up by night a great number of lamps filled with oil mingled with salt, round every house, the tow swimming on the surface. These burned during the whole night, and the festival was thence named the lighting of lamps. The Egyptians who were not present at this solemnity, observed the same ceremonies, wherever they happened to be; and lamps were lighted that night, not only at Sais, but throughout all Egypt. The reasons for using these illuminations, and paying so great respect to this night, were kept secret.

AT Papremis a very extraordinary custom was observed; for after having gone through the usual form of worship, a few of the priests towards the setting of the sun, attended about the image of Mars, whilst the far greater part of them posted themselves before the gates of the temple with staves or clubs in their hands; on the other hand, a company of men, who had devoted themselves to this service, and frequently amounted to above a thousand, armed in like manner, drew up opposite to the priests who guarded the avenues of the temple. The image of the god, which was kept in a gilded wooden shrine, and had been removed out of the temple on the eve of the festival, and placed in another chapel, was drawn by those few who were appointed to attend it, together with the shrine in which it stood, on a four-wheeled chariot, back again to the temple. But the priests who guarded the entrance refusing to give them admittance, the beforementioned votaries, in duty to the god, began to beat the opponents with their clubs, whereon a violent conflict ensued, the blows being chiefly dealt on the head: insomuch, that in all probability many must have died of their bruises, though the Egyptians would never allow it. The inhabitants of the place accounted for this barbarous institution, by relating that Mars having been educated abroad till he attained to man's estate, and coming home to see his mother, who was an inhabitant of this sacred place, her servants, having never seen him, refused to admit him, and forcibly drove him away. Whereupon, retiring to another city, he got together a good number of men, and returning, fell upon his mother's servants, and entered by force; in commemoration of which action this combat was instituted.

BUT there was nothing so remarkable in the Egyptian religion, as the preposterous worship that nation paid to animals; such as the cat, the ichneumon, the dog, the ibis, the wolf, the crocodile, and several others; which they had in high veneration as well dead as living. Whilst they were living, they had lands set apart for maintenance of each kind; and both men and women were employed in feeding and attending on them, the children succeeding their parents in the office, which was so far from being declined, or thought despicable by the Egyptians, that they gloried in it as high honour, wearing certain badges and ensigns, by which being distinguished at a distance, they were saluted by bending of the knee, and other demonstrations of respect. To these, and to the deities to which they were sacred, the inhabitants of the several cities where they were worshipped, offered up their prayers; and in particular for the recovery of their children, whose heads they shaved sometimes all over, sometimes only one half, or a third part, and putting the hair into one balance, and silver into the other, when the silver overbalanced, they gave it to the keepers of the animals; who therewith provided food for them, which was usually fish cut in pieces; but the ichneumons and cats were sometimes fed with bread and milk.

IF a person killed any of these sacred animals designedly, he was punished with death; if involuntarily, his punishment was referred to the discretion of the priests; but if a man killed either a cat, a hawk, or an ibis, whether with design or not, he was to die without mercy; the enraged multitude hurrying away the unfortunate person a son to certain death, sometimes without any formal process of trial <sup>a</sup>: an instance of which is given in a Roman, who happening accidentally to kill a cat, the mob immediately gathered about the house where he was, and neither the entreaties of some principal men sent by the king, nor the fear of the Romans, with whom they were then negotiating a peace, could save the man's life <sup>1</sup>. For this reason, if any one by chance found one of these creatures dead, he stood at a convenient distance from it, and with great lamentation protested that he found it dead. And, what may seem still more incredible, it is reported, that at a time when there was a famine in Egypt, which drove the inhabitants to so great a distress that they fed on one another, there was no one person accused of having tasted of any of these sacred animals.

b THE extravagant worship which the Egyptians paid to these deities, as to the bulls at Memphis and Heliopolis, the goat at Mendes, the lion at Leontopolis, and the crocodile at the lake Mæris (D), and to many others in different places, exceeds all belief. For they were kept in consecrated enclosures, and well attended on by men of high rank, who at a great expence provided victuals for them, which consisted of the greatest dainties, such as the finest flour boiled in milk, cakes of several sorts made with honey, and the flesh of geese boiled and roasted: those who fed on raw meat were supplied with several sorts of birds. And not only this, but they were washed in hot baths, anointed with most precious ointments, and perfumed with the most odoriferous scents: they lay on the richest carpets and other costly furniture; and that they c might want nothing to make their life as happy as possible, they had the most beautiful females of their several kinds provided for them, to which they gave the title of their concubines, bestowing extravagant attendance and expence upon them.

WHEN any of these animals died, they lamented them as if they had been their dearest children, and frequently laid out more than they were worth in their funeral: as an instance of which, it is said, that in the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, the Apis dying of old age (E) at Memphis, his keeper bestowed no less than fifty talents of silver, or almost 13,000 l. over and above all his substance, in the burying of him. And lest this should seem improbable, we are told, that some keepers of these creatures had squandered away 100,000 talents, a most immense sum, in the d maintenance of them <sup>a</sup>. In whatever house a cat died, all the family shaved their eyebrows; and if a dog, their whole body; nor would they make use of any provision which happened to be in the house at such times. In case of a fire, there was generally great lamentation among the Egyptians on account of their cats; for though, when such accidents happened, they took greater care to preserve their cats than their houses, yet those creatures, either by creeping sily on the ground, or leaping over the mens heads, for the most part found a way to throw themselves into the fire. The dead bodies of the sacred animals were wrapped up in fine linen, and carried to be embalmed, and being anointed with the oil of cedar, and other aromatic preparations, to preserve them from putrefaction, were buried in sacred coffins. Dead cats were carried to be interred to the city of Bubastis; hawks, and the venomous mole were carried to Butus; dogs, bears, (of which there are but few in Egypt) and a small kind of wolves, no bigger than foxes, were buried where they were found dead. And in performing this last honour to them, the Egyptians were so exact, that when they had been abroad in foreign wars, they frequently brought home dead cats and hawks along with them for that purpose, with great demonstrations of sorrow, though at the same time they often wanted necessities <sup>1</sup>.

How absurd and ridiculous soever these superstitions may seem, yet they wanted not those who endeavoured to defend them by various reasons; though the priests generally affected silence on these occasions, referring all to certain mysteries which they f might not reveal.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. & DIOD. SIC. ubi sup.
HEROD. ubi. sup.

<sup>1</sup> DIOD. ibid. p. 75.

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>1</sup> Idem, &

(D) The crocodile seems to be the last animal to which mankind could be tempted to pay divine adoration. That it might be done with safety, one of these creatures was trained up to be tame and familiar for the purpose, and had his ears adorned with strings of jewels and gold, and his fore-feet with chains. He was fed with consecrated provisions at the publick charge; and when strangers went to see him, which often happened out of curiosity, they also carried him a present of a cake, dressed meat, and wine, or a drink made with honey, which was offered to him by the priests; one opening his mouth, and the other feeding him. When he died, his body was embalmed and buried in a sacred coffin at Asisnoe (1).

(E) This contradicts that assertion of some, that the Apis was not suffered to live beyond a certain time; after which the priests drowned him in a sacred fountain (2).

(1) HEROD. ubi sup. STRABO, l. 17. p. 165.

(2) AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. 22. p. 227.

1. THE first reason alledged, was from the fabulous tradition, that the gods, in the <sup>a</sup> early ages, were obliged to transform themselves into several kinds of animals, to avoid the assaults and cruelties of men, who had conspired against them; but afterwards, out of gratitude for the many benefits bestowed by them on mankind, those in power ordained that the creatures whose shapes the gods had assumed, should be well maintained while they lived, and honourably buried when they died.

2. SOME pretended this worship had the following original: They say, that the antient Egyptians being often routed by their neighbours for want of a regular disposition of their troops, they at length invented the use of standards, to distinguish the different companies; and for that end fixed the images of the animals they afterwards adored, on so many spears, and caused the leaders to carry them at the head of each <sup>b</sup> troop; by which means every man knew his post: their observing this order often gained them the victory, the honour of which they ascribed to the animals whose figures they had used for ensigns. Others will have these images to have been made use of in the most early times, to distinguish the first civil societies, who united for mutual defence against the violence of their fellow-creatures.

3. A THIRD reason is taken from the great use and service the several animals are of to mankind: as the ox for tilling the land; the sheep, by supplying milk and wool; the dog for guarding the house, and hunting; the ibis and hawk for destroying the serpents and noxious insects; the crocodile for defending the country against the incursions of the Arabian robbers; the ichneumon for preventing the too great multiplication of the crocodiles; and the cat against the asp and other venomous reptiles <sup>c</sup>.

4. BUT men of better judgment, not satisfied with these reasons, which seemed to them too weak to excuse practices so dishonourable to paganism, and at which they blushed in private <sup>a</sup>, urged something more specious in favour of it, by pretending that the worship paid by the Egyptians to animals, did not terminate in the animals themselves, but in the gods, whose symbols they were, and to whom they had some peculiar relation. The philosophers, say they, honoured the image of god wherever they met with it, even in inanimate beings, and consequently much more in those which partook of life. They therefore are to be commended who worship not the creatures, but the supreme deity through them; which should be esteemed as so many mirrors offered us by nature, reflecting the divine image; or as so many instruments of God <sup>d</sup> in the eternal support and preservation of the world. Wherefore, if statues should be adorned with all the gold and precious stones in the world, it is not to them that men should direct their worship; for the divine nature cannot dwell in the artful disposition of colours, nor in matter which is subject to decay, and destitute both of sense and motion. And they add, that as the sun, moon, heaven, earth and sea are common to all men, but have different names in different nations; so there is but one Mind and one Providence which governs the universe, and has several subordinate ministers, though called by different names, and worshipped in divers manners, and with different ceremonies, according to the laws and customs of every country <sup>e</sup>.

AGREEABLY to this notion, they pretended that the hawk was an emblem of the <sup>e</sup> supreme Deity, because of its piercing sight and swiftness. The asp, the cat, and the beetle were also honoured as images of the divine power; the first, as not subject to old age, and moving without the assistance of limbs; the cat, because they imagined she conceived by her ear, and brought forth her young by her mouth, representing the generation of speech; and the beetle, because they supposed there was no female in the whole species. The crocodile also they took to be another image of the Deity, because of all animals it has no tongue, which organ God has no occasion for <sup>f</sup>.

THE relation the sacred animals bore to some particular gods, or the services they had rendered on some particular occasions, or their being typical resemblances of some parts of nature, are also mentioned as further reasons for the great respect shewn <sup>f</sup> them. Thus it is said, that dogs were worshipped because they guided Isis when she sought for the body of Osiris, which they had guarded from wild beasts <sup>g</sup>; though this creature afterwards lost much of its reputation, by eating part of the Apis, which had been killed by Cambysis, when no other animal approached the dead body <sup>h</sup>; that the hawk was deified because one of those birds, in antient times, brought a book to the priests of Thebes, tied round with a scarlet thread, containing the rites and ceremonies which were to be observed in the worship of the gods; for which

<sup>a</sup> Vid. DIOD. SIC. ubi sup.

PLUT. de Isid. & Osirid. p. 380.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. PLUT. ibid. p. 379.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. p. 377, 382, &c.

<sup>d</sup> Idem. ibid. p. 363, 380, &c.

<sup>e</sup> DIOD. ubi sup. p. 77.

<sup>f</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. p. 368.

a reason the sacred scribes wore a scarlet fillet, with a hawk's feather on their head: that the wolf was adored because Osiris arose in that shape from the infernal regions, and assisted Isis and her son Orus in the battle against Typhon, wherein the usurper was slain; or else because when the Ethiopians once broke into Egypt, a great company of wolves fell upon the invaders, and drove them beyond Elephantis; whence that name was called Lycopolites; though others give no other reason for the respect paid them, than the near relation they bore to dogs: that the crocodile attained this honour because one of those creatures saved Menas, an antient king of Egypt, from being worried by his own dogs, which pursued him to the lake Muris, where a crocodile took him on his back, and carried him to the other side of the lake*: that the cat was revered as an emblem of the moon, for its various spots, fruitfulness and activity in the night: and the goat, the most lustful of all creatures, was the hieroglyphick of that violent impulse by which men are urged to propagate their species; and in honouring this animal, they testified their gratitude to their gods for the populousness of their country*.

NOT to take up the reader's time in enumerating the other animals worshipped in the several parts of Egypt, we shall conclude what we intend to say of them, with Herodotus's account of the phoenix, which fable has given rise to whatever has been since related of that imaginary bird. He tells us, that the phoenix was one of the sacred birds, which himself had never seen but in effigy; for he appeared in Egypt but once in five hundred years, immediately after the death of his father, as those of Heliopolis affirmed. The painters represented him with a plumage of crimson and gold, and of the shape and size of an eagle. They pretended he came from Arabia, and brought the body of his father embalmed, which he buried in the temple of the sun. And this he performed in the following manner: first he moulded as much myrrh as he could carry into the shape of an egg, and having tried its weight, hollowed the egg, and put his father into it; he then stopped up the aperture again with myrrh, in such proportion that the weight of the whole might equal that of the egg before the body was put in, and carried it to Heliopolis*.

THE Egyptians are reported to have been the first who ordained that men should abstain from women in temples, and not enter any sacred place without washing after the use of a woman. They were also the first who assigned each month and day to a particular deity, and observed the times of each person's nativity; by which they judged their future fortunes. They carefully registred all prodigies (in which their country is said to have abounded more than any other) with an account of their consequences; supposing that if the like happened at another time, the event would be the same. However, they did not pretend to foretel any thing themselves, but all predictions were delivered by the gods. For if they were not the first nation which erected oracles, and introduced the custom of consulting them, it is however allowed that the most antient and famous oracles among the heathens, particularly those of Jupiter in Lybia, and at Dodona, owed their original to Egypt*; as will be mentioned in a more proper place.

THERE were several oracles in Egypt, as those of Hercules, Apollo, Minerva, Diana, Mars and Jupiter; but that which they revered above all others, was the oracle of Latona, in the city of Butus†: and in after-times there was a very famous one of Serapis at Alexandria‡. The sacred animals also themselves had their several oracles; as the Apis, the goat, the lion, and the crocodile*. The manner of consulting the Apis was, by observing into which chamber, of two that were prepared for him, he entred; his going into one of them being construed as a good omen, and into the other as a bad one: or else they offered him food, and from his accepting or refusing it, concluded the answer favourable, or the contrary. It is said that Germanicus Caesar consulting this oracle some short time before his death, the beast would not eat out of his hand§.

WE must not omit to say something of the human sacrifices which are said to have been offered by the antient Egyptians. As red oxen were allowed to be sacrificed because of their resemblance to Typhon, who, it is said, was red-haired; so men of that complexion were reported to have been slain in former times by their kings at the tomb of Osiris: but few of the Egyptians having red hair, strangers were the usual victims; whence it is supposed the fable so current among the Greeks, of the cruelty of Busiris to strangers took its rise; not from any king of that name, but

Some other Institutions of the Egyptians.

* DIOD. ubi sup. p. 78, &c.
ubi sup.

* Idem ibid.

† Vid. VAN DALE de Orac. p. 274.

* PLUT. ubi sup. p. 376.

† Idem ibid.

* DIOD. ubi sup.

* HERODOT.

* PAUSAN. l. 7. RUFFIN. Hist. Eccl. l. 2. c. 23.

* PLIN. Nat. hist. l. 8. c. 46. AMM. MARCELL. l. 32. c. 15.

because

because Osiris's tomb was so called in the Egyptian tongue <sup>c</sup>. Men were also in old times sacrificed at Heliopolis, and to Juno or Lucina, at a city in the upper Thebais, called by the name of that goddess, who was worshipped there under the form of a vultur. These human victims were to be approved of in the same manner as the calves that were searched and sealed as clean; and three were sacrificed every day, at a certain season in the dog-days being burnt alive, and their ashes scattered abroad; to these unhappy men they gave the epithet of Typhonian <sup>d</sup>. This barbarous custom was abolished by Amosis, who ordered that so many images of wax should be offered in their stead <sup>e</sup>: and there was so little remembrance of it left in the days of Herodotus, that mentioning a fable of the Grecians, that when Hercules arrived in Egypt, the Egyptians designing to sacrifice him to Jupiter, conducted him to the altar with great ceremony; but that he delivered himself, by killing all that were present; that historian judges those who invented that story utterly ignorant of the Egyptian laws and customs; for how, says he, can we imagine that a people forbidden to kill any kind of animal, except geese, swine, and such bulls and calves as they find without blemish (F), would sacrifice men? however that there was really such a custom, seems undeniable from good authority; and is confirmed by the impress of the priest's seal, which was set on the oxen that were to be sacrificed; and on which a man was engraven kneeling with his hands bound behind him, and a sword at his throat <sup>f</sup>. We have formerly mentioned the human sacrifices which were offered to the Nile, according to a tradition of the Egyptians <sup>g</sup>; but we do not find any notice taken of them in ancient authors.

We have mentioned the worship of leeks and onions as one part of the Egyptian superstition: But as the historians mention nothing of this, we imagine the laryrit, to heighten the ridicule, might go a little beyond strict truth <sup>h</sup>; though there might possibly be some foundation for such an opinion, from the scrupulous abstinence of some of that nation from particular vegetables, as lentils, beans and onions; the latter of which the priests abominated, as some pretend, because Dionysus, who had been brought up by Isis, was drowned in hunting after them; or rather because onions alone of all plants thrive when the moon is in the wane <sup>i</sup>.

BEFORE we quit this subject, the structure of the Egyptian temples deserves some notice. The first thing which offered itself to the view, was an avenue, or stone pavement, of a plethron in breadth, or something less, and about three or four times as long; having on each side a row of sphinxes, twenty cubits distant from each other. This avenue led to a portico, behind which was a second, and sometimes a third (the number of these portico's being not always the same.) The temple itself consisted of a spacious and magnificent court, and a well proportioned chapel; in which was generally no image (for the Egyptians in the eldest times used none <sup>j</sup>) or if there was any, it was not of human form, but in the shape of some irrational animal <sup>k</sup>.

The miscellaneous customs of the Egyptians.

FEW nations in the world observed their original laws and customs so long as the Egyptians; and their exactness in observing ordinances of a higher nature was not to be admired, considering their strict attachment to their own usages and manners in trivial things; for a new custom was a prodigy in Egypt <sup>l</sup>.

IN the education of their children they were very careful; but they brought them up with great frugality, feeding them with cheap broths, made of common things, and with the stems of the papyrus roasted under the ashes, and the stalks and roots of other plants which grew in the marshes, sometimes raw, and sometimes dressed. They went for the most part naked and barefoot during their childhood, because the warmth of the climate; so that the whole expence of a child, from his birth till he arrived at the state of manhood, did not exceed twenty drachms, or about thirteen shillings: which was one great cause that Egypt was so exceeding populous. As to the instruction they gave their children, the priests taught them two sorts of letters, those called sacred, and those in which their common learning was written;

<sup>c</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 79.

<sup>d</sup> MANETHO, apud Porphy. de abst. l. 2. c. 55. Euseb. prep. Ev. l. 4. c. 16. & Plut. de Isid. & Osir. p. 380.

<sup>e</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. p. 363.

<sup>f</sup> PLUT. ubi sup. p. 353. Vid. DIOD. p. 80.

<sup>g</sup> PLATO, in Tim. p. 656.

<sup>h</sup> MANETHO, apud Porphy. de abst. l. 2. c. 55. Euseb. prep. Ev. l. 4. c. 16. & Plut. de Isid. & Osir. p. 380.

<sup>i</sup> Idem apud cosl.

<sup>j</sup> HEROD. ubi sup. c. 45.

<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 178. b.

<sup>l</sup> JUVEN. sat. 15. ver. 10.

<sup>m</sup> PLUT.

<sup>n</sup> LUCIAN. de dea Syria.

<sup>o</sup> STRABO, l. 17. p. 1158.

(F) From this passage, and what has been said above, we cannot but think those mistaken who have asserted, that it was never lawful for the Egyptians to appease the gods with cattle or blood; but only with prayers and incense (1).

(1) Vid. MACROB. Saturnal. l. 1. c. 7.

a but exercised them chiefly in geometry and arithmetic: however, there were few of the inferior classes who learned to write and read, except the tradesmen. But that they might be useful members of the commonwealth, and be enabled to maintain themselves, they began very early to learn their paternal art or profession, either from their fathers or near relations. Music and wrestling they never taught their children, as disapproving them both: the first they esteemed not only useless, but rather hurtful, serving only to emasculate the mind; and the other they believed did not tend to the preservation of health, the strength gained by it being of short duration, and the exercise itself dangerous *. One particular of the education of the Egyptian youth was very commendable; for they were taught to behave with great respect towards their elders; being obliged to rise up from their seats, and to retire at the approach of those that were more aged; which custom was also practised at Sparta †.

As to the diet of the Egyptians, we have already made some occasional observations; to which we may add, that among them it was a reproach to eat bread made of barley or wheat; instead of which they used a fine flower, called by some olyra, and by others zea, or spelt; and this bread they named collestis, probably from its glutinous quality ‡. Their usual drink was (as it is at this present) the water of the Nile, which is very agreeable to the taste, and so fattening, that they never gave it to the Apis, lest he should grow too corpulent §. It is true, the water of this river is pretty muddy, but the Egyptians have a way of clarifying it by rubbing the vessel with a little pounded almonds ¶. Their better sort of drink, or wine, as Herodotus calls it, was made of barley, because they had antiently no vines in that country †, or rather did not cultivate them, nor do they yet in any other part than the province of al Fezzum *. So that we are probably indebted to this nation for the invention of beer.

THE Egyptians abstained from different sorts of animals, in different parts of the kingdom, according to the different deities they worshipped; but they all agreed in the aversion they had to swine's flesh; which was accounted by them so impure, that if a man but touched one of those animals by accident, he went immediately and plunged himself in the river, with his clothes on. And for this reason hogherds alone of all the Egyptians were not suffered to enter any of their temples; neither would any man give his daughter in marriage to one of that profession, or take a wife born of such parents; so that they were forced to inter-marry among themselves. They eat fish, either pickled or dried in the sun; and also quails, ducks, and smaller birds, preserved in salt, without any other preparation: all other birds or fishes, except such as they accounted sacred, they eat without scruple, either boiled or roasted. Those who dwelt in the marshes, made food of several plants, which annually grow there, particularly the lotus, of which they made a sort of bread, and the lower stems of the papyrus, the head of which was reserved for other uses ¶.

At their principal feasts it was their custom, when they began to taste their wine after supper, to bring in a coffin with the image of a dead man carved in wood and painted, of one or two cubits in length, or as others say, a real corpse*; which was carried about to all the company by a person appointed for that purpose, who repeated these words distinctly; Look upon this, and be merry; for such as this is, shalt thou be, when thou art dead †. This image some will have to be that of Maneros, in memory of whom they sung a mournful song at their entertainments, which they called by his name. Of this person there are various traditions: the Egyptians made him the son of their first king, who died in the flower of his age; others say he was the son of a king of Byblus, in Phanicia, and was frighted to death by the angry look of Isis, for his prying too nearly into her behaviour to the dead body of Osiris. This Maneros is reported to have been the first inventor of music; for which reason, and the conformity of the song to that sung by other nations in honour of the Grecian Linus, Herodotus supposes him to be the same with that poet: but after all, some pretend Maneros was not the name of a person, but of the song itself; and that the dead image represented the fate of Osiris ‡.

THE Egyptians were very cleanly, both at their meals and in other respects; carefully scouring the drinking vessels, which were of brass, every day; and using frequent ablutions and purifications: they scrupulously avoided eating with strangers, as unclean §; and for neatness chiefly it was that they circumcised themselves, which was a custom among them from time immemorial ¶, and esteemed by them so ne-

* DIODOR. ubi sup. p. 72. de Isid. & Osir. p. 353.

† HEROD. ubi sup.

‡ Idem ibid.

§ PLUTARCH.

vol. II. p. 226.

* SICARD, Mem. des Mus. vol. II. p. 13.

† HEROD. ubi sup.

‡ LUCAS,

¶ HEROD. ubi sup.

* See before, p. 183.

† LUCIAN. de luctu. SILIUS de bello Pun. l. 3.

‡ Gen xliii.

§ PLUTARCH. de Isid. & Osir. p. 357.

¶ HEROD. ubi sup.

31. HEROD. ibid.

* HEROD. ibid. DIOD. Sic. ubi sup. p. 24.

cessary, that Pythagoras, to have the liberty of conversing with the Egyptian priests, <sup>a</sup> and entering into their temples, was obliged to submit to this operation <sup>b</sup>. One of the fathers tells us they were circumcised at the age of fourteen <sup>c</sup>; but whence he had his information we do not know. Whether the Jews learned this custom of the Egyptians, as some of the profane historians pretend, is a point we shall consider in another place.

THE habit of this nation was a linen vest, fringed at the bottom, which they called calasiris; and over that they wore a white mantle of woollen cloth. But to enter any of their temples in that upper garment, or to bury their dead in woollen, was accounted profane. Their manner of saluting one another abroad, was by bowing very respectfully, letting their hands fall down to their knees <sup>d</sup>.

THE Egyptians, in several of their manners and customs, seemed industriously to act in contradiction to the rest of mankind. For among them it was the custom for the women to be employed in trade and business abroad, while the men staid at home to spin, and minded domestic affairs; and this perhaps gave occasion to that extraordinary law, by which the sons were not obliged to provide for their parents, but the daughters were. In carrying of burdens, the men bore them on their head, and the women on their shoulders; and when they made water, the women stood upright, but the men sat. They used to ease nature at home, and eat publicly in the streets; saying, very justly, that such things as were filthy, though necessary, should be done in private, and such as were decent, in publick. They kneaded dough with their feet, and tempered mortar with their hands. And whereas in other countries, the apartments of the cattle were separated from those of the men, in Egypt men and beasts <sup>e</sup> dwelt together. And we might mention several other instances of the like singularity.

THE great virtue of the Egyptians, and wherein they pretended to excel all mankind, was gratitude; which they esteemed to be of the greatest service in life, as the only encouragement to beneficent actions. And for this reason it was, that they honoured their princes as gods, supposing that those whom providence had exalted to the throne, and endued with both the power and will to do good to mankind, participated in some measure of the divine nature; hence also proceeded the great respect they shewed to the remains of their dead ancestors, and their constant endeavour to testify their gratitude to every person and thing from which they received benefit <sup>f</sup>.

Of their funeral ceremonies.

THE Egyptians are said to have been the first who asserted the immortality of the soul, which, according to their doctrine, when the body was corrupted, entered into some other animal, and passing by a continual metempsychosis through the different kinds of animals, belonging to the air, earth, and water, returned again into a human body, after the revolution of 3000 years <sup>g</sup>. For this reason they endeavoured by art to preserve the body as long as possible, that the soul might be obliged to continue with it, and not soon pass into another <sup>h</sup>: and as the dead bodies, by the means they used, were of long duration, they spared no labour nor cost in building their sepulchres, which they termed their eternal mansions; at the same time being little curious in the structure of their houses, calling them inns, where they staid but for a short time, <sup>e</sup> whereas they remained in the other for a long course of years <sup>i</sup>.

THE mourning for the dead, and funeral rites, in Egypt, were antiently these: when a man of any consideration died, all the women of that family besmeared their heads and faces with dirt, then making bare their breasts, and girding their waists, they left the body at home, and marched through the streets of the city lamenting and beating themselves as they went, attended by all their relations of the same sex; the men at the same time forming another company, mourned in the same manner. And this they continued till the corps was interred; abstaining in the mean time from bathing, wine, and the more delicate meats, and laying aside their best attire. The first lamentation being over, the body was carried to those who professed the art of embalming, which, like other trades, they learned from their ancestors. These shewed the kindred of the deceased several models or patterns in wood and painted, together with a bill of the charges of each manner of preparation, and asked them which they would chuse: for there were three different ways of preparing dead bodies for burial. One was very exquisite and expensive, and came to a talent of silver, or about 258 l. 6 s. 8 d. the second was inferior, and of a moderate price, the charge being 20 mina, or a fourth part of the former sum; and the third was very mean, and cost but a trifle.

<sup>b</sup> CLEM. ALEX. Stromat. l. i. p. 30.

<sup>c</sup> AMBROS. de Abrahamo, l. 2. c. 11.

<sup>d</sup> HEROD.

ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>f</sup> DIOD. ubi sup. p. 81.

<sup>g</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>h</sup> SERVIVS in

Virgil. Æn. 3. ver. 67. Vid. AUGUST. Sermon. de divertis, & PLATON. in Phædon.

<sup>i</sup> DIOD. ubi

sup. p. 47.

- a This preliminary being settled, the embalmers took the body, and first drew out the brains through the nostrils with a crooked instrument of iron, and filled the vacancy with certain medicaments. Then one, whom they called the scribe, marked out, on the left side of the belly, how far the incision was to be made; and the paraschistes, whose office it was to make the incision, taking a sharp Ethiopic stone, cut open the body, as far as the law ordained, and immediately ran away as fast as he could, all that were present pursuing him, throwing stones at him, and cursing him, to turn the execration upon him: for they thought it a very heinous crime to wound, or offer violence to a dead body; but the saricheutæ, or embalmers, were highly esteemed and respected, conversing with the priests, and being with them admitted, as persons of sanctity, into the more sacred parts of their temples. When these came to dress the dissected body, one of them thrust his hand into it by the wound, and drew out all the intestines, except the heart and kidneys; another cleansed all the entrails, washing them with wine of palms and aromatic odours (G). Then the belly was filled with pounded myrrh, cassia, and other odoriferous drugs (frankincense only excepted) and the incision being sewed up, the body was carefully anointed with the oil of cedar and other things for above 30 days, or else laid in nitre for 70 days, which was the longest time allowed. At the expiration of which term, they washed the whole body, and bound fillets of fine linen round every part, covering it with gum, which the Egyptians used instead of glue. And all this was done without disfiguring the body; so that the very hairs remained on the brows and eye-lids, and the resemblance of the countenance was preserved, and easy to be known (H). The embalmers having done their parts, the relations received the corps, and put it into a wooden coffin, shaped like a man, which they set upright against the wall of the edifice designed for that purpose (I). For several of the Egyptians kept their dead at home with them above ground*, in magnificent apartments, having by this means the pleasure of seeing the lineaments of their ancestors, who died many ages before they were born; and they often brought the dried corps of a friend as a guest to their feasts†. The way of embalming which we have described, was the most costly manner of preserving the dead: those who were unable, or unwilling to be at so great an expence, were contented with a more ordinary preparation, which was done in this manner: they injected a clyster of oil of cedar by the common way, without opening the belly, or taking out the bowels, and laid the body in nitre the number of
- b
- c
- d

* CICERO. Tusc. quest. l. 1. c. 9.

† LUCIAN de lectu.

(G) Plutarch writes, that when the belly was opened, they first exposed it to the sun, and cast the bowels into the Nile, as what defiled the body (1).

(H) This seems a little extraordinary, considering how the flesh of the face must have been dried by the salt; but an eye-witness assures us, that he saw some embalmed bodies, in Egypt, with the hair, beard, and nails, the fillets which covered the head and feet being rotted off (2).

(I) To the description of Herodotus and Diodorus given above, we beg leave to add some observations as to those embalmed bodies, or mummies, as they are now called, which are frequently taken up and brought from Egypt.

The coffins in which they lie are very thick, and generally of sycamore, which in Egypt they call Pharaoh's fig-tree, and does not rot so soon as other wood; though some are of stone, and others of clothes pasted together, and very strong. The top of the coffin is usually cut into the shape of a head, with a face painted on it, resembling a woman; the rest is one continued trunk, and at the end of it is a broad pedestal, to set it upright upon in the repository. Some of these coffins are handsomely painted with several hieroglyphics.

The bodies appear in this manner: they are wrapped up in a shroud of linen, upon which are fastened divers scrolls of linen also, painted with sacred characters: these scrolls generally run down the belly and sides, or else are placed on the knees and legs. The face is covered with a kind of head-piece of linen cloth fitted with plaister, on which the countenance of the person is represented in gold; and the feet have also a cover of the same, painted with hieroglyphics, and fashioned like a high slipper. The whole body is swathed with fillets, or narrow bands of linen, beginning with the head, and ending with the feet, so artificially, and in so inimitable a manner wound round with so many casts, and turnings, and so often one upon another, that there cannot be less than a thousand ells of filleting upon one body. Those which cover the head and face being so neatly done, that they hinder not, but one may see the shape of the eyes, nose and mouth. On the breast is a sort of breast-plate, made with folds of linen cut scollop-wise, richly painted and gild: on which is usually the face of a woman with her arms expanded.

The inside of the body is filled with medicaments of the consistence, colour, and scent of pitch or bitumen, which waxes soft by the heat of the sun. In a skull of one of these bodies, there was found the quantity of two pounds of this preparation, which could not be infused any other way than by the nostrils, as Herodotus intimates. And the tongue of one being weighed, was less than seven grains English (3). Some curious persons in vain searched one of these mummies for the piece of money, which the ancient Greeks are said to put in the mouths of the dead, to pay Charon his fare (4). We are told however, that the greater part of these embalmed bodies have under the tongue a small plate of gold worth about two p.isses (5).

(1) PLUT. apud Greaves, ubi inf. (2) Voyage de M. DE BREVES. (3) THEVENOT, Voy. part 1. c. 6. GREAVES, Pyramidogr. p. 49, 50. (4) Vid.

GASSEND. de vita Peirsc. l. 4. (5) BURRETINI apud Thevenot, Relat. part. 1. p. xxv.

days abovementioned; at the end of which they let out the oil of cedar by the fundament, <sup>a</sup> which, by a peculiar efficacy, brought away the whole paunch and intrails shrunk and putrified; the nitre having consumed the flesh, and left nothing but the skin and bones. And when this was done, they delivered the body to the relations without any further operation. The third and last manner of preserving the dead, used only for the poorer sort, was performed by cleansing the belly by injected lotions, and salting the body for 70 days; after which it was taken away <sup>m</sup>. The wives of considerable persons, and all women who had been beautiful and dear to their relations, were not delivered to the embalmers presently after death; but were kept at home three or four days before they were carried out, to prevent those artists from abusing the bodies of such persons; for one of them was caught in such an action, and accused of it by his <sup>b</sup> companion. If any Egyptian, or even a stranger, was found killed by a crocodile, or drowned in the river, wherever the body came ashore, the inhabitants were by law obliged, at their own charge, to embalm and place it among the consecrated monuments, in the most costly manner; for none of his friends, or relations, or any other might touch his body, except the priests of the Nile, who buried him with their own hands, as something more than human <sup>n</sup>.

WHEN the corps of the deceased was prepared for the sepulchre, his nearest relations gave public notice of the day when such a one, by name, was to pass the lake, in order for his interment; to which the judges and all his friends were invited. At the time prefixed, above forty judges assembled, and sat in a semicircle, <sup>c</sup> in a certain place beyond the lake (which we suppose to be that of Meris.) The vessel, whose pilot was, in the Egyptian tongue, called Charon, being ready hauled up to the shore, before the coffin which contained the body was suffered to embark (K), every one was at liberty to accuse the deceased. If an accuser appeared, and made good his charge, that the deceased had led an ill life, the judges gave sentence accordingly, and the body was denied the usual burial: but if the accuser was convicted of having accused him unjustly, he incurred a severe punishment. If no accuser appeared, or if the accusation proved false, then the relations, laying aside their lamentation, proceeded to recite the praises of the deceased; in doing which they <sup>d</sup> took no notice of his descent, for all the Egyptians were held equally noble; but having mentioned in what manner he had been brought up and educated, they declared how he had lived and behaved himself after he became a man, enlarging on his piety, justice, temperance and other virtues; and beseeching the infernal gods to give him a favourable reception among the pious. The assistants joined their acclamations to this funeral oration, and celebrated the praises of the departed, as of one who was going to dwell for a long space of time with the just below. After this the body was deposited in the sepulchre of the family if they had one; and if they had not, they kept it at home with them in the manner abovementioned. Those that were forbidden to be interred, either for crimes by them committed, or for debt, were deposited <sup>e</sup> privately in their own houses. But it often happened, that the posterity of such persons growing rich, paid their debts, or obtained their pardon, and buried them in an honourable manner.

It must be acknowledged, that this institution of the Egyptians, in relation to their treatment of dead bodies, was excellently contrived for the encouragement of virtue, and the discouragement of vice. It is very plain, that the Greeks took all they fabled concerning the infernal judges, and the happiness and punishments of men after death, from this practice of the Egyptians: but Diodorus observes, that instead of bringing men to amendment of life by those fables, they incurred the ridicule and contempt of profligate persons, whereas in Egypt the reward of the good, and punishment of the wicked, after death, was not fabulous or imaginary, but really and daily distributed <sup>f</sup> in public, in the sight of all men <sup>o</sup>.

THE sepulchres wherein the Egyptians deposited the bodies of their dead, were built in various manners, according to the person's condition. The magnificence of the royal tombs have been already hinted; those of the antient kings at Thebes, it is said, could not be exceeded by their posterity. The sacred commentaries mentioned forty seven of them; but in the time of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, there were but seventeen remaining; most of which were quite decayed when Diodorus visited those parts in the 180th Olympiad. Of the pyramids, which were built for the same pur-

<sup>m</sup> HEROD. & DIODOR. ubi sup.

<sup>n</sup> HEROD. ibid.

<sup>o</sup> DIOD. ubi sup. p. 82, &c.

(K) This is the sense of the original; though it should rather seem, by the judges sitting on the farther side of the lake, that the corps was actually ferried over, but was not suffered to be disembarked, till sentence had passed.

- a pose, we have spoken sufficiently; and the sepulchre of Ossymandyas we may mention hereafter. The Egyptians of lower quality, at a great expence, cut subterraneous grots, or dormitories, in the rocks; such as those in the Lybian desarts, of which travellers speak so much, calling them catacombes, or mummy-pits. The entrance into them is by a square well, by which one may descend, setting the feet in the holes cut on each side for that purpose. These wells are not of equal depth, but the shallowest are above six mens height. At the bottom of the well there is a square opening, and a passage of ten or fifteen feet long, leading into several square vaulted chambers, each side of which are usually fifteen or twenty feet; and in the midst of every one of the four sides of the chamber is a bench cut out of the rock, upon which the
- b embalmed bodies lie. At the head of them there is commonly an idol, at the feet the image of a bird; and on the walls are several hieroglyphics, which might serve for epitaphs. Besides the principal bodies, there are other smaller ones, and particularly of children, which lie on the ground. Sometimes there are no less than twenty five or thirty of these chambers, or grots, having communication with one another; and the descent to them all is by one well. The stones of which Strabo observed a great number in a plain between Syene and Phile, are also by some thought to have been tombs. That author calls them Hermæa, from the resemblance they bore to the heaps of stones frequently erected by the highways in honour of Mercury; and he describes them to be a great smooth stone, almost spherical, of that hard and black marble of
- c which mortars were made, placed upon a greater stone, and surmounted by another; some of them lying by themselves: the greatest of them was no less than twelve feet diameter, and all of them above half so big.

THE antient Egyptians were the inventors of many useful arts and sciences: and thought they did not perhaps carry them afterwards to that perfection which might have been expected from them, since among them every man was obliged to apply himself to his paternal profession, and was confined to one particular art, or branch of learning only; yet whoever considers how difficult it is to lay the first foundations of any science, be they ever so small, will allow them great commendation.

Of their arts and sciences.

- As they acknowledge themselves indebted to their first kings for instructing them
- d how to provide the common necessities and conveniencies of life, so they attributed the honour of the first invention of the sciences to their Hermes, or Mercuries. How many there were of this name, when they lived, and what they invented or wrote, we shall enquire in another place, contenting ourselves here with a short account of the arts and learning which the Egyptians are supposed to have communicated to the rest of mankind, and the progress they made therein.

- THAT the Egyptians were early famous for wisdom and learning, appears from many antient writers, and even from the scriptures themselves: it is said, among other things, to the honour of Moses, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; and to magnify the wisdom of Solomon, we are told, that it excelled all the wisdom
- e of Egypt. Profane authors also unanimously testify this nation to have been the parent of all philosophical knowledge, and the only men that perfectly understood divine things.

- GEOMETRY is on all hands agreed to have been first found out in Egypt; and is said to have owed its rise to the setting out and measuring of their lands, the bounds of which were annually disturbed by the overflowing of the Nile. How far the Egyptians improved this science, is not very certain; but their skill therein seems not to have very profound, or to have extended to all geometrical quantities and subtle theories, like that of the moderns: the utmost they knew was probably no more than plain measuring, and such rules as were of common use in life. For
- f Pythagoras, who travelled into Egypt for the sake of their learning, after his return home offered a hecatomb, on his finding out the proportion of the longest side of a right angled triangle to the other two; and Thales, who also learned geometry in Egypt, sacrificed an ox to the gods, for joy that he had hit on a method of inscribing a rectangled triangle within a circle: which inventions they could not have had from the Egyptians, unless we should say that those two philosophers unjustly arrogated to themselves what they were beholden to their masters for. Now, if these more simple, though noble propositions, were not then to be found in the Egyptian geometry, much less can it be supposed to have contained those more abstruse theo-

Of their geometry.

<sup>a</sup> BURRETTINI, ubi sup.

<sup>q</sup> STRABO, l. 17. p. 1173.

<sup>r</sup> DIODOR. ubi sup. p. 41.

<sup>s</sup> ACTS

vii. 22.

<sup>t</sup> 1 Kings iv. 30.

<sup>u</sup> MACROB. in Somn. Scip. l. 1. c. 19. & Saturn. l. 1. c. 14. &

l. 7. c. 13.

<sup>v</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Proem. STRABO, l. 16, 17. PLATO, in Phædro. ACHILL.

TATIUS ad Aristi Phæn. IAMBlich. de vita Pythag. p. 144.

<sup>w</sup> HEROD. ubi sup. DIOD. p. 73.

<sup>x</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Pythag.

<sup>y</sup> Idem in Thalete.

rems, and analytical methods, which were afterwards known, and for which we are indebted to the Greeks, who built so fine a superstructure on the old Egyptian foundation *.

Arithmetic.

As arithmetic is not only of great use in itself, but absolutely necessary both in the theory and practise of geometry, that science was diligently cultivated in Egypt. That there was in later ages a kind of algebra known in that country, appears from the writings of Diophantus; but whether it was not an improvement made by the Grecians, after their settling there, cannot be affirmed; however, it was greatly inferior to the modern algebra in many respects *.

Astronomy.

It is generally supposed, that astronomy was also an invention of the Egyptians *, who by reason of the constant serenity of the air, and the flatness of their country, might observe the heavenly motions earlier, and with more ease than other people. Herodotus indeed gives the honour of this to the Babylonians †; but Diodorus makes the Babylonians themselves, as well as their sciences, to have been transplanted from Egypt. He attributes the first invention to those of Thebes; and says the Egyptians were accurate observers of the places and motions of the stars, and kept registers of their observations for an incredible number of years, having addicted themselves to this study in the most early ages; that they were well acquainted with the motions, periods, and stations of the planets, and with their influences and effects; and by long experience were often able to make surprizing predictions of events in life, and to foretel famines, plenty, pestilential diseases, earthquakes, the appearance of comets, and other things which seemed to exceed human capacity. The phenomena they seem to have observed, were indeed the most obvious and easy; but thereby they were directed to adjust the length of the year to the anual revolution of the sun, which this nation first did, by adding to their twelve months, of thirty days apiece, five additional days and six hours, while the Greeks and Romans used the more rude and inconvenient form of lunar years, intercalating a month every third year. But the great use they seem to have made of their astronomy, was either for the use of husbandry, or else for astrological calculations, with which the Egyptians were much in love. It is probable they might have a true notion of the system of the world, and of the matter of the planets and fixed stars; for they called the moon, an ethereal earth, and affirmed the stars to be fire ‡; however, they were far from having an exact knowledge of the theory of the planetary motions, so as to make any artificial calculations; since Thales was the first man who ventured to foretel an eclipse §, and Eudoxus and Ptolemy first reduced the heavenly morions into hypotheses and tables ¶.

Physic.

THE science of physic seems also to have owed its original to the Egyptians †. The invention of it is generally ascribed to Æsculapius, which name was given to Tosorthrus, or Sesorthrus, a king of Memphis, and the second of the third dynasty of Manetho, for his great skill in that art *. This prince was much more antient than the Grecian Æsculapius; and though Africanus places him some ages after Atrothis, the successor of Menes, and supposed to be the same with Thoth, or the first Hermes; yet others make them contemporaries †, as they must have been, if this Æsculapius was the same with the son of Sydic, and the brother of the Cabiri ‡. Atrothis is also said to have been a physician, and to have written some books of anatomy §, unless we rather ascribe those writings to the second Hermes, who might publish several inventions of the first Hermes, and of Æsculapius; for we are told, that among the Hermetic books there were six which treated of physic, and that the first of it was anatomical ¶. Isis herself is said also to have invented several medicines, and to have taught the art to her son Orus, or Apollo; whence she was held by the Egyptians to be the goddess of health ¶.

THE Egyptian physicians mentioned by Moses †, seem rather to have been embalmers than physicians, in the strict sense of the word; unless we suppose both arts were originally professed by the same person, which possibly might be the case, though in after-times it was otherwise. For every physician was not permitted to practise every branch of the art; but it was distributed into distinct parts, and each man applied himself to the cure of one disease only, pretending to no more. This occasioned a great number of physicians in Egypt; some professing to cure the diseases of the

* Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 72. WOTTON's Reflections on ancient and modern learning, c. 9. p. 115. † Ibid. c. 14. p. 180. ‡ PLATO, in Epinom. ARIST. Metaph. l. 1. DIOG. LAERT.

& ACHIL. TATIUS, ubi sup. MANIL. Astron. l. 1. § HEROD. ubi sup. ¶ DIOG. ubi sup:

p. 46. HEROD. ubi sup. † PROCL. in Tim. Platonis, l. 1. p. 45. § DIOG. LAERT. in Thalet. CICER. de Divinat. l. 1. PLIN. l. 2. c. 12. ¶ Vid. BURNET. ubi sup. p. 73, &c. † PLIN.

nat. hist. l. 7. c. 56. ‡ Vid. SYNCHELL. Chronogr. p. 56, 57. § MARSHAM. Canon. Chron.

p. 40. ¶ See before, p. 136. † SYNCHELL. ubi sup. ‡ CLEM. ALEX. Str. l. 1. p. 634.

¶ DIOG. Sic. l. 1. p. 22.

¶ Genes. l. 2.

a eyes; others those of the head, teeth, or parts about the belly; some applied themselves to chirurgical operations, whilst others undertook the care of internal distempers: by which regulation great improvements might have been expected from them in their several provinces, had not the laws as it were shut the door to any future discoveries, by obliging the physicians to prescribe according to fixed rules and receipts set down in their sacred registers, which had been collected from long observation and experience, and approved by the most famous men of the profession. So long as the physician followed these legal prescriptions, he was safe, let the success of the medicines be what it would; but if once he ventured to depart from them, and to follow his own private judgment, he was answerable for the event, and ran the hazard of his life in case the patient died<sup>a</sup>. It must be confessed however, that this was a most effectual method to prevent the mischievous practice of empirics. Another thing observable, in respect of the Egyptian physicians, is, that they had a public provision made for them by law; for which reason they were not to take any fee from those who happened to be sick in the army, or on a journey within the kingdom<sup>b</sup>.

THE Egyptian medicines seem rather to have been calculated for prevention than cure; they chiefly prescribed evacuations, which they effected either by clysters, potions, or emetics, or else by fasting; and this they repeated every day, or let the patient rest three or four days, according to the case: for they were of opinion, that in the digestion of all food, the greater part was superfluous, and, loading nature, caused diseases<sup>c</sup>; for which reason those who lived in the corn-country used to vomit and purge themselves every month, three days successively, to preserve health, though otherwise they were by nature one of the most healthful people in the world<sup>d</sup>. The better to promote the operation of their medicines, the physicians, together with their proper art, also studied astrology and their ritual mysteries<sup>e</sup>; for the Egyptian practice of physick depending much on astrological and magical grounds, either the influence of some particular planet, or some tutelar daemon were still considered<sup>f</sup>; which precarious foundations must needs depreiate their skill, and stop any increase of knowledge which might be made on other principles. However, we cannot wholly assent to the opinion of a modern writer, who thence imagines the antient Egyptian prescriptions were not medicinal, but religious purifications only; and that the pharmaceutic books were filled, not with recipes for sickness and distempers, but with meats and drinks, unguents, lotions, and purgations proper to be used in the several services of each deity<sup>g</sup>. What we have already observed from good authority, cannot agree with this notion.

THERE seems much less foundation for the assertion of some moderns, who tell Chymistry: us, there was a particular medicine used only among the Egyptian priests, and kept secret from the Greeks, and the generality of the natives themselves; which medicine was of such efficacy, that it could do any thing but restore life to the dead. This, they say, was the grand elixir, a chymical preparation made with the philosophers stone, the invention of Hermes; by the help of which the Egyptian kings were enabled to build the pyramids with the treasures their furnaces afforded them<sup>h</sup>. But such fancies are sufficiently confuted by the profound silence of antient authors in the matter, and the weak arguments of those who contend for this antiquity of chymistry, built on suspicious authorities, uncertain conjectures, and allegorical interpretations of the fabulous stories of the Greeks, which they will have to be chymical secrets disguised; fancying the golden fleece, which Jason fetched from Colchis, was only a receipt to make the philosophers stone; and that Medea restored Æson, his father, to his youth again, by the grand elixir<sup>i</sup>.

As they began to cultivate anatomy in Egypt very early, if credit may be given to Anatomy. what is said above, and their kings ordered dead bodies to be dissected for the perfection of this part of physick, it might be presumed they made greater progress therein than we can allow, if two instances that are given of the accuracy of the Egyptian anatomists be genuine. One of their observations was, that there is a particular nerve which goes from the heart to the little finger of the left hand; for which reason the Egyptians always wore rings upon that finger, and the priests dipped that finger in their perfumed ointments<sup>j</sup>. And the following reason is given why a man cannot live above one hundred years; because the Alexandrian embalmers observed a constant encrease and diminution of the hearts of those sound persons whom they opened, whereby they judged of their age; finding that the hearts of infants of a year old weighed a two drachms, and this weight increased annually by two drachms every year till men came to the age of fifty; from which time they as gradually decreased till they came to an hundred; when, for want of a heart, they must necessarily die <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. ubi sup. p. 74.<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. p. 73.<sup>e</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.<sup>f</sup> Scholast. in Ptolem. Tetrabibl. l. 1.<sup>g</sup> Vid. CORNINGIUM de Hermetica Ægyptior. vetere, & Paracelsica nova medicina, & WORTON's Refl. on antient and modern learning, p. 119, &c.<sup>h</sup> SHUCKFORD's Connection, vol. II. p. 408, &c.<sup>i</sup> Vid. BORRICHIUM

de orta &amp; progressu Chymiz.

<sup>j</sup> Vid. WORTON, ubi sup. p. 120, &c.<sup>k</sup> FLIN. l. 19. c. 5.<sup>l</sup> A. GELLIIUS Noct. Attic. l. 10. c. 10. MACROB. Sat. l. 7. c. 13.

Natural philosophy.

Of the physiology of the old Egyptians (to consider it here distinctly from their theology, which two the antients constantly joined together) we have not much to say. Their opinion as to the origin of things, and the mundane revolutions, we have considered elsewhere <sup>c</sup>. Their philosophical doctrines, as it seems, may best be known by looking into that of the ancient Greeks, who were their scholars, and travelled into Egypt for instruction in these higher parts of learning; from whence it was, in all probability, that Pythagoras brought home the knowledge of that ancient system of the world which bears his name, and is now so generally received; though it seems to have been part of the secret doctrine of the Egyptians, and not revealed to the vulgar. It may not be amiss to observe, that the ancient Barbarian philosophers did not employ their studies in the explication of this or that particular phenomenon, or direct their enquiries into the examination of things taken singly; it being in vain to expect from them, for example, the cause of the attractive power of the loadstone, or of the colours of the rainbow; what is the substance of fire, and what the particles of water; or how great the force of compressed air: but their speculations were about the mundane phenomena, or those which affected universal nature; such as the first beginning of things, their revolutions, periods, and final catastrophe <sup>b</sup>.

Magic.

BUT the science for which the Egyptians were particularly famous, and the attainment whereof was esteemed the highest pitch of knowledge <sup>a</sup>, was magic. Some imagining the invention of this art to exceed human capacity, pretend the angels, who fell in love with the antediluvian women, first taught it; that Ham preserved the principal rules of it from being lost at the deluge; and that Mizraim learned those secrets of his father <sup>b</sup>. But others ascribe the invention to Hermes <sup>c</sup>; though it is said to have been much improved by Nechepfos a king of Egypt <sup>d</sup>. However, the art was certainly very antient in Egypt; they had magicians, who pretended to the interpretations of dreams, and a way of divining by a cup in the time of Joseph <sup>e</sup>; and very extraordinary instances were given of the power of enchantments in the days of Moses <sup>f</sup>. The professors of magic, among the Egyptians, were the priests and sacred scribes, two of which order, named Jannes and Jambres, were pitched upon to withstand that prophet <sup>g</sup>. Nor was this science confined to that nation in those early times: from the caution given to Moses to the Israelites against them <sup>h</sup>, it is evident there were pretenders to it under various denominations, among most of the idolatrous people; and Balaam, in particular, seems to have been a considerable proficient therein <sup>i</sup>. The claim of Zoroastes and the Babylonians to the honour of the first practising and teaching magic shall be considered in another place.

WHAT were the real grounds of this science we cannot say; there is an innocent kind of magic, which consists only in an excelling knowledge of nature, and its various powers and qualities in its several productions, and the application of certain agents to certain patients, which by force of some peculiar qualities, produce effects very different from what fall under vulgar observation and comprehension <sup>a</sup>; but the magical wisdom of the Egyptians must have been something very different from this, or have gone much beyond what we are now matters of, notwithstanding those vast and various discoveries which have been lately made in the properties of natural bodies; there being no one, as we presume, who will now pretend to do those wonderful things which Pharaoh's magicians did when they contended with Moses; not to insist on the improbability that that law-giver would forbid the practice of an art which he must know to be not only innocent, but valuable.

It is therefore supposed, that these ancient magicians formed the rules of their art either from their superstitious belief of the great influence the heavenly bodies had on this lower world; or, from that other, though more late opinion, that the world was governed by inferior intelligences or demons, and the spirits of heroes and extraordinary men deceased. As to the first foundation of this science, we have already observed, that the Egyptians assigned each month and day to a particular god: they imagined that the seven planets governed the seven days of the week <sup>b</sup>; and pretended that by the observation of the motion of the celestial bodies, through a long series of years, they had obtained

<sup>a</sup> PLIN. l. 9. c. 37. CENSORIN de die natali, c. 17.

<sup>b</sup> Introd. p. 12, &c.

<sup>c</sup> BURNET.

Archæol. l. 1. p. 78. Vid. STRABON. l. 17.

<sup>d</sup> PLIN. l. 30. c. 1.

<sup>e</sup> See before, p. 81, and 120,

in the notes.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. PHILASTRIUM Brixienf. Hæres. n. 3.

<sup>g</sup> AUSEN. Ep. 19.

<sup>h</sup> Gen. xli. 8.

xlv. 5, 15.

<sup>i</sup> Exod. vii. 11, &c.

<sup>j</sup> 2 Tim. iii. 8.

NUMENIUS apud Euseb. Præp. Ev. l. 8. c. 8.

ARTABANUS apud eund. ibid. l. 9. c. 27.

<sup>k</sup> Deut. xviii. 10, &c.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid. c. xxiii. 23, and xxiv. 1.

<sup>m</sup> Vid. Sir W. TEMPLE's essay on the wisdom of the antients.

<sup>n</sup> DION CASSIUS, l. 36. p. 37.

the

- a the art of foreseeing future events<sup>1</sup>. They also thought the influence of those heavenly bodies on the elements, caused such effluxes as might affect the mind of those who were duly prepared to receive them, so as to enable them to deliver oracles; and even that they might, by a proper discipline, make them capable of working wonders, and procuring prodigies<sup>2</sup>. For they believed the sun, moon, stars, and elements were indued with intelligence, and appointed by the supreme Deity to govern the world<sup>3</sup>; and though they acknowledged that God might<sup>4</sup>, upon extraordinary occasions, work miracles, reveal his will by audible voices, divine appearances, dreams, or prophecies; yet they imagined also, that, generally speaking, prodigies were caused, oracles given, and visions occasioned in a natural way, by the observation or influence of the courses
b of heavenly bodies, and by the operations of the powers of nature; and they conceived, that their learned professors could work miracles, obtain oracles and omens, and interpret dreams, by a deep study of, and profound enquiry into natural knowledge, and assisted by a proper temper and disposition of mind, attainable by the use of such means as they thought had a natural power to raise warm conceptions, produce enthusiastic fury, and fetter their reason, which they fancied averted the divine instinct, such as inebriating liquors, music, and the like<sup>5</sup>; and in all these things they supposed the deity not immediately concerned, but that they were the natural effects of the influence of the planets and elements, seeming strange and unaccountable to the vulgar and unlearned, but fully understood by persons of science and philosophy<sup>6</sup>. The other c foundation of magic was built on an opinion which was something later than the former, viz. that spirits, or demons, of a nature superior to men, were employed in the government of the world, and had their several provinces appointed them by God<sup>7</sup>; and to this honour they imagined the souls of departed heroes and extraordinary men were also admitted: for which reason they supposed, they had not only powers far exceeding those of mortal men, but ascribed oracles, visions, and omens to the ministry of such spirits. And these notions are not greatly different from the almost unanimous opinion of Jews and Christians, who acknowledge the superintendence of angels over human affairs, the malicious intermeddling of evil spirits therein, and the great knowledge and abilities of both<sup>8</sup>. Whether, by the law of nature, all kind of commerce with these invisible agents was prohibited, or not, has been thought not so clear; though it be plainly forbidden to Christians, either because the government of the intellectual world was changed at the coming of CHRIST<sup>9</sup>; or rather because of the mischiefs that ill-designing men might thereby be enabled to do, and the door it might open to idolatry and superstition. That such a commerce is, or at least formerly was, possible, we cannot but confess; and we conceive it very difficult to account for several passages in scripture, without allowing it to have been practised; as we may observe hereafter: however, much the greater part of what has been attributed to this sort of magic, was undoubtedly the effect of imposture and delusion, d which have been so apparent in several instances, as to tempt one almost to believe the same of all the rest.

SOME of the other arts of the Egyptians, which were less considerable, we have already occasionally taken notice of. The Greek writers tell us, that all trades and professions in Egypt, even the most inferior, were not reckoned ignoble; husbandmen, and those who fed cattle, in particular, were much considered<sup>10</sup>; though these latter, in some parts of the country, were not suffered, but counted an abomination<sup>11</sup>; the reason of which was chiefly the difference in religion. For the skill of the Egyptians in architecture, mechanics, painting, and sculpture, we need only refer to what we have said in the preceding section: yet, as to the last, we may add, that their statuaries worked by the most methodical rules of proportion, and not by the eye, as the Greeks f did; and they judged of the exactness of the symmetry by the same. For they divided the whole body into twenty one parts and one fourth; and after the artists, who were employed, had come to a resolution as to the size of the statue, they went home, each taking his task, which they performed with such singular skill, and made the several parts so accurately proportionable to one another as was wonderful. It is said the most famous statuaries among the antients lived sometime in Egypt; particularly Telecles and Theodorus, the sons of Rhoecus, who made the famous statue of Apollo Pythius in Samos, after the Egyptian manner; for it was divided into two parts, from the head to the groin; Telecles cutting one half in Samos, and his brother the other half at Ephesus;

And other arts.

<sup>1</sup> CICERO de divin. l. 1. c. 1.

<sup>2</sup> PLUTARCH. de defect. orac.

<sup>3</sup> Vid. CICERO. de nat.

Deor. l. 2. c. 15. & Acad. quest. l. 4. c. 34, 37.

<sup>4</sup> Vid. eund. de divinat. l. 1. c. 55.

<sup>5</sup> Vid.

PLUT. ubi supr. p. 432.

<sup>6</sup> Vid. SHUCKFORD, ubi supr. p. 391, &c.

<sup>7</sup> PLUT. ubi supr. p. 418.

<sup>8</sup> See before, p. 49, 50.

<sup>9</sup> See BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. p. 103.

<sup>10</sup> See before, p. 201, 213, 2.

<sup>11</sup> Dion. Sic. l. 1. p. 67, &c.

<sup>12</sup> Genes. xlv. 34.

which being jointed together, fitted so exactly, that they seemed to have been made by a one hand: and this seemed the more admirable, considering the attitude of the statue, which had its hands stretched out, and its legs at a distance from each other in a moving posture.

Of their navigation on the Nile.

WE had almost forgot to speak of the extraordinary construction of the vessels which the old Egyptians made use of on the Nile. Their ships of burden were made of the acantha or Egyptian thorn<sup>a</sup>; from which they cut small planks about two cubits square: these pieces of timber they set together like tiles, and fastened with a great number of long pins; and when the whole was thus well compacted, they erected benches for the rowers. For they used no kind of ribs, or bent timber in their work, but secured the joints of the inside with bands of papyrus. They had but one rudder,<sup>b</sup> which passed quite through the keel, a mast of acantha, and a sail made of the papyrus. These vessels were very unfit to mount the river against the stream, and therefore were always towed up, unless the wind proved very fresh and favourable. But when they came down with the current, they fastened a hurdle of tamarisk with a rope to the prow of the vessel; which hurdle they strengthened with bands of reeds, and let it down into the water: they also hung a stone, pierced through the middle, and of a considerable weight, by another rope, to the poop. By this means the stream bearing on the hurdle, carried down the boat with great expedition, the stone at the same time balancing and keeping it steady. Of these vessels they had great numbers on the river, and some very large<sup>c</sup>. The Egyptian navigation by sea we shall mention by and by, when we come to speak of their trade.

How the Egyptians preserved their knowledge.

THE manner wherein the old Egyptians preserved their knowledge, and transmitted it to posterity, deserves to be particularly considered. Their priests, as we have already intimated, were the depositaries of all their learning; they had the care of their philosophy and other sciences, as well as of their religion and sacred rites<sup>a</sup>, and were the persons to whom those who desired to be instructed therein were obliged to apply themselves; for which purposes they had divers colleges or academics in several parts of the kingdom: one of which, at Heliopolis, is mention'd by Strabo, who visited the apartments where Eudoxus and Plato had studied for several years<sup>b</sup>. The Egyptian learning was partly inscribed on columns, and partly committed to writing in the sacred books. Not only the Egyptians, but several other ancient nations, used to preserve the memory of things by inscriptions on pillars: to say nothing of those which Seth, as it is pretended, erected before the flood for the same purpose<sup>c</sup>, we are told the Babylonians kept their astronomical observations engraven on bricks<sup>d</sup>; and Democritus is said to have transcribed his moral discourses from a Babylonish pillar<sup>e</sup>. But the most famous of all others, were the columns of Hermes in Egypt, mentioned by several valuable authors: upon them he is reported to have inscribed his learning, which was afterwards explained more at large by the second Hermes in several books. It is certain, at least, that from these pillars the Greek philosophers and Egyptian historians took many things. Pythagoras and Plato both read them, and borrowed their philosophy from thence<sup>f</sup>: Sauconiathe and Manetho likewise made use of the same monuments<sup>g</sup>, which were still remaining in the time of Proclus, or not long before<sup>h</sup>. They stood in certain subterraneous apartments near Thebes<sup>i</sup>. To these inscriptions succeeded the sacred books, somewhat more recent, but not less famous; to which Sauconiathe<sup>j</sup> and Manetho<sup>k</sup> are also said to have been beholden for the perfecting of their histories. For these books did not only contain what related to the worships of the gods, and the laws of the kingdom, but historical collections, nay, even all kind of miscellaneous and philosophical matters of considerable moment. For it was part of the business of the priests, or sacred scribes, to insert in those public registers whatever deserved to be recorded and transmitted to posterity, as well as carefully to preserve what had been delivered down to them from their ancestors<sup>l</sup>.

THESE were the literary monuments of the Egyptians. Of each kind there were some that were obvious and plain to be understood by the common people and strangers; and others more dark and mysterious, which were laid up in the inner recesses of the temples, and communicated but to a very few. For there were two sorts of learning among the antients, and particularly the Egyptians, the vulgar and

<sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. ubi sup. p. 88. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 182, c. <sup>c</sup> HEROD. l. 2. <sup>d</sup> Vid. PORPHYR. de Abstin. STRAB. l. 17. p. 1159. <sup>e</sup> CLEM. ALEX. STR. l. 1. DIOD. SIC. l. 1. p. 86. <sup>f</sup> STRABO, ubi sup. <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 81. <sup>h</sup> PLIN. l. 7. c. 56. <sup>i</sup> CLEM. ALEX. ubi sup. <sup>j</sup> IAMBlich. de Myst. §. 1. c. 2. PROCLUS apud Burnet, ubi infra. <sup>k</sup> EUSEB. PRÆP. EV. l. 1. c. 9 & 10. & Chronic. Gr. p. 6. <sup>l</sup> PROCLUS, ubi sup. <sup>m</sup> PAUSAN. l. 1. p. 78. AMMIAN MARCELL. l. 22. p. 232. <sup>n</sup> EUSEB. PRÆP. EV. l. 1. c. 9. <sup>o</sup> JOSEPH. cont. Apion. l. 1. <sup>p</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. PLAT. in Tim. STRAB. l. 17. p. 139.

- a the secret; the difference between which consisted not so much in the matter, as in the manner of delivering it. The first was open to all, who might be instructed therein by the public monuments, and the ordinary matters; but the other, lest it should grow cheap, or be corrupted by passing through vulgar hands, was veiled and disguised by more methods than one. For, the monuments of this superior sort of learning, besides being hidden in the private apartments of the temples, were written in a character not commonly understood, and guarded by the priests, who were extremely difficult of access, and could not be prevailed on to explain them, but after abundance of preparation and initiatory ceremonies<sup>a</sup>; a memorable instance of which was their usage of Pythagoras. This person designing to travel into Egypt, b desired Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos, to recommend him, by letter, to Amasis king of Egypt, who was his particular friend, that he might have the free admission to the secret learning of the priests; and when he came to Amasis, he obtained also of him letters to the priests, ordering them to communicate their knowledge to him. Thence he went, first to those of Heliopolis, who referred him to the college at Memphis, as their seniors; and from Memphis he was sent, under the same pretext, to Thebes: after much tergiversation, not daring to disobey the king's command, by any farther dilatory excuses, they endeavoured to deter Pythagoras from his purpose, by the infinite labour and trouble he was to expect, injoining him, in his noviciate, things that were very hard, and contrary to the religion of the Greeks. c And when he had undergone all this with invincible courage, he obliged them at length, against their wills, to admit him to a participation of their sacred mysteries, and profoundest learning<sup>b</sup>.

THE last method which the Egyptians took to conceal their doctrines from popular conception, was by wrapping it up in hieroglyphics, symbols, ænigmas and fables. Of the hieroglyphic figures we shall take notice immediately. As to the rest, it is well known that the ancients in general used to deliver their instructions under those dark veils of allegory and fiction; instances of which are too frequent, both in sacred and profane writers, to need quotation: there being few or none in the most early times, either among the Greeks or Barbarians, who taught any d part of philosophy plainly and intelligibly<sup>c</sup>; as if they thought that to express things in a familiar and easy manner, argued want of acuteness; or else imagined, that modesty forbade them to shew truth naked to the vulgar. The Egyptians seem to have excelled other nations in the obscurity of their fictions; wherein the footsteps of truth were often so faint, that they required a sagacious tracer, and one able to discern things of moment from trifles<sup>d</sup>.

IN their inscriptions and writings, the Egyptians made use of three several sorts of characters: the first and most ancient was that of hieroglyphical figures of various animals, the parts of human bodies, and mechanical instruments; of which three things the hieroglyphics, both of the Ethiopians and Egyptians, consisted<sup>e</sup>: though e there is reason to think the Egyptians had also another sort of characters, called hieroglyphical, and made use of by the priests, something resembling the present Chinese characters<sup>f</sup>. They are said to have been the invention of Hermes; and a specimen of his performance therein, is given us by Sanchoiatho<sup>g</sup>. The conjecture of Sir John Marsham is by no means improbable, that the use of these hieroglyphical figures of animals introduced the strange worship which was paid them by that nation<sup>h</sup>; for as those figures were made choice of, according to the respective qualities of each animal, to express the qualities and dignities of the persons they represented, which were generally their gods, princes, and great men; the people became gradually accustomed to these figures, which they used to place in their temples f as the images of their deities; whence it is not absurd to imagine that they came at length to pay a superstitious veneration to the living animals themselves. And this opinion we rather approve, than the contrary one of a late learned writer, who supposes the sacred animals were first appointed and consecrated to each god, and the hieroglyphics afterwards formed from them<sup>i</sup>.

THERE are large collections among the antiquaries of hieroglyphical inscriptions, images and pictures, which they have taken a great deal of pains to explain, but with very little success<sup>k</sup>; for if we except a few of these characters, the meaning of which has been preserved by old writers (L), there is great reason to suspect their a conjectures are very ill-founded; and particularly as to those figures which they suppose to represent the old Egyptian gods; the greater part of them being in human form, with the head of some animal, or else distinguished by some animal representation set upon their heads, or near them; whereas, as we have observed, images of human form were not introduced among the Egyptians till later times; and why such figures might not be made in memory of some of their most famous men, we cannot see, since it was the old Egyptian custom to represent, not the man's person, but his manners, characters, station and honour<sup>1</sup>; and this they did by hieroglyphics.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 60, a. <sup>b</sup> PLUTARCH de Isid. & Osir. p. 354. STRAB. l. 17. p. 1159. <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 214, a. <sup>d</sup> PORPHYR. de vita Pythag. <sup>e</sup> Vid. DIOG. LAERT. in præf. PHORNU. cap. de fab. antiq. trad. CLEM. ALEX. Strom. l. 5. p. 556, &c. <sup>f</sup> PLUT. Erot. p. 763. <sup>g</sup> DION. Sic. l. 3. p. 145. <sup>h</sup> Vid. PORPHYR. de vita Pythag. p. 12. <sup>i</sup> See before, p. 118, c. <sup>j</sup> MARSH. Can. Chron. p. 38. <sup>k</sup> SHUCKFORD, Connect. Vol. II. p. 331, &c. <sup>l</sup> Vid. KIRCHER. Oedip. MONTFAUCON, Antiq. expliq. PIGNORI Menf. Ilic. &c.

BESIDES these, the Egyptians also used literal characters, of which they had two sorts; one of them they called the sacred letters, in which their public registers, b and all matters of a higher nature were written; and the other the vulgar, or epitolographic, made use of by every body in common business<sup>m</sup>. The Egyptians were not the only people who observed such a distinction in their writing; several of the eastern nations, particularly the Ethiopians and Babylonians, had two different kinds of letters<sup>n</sup>; and the modern Brahmins among the Indians, have not only a sacred character, but a sacred language also, in which they are very shy of instructing strangers<sup>o</sup>.

WHEN, and by whom letters were invented, we shall not now enquire; it will be sufficient to observe here, that though most other nations are supposed to have received them from the Egyptians, yet themselves possibly learned them of their c neighbours the Ethiopians, among whom letters were in use very early, and whose vulgar character became the sacred one of the Egyptians<sup>p</sup>. Both these sorts of old Egyptian letters are now lost, or if the forms of them remain in any old inscriptions, they are unintelligible, and cannot be decyphered. All that we know of them is, that the alphabet consisted of twenty five letters<sup>q</sup>, and that they wrote from the right hand to the left<sup>r</sup>, as most of the oriental nations still do. We can by no means come into the opinion of those who imagine the present Coptic letters to have been those of the ancient Egyptians (M); for the Coptic alphabet is manifestly

<sup>1</sup> Vid. PLUT. ubi sup. See SHUCKFORD, Connect. Vol. II. p. 348, &c. <sup>m</sup> HEROD. l. 2. DIODOR. l. 1. p. 72. Vid. CLEM. ALEX. Strom. l. 5. p. 555. PORPHYR. de vita Pythag. p. 185. <sup>n</sup> Vid. DIODOR. l. 3. p. 144. DIOG. LAERT. in Democrito. LUCIAN de Macrob. <sup>o</sup> Vid. BURNET. Archæol. l. 1. cap. 8. <sup>p</sup> DIODOR. ubi sup. <sup>q</sup> PLUT. de Isid. & Osir. p. 374. <sup>r</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

(L) Thus we are told they represented the supreme Deity, by a serpent with the head of a hawk (1). The hawk itself was the hieroglyphic of Osiris; the river-horse of Typhon; the dog of Mercury; the cat of the moon, or Diana; the beetle of a courageous warrior; a new-born child of the rising sun, and the like (2).

(M) Della Valle thinks the modern Coptic letters were the vulgar letters of the ancient Egyptians, and not taken by them from the Greeks; because, 1. The Greeks, when they express numbers by letters, according to the order of the alphabet, for the number 6, use  $\varsigma$ , which is supposed to be not a simple letter, but the compound character Sigma-tau; for which they are not able to give any reason: whereas by the Coptic alphabet it appears to have been originally the sixth letter, though it be wanting in the Greek. 2. The Copts pronounce the vowels and diphthongs, not according to the corrupt pronunciation of the modern Greeks, but after the ancient manner. 3. He found some Coptic letters on a mummy, among hieroglyphics; which shews they were in use before that way of writing was lost (3). But it may be answered, that the Greek numeral  $\varsigma$ , and the Coptic  $\text{So}$ , are really no other than the Samaritan Waw set backwards, or the Æolic Digamma, which the Greeks afterwards threw out of their common alphabet, as they did the Kappa and Sampi (the Samaritan Kaph and Sade) they being also used as numerals only; but the Copts have retained the figure of the Waw, calling it So or Sou (which signifies fix, the number it stands for) though they never use it, we believe, otherwise than as a numeral; nay, in some Coptic alphabets, the Kappa and Sampi are still inserted (4). Which joined with the other two arguments of Della Valle, may prove the Greek letters to have been used very early in Egypt, but not that they were originally Egyptian.

Kircher (5) goes something farther. He endeavours to prove the Coptic letters were invented by Hermes, and most of them formed from some of the sacred animals, as the ibis, the serpent, the bull, the ram, and the hawk. And to such as have not pertinent names, he gives others, which have an apt signification in Coptic: Zida, for example, he calls Zenta, i. e. life, of which the serpent, whose form this letter bears, is the symbol; and Xi he calls Xanuti, i. e. a chain, the links of which it seems to resemble. Plutarch indeed tells us, that the first Egyptian letter was the ibis (6); that bird, with its legs divaricated, and bill inserted between them, making the figure of an equilateral triangle (7), which comes something near the Coptic Alpha; but we know not how this can be carried farther with any certainty. Clement Alexandrinus mentions four golden images of gods, viz. two dogs, a hawk, and an ibis, which used to be carried in procession at a certain solemnity, and that they called them four letters (8). Now though Kircher has derived seven letters from the ibis, and one from the hawk, yet he could find

(1) EUSEB. de prep. Ev. l. 3. c. 10. p. 41. (2) Vid. PLUT. de Isid. & Osir. l. 1. c. 3. p. 145. CLEM. ALEX. Strom. l. 5. p. 566. (3) DELLA VALLE, Viag. l. 2. II. (4) F. d. ED. BURNARDI

Tab. alphabetor. n. XXVI. (5) In Oedip. Ægypt. Tom. 3. p. 42, &c. & in Turr. Babel. p. 177, &c. (6) PLUT. Sympos. l. 4. quæst. 5. (7) Ibid. l. 9. quæst. 3. (8) CLEM. ALEX. Strom. l. 5. p. 567.

nothing but the Greek, with the addition of some few letters, to express sounds which the Grecians had not, and probably came to be used in Egypt after the time of Alexander, though we know the Greek language, and perhaps their letters also, were taught there long before, viz. in the reign of Psammitichus *. That the reader may judge of this affinity, we have here inserted the Coptic alphabet.

The COPTIC ALPHABET:

Figure.	Name.	Power.	Figure.	Name.	Power.
Α α	Alpha	A.	Π π	Pi	P.
Β β	Beta	B. V.	Ρ ρ	Ro	R.
Γ γ	Gamma	G.	Σ σ	Sima	S.
Δ δ	Dalda	D.	Τ τ	Tau	T.
Ε ε	Ei	E.	Υ υ	Ypsilon	Y. U.
Ϝ ϝ	So	S.	Φ φ	Pbi	Pb.
Ζ ζ	Zita	Z.	Χ χ	Chi	Ch. Græc.
Η η	Hita	I. Æ.	Ω ω	O	O long.
Θ θ	Tbita	Tb.	Ϙ ϙ	Sbei	Sb.
Ι ι	Iauda	I.	Ϛ ϛ	Fei	F.
Κ κ	Kappa	K.	Ϝ ϝ	Kbei	Kb.
Λ λ	Lauda	L.	Ϟ ϟ	Hori	H.
Μ μ	Mi	M.	Ϡ ϡ	Tanja	T.
Ν ν	Ni	N.	Ϣ ϣ	Sbima	Sb.
Ξ ξ	Xi	X.	Ϥ ϥ	Dbei	Db.
Ο ο	O	O short.	Ϸ ϸ	Epsi	Pf.

THE old Egyptian language was certainly one of the most ancient in the world, and in all probability an original, or mother tongue, which took rise at the confusion of Babel <sup>Of their language.</sup>. It appears to have been formed at least so early as the time of Joseph, who when he was made governour of Egypt had a new name given him of Egyptian derivation *, and speaking to his brethren in that language, was obliged to make use of an interpreter †:

* Idem ibid. DIODOR. l. 1. p. 61. † See before, p. 156. a. ‡ Genes. lxi. 45. § Gen. lxii. 23.

find none that seemed to have any affinity with the dog; which shews how precarious these conjectures are, though we confess them to be ingenious. It is not improbable that the Egyptians in later times, when they had lost their ancient letters and learning, and had for some centuries made use of the Greek alphabet only, the introduction of which they had forgotten, might imagine their letters then in use to be those ancient ones used by their ancestors, and thereupon endeavour to find mysteries in them which it is easy for men of warm conceptions and enthusiastic way of thinking to do in the most trivial things.

Another learned author seems also to have been once of opinion that the Greek alphabet was derived from the Coptic; for he says, the letters used by Moses, and throughout all Asia, have not the least affinity with the Greek (which is contrary to the sentiments of almost all learned men) but that the Coptic or Egyptian letters have the utmost resemblance to them, and, which he thinks more ob-servable, the manner of writing in all Asia is from the right hand to the left; but the manner of writing in Egypt and Greece, is from the left hand to the right; and this he wonders Sir Isaac Newton could not distinguish (1.) We agree that the manner of writing in Egypt is now as this gentleman says, (we mean when they write Coptic) but that it was so anciently he would have been much in the wrong to affirm, Herodotus expressly testifying the contrary (2); and the derivation of the Greek alphabet from the Samaritan is so apparent, that this writer himself, in a later work of his, seems to make no doubt of it; and goes a little too far, as we apprehend, on the other side, in asserting the Samaritan characters to have been the old Egyptian (3); which may possibly be true, but is more, we believe, than at this time can be proved.

We will not deny however, but that the seven letters added by the Egyptians to the Greek alphabet, may be the remains of their ancient characters yet we are rather of a contrary opinion.

(1.) BEDFORD'S Animadu. on Sir Isaac Newton's Chronol. p. 27, 68. (2) See the preceding page. (3) BEDFORD'S Script. Chronol. p. 494. and and yet this very language is in some measure preserved to our own times in the present <sup>a</sup> Coptic, though, by reason of the almost continual subjection of that nation to foreigners, ever since their conquest by Cambyfes, a considerable part of it has been lost; in return for which it has received a great number of Greek, and some Persian, Latin, and Arabic words, during the long time they have been under the successive yokes of those nations. The Arabic at present prevails so universally in Egypt, that the Copts, or native Egyptians themselves, generally speak no other, the common people having utterly lost the knowledge of their ancient tongue, which few, even of their priests, understand to any degree of perfection.

Its present state.

THE Coptic tongue as far as preserved at present consists chiefly of the old Egyptian and Greek; still bearing evident marks of primitive antiquity in its structure, where. <sup>b</sup> in it differs so widely from all the oriental and European languages, that it is impossible to conceive it derived from any of them. For the Copts neither decline their nouns, nor conjugate their verbs (not even those of foreign extract) otherwise than by prefixing particles sometimes of one, sometimes of more syllables, and sometimes of a single letter, which denote the case, gender, number, and person; several of them being often joined together in one word, and the primitive word usually placed last. So that the difficulty of this tongue consists in the incredible combination of the words and particles, in the change of the vowels, and in transposing the middle part of the word, and adding of servile letters; to distinguish all which requires great labour and skill.

Of their trade and navigation.

As Egypt is excellently situated for commerce, the trade of the western parts of <sup>c</sup> Asia, all Europe, and the north lying open to it by the Mediterranean, and that of Arabia, Persia, India, and the southern and western coasts of Africa by the red sea; the eastern merchandizes being commodiously brought into Egypt on camels by the Isthmus of Sues; it is to be presumed so industrious and sensible a people were not long without making use of those advantages; which they might be induced to, not only by the prospect of gain, but also to supply themselves with those things which their country wanted, such as metals, timber, pitch, rosin, and the like; which they might do by disposing of their own many and rich productions and manufactures, such as corn, linen, paper, glass, and several other valuable commodities. Sir John <sup>d</sup> Maryhem supposes that the Egyptians did not apply themselves to merchandize till the time of the Ptolemies; but in this he seems to be mistaken; for though those Princes did very much encourage trade, recovering that of the east to their subjects, by building of Berenice, Myos-hormos, and other ports on the Arabian gulph, so that Alexandria became the greatest mart in the world; yet the Egyptians certainly traded very considerably with foreigners long before. For, not to insist on their claim to the first invention of commerce, which they say was discovered by Osiris, and their Mercury <sup>e</sup>, not only Diodorus tells us that Psammitichus gained great riches by trade before he was king of all Egypt, but we learn from scripture that the Midianites and Ismaelites traded thither so early as the time of Jacob <sup>f</sup>; and it is presumed that they had anciently the sovereignty of the red sea, by which means they engrossed all the trade of the Indies, and other parts which were then carried on that way. They seem indeed to have been dispossessed of it, if what Philostratus relates be true, by a certain prince named Erythras, (whom some imagine to be the same with Esau, or Edom) for he being master of the red sea, made a law, or regulation, that the Egyptians should not enter that sea with any ships of war, and with no more than one merchant ship at a time. To evade which, the Egyptians built a vessel so large and capacious, that it might answer the end of several. However, afterwards, David becoming master of Elath and Esfiongeber, two ports on the red sea belonging to Edom, which he had conquered, built ships there, as some say, and ferched gold from Ophir; but whether that be true or no, Solomon, his son, certainly established a very great trade there, which it is not improbable he might do by permission, or with the participation of the Egyptians, to whose king he was son-in-law. And this trade the Jews continued to share with them, with some little interruption, till the time of Abaz, when they entirely lost it, and it fell into the hands of the Syrians, and after of the Tyrians, till the Ptolemies recovered the whole again to their own subjects, as has been said before.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. SICARD. dans les Memoires des Missions, Tom. II. p. 61.

Differt. de ling. Coptica, p. 120, &c.

<sup>b</sup> Canon. Chron. Sec. 14. p. 367.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. WILKINS

Hist. du Commerce & de la Navig. des anciens, c. 7.

<sup>d</sup> Vid. HURT.

xxxvii. 25, 36.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. HURT, ubi supr. c. 48.

<sup>f</sup> Diod. Sic. l. 1. p. 60.

<sup>g</sup> Genef.

<sup>h</sup> EUPOLEM. ap. Euseb. de præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 30.

<sup>i</sup> De vita Apolloni, l. 3. c. 35.

<sup>j</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 6.

<sup>k</sup> 2 Chron. viii. 17, 18.

<sup>l</sup> Kings ix. 26, &c.

<sup>m</sup> Vid. STRAB. l. 16.

- a SOME writers have indeed expressly asserted, that Psammitichus was the first king of Egypt who opened the ports to strangers, and granted foreign merchants security in his dominions; and that the ancient princes, being content with the abundant riches of their own country, would not permit strangers to have any access to it, fortifying the frontiers against them, and particularly against the Greeks. But this cannot be understood of any other commerce than that which was driven by the Mediterranean sea, while the Greeks committed their piracies along the coasts of Egypt, and being themselves excluded thence on that account, complained of such treatment as a great injustice, and a restriction against the law of nations, representing the Egyptians as a barbarous nation, renouncing all pretensions to humanity and hospitality; whence arose the fable of the cruelty of Busiris: for that the Egyptians did before this trade with nations on the other side of their country, is evident from the abovementioned instance of the Midianites and Ismaelites, the easy access which Abraham and the sons of Jacob had to Egypt, and from Solomon's having horses from thence.

TOWARD the Greeks indeed they behaved themselves with some caution and reserve, even after they were admitted; for, after the time of Psammitichus, though Amasis, who was their great friend, suffered them to build the city of Naucratis for the settlement and residence of their merchants; yet that was the sole place in the whole kingdom where he allowed them to have a factory. They sailed up to it by the Canopic mouth of the Nile (N); and if by any accident a vessel entered any other mouth of that river, the owners, after making oath that they were forced in there against their will, were obliged to go back to that channel; or, if the winds were contrary, to unlade, and send up their goods to Naucratis by the river vessels.

THOUGH the Egyptians, on a religious account, bore a great aversion to the sea, which they called Typhon, because it swallows up their Nile, and hated strange sailors so much that they would not speak to them; and, though they were not fond of going out of their own country, for fear of introducing luxury and foreign customs, yet were they not ignorant of sea affairs, having an order of men among them who followed nothing else; nay, the Grecians confess they learned navigation from them. Sesostris built a formidable navy of four hundred ships of war for his expedition to the southern seas; and also a very large vessel of cedar, two hundred and eighty cubits long (O), gilt without, and beautified with silver within, which he dedicated to Osiris. And it is to be presumed, they improved in this art in succeeding times.

WE shall here conclude this account of the ancient Egyptians, and hope we may be excused if we have been somewhat diffuse in speaking of so extraordinary a people.

<sup>1</sup> STRAB. 17. p. 1142. DIOD. SIC. l. i. p. 61. <sup>2</sup> Vid. STRAB. ubi supr. <sup>3</sup> Genes. xii. 10. lxii. 1, &c. <sup>4</sup> 2 Chron. ix. 18. 1 Kings x. 28. <sup>5</sup> HEROD. l. 2. sub finem. <sup>6</sup> PLUT. de Isid. & Osirid. p. 363. Sympof. l. 8. p. 729. <sup>7</sup> CLEM. ALEX. Strom. 1. p. 302. <sup>8</sup> EURIPID. in Troad. <sup>9</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. i. p. 50, 52.

(N) Yet others make this city of Naucratis to be a colony of the Milesians, and to stand on the Bolbitic, or Hiracleotic mouth of the Nile (4). But this we shall examine hereafter.

(O) This ship must vastly exceed any modern vessels in bulk, being near twice as big as one of our largest first rates; the length of the Royal Sovereign being no more than 175 feet on the middle gun-deck; and the breadth about 70 feet by the beam.

(4) See BAYLE Dict. Hist. Art. Naucratis Rem. A. B.

SECTION III.

Of the Egyptian chronology to the time of Alexander the Great.

BEFORE we enter on so intricate a subject as the Egyptian chronology, it will be necessary, for the better understanding of what shall be said, to exhibit the series of the kings of Egypt, according to the several authors who have recorded their successions.

I. A TABLE of the last sixteen of the thirty Dynasties, according to the old Egyptian chronicle<sup>a</sup>, the fourteen first Dynasties being wanting.

Dynasty.	Gener.	Years.	Dynasty.	Gener.	Years.
XV. - 15	Of the Cynic circle reigned	- 443	XXIII. - 2	Diospolites	- 19
XVI. - 8	Tanites	- 190	XXIV. - 3	Saites	- 44
XVII. - 4	Memphites	- 103	XXV. - 3	Ethiopians	- 44
XVIII. - 14	Memphites	- 348	XXVI. - 7	Memphites	- 177
XIX. - 5	Diospolites	- 194	XXVII. 5	Persians	- 124
XX. - 8	Diospolites	- 228	XXVIII. *	* * * *	*
XXI. - 6	Tanites	- 121	XXIX. *	* * * *	39
XXII. - 3	Tanites	- 48	XXX. - 1	Tamite	- 18

The Sum of the thirty Dynasties is, 36525

II. A TABLE of the Egyptian Dynasties from Manetho, according to Africanus and Eusebius.

T O M E I.

The I. Dynasty of Thinites or kings of This; consisting of eight kings.      The II. Dynasty of Thinites, consisting of nine kings.

	Y.	Y.		Y.	Y.
1 Menes	-	-	62—60	1 Boetbus or Boebus	- 38 : —
2 Athotbis or Athotbis	-	-	57—27	2 Cæacbos or Cbous	- 39 : —
3 Cencenes	-	-	31—39	3 Binctbris or Biopbis	- 47 : —
4 Venepbes	-	-	23—42	4 Tlas	- 17 : —
5 Usaphædus or Usapbaes	-	-	20—20	5 Setbenes	- 41 : —
6 Miebidus	-	-	26—16	6 Chæres	- 17 : —
7 Semempsis	-	-	18—18	7 Nephercheres	- 25 : —
8 Bienaches or Ubienthes	-	-	26—26	8 Sefochris	- 48—48
	253	252		9 Cheneres	- 30
					297 302

The III. Dynasty of Memphites, consisting of nine kings.      The IV. Dynasty of Memphites, consisting of eight kings.

	Y.	Y.		Y.	Y.
1 Necherophes or Nacherochis	-	-	28 : —	1 Soris	- 29
2 Tofortbrus or Sefortbus	-	-	29 : —	2 Supbis	- 63
3 Tyris	-	-	07 : —	3 Supbis	- 66
4 Mesochris	-	-	17 : —	4 Mencheres	- 63
5 Soipbis	-	-	16 : —	5 Rhatafes	- 25
6 Tofertafis	-	-	19 : —	6 Bicheres	- 22
7 Achis	-	-	42 : —	7 Sebercheres	- 7
8 Siphuris	-	-	30 : —	8 Thamphtbis	- 9
9 Cerpheres	-	-	26 : —		274 448
	214	198

The V. Dynasty of Elephantines according to Africanus of 9, of Eusebius 31 kings.      The VI. Dynasty of Memphites of 6 kings.

	Y.	Y.		Y.	Y.
1 Usercheris or Othoes	-	-	28 : —	1 Othoes	-
2 Sepbres	-	-	13 : —	2 Pbius	- 53
3 Nephercheres	-	-	20 : —	3 Metbusupbis	- 7
4 Sifiris or Phiops	-	-	7 100	4 Phiops	- 94
5 Cheres	-	-	20 : —	5 Mentefupbis	- 1
6 Ratburis	-	-	44 : —	6 Nitocris	- 12—1
7 Mercheres	-	-	9 : —		203 203
8 Tarcheres	-	-	44 : —
9 Obmus	-	-	33 : —
	248

The

The VII. Dynasty of Memphites, consisting, according to Africanus, of 70 kings, who reigned 70 days, according to Eusebius, of 5 kings, who reigned 75 days.

The VIII. Dynasty of Memphites, consisting of 27 Kings, who reigned 146 years according to Africanus, but of 5 kings who reigned 100 years according to Eusebius.

The IX. Dynasty of Heracleots, consisting of 19 kings according to Africanus; but according to Eusebius, they are called Heracleopolites, and are accounted 4 kings.

The X. Dynasty of Heracleots or Heracleopolites, consisting of 19 kings, who reigned 185 years.

The XI. Dynasty of Diospolites, consisting of 16 kings, who reigned 43 years.

1 Achiboes or Aitbus

- - -
409 100

After whom Ammenemes reigned 16 years.

T O M E II.

The XII. Dynasty of Diospolites, consisting of seven kings.

	Y.	Y.
1 Gefon or Sefynchoris	-	46—46
2 Ammanemes	-	38—38
3 Sefostris	-	48—48
4 Lachares or Labaris	-	8—8
5 Ammeres	-	8
6 Ammenemes	-	8
7 Sermiophres his Sister	-	4
		<hr/> 160 245

The XIII. Dynasty of Diospolites, consisting of 60 kings, who reigned according to Africanus, 184 years, according to Eusebius, 453 years.

The XIV. Dynasty is wanting in Africanus. Eusebius calls them Xoites, and says, they made up 76 kings, and reigned 184 or 484 years.

The XV. Dynasty, according to Eusebius, of Diospolites, according to Africanus, of Phœnician shepherds, consisting of 6 kings.

	Y.
1 Saïtes	19
2 Byon	44
3 Pachnan	61
4 Staan	50
5 Archles	49
6 Aphopis	61
	<hr/> 284 250

The XVI. Dynasty of Greek shepherds, consisting of 32 kings, who reigned, according to Africanus, 518 years. According to Eusebius, this Dynasty was of Thebans, consisting of five Kings, who reigned 190 years.

The XVII. Dynasty, according to Africanus, consisted of 43 pastor kings, and 43 Theban kings, who reigned together 153 years. According to Eusebius, of Phœnician shepherds: thus,

1 Saïtes	-	-	-	19
2 Beon	-	-	-	43
3 Aphopis	-	-	-	14
4 Archles	-	-	-	30
				<hr/> 106

The XVIII. Dynasty of Diospolites, consisting of 16 kings.

	Y.	Y.
1 Amos, Amosis, or Tetbmofis	-	—15
2 Chebron	-	13—13
3 Amenophibis or Ammenopbis	-	21—21
4 Amerfis or Mipbris	-	22—12
5 Misaphris or Mispbragmulbosis	-	13—26
6 Anosis or Tutbmofis	-	26—9
7 Tutbmofis or Amenopbis	-	9—31
8 Amenopbis or Horus	-	31—36
9 Horus or Achencherfes	-	37—12
10 Acheris or Aiboris	-	32—39
11 Rathos or Cbencheres	-	6—16
12 Chebres or Acherres	-	12—8
13 Acherres	-	12—15
14 Armeses or Danaus	-	5—5
15 Rameffes or Ægyptus	-	1—68
16 Amenoph or Memopbis	-	19—40
		<hr/> 263—348

The XIX. Dynasty of Diospolites, consisting, according to Africanus, of 6, according to Eusebius, of 5 kings.

	Y.	Y.
1 Setbos	-	51—55
2 Rhasfaces or Rbapfes	-	61—66
3 Ammenophibis	-	20—40
4 Ramefes or Ammenemmes	-	60—26
5 Ammenemmes or Thuoris	-	5—7
6 Thuoris or the Polybus of Homer	-	7—
		<hr/> 209—194

T O M E III.

The XX. Dynasty of Diospolites, consisting of 12 kings, who reigned according to Africanus 135, according to Eusebius 178 years.

	Y.	Y.
1 Sefonchis or Sechosis	-	21—21
2 Oforoth or Oforthon	-	15—15
3 - } Tachellothbis	-	13
4 - }	-	25
5 - }	-
6 Tachellothbis	-	13
7 - }	-
8 - }	-	42
9 - }	-
		<hr/> 120—49

The XXIV. Dynasty of one Saïte.

Esechoris or Bouchoris	-	6—44
------------------------	---	------

The XXI. Dynasty of Tanites, consisting of seven kings.

1 Smedis or Smendis	-	26—26
2 Psufenes	-	46—41
3 Nephhercheres	-	4—4
4 Amenophthis	-	9—9
5 Ofochor	-	6—6
6 Pinaches or Pfinaches	-	9—9
7 Sufennes or Psufenes	-	30—35
		<hr/> 130—130

The XXIII. Dynasty of Tanites, consisting, according to Eusebius, of 3, according to Africanus, of 4 kings.

1 Petubates or Petubastis	-	40—25
2 Oforco or Hercules	-	8—9
3 Psammus	-	10—10
4 Zet	-	31—
		<hr/> 81—44

The XXV. Dynasty of Ethiopians, consisting of 3 kings.

1 Sabacon	-	8—12
2 Seuechus	-	14—12
3 Tarcus or Taracus	-	18—20
		<hr/> 40—44

The

The XXVI. Dynasty of Saites, consisting of nine kings.

	Y.	Y.
1 Stepbinares or Ammeris	-	7—12
2 Nerepsos or Stephanathis	-	6—7
3 Necho or Nechoptes	-	8—6
4 Psammitichus or Necho	-	54—8
5 Necho or Psammichus	-	6—45
6 Psammuthis or Necho	-	6—6
7 Vapbris or Psammuthis	-	19—17
8 Amosis or Vapbris	-	44—25
9 Psammacherites or Amosis	-	0 $\frac{1}{2}$ —42
	150 $\frac{1}{2}$	168

The XXVIII. Dynasty, one Saite.

Amyrteos or Amyrtaus	-	6
----------------------	---	---

The XXVII. Dynasty of Persians, consisting of eight kings.

	Y.	M.	Y.	M.
1 Cambyfes	-	6	3
2 Darius Hystaspes	-	36	36—7
3 Xerxes	-	21	21—
4 Artabanus	-		7	0 0
5 Artaxerxes	-	41	40
6 Xerxes	-	0—2	0—2
7 Sogdianus	-	0—7	0—7
8 Darius the Son of Xerxes	19—	19—
	124—4—	120—4

The XXIX. Dynasty of Mendefiaues, consisting, according to Africanus, of 4, according to Eusebius, of 5 kings.

	Y.	M.	Y.	M.
1 Nepheritis	-	6	6
2 Achoris	-	13	13
3 Psammuthis	-	1	1
4 Nephrotes	-	0—4	0—4
5 " Mutbis	-		1
	20—4—	21

The XXX. Dynasty of princes of Sebennytus, consisting of 3 kings.

1 Neelanebes	-	18—10
2 Teos	-	2—2
3 Neelanebes	-	18—8
	20—	38

N. B. In the double columns of numbers throughout these tables, the first are the years according to Africanus, the second according to Eusebius.

III. A TABLE of Egyptian kings from Manetho, according to Josephus<sup>b</sup>.

	Y <sup>rs</sup>	M <sup>ths</sup>	Y <sup>rs</sup>	M <sup>ths</sup>
Orus	-	-	36	5
Acenbres	-	-	12	1
Ratbosis	-	-	9
Acencheres I.	-	-	12	5
Acencheres II.	-	-	12	3
Armais	-	-	4
Rameffes	-	-	1	4
Harmessis Miamun	-	-	66	2
Ameno <sup>c</sup> phis	-	-	19	6
			393

Timeus reigned
The pastor kings.

1 Salatis	-	19
2 Baon	-	44
3 Aphachnas	-	36
4 Apbopbis	-	61
5 Janias	-	50
6 Affis	-	49

Egyptians.

Halispbragmutbosis	-	-
Tethmosis	-	25 4
Chebron	-	13
Amenophis	-	20 7
Amesses, a woman	-	21 9
Mephres	-	12 9
Mephramutbosis, or Mispbragmu- tosis	21	10
Tethmosis	-	9 8
Amenophis	-	30 10

IV. A TABLE of the Theban kings from the Laterculus of Eratosthenes<sup>c</sup>.

	Years
1 Menes, or Mincs, reigned	62
2 Athotbes I.	59
3 Athotbes II.	32
4 Diuies	19
5 Pempbos	18
6 Tagar Amachus Momchiri, or Taga- ramus	79
7 Stachus	6
8 Goformies,

<sup>b</sup> Contra Apion. l. 1.

<sup>c</sup> Apud SYNCCELL. p. 92, &c.

	Years		Years.
8 Goformies, or Elefipantus	30	24 Rhameffe, son of Uapbres	29
9 Mares	26	25 Concharis	6
10 Anoyphes	20	26 Silites	19
11 Sirius	18	27 Baon	44
12 Gbnubus Gneurus	27	28 Apachnas	36
13 Raupfis	13	29 Apbophis	61
14 Biyris	10	30 Setbos	50
15 Saopbis	29	31 Certus	29
16 Senfaopbis	27	32 Asetb	24
17 Mofcheris	31	33 Amosis, or Tetbmofis	22
18 Mustbis	33	34 Chebron	13
19 Pammus Archondes	35	35 Amepbes	15
20 Apappus the Great	100	36 Amenfes	1
21 Echeſeus Caras	1	37 Miſt-bragmutbofis	16
22 Nitocris	6	38 Miſſphres	23
23 Myrtæus	22	39 Tutbmofis	39
24 Thyofimares	12	40 Amenophthbis	34
25 Thyrellus, or Thinillus	8	41 Horus	48
26 Sempbucrates	18	42 Achencheres	25
27 Chutber Taurus	7	43 Athoris	29
28 Meres, or Meures, the philoſopher	12	44 Chencheres	26
29 Choma Ephiha	11	45 Acheres	8 or 30
30 Anchunius Ochy, or Scunioſchoſ	60	46 Armaus, or Danaus	9
31 Penteatbyris	16	47 Rhameſſes, or Ægyptus	68
32 Stamenemes	23	48 Amenophis	5
33 Siſtoſichermes	55	49 Thuoris	17
34 Maris	43	50 Necheſſos	19
35 Sipboas Hermes	5	51 Pfammuthis	13
36	14	52	4
37 Pbruron, or Nilus	54	53 Certus	20
38 Amurthaus, or Amythantaus	63	54 Rhampſis	45
		55 Amenſes, or Amenemes	26
		56 Ochyraſ	14
		57 Amedes	27
		58 Thuoris, or Polybus	50
		59 Athotbis, or Pbuſanus	28
		60 Cencenes	39
		61 Uennepbes	42
		62 Suffacim	34
		63 Pſuenus, or Senipſuerus	25
		64 Ammenophes	9
		65 Nephecheres	6
		66 Saïtes	15
		67 Pſinaches	9
		68 Petubaſtes	44
		69 Oſortbon	9
		70 Pſammus	10
		71 Concharis	21
		72 Oſortbon	15
		73 Tacelophes	13
		74 Bocchoris	44
		75 Sabacon	12
		76 Sebechon	12
		77 Taraces	20
		78 Amaes	38
		79 Stepbinaſbes	27
		80 Nacepſus	13
		81 Nechaab I.	8
		82 Pſammitichus	14
		83 Nechaab II.	9

V. A TABLE of the Egyptian kings
according to the ſeries of Syncellus<sup>d</sup>.

	Years.		Years.
1 Meſtraim, or Menes, reigned	35	57 Amedes	27
2 Curudes, or Cudrus	63	58 Thuoris, or Polybus	50
3 Ariſtarchus	34	59 Athotbis, or Pbuſanus	28
4 Spanius	36	60 Cencenes	39
5	} 72	61 Uennepbes	42
6		62 Suffacim	34
7 Serapis	23	63 Pſuenus, or Senipſuerus	25
8 Seſonchoſis	49	64 Ammenophes	9
9 Amenemes	29	65 Nephecheres	6
10 Amafis, or Amofis	2	66 Saïtes	15
11 Aceſepthibres	13	67 Pſinaches	9
12 Achoreas	9	68 Petubaſtes	44
13 Amiſſes, or Armiſſes	4	69 Oſortbon	9
14 Chamois	12	70 Pſammus	10
15 Amefiſes	65	71 Concharis	21
16	14	72 Oſortbon	15
17 Uſe	50	73 Tacelophes	13
18 Rhameſes	29	74 Bocchoris	44
19 Rhameſſomenes	15	75 Sabacon	12
20 Thyſimares	31	76 Sebechon	12
21 Rhameſſeſcos	23	77 Taraces	20
22 Rhameſſemeno	19	78 Amaes	38
23 Rhameſſe, ſon of Baëtes	39	79 Stepbinaſbes	27
		80 Nacepſus	13
		81 Nechaab I.	8
		82 Pſammitichus	14
		83 Nechaab II.	9

<sup>d</sup> Chronog. p. 91, &c.

84	Pfammuthis, or Pfammitichus II.	17	89	Acboris	-	-	13
85	Uaphres	-	34	90	Pfammuthis	-	2
86	Amasis	-	50	91	Menas	-	4
87	Amyrtæus	-	6	92	Nectanebes	-	8
88	Nepherites	-	6	93	Tes	-	2

VI. A TABLE of the kings of Egypt.

According to Herodotus.According to Diodorus Siculus.

Menes	-	-	-	-	Menas, or Mneves	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	- - - 52 of his descendants	1400 years,
•	•	•	•	•	Busiris	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	- - - 7 of his descendants,
Nitocris	-	-	-	-	Busiris the 8th of them.
•	•	•	•	•	•	•	•
•	•	•	•	•	Osymandyas	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	- - - 8 of his descendants,
•	•	•	•	•	Uchoreus the 8th of them.
•	•	•	•	•	- - - 12 generations.
Meris	-	-	-	-	Myris	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	- - - 7 generations, one of these
•	•	•	•	•	- - - Sasyches , the law-giver.
Sesostris	-	-	-	-	Sesostis I.	-	-
Pheron	-	-	-	-	Sesostis II.	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	- - - several generations.
•	•	•	•	•	Amasis (Ammosis)	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	Aclifanes the Ethiopian	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	Mendes, or Marus	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	- - - 5 generations, an Interregnum.
Proteus	-	-	-	-	Proteus	-	-
Rhampsinitus	-	-	-	-	Rempbis	-	-
•	•	•	•	•	Nilus	} 6 generations,
•	•	•	•	•	- - -
Cheops	-	-	-	-	Chemmis, or Chembes	-	-
Cephrenes	-	-	-	-	Cephren, or Cbabryis	-	-
Mycerinus	-	-	-	-	Mycerinus, or Cberinus	-	-
Afyehis	-	-	-	-	Gnepbachtibus	-	-
Anyfis	-	-	-	-	Bocchoris	-	-
Sabaco	-	-	-	-	Sabaco	-	-
Anyfis again	-	-	-	-	- - - Interregnum 2 years
Setbon	-	-	-	-	•	•	•
- - - 12 kings	-	-	-	-	- - - 12 kings
Pfammithichus	-	-	-	-	Pfammithichus	-	-
Necus	-	-	-	-	- - - 4 generations	-	-
Pfamnis	-	-	-	-	•	•	•
Apries	-	-	-	-	Apries	-	-
Amasis	-	-	-	-	Amasis	-	-
Pfammenitus	-	-	-	-	•	•	•

2 THE variations observable in these several successions of Egyptian kings, both in their names and the years of their respective reigns, are so great, and there are such chasms, and such apparent corruptions and mistakes in them all that it would seem labour lost to go about to reduce them into a chronological series, so as to make them agree with each other, much less with scripture, and the chronological observations of other historians. However, we shall say something of each of the preceding tables.

To begin with the first of them. The sum total of the thirty dynasties, according to the old chronicle, is not only an immense number, vastly exceeding the true age of the world, but appears to be an astronomical calculation, by which the Egyptians would suggest their dynasties to have run through a whole periodic revolution of

N n n

the

the zodiac*, and therefore we shall not offer to make any use of it. It need only be observed, that though this sum be said to be the amount of the thirty dynasties, yet therein must be included the 30,000 years which the Sun reigned, the 3984 years reign of Saturn, and the other twelve gods, and the 217 years reign of the eight demi-gods, making together 34,201 years. As to the fourteen first dynasties, which we conceive to be omitted in the fragment we have remaining of this chronicle, the meaning of the original may perhaps be, that the fifteen generations of the cynic circle, which are placed in the table in the fifteenth dynasty, and reigned 443 years, make up the first fifteen dynasties: And this seems to be confirmed by the sum total of the years of the sixteen last dynasties, as in the table, which is 2140 years, and with the said 34,201 years, makes 36,341; to which, if we add 184 years, for the duration of the twenty eighth dynasty, the number of which is omitted, we shall have the compleat sum of 36,525. And consequently deducting thence the sum of the reigns of the gods and demi gods, the remainder will be 2324 years, for the duration of the succeeding dynasties, according to this chronicle; which is a number reasonable enough, though it cannot be reconciled to the account of Manetho.

Of the Dynasties of Manetho.

THE successions of Manetho, which are given in the second table, have this additional corruption, that their order hath been disturbed by transcribers; and as in their present disposition they cannot possibly be reduced to any one system of chronology, some have altered that disposition so as to suit them to their own hypotheses, while others made short work with them, and absolutely rejected either the whole of these dynasties, or great part of them, as fabulous.

THE credit of Manetho hath been drawn in question by several writers†, not only because of the incredible antiquity to which his history is supposed to have ascended, but from the account which, it is said, himself gave of the records from whence he took it, he pretending to have extracted it from certain pillars in the Seradic land, on which inscriptions had been made in the sacred dialect and letters, by Thoth, the first Hermes, and which were translated, after the flood, out of the sacred dialect into the Greek tongue (A) in sacred letters (B), and laid up in books by Agathodæmon, the son of the second Hermes, the father of Tat, in the inmost recesses of the Egyptian temples‡. Now it is absolutely impossible that the first Hermes, who lived in the earliest ages of the Egyptian monarchy, could write a history of so many generations which came into the world after his death, unless he did it by inspiration; and if Manetho could have been so stupid as to assert this, it must necessarily have overthrown the credit of his whole work. But we do not think that writer could mean any such thing; the words cited from him do not say he took his whole history from those pillars; tho' he might probably quote those records to support the ancient history which preceded the time of Thoth; and such pillars, or at least some pillars which were of great antiquity, and which the priests attributed to Thoth, must have been extant in the days of Manetho, or he would never have appealed to them in so publick a manner, especially in a work addressed to his prince. It may also be suggested that tho' Thoth made the first inscriptions on those pillars, yet it is not impossible but in succeeding times other inscriptions might be added to those of Thoth; and the pillars might still be * See before, p. 92, in the notes.

M. 2269. STILLINGFLEET Orig. Sacr. Book I. c. 2. § 10, &c.

† Vid. JAC. CAPPELL. in Hist. Sacr. & Exot. ad Ann. M. 2269. STILLINGFLEET Orig. Sacr. Book I. c. 2. § 10, &c. § SYMCELL. p. 40. See before, p. 81. b. and the note there.

(A) Dr. Stillingfleet (13), with great reason thinks this absolutely incredible, the Greek language not being known in Egypt, at least was not in repute there, so early as this; for the Grecians, had little or no commerce with the Egyptians till the time of Psammitichus, as we have observed more than once. It seems also very unlikely that Manetho should assert this; for besides the improbability abovementioned, the Egyptian history was so far from being translated to his hand, that he himself was obliged to translate it into Greek from the sacred registers (14); for which reason we suspect some corruption in this passage; and, if it be not too bold a conjecture, we should guess that, instead of ἱερὰ γράμματα, the Greek tongue, it ought to be read ἱερὰ λαϊκὰ φωνή the vulgar tongue; but we dare not dictate in so dubious a point.

(B) The original words are γράμματα ἱερογλυφικά, which the learned writer named in the preceding note, translates hieroglyphic characters, and very justly wonders how any translation can be made into such characters, which represent things, and not words (15). But as these characters are plainly called letters, we conceive they could not be hieroglyphical in the common acceptation of the word, but rather suppose them to be the same with the hierographic, or sacred letters abovementioned.

(13) Orig. Sacr. Book I. c. 2. ubi. sup.

(14) JOSEPH. cont. Apian. l. 1. p. 1336. (15) STILLINGFLEET.

- a in common phrase ascribed to him, tho' the historical inscriptions were continued after his death by others. But after all, it may be questioned whether Manetho really intended to support his history by the authority of those pillars; for the passage wherein he mentions them, seems to have been taken out of another book of his, called Solhis, or Seth, which was not historical, but prophetic; for in his dedication of that work to Ptolemy Philadelphus, he says, that his interpreting the sacred books of Hermes was in obedience to that prince's command, who enquired of him concerning the future events that were to happen in the world<sup>b</sup>. And as to the records from whence he took his history, we are elsewhere assured it was from the sacred registers<sup>c</sup> which were kept by the priests, and written in the Egyptian language, since he translated them into Greek.

THE strongest prejudice therefore against the credit of this writer arises from his chronology. The Egyptians, it is true, pretended to an excessive antiquity, and to have authentic records for a prodigious length of time past. This appears not only from the old chronicle abovementioned, but from the extravagant numbers of years their priests imposed on Herodotus, Plato and Diodorus (C); but Manetho seems to have been much more modest. The sum of his thirty one dynasties from Menes to fifteen years before Alexander (without taking the reigns of the gods and demi-gods into the account) if cast up, will amount to above 5300 years, which will reach higher than the creation of the world; and Joseph Scaliger<sup>d</sup> has accordingly settled their chronology in such a manner that, by his own way of reckoning, it exceeds the epoch of the creation 1336 years. But there is a lesser number mentioned by Synceilus, who says the account of the years of all the dynasties was 3555, which is somewhat more bearable than the other, and yet will agree with no system of chronology, unless we take part of this number for the reigns of the antediluvian princes of Egypt. Manetho, as we have already observed, began his history with seven gods, and nine demi-gods<sup>e</sup>, who reigned 1985 years; and then succeeded mortal kings, the first of whom was Menes. These three races seem to be the same with those called in the old chronicle Aurita, Mesirai, and Egyptians<sup>f</sup>. Now, if we allow (as is most reasonable, in case there be any truth at all in this part of the history) that the gods, or Aurita, were antediluvians; the demi-gods, or Mesirai, the post-diluvians of the race of Mizraim; and the mortal men, or Egyptians, Menes and his successors; and, if we allow 1200 years part of the 1985 for the reigns of the first<sup>g</sup>, the remainder, 785, will be the years of the reign of Mizraim and his descendants. And deducting the whole 1985 out of the said 3555, there will remain 1570 years, the distance from Menes to the fifteenth year before Alexander; from which time, if we compute backwards, the beginning of Menes's reign will fall about eleven years before Abraham went into Egypt, according to the Samaritan chronology; and that of Mizraim about 298 years after the flood. This way of computing would be plausible, were it not that the epoch of the Egyptian kingdom will by this means precede the dispersion of mankind 103 years, which can hardly be supposed, unless it be allowed that the Egyptians reckoned the years of the government of their first ancestors over their families before they quitted Shinaar, and arrived in Egypt. But the great objection of all is, that Manetho's number of 3555 appears to belong wholly to the successors of Menes, and we have no authority to support our making any deduction from it.

SOME chronologers therefore, particularly father Petau<sup>h</sup> (who took delight in contradicting Scaliger) reject the whole scheme of Manetho's dynasties as fabulous, and of no manner of value or credit. And others<sup>i</sup>, to whom Eusebius led the way in his canon<sup>j</sup> omit the first sixteen dynasties only, and begin their chronology with <sup>b</sup> Vid. SYNCELL. p. 40. <sup>c</sup> JOSEPH. cont. Apion. l. 1. p. 1336. EUSEB. præp. Ev. l. 2. in præm. <sup>d</sup> Canon. Isagog. l. 2. p. 228. <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 92. d. <sup>f</sup> See ibid. <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 92, 94. d. <sup>h</sup> De Doctr. Tempor. l. 9. c. 15. <sup>i</sup> CALVESIUS, USSERIUS & JAC. CAPPELLUS, PERIZONIUS esteem the first fourteen or fifteen to be fabulous. <sup>j</sup> Chron. Græc. p. 89.

(C) Some of these incredible accounts follow:
	Years.
From Vulcan to Alexander (16)	48,863	From Bacchus to Amasis (20) - - - - 15,000
From the reign of the Sun to Alexander (17)	23,000	The gods and heroes reigned (21) - - - 18,000
From Osiris to Alexander (18) above	10,000	From Orus , the last of them, to the 180th } 15,000
Or almost - - - - -	23,000	Olympiad (22) - - - - -
From Hercules to Amasis (19) - - - -	17,000	Kings of Egypt before Amasis reigned (23) 13,000
		From their first mortal king to Sethon (24) 11,340
		There were chronicles at Lais (25) of 8,000

(16) DIOG. LART. in Præm. (17) DIODOR. ubi sup. p. 41. (22) Idem ibid. (23) POMP. SIC. l. 1, p. 22. (18) Idem, ibid. p. 20. (19) MELA. l. 1. c. 9. (24) HEROD. ubi sup. (25) HEROD. l. 2. (20) Idem ibid. (21) DIODOR. PLATO in Tim.

the seventeenth; though they differ among themselves in their computations. The <sup>a</sup> first who, without rejecting any, earnestly set about reducing the entire series to the scripture chronology, was the learned Sir John Marsham, who first guessed that these dynasties were not successive, but collateral. He supposes that Egypt, immediately after the death of Menes, was divided into four distinct kingdoms, of Thebes, This, Memphis, and the lower Egypt, besides some of lesser note which arose afterwards, and the epochs of which are more difficult to be settled, and that it continued so divided for almost seven centuries, till the pastors made themselves masters of all, except that of Thebes; after whose expulsion, in about 500 years Egypt became subject to one prince. By this means the duration of the whole empire, from Menes to the end of the reign of Amasis, is reduced to 1819 years. This gentleman's work is full of curious learning and uncommon observations; but his great oversight seems to have been his adhering so very scrupulously to the Hebrew chronology; whereby he is obliged to make Menes the same with Ham, and not Mizraim, (as almost all other writers imagine) and is also forced to begin the date of his reign immediately from the flood. He follows Herodotus <sup>b</sup> in reckoning 1400 years from Menes to Sesostris, whom therefore he asserts to be the Shishak of the scriptures, tho' Diodorus plainly reckons a much larger interval between them. In which last particular, as he has been strenuously opposed by several writers <sup>c</sup>, so he has been followed by others <sup>d</sup>. It must be observed that Sir John Marsham makes great use of the table of the Theban kings given us by Eratosthenes, of which we shall hereafter speak.

THE next who undertook to model this Egyptian chronology was father Pezron, who, by following the larger chronology of the Septuagint, hath more latitude, and allows the duration of the Egyptian empire 2619 years from Menes to Nectanebus. This author likewise goes on the same foundation with Sir John Marsham, in making the first seventeen dynasties not successive, but collateral. He is of opinion that the Misraens, or offsprings of Mizraim, the first inhabitants of Egypt, were those whom their posterity honoured with the titles of gods and demi-gods; and that, though they began to people the country, yet they formed no kingdom there till Menes, who began his reign 648 years after the deluge, and 117 years after the dispersion. Sesostris he places in the time of the judges of Israel, when Deborah ruled over that people <sup>e</sup>.

FROM the plans of these two great men, several other chronological writers have formed systems of their own, differing in some respects from them, as well as from each other. The chief care of them all is to fix the times of Menes and Sesostris; which, when they have done, they imagine the rest follows almost of course. Their opinions, as to these two princes, are so various, that it would lead us into too great a detail to mention them all in this place; and what we judge most curious and worthy notice in such disquisitions, will be more properly introduced when we come to the histories of these princes. One thing may be generally observed in respect to all these writers, and especially in regard to Perizonius, viz. that they are much oftner in the right in refuting and detecting the errors and mistakes of other authors, than in settling or adjusting any thing themselves.

THE fundamental hypothesis which all these writers go upon, that there were, in the most early times, several kingdoms in Egypt at once, seems to be very probable, the scripture mentioning the kings of the Egyptians in the plural, even so late as the time of Jehoram. The kingdoms of Thebes and Memphis subsisted together in Egypt for several centuries; and it is certain, from Herodotus and Diodorus, that there were, at least, two kings in that country at the time of the invasion of the Ethiopians under Sabbaco. But it does not appear that Manetho himself, though he wrote the history of five Egyptian nations <sup>f</sup>, did make any of the dynasties he has given us collateral or contemporary; on the contrary, unless his transcribers have done him more wrong than we have reason to suspect, he placed them all in a continual succession; and it is taking the utmost liberty with Manetho to alter it, unless we charge the fault on the records from which he transcribed.

AFTER Cambyfes had carried away their records, the Egyptian priests, in all probability, to supply their loss, and keep up their pretensions to antiquity, began to write new records, wherein they must necessarily have made great mistakes, and ad-

<sup>a</sup> In his Canon Chronicus Aegyptiacus, &c. <sup>b</sup> Lib. 1. p. 42. <sup>c</sup> PEZRON, PERIZONIUS, WHISTON, BEDFORD, &c. <sup>d</sup> Sir ISAAC NEWTON, SHUCKFORD, BOSSUET, LE CLERC, &c. <sup>e</sup> PEZRON, Antiq. des temps retable. c. 13. <sup>f</sup> 2 Kings vii. 6. <sup>g</sup> SYNCCELL. p. 40. <sup>h</sup> See PERIZON. Orig. Aegypt. p. 62, &c.

- a ded a good deal of their own invention, especially as to distant times. From these materials, for want of better, Manetho collecting his history, must have intermixed a good deal of fable, as there is indeed in the antiquities of all nations (the Jews excepted) for it cannot be expected that people in the circumstances of these early nations could have began to keep records till some ages after their settlement. It is unjust therefore to lay the whole blame of the confusion and uncertainty we find in the Egyptian history at the door of Manetho: He collected, for ought we know, faithfully from the records he had, and we have so few genuine remains of him, and what we have, have been so mangled by transcribers and critics, pretending to correct him, that Isis found less difficulty in gathering the dispersed remains of her dead husband, than would fall upon him who should attempt to patch up a figure which might bear some resemblance of that historian. Several ancient writers, of sense and judgment, as Josephus, Plutarch, Porphyry, and Eusebius, looked on him as a writer whose authority was to be depended on; and the curious fragment transcribed from him by Josephus, before his copies had been corrupted, seems to confirm this good opinion, being the most valuable and authentic piece of Egyptian history of so great antiquity, that is extant; and the series of kings we have exhibited thence, in the third table, is a pretty exact record, connecting, if there be any credit in Manetho, the Egyptian and Grecian histories, by acquainting us that Setbofis was Ægyptus, and his brother Armais, Danaus.
- b THE list of Theban kings given by Eratosthenes has had a very favourable reception among the learned, not only as a supplement to Manetho, who has entirely omitted that succession, but as a certain foundation for fixing the Egyptian chronology (Q.) His authority has been preferred to that of Manetho<sup>b</sup>, in regard he was no Egyptian priest, but a Cyrenæan, a man of eminent learning, and keeper of the Alexandrian library, and took his catalogue from the sacred records of Thebes, or had it from the sacred scribes there<sup>c</sup>. Together with the Egyptian names of the kings, he has given their interpretation in Greek, which those skilled in the Coptic tongue allow to be just in some instances; but several of them being corrupted and unintelligible, we have chosen to omit them.
- d THIS series of Eratosthenes is supposed to be connected with a known epoch in the Grecian history, by a remark of Dicæarchus, Aristotle's scholar, who says, that from the reign of Sesonchosis, who succeeded Orus, the son of Isis and Osiris, to the reign of Nilus, are 2500 years; and from Nilus to the first Olympiad 436 years<sup>d</sup>. Who Sesonchosis was is very uncertain; the first king of the twelfth dynasty of Manetho seems to have born this name, or one very near it; but he must have lived too late to be the person here meant; and if he be taken to be the immediate successor of Orus, he must have been one of the demi-gods, and the same with Ares, or Mars; which carry us back into fable. The first of these observations therefore can be of no great use, for the time of Sesonchosis, after this way of reckoning, will precede the deluge, even according to the Samaritan chronology, near 700 years. But the other king, named by Dicæarchus, is found in the catalogue of Eratosthenes, in which the last king but one is Pbruron, or Nilus; and therefore his time being known, the years of all the preceding kings are easily adjusted to any system of chronology. This seems plausible enough; yet we are afraid it will not altogether agree with the account of Diodorus. It is plain Dicæarchus supposed Nilus reigned at the time of the Trojan war; for his calculation will carry us up thither; but, according to Diodorus, Nilus must have been several generations later than Proteus, who reigned in Egypt at the time of the Trojan war, by the joint testimony of him and Herodotus<sup>e</sup>; so that Dicæarchus seems only to have given a tolerable guess at his age, and not fixed it with such certainty as to enable us to determine it within a century at least. Besides, it is more than probable that this table of Eratosthenes has suffered by time and transcri-
- e

<sup>b</sup> Vid. MARSH. CAN. CHRON. p. 8, 26, 297. CUMBERL. on Sanchon. p. 416, &c. <sup>c</sup> Vid. SYNCCELL. p. 147. <sup>d</sup> DICÆARCH. apud Scholiast. Apollon. Argon. l. 4. v. 272. <sup>e</sup> DIO-

(Q) Besides the observation of Dicæarchus, mentioned hereafter, there is another affixed to Mares, the ninth king of this catalogue in Scaliger's edition of Eusebius's Greek chronicle (26), purporting that he was contemporary with the sixteenth dynasty of Thebans in the lower Egypt;

(26) Pag. 18. l. 34.

which observation might be of use to those who have a mind to frame a table of the dynasties, though Goar, in his edition of Syncellus, has omitted it, and taxes Scaliger with adding it of his own invention (27).

(27) GOAR, in Not. ad Syncell. p. 521.

bers, as well as the dynasties of Mancbo; and there are doubtless several mistakes in the numbers as well as names; the sum total, for example, which Syncellus reckons to be 1075, will not agree with the particulars; for, if carefully cast up, they amount to no more than 1055:

HOWEVER, according to this calculation of Dicaearchus, the table of Eratosthenes will suit well enough with the Samaritan chronology; for if to the year before CHRIST 776 (the epoch of the first Olympiad) we add 436, the reign of Nilus will ascend to the year before CHRIST 1212; to which, if we again add 992, the number of years between the last year of Nilus and the first of Menes, this last king's reign began 794 years after the flood; that is, 393 years after the dispersion, and about 300 years before Abraham's descent into Egypt. But if we abate three or four generations in this calculation, it will still better agree with Diodorus, and allow more time for the rising of the kingdom of Egypt.

Of the series of Syncellus.

As to the series of Syncellus, given in the fifth table, on which Sir John Marsham built much<sup>f</sup>, we have a worse opinion of it than of any of the other, especially in the more early ages, where it is supported by no concurring evidence at all. He seems to have composed it by picking here and there such names and numbers, and sometimes adding both out of his own head, as he thought fit, in order to accommodate it to the sacred chronology<sup>g</sup>, and therefore we shall take no further notice of it.

Of the successions according to Herodotus and Dio-dorus.

WE need not spend many words to shew that it is next to impossible to frame a consistent chronology, as some have attempted<sup>h</sup>, from the successions of kings in Herodotus and Diodorus. For, besides their irreconcilable disagreement in several instances, they confessedly omit a great number of princes, and mention no years of the reigns of others; whereby such chasms are left, as no body can tell how to fill up; and their manner of reckoning by descents, or generations, is also visibly uncertain. Before Psanmitichus the Egyptian chronology is very dark; and though after that prince's time it begins to clear up, yet the variations between all the historians since his reign are considerable, as appears by the tables.

WE shall not therefore waste our time in composing a hypothetical scheme of these kings of Egypt; of such performances there are choice already; and they are much more easy to frame, than to support. Calculations by numbers of years, which are so liable to mistake and corruption, must needs be very precarious; and it seems much more reasonable to rely on the coincidence of facts and historical synchronisms, from which chiefly we shall, in the course of our history of Egypt, endeavour to fix the times of such events as we judge capable of it, and shall represent them accordingly in the general chronological tables. And this we think is the most that can be done with any degree of certainty: Considering which it is amazing to us, that men should pretend to adjust the Egyptian chronology, from the most early times, to so great a nicety as a few years, and dictate dogmatically in a matter of such absolute uncertainty and confusion.

BEFORE we conclude, we must observe, as to the Hebrew chronology, the imperfection of which we have mentioned more than once, that if any stress be laid on the foregoing accounts of the Egyptian affairs, the beginning of that kingdom must be placed much earlier than this computation will allow. For, according to the most moderate calculation, which is that of Eratosthenes, as fixed by the observation of Dicaearchus, the reign of Menes must begin within two centuries of the flood; which to us appears improbable in the highest degree<sup>i</sup>; even though we should admit that Menes was the same with Mizraim, as the patrons of that chronology generally suppose; the contrary of which we believe to be true, and shall endeavour to prove hereafter.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. Can. Chron. p. 7.

<sup>g</sup> Vid. PERIZON. Orig. Æg. p. 53, &c.

<sup>h</sup> Vid. CON-

RING. Adv. Chronol. c. 17, 18. STILLINGFL. Orig. Sacr. l. 1. c. 5.

<sup>i</sup> See before p. 172, &c.

S E C T. IV.

The History of Osiris, Isis, Typhon, and Orus.

BEFORE we enter upon the history of the men who were kings of Egypt, we are in some sort obliged to insert the following abstruse yet ancient fiction. Osiris and Isis were said by some to have been the son and daughter of Saturn and Rhea; but, according to others, they were their grand-son and grand-daughter, being descended from Ju- piter

- a Jupiter and Juno, who had a deity born to them on each of the five intercalary days of the Egyptians. These five deities were called Osiris, Isis, Typhon, Apollo, and Venus<sup>a</sup>. We have also their origin and generation differently reported by various authors, and with the several particulars related thus: Sol surprizing Rhea in a private congress with Saturn, prayed that she might not be delivered in the space of any one month or of the year. Soon after Mercury, smitten with love of the goddess, embraced her also; and beating Luna at dice, took from the Lunar year the seventy second part of every day, and thereof composed five days, and added them to the year of 360 days, that she might bring forth in them: and these the Egyptians celebrated as the birth-days of Osiris, Isis, Typhon, Orus and Nephthe. On the first day Osiris was born, and at his birth a voice was heard crying out, The lord of all things is come into the world: or, according to others, a damsel called Pamyles, going to fetch water from the temple of Jupiter at Thebes, heard a loud voice commanding to proclaim, The great and beneficent king Osiris is born. He was delivered to this damsel who was directed to nurse him, which she did with all the veneration due to him, performing the mysteries called Pamyliæ, like those stiled Pallephoria, in honour of him. On the second day Arueris was brought forth, whom some called Apollo, and others the elder Orus. The third was the birth-day of Typhon, who came not into the world in proper time and place, but by a violent eruption leaped out of his mother's side. On the fourth day Isis, and on the fifth Nephthe, or Nephthys, took birth; which last was also called Finis, Venus, and Victoria. Sol was the father of Osiris and Arueris; Mercury was the father of Isis; and Saturn was the father of Typhon and Nephthe. The third day being the birth-day of Typhon, was held to be inauspicious, or unlucky; so that the kings thereon suspended all business, and abstained from eating and drinking. Nephthe married Typhon, and Isis married Osiris. As for these last it is said, that, impelled by a mutual love, they embraced whilst yet in their mother's womb; and it was thought that Arueris, the elder Orus of the Egyptians, and the Apollo of the Greeks, sprang from that early conjunction. (A). Osiris had no sooner obtained the kingdom of Egypt than he reclaimed the inhabitants from their savage and brutal way of living, instructed them how to improve the fruits of the earth, and instituted divine worship<sup>b</sup>; building the city of Thebes, as is (but with uncertainty) said, and erecting several temples, and, amongst the rest, one to Jupiter Uranius, and another to Jupiter Ammon, his father, who reigned before him<sup>c</sup>. But, that his beneficence might not be confined within the bounds of his own country, he undertook to visit the several nations on the earth, all of whom he civilized and brought into order; not by the forcible constraint of arms, but by dint of mild persuasion, and by the allurements of music and poetry<sup>d</sup>. His entering on this expedition, and the more remarkable particulars of his travels, are thus told.

- c HAVING in view the vast and beneficial design abovementioned, he drew together a great number of followers, amongst whom was his brother Apollo, who claimed the laurel as sacred to him, in the same manner as the ivy was to Osiris. He took also his two sons with him, Anubis (which hereafter will be controverted) and Macedo. These two wore coats of mail, and over them the skin of such a beast as corresponded with the nature of their courage; thus Anubis had a dog's skin, and Macedo the skin of a wolf; and hence, said they, the dog and the wolf were worshipped in Egypt. Pan also was of the company; he was afterwards highly revered over all the country, <sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. lib. 1. p. 13.<sup>b</sup> PLUT. de Isid. & Osirid. p. 355.<sup>c</sup> DIOD. SIC. ubi supra.<sup>d</sup> PLUT. ubi supra.

(A) Herodotus gives them a daughter, Bubastis, or Diana; and seems to have heard the story of these fabulous princes, with some variation from what is related by Diodorus and Plutarch, the only authors remaining who have recorded this fiction at length. And particularly, speaking of the floating island Chemmis, near the city of Butus, he writes that, by an Egyptian tradition, Latona, one of the primary deities, residing at Butus, had Orus committed to her care, at a time when Typhon was in search after him to destroy him; and she accordingly concealed him in the aforesaid isle. Now, according to Plutarch, Typhon was kept within the bounds of duty by the prudence of Isis during all the expedition of Osiris; with which account this violent proceeding cannot consist; and Herodotus does not in the least hint at this search afterwards. Diodorus says Orus accompanied his father in his travels; he was therefore out of the reach of his enemy; and after his father's murder, this author writes, he was so far from flying from Typhon, that he made war against him, overcame him in battle, and slew him. It appears then that Herodotus heard this fiction related after a third manner, differing much from both the former (1).

(1) HERODOT. lib. II.

inasmuch that he had not only statues and temples erected to him, but also the city of Chemmis, the name implying it was Pan's city. Add to these Maro, famous for planting and dressing of vines; and Triptolemus for sowing of corn, and gathering in the harvest. Besides, Osiris took with him nine virgins, proficient in music, and all these being committed to the care of Apollo, he thence obtained the title of master of the nine sisters, or muses; likewise some satyrs he met as he went towards Ethiopia, who were acceptable for their jocund disposition, and diverting by their antic behaviour, skipping and dancing.

BUT before he left Egypt, he provided against any disturbances which might arise in his absence, by committing the administration to persons equally wise and faithful. For he invested Isis with the regency, wherein he left his friend Hermes to assist her. Hermes was also called Mercury, Thoth, Thoyth, Tauauies, Trismegylus, and by other names. It is a common opinion that there were two persons or more who bore these several appellations; but leaving the discussion of so dark a point, we will here speak only of one person, and enumerate the inventions and books ascribed to him. He, said they, invented articulate sounds, appellatives, letters, divine worship, astronomy, music, wrestling, arithmetic, statuary, the three-stringed lyre, and the use of the olive, and not Minerva, as the Greeks mistakenly asserted. He was also stiled the father of eloquence, and thence he derived his name of Hermes, the interpreter, or speaker*. Now as to the books he wrote, Seleucus reckoned them at no less than 20,000†; and Manetho exceeds him, computing them at 36,525‡. These numbers are so enormous, that to the learned it hath been no inconsiderable difficulty to conceive how one person could be the author of such myriads of tracts. Therefore some have supposed these computations to refer to verses, others to leaves of the Papyrus; and others again to succinct discourses and proverbs. But Clement of Alexandria will lead us, in some measure, out of this labyrinth, by the following account of an ancient Egyptian procession: The first who advanced, says he, was a Chanter, or singer, who bore some symbol or other of music: His business it was to receive two of the books of Mercury or Thoth; of which the one contained hymns to the gods, and the other rules for the conduct of a king. Secondly, an Astrologer, bearing a dial and a palm, which were symbols of astrology: He was obliged to have the four astrological books of Mercury by heart; the first of which contained the places of the fixed stars, and the three others treated of the sun and moon, their eclipses, illuminations, rising, and the like. Thirdly, an Hierogrammateus, or sacred scribe, with a feather on his head, bearing a book and a reed, in which were ink and a reed to write with: He was versed in the subjects of ten books, the 1. of hieroglyphics; 2. of cosmography; 3. of geography; 4. of the order of the sun and moon; 5. of the five planets; 6. of the chorography of Egypt; 7. a description of the Nile; 8. a description of the sacred utensils, and of the places consecrated to them; 9. treated of measures, and the 10th of whatever was necessary in their worship. Fourthly, a Stolistes, a kind of solemn marshal, holding the cubit of justice, and a cup for libations: He knew whatever concerned the institution of youth, and the sealing of victims. The whole Egyptian religion was comprehended in ten books; the 1. related to the sacrifices; the 2. to first-fruits; 3. to hymns; 4. to prayers; 5. to processions; 6. to festivals, and the other four were written on the like subjects. Fifthly, and last of all came the Prophet, bearing a water-pot openly in his bosom, and followed by those who carried the processional bread: He, as presiding over the temple, studied the ten books called sacerdotal, which spoke of the laws, the gods, and the whole discipline of the priesthood. Here we have an account of thirty six books of Hermes; besides which he wrote six more, which treated of anatomy, diseases, medicaments, and the like; so that he was author of forty two in all, each of which might be divided into many Sections*. This is some rational account of the matter. But to return from whence we digressed, this sagacious person or some such one was left behind to assist Isis in the government of the kingdom.

MOREOVER, Hercules was appointed general over the forces at home, and Antaus, Bufris and Prometheus were constituted governors of several provinces. Osiris having thus settled affairs in Egypt, began his progress, moving first towards Ethiopia. In this country he raised the banks of the Nile, and dug several canals, thereby to prevent the too frequent inundations, and to abate and properly distribute the * DIOD. SIC. l. i. p. 14, &c. † SELEUC. apud Jamblich. de Myst. Ægypt. § 8. cap. 1.

‡ MANETHO, apud eund. ibid. § CLEM. ALEX. Strom. lib. 6. p. 633.

a waters of the Nile. Whilst he was thus employed in Ethiopia, the Nile broke down its banks in Egypt, and overflowed a great part of the country; and this it did with so rapid a tide, and so copious a flood, as swept away all before it, and drowned great multitudes of people, doing especially damage in Prometheus's jurisdiction, whereat he was grieved almost to despair. But Hercules soon drained off the waters, and thence is said to have shot through the eagle which preyed on Prometheus's heart; for the suddenness of this flood was compared to the flight of an eagle, and the river from thence was sometimes called after that bird. But to return to Osiris; he instructed the Ethiopians in all the branches of agriculture, and built them several cities; which done, he departed, leaving some behind him to act
b as his governors, and others to gather in his tribute. From Ethiopia he went into Arabia, and so continued his travels till he had got beyond India. In India he built several Cities, and particularly Nysa, which he so called from the place where (according to some) he was bred up. Here he planted the ivy which was no where else to be found in India, and left so many monuments of himself behind him, as afterwards gave room to dispute whether he was not originally of that part of the world. Having surveyed all Asia, he crossed the Hellcfont, and landing in Thrace, killed Lycurgus, the king of that country, who opposed his progress. Here he left Maro to cultivate the land, and commanded him to build a city, and to call it after his own name, Maronea. Afterwards he bestowed on his son Macedo the country of c Macedon, which borrowed its name from him; and Triptolemus had charge of Attica. At length Osiris returned back into Egypt, laden with the choicest productions of the earth, and with the blessings of the whole race of mankind who consented to his deification.

But his brother Typhon slew him soon after his arrival, and cut his body into twenty-six pieces, giving one to each of his accomplices<sup>1</sup>. It was thus that by some of the priests we had the story of the death of Osiris; but the fable was also told after the following manner: Typhon hearing that his brother was on his return, entered into a conspiracy with seventy two others, exclusive of the queen of Ethiopia, called Afo, to kill him. And privately taking measure of Osiris's body he ordered d a very magnificent coffin to be made, and contrived that it should be brought home to him as he was entertaining his friends. This was done, and his guests failed not to take notice of the coffin and admire it. Whereupon Typhon, in a jesting way, told them, that the person amongst them whom it best fitted should have it. Several of the company tried, but to no purpose, till Osiris went into it, which he had no sooner done, than they shut the lid on him, and locked it. Then pouring melted lead over it, they conveyed him to the Tanitic mouth of the Nile, and there threw him into the sea; on which account that entrance of the river was abhorred by the Egyptians. This cruelty was transacted on the seventeenth day of the month Albyr, in which the sun went through the Scorpion, and in the twenty eighth
e year of the reign of Osiris; though, according to some, not of his reign, but of his life. When the Pans and Satyrs told it to the men, they were seized by such sudden consternations as have ever since born the name of Panic fears. And Isis hearing it, cut off a lock of her hair, and, putting on mourning, set out from the city of Coptus, where she received the doleful news, and went in quest of the body of Osiris. As she went along, she asked all she met, if they had seen, or heard of, the coffin; but she enquired in vain, till some children, who had seen Typhon's friends carrying it, gave her some information. Hence the Egyptians held children to have been induced with a prophetic faculty, and were wont to draw conjectures from what they said while playing in temples.

f Isis knowing that Osiris had, by mistake, lain with his sister Neptbe, and that she had exposed a son she had by him, through fear of Typhon, resolved now to seek him; and, after much fatigue, she was guided by dogs to the place where he was. Having found him, he afterwards served her for a guard and companion, and was called Anubis. He was thought to have guarded the gods in the same manner as dogs take care of men. At length she came to understand that the coffin was thrown up by the sea, and lodged in a tuft of broom, or heath, at Byblus, and that the broom had suddenly sprouted up with a large stalk, whereby it inclosed and concealed it from sight. She therefore repaired thither, and passing over the methods she practised to possess herself of the coffin, let it suffice that at last she obtained it. When she
g first cast her eyes on it, she cried out with so loud a voice that she struck the king of

<sup>1</sup> Diob. Sic. ubi supra, p. 15, &c.

Byblus's youngest son dead; for she had insinuated herself into his family, as the most ready means to obtain what she wanted, he having out of curiosity built over the broom which hid the coffin. With his eldest son and the coffin she immediately embarked; and, in her passage, dried up the river Phædrus, which displeased her, because of a rustling breeze which issued from its mouth as she passed by about break of day. Being now private, and at leisure, she opened the coffin, and laying her face to the face of the deceased, bathed it with her tears. As she was thus giving vent to her grief, the king's son she had brought away with her from Byblus came behind her, and saw what she was about; whereat enraged, she turned on him with so dreadful a countenance, that she frightened him also to death. Some said he jumped into the sea. This is supposed to be Maneros<sup>k</sup>. She brought the body to Butus and hid it; but Typhon one night hunting by moon light, fell on it, and tore it into fourteen pieces, which he scattered abroad. Isis then traversed the lakes and watery places in a boat made of the Papyrus, seeking after the limbs of Osiris. Whence it was held that those who went on the water in boats made of that wood were in no danger from crocodiles, who either loved or else dreaded the goddess. In whatever place she found a limb, she there buried it; for which reason there were many tombs ascribed to Osiris: but others said, she made several counterfeits of his body, and presented them to as many cities, pretending to the inhabitants of each that they had the true corps, and so established the worship of him in many places, and made it difficult for Ty- phon to find out the right monument, in case he should ever get the superiority, and continue in his implacable malice against Osiris<sup>l</sup>. This burial is also related after a third, and almost quite different manner. For the author, from whom he took the first account of his death, reports that Isis got together the twenty-six pieces of his mangled carcass, joined them, and embalmed them; and afterwards prevailed on the Egyptian priests to consent to, and promote his deification, in consideration of a third part of Egypt which she gave them them; and they buried him at Memphis.
 But the place of his burial was a matter of great dispute and controversy; though some produced the following inscription in sacred characters, which they said was on a pillar in Arabia.

SATURN, the youngest of all the gods, was my father. I am Osiris, that king who led an army as far as the desarts of India, and from thence northward as far as the springs of the river Ister, and thence quite to the ocean. I am the eldest son of Saturn, sprung from a noble stock, and of generous blood; cousin to the day. Nor is there a place where I have not been, I, who freely dispensed my benefits to all mankind.

Isis, after the most diligent search, could never recover the privities of Osiris, which, being thrown into the river, were devoured by the lepidotus, the squameus, the phagrus, and the oxyrynchus, which four sorts of fish the Egyptians detested and abstained from upon that account: But she made ample amends for this irreparable loss, by instituting a kind of separate worship, which was devoutly and universally paid to the image of those parts afterwards.

THERE were various reports concerning the actions of Isis and Orus after the death of Osiris, as also relating to Typhon. And first it was affirmed, that they overcame him in battle, and slew him<sup>m</sup>. Secondly, he was said to have been thunderstruck by Jupiter, and plunged under the lake Sirbon<sup>n</sup> (B), where being supposed to lay sub-<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 213. <sup>l</sup> PLUT. ubi supra. p. 357, 358.

<sup>n</sup> APOLLON. RHOD. Argo. lib. 11.

<sup>m</sup> DIOD. SIC. ubi supra, p. 79.

(B) According to Diodorus Siculus the lake, or bog Sirbon, Serbonis, or Selbonis, under mount Casius, was two hundred furlongs in length, very narrow, but very deep. Many mistaken in their road, nay, whole armies, misguided in their march, have been swallowed up in it. The shore all round it was a plain of sand, which the winds blowing over the surface of the bog, the lower particles lighted thereon, and by degrees formed a loose skin, or crust, over it; which, though weak, was sufficient to deceive the eye of the wandering traveller, who no sooner set foot upon it, than he felt it give way under him, and was irrecoverably lost, and this even at the very brink of it. It was also called Barathra, or the profound gulphs (2). But it has from time to time decreased in extent; for Pliny speaks of it as a small place to what it had formerly been (3); and it is now thought to be quite choaked up, such a place being no more to be found (4).

(2) DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. p. 26.
 tom. III. p. 306.

(3) PLIN. Hist. Nat. lib. 5. c. 13.

(4) Voyage de P. LUCAS, merfed,

a merged, it was thence called Typhon's exhalations *. And thirdly, it was asserted that Osiris ascending from the infernal regions, instructed Orus, and excited him to war with Typhon; and that after a battle, which continued several days, Typhon was taken prisoner. But Isis restoring him to his liberty, so enraged Orus, that he tore off the royal attire from her head, when Mercury being present, covered her with a helmet made of an ox's head instead thereof. Typhon after this renewed the war twice, and was both times vanquished †; and being no longer able to withstand his enemies, concealed himself (as should seem) under the abovementioned lake Sirbon ‡. Osiris moreover appeared to Isis, and had a son by her, called Harpocrates, but he proved a weak and ricketty person. Here Plutarch breaks off, and after assuring us that his is the genuine story, proceeds to explain away the whole into an allegory. But seeing that Diodorus continues to the death of Isis and Orus, we now turn to him. Isis having thus quelled her enemies, reigned with great prudence, justice, moderation, and beneficence. And because of her great and constant affection towards Osiris, which appeared in nothing more than in the vow she made of widowhood, a law was enacted, which allowed of the marriage contract between brother and sister: And from the same source sprang the custom of preferring the queen before the king, and the wife before the husband*. At last she died, and was buried at Memphis, as the common opinion was; but this also was disputed. And particularly those who laid a stress upon the above-inserted inscription, affirmed there was another pillar c near to the former in Arabia, and that the following words in sacred characters were legible upon it.

I, Isis, am the queen of this country, and was instructed by Mercury. What he have ordained, may no one make void. I am the eldest daughter of Saturn, the youngest of the gods. I am the sister and wife of king Osiris. I am she who first cultivated Bread-corn for the use of man. I am the mother of king Orus. I am she who ariseth in the dog-star. The city of Bubastus was built in honour of me. Farewel! rejoice, O Egypt, my nursing mother! — This was all, said they, that was to be distinguished of this inscription †.

She had a most stately temple erected to her in the city of Buſiris, situate near d the middle of the Delta ‡, some remains of which are thought to be still standing (C).

There is nothing said of Orus any farther than that he was the last of the gods and demi-gods †; and therefore we here conclude this fabulous or mythologic section.

* PLUTARCH in vita Antonii, p. 916. † Idem Isid. & Osirid. ubi supra. ‡ HERODOT. lib. 3. † PLUT. ubi supra. † See before, p. 203. † DIODOR. Sic. ubi supra. † HERODOT. lib. 2. † Idem, ibid.

(C) Of these ruins take the account given by an eye witness in his own words. "I here saw the remains of one of the finest, most extensive, and most ancient temples of Egypt. All the stones are of extraordinary length and thickness, and all of granite. They are, for the most part, adorned with sculptures in Relievo, which represent men and women, and all sorts of hieroglyphics. Many of these stones bear the image of a man standing upright, with a long peaked cap on his head, and holding a goblet or bowl, in each hand, which he presents to three or four young women, which stand also upright, one behind another. These young women have each of them a javelin in one hand, and a staff, shorter than the javelin, in the other; and on each of their heads is a ball between two long taper horns. Others of these stones are embellished with hieroglyphical representations of birds, fishes, and terrestrial animals. A lofty and very substantial pillar of fine granite, having each of the four faces of its upper part wrought with four angular flutings or indentures, seems to have been erected to support the arcades and vaults of this sumptuous edifice. On each face of this pillar there is also carved the head of a woman bigger than the life. These sculptures have not been in the least injured by time, by the sun or by the Arabs. . . . It seems to be more than probable, that this temple, the remains of which I have here described, was the very temple of the goddess Isis, and that the city of Buſiris, mentioned by Herodotus, is now the very town of Bahábeit, situated in the middle of the Delta, near Sebennytus, or Sammanúd. My opinion is the more credible, in that throughout all the island it was never heard, or known, that any monument of marble, or stone, either little or big, was ever found, that could suit with any other deity than the goddess Isis. . . . These ruins which are near to Bahábeit are about 1000 paces in circumference. They are about a league from the Nile, about two or three leagues from Sammanúd, and about twenty five or thirty leagues north of Káhira. There is not either brick, plaster, mortar or common stone amongst these reliques; nothing being there to be seen but great blocks of granite (5).

(5) Nouv. Mem. Des Missions de la Comp. de Jéf. dans le Levant, Tome II. p. 117. & seq.

S E C T. V.

The Reigns of the kings of Egypt.

Menes or Menas.

MENES, or Menas, is universally agreed to have been the first mortal who reigned <sup>a</sup> over Egypt (A). In his time the whole country, except Thebais, was a morass; and no land appeared between the lake Maris and the Mediterranean sea, which was seven days passage on the river. He diverted the course of the Nile, which was wont to wash the foot of the sandy mountain towards Lybia, and built the city of Mempbis within the ancient bed of the river. On the north he made a lake and on the west side of it, another, both without the walls, and both fed by the Nile which flowed along the east side of the town; and in the city itself he built the famous temple of Vulcan *. He was the first who instructed the Egyptians in religious matters, and introduced

<sup>a</sup> HERODOT. lib. II.

(A) It is on all hands agreed that Menes was the first king of Egypt; but all are not of one mind concerning him in any other respect. And though we have resolved to follow no particular hypothesis in the Egyptian affairs, as thinking them all not a little dubious; yet we shall in the most summary way entertain the reader with the conjectures of some of the most eminent chronologers who have laboured in the ungrateful work of settling the Egyptian antiquities. In conformity to what we now propose, we shall take notice that, according to Sir John Marsham, this Menes was the Cham or Ham, of the scriptures, the Jupiter Hammon or Ammon of the Greeks, the Thamus or Adonis of the Phœnicians, the Saturn of Sanchoniatho, and the first who taught the Egyptians to live delicately; which alone, is a sufficient inducement to think that he could not have lived in the early and simple times which immediately succeeded the deluge. But we shall have no need to contradict him, seeing that will be done presently by one of no mean fame, who wrote professedly with that intent. In a word, Sir John lays it down that he was king of all Egypt, and the father of the Egyptian god Mercury or Athotbes (1).

It will now be worth the readers while to hear what Perizonius hath to object to the account of this gentleman. He says, that the first who reigned in Egypt were the Mesiræi or Semigods. Then came Menes, whom he denies to have been either Ham or Mizraim, or that Hammon is properly the same with the Egyptian Jupiter, or that Menes was the father of the Egyptian Mercury: We will next give you an argument of his in proof of these heads separately, and then conclude with his conjectures concerning the age and family of Menes, and of this obscure period of the Egyptian affairs. 1. Menes succeeded the Mesiræi: This he proves by very ample testimony, and then observes that he could not be the founder of their race, but their successor; and since it is said that he first taught the Egyptians to feed deliciously, and to adorn their beds, it must follow that there had been Egyptians before his time, who were used to a coarser and more simple way of living. 2. For the same reason it is very improbable that he was either Ham or Mizraim. 3. Hammon is not properly the Egyptian Jupiter; for that Ham or Hammon, was, by the Greeks, in after-times dignified with the name of Jupiter, was owing to their being so solicitous after foreign gods, to whose original or proper name they prefixed that of Jupiter; so Jupiter Belus, Jupiter Hammon, Jupiter Casus, and many more; wherefore this had no affinity with the ancient Egyptian genealogy, which owned nothing of the Grecian Jupiter. In a word, he thinks he was styled Dionius, or sprung from Jupiter by Eratosthenes, because he was the first that reigned after the Mesiræi or Semigods, as is related by the same author. It is his opinion that Menes lived in or about the days of Abraham, but does not lay it down for certain; and though Eratosthenes calls him the father of Athotbes, or Mercury, he can by no means admit it (2).

Father Pezron, who wrote before Perizonius, brings down the reign of Menes much later than the days of Ham, or Mizraim. According to his hypothesis Menes began to reign 2904 years after the creation, and 648 after the flood. This he endeavours by all means to prove, and seems to be pretty confident that he is in the right; but it would be endless to enter into the arguments of the chronologers we shall mention from time to time, and we shall avoid it as much as possible, except when their reasoning is very clear and important, or their notions very singular (3).

We will now consult the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton. As he is of opinion that Sesostrius was Osiris, he places Menes after him, and in consequence thereof, and for other cogent reasons, he transposes the series of the kings of Egypt mentioned by Herodotus after this manner: Sesostrius, Phoron, Proetus, Menes, Rhamphinitus, Marris, Cheops, Cephren, Mycerinus, Nitocris, and the rest in the same order as they stand in Herodotus. He supposes Menes to be the same with Amenophis and Memnon, and that by corruption he was called Menes, Mines, Minæus, Minies, Minevis, Enephes, Venephes, Phamenophis, Ofymanthas [Ofymandyas], Ofimandes, Ismandes, Imandes, Memnon, Arminon. According to his hypothesis Menes is about 300 years older than Psammiticus. He looks on it as absurd to suppose that there was any king of all Egypt, till after the expulsion of the Shepherds; and observes, that the miracles of Mempbis were not spoken of, or known in Greece till some ages after the Torjan war; for Homer celebrates Thebes as the glory of those days, and makes no mention of Mempbis; which, with the temple of Vulcan, that stood in the midst of it, he grants to have been built by Menes. In a word, this hypothesis reduces the antiquity of the Egyptian empire, of which Menes was the first king, much lower than any other (4).

(1) Vid. MARSH. Can. Chron. (2) PERIZON. Ægypt. Orig. & Temp. Antiquissimum, Invest. (3) PEZRON. Antiq. des Temps rétab. & déf.

(4) Sir ISSAC NEWTON's Chron. of the ancient kingdoms amended, p. 238.

- a domestic magnificence and luxury; on which account his memory was loaded with execrations by one of his successors, as will be hereafter observed<sup>b</sup>.

FROM the reign of this king, Herodotus declares, that the Egyptians produced a catalogue of 130 monarchs, extending from Menes to Maris, who was the last of the number; and that there was nothing worth notice recorded of any of them, except one Ethiopian woman called Nitocris. On the other hand Diodorus writes, that the family of Menes enjoyed the crown to the fifty second descent, and that their several reigns took up the space of 1400 years. Since therefore there is so vast a chasm in both of them, we think we may safely venture to fill it up in part with what we find concerning the shepherds who ruled in Egypt; and the rather, because this whole transaction seems

- b to belong to some very distant period of the Egyptian history.

IT happened (to use the words of an eminent author) in the reign of Timaus The irruption of the pastors or shepherds, who set up Salatis. king of Egypt, that God being displeased with the Egyptians, they suffered a great revolution; for a multitude of men, ignoble in their race, took courage, and pouring from the East into Egypt, made war with the inhabitants, who submitted to them without trying the event of a battle. Having reduced the princes, they inhumanly burnt the cities, threw down the temples of the gods, and behaved in the most cruel and insulting manner over the ancient inhabitants, putting them to death, and carrying away their wives and children into captivity. At length they made one of their own number king, whose name was Salatis. He usually resided at Memphis,

- c and leaving garrisons in the most proper places, kept both the upper and lower Egypt under tribute. But particularly he fortified the eastern parts, fearing an invasion of the Assyrians, who were at that time most powerful. Finding therefore a convenient city in the Saitic Nome, which was seated on the eastern banks of the river Bubastis, and which was called Avaris in the ancient dialect, he rebuilt it, and surrounded it with a very strong wall, and kept a garrison of 24,000 soldiers therein. It was his custom, about the time of harvest, to come hither to gather in his corn, and to pay and exercise his soldiers, that they might always be ready and fit for action, and be a constant terror to any who should attempt an invasion. Salatis died, and was succeeded by five others<sup>c</sup>, who did their utmost, as well as their predecessor, to root out the whole nation of Egyptians. This people were called Hycfos, or King Shepherds (B), hyc, in the sacred dialect, signifying a king, and fos, in the common dialect, signifying a pastor or shepherd; and of these two came the compound Hycfos. Some would have it that these were Arabians. They held Egypt 511 years. This is all the genuine account we have of the irruption of the shepherds, their expulsion will be hereafter related.

WE now return to Herodotus and Diodorus, and this last making mention of several princes between Menes and Myris, let us hear what he says concerning them.

BUSIRIS (C) in process of time became king, and was succeeded by 8 princes of Busiris I. his line, the last of which was called also Busiris, and was the founder of the city of Thebes, which he made the capital of the kingdom<sup>c</sup>.

- c OSYMANDYAS (D) stands next. It is uncertain whom, or when he succeeded. Osymandyas. The Bactrians revolting from him, he reduced them, as is said, with an army con-

<sup>b</sup> Diod. Sic. lib. 1. p. 42. <sup>c</sup> See before p. 231. <sup>d</sup> MANETHO apud Jos. contra Appion. l. 1. p. 1039. <sup>e</sup> Diod. ubi supr.

(B) We will barely transcribe the opinions of the above cited chronologers as to the time of this irruption, as it is represented, of the shepherds into Egypt. Sir John Marsham places it 157 years before the Exodus of the children of Israel (1). Perizonius drawing a very circumstantial parallel between what is recorded of the shepherds by Manetho, and what is said of the obscurity of the Israelites, the power and dignity of Joseph, and the miraculous works of Moses which almost utterly destroyed the country; upon the close, pronounces the shepherds so heinously spoken of, to have been the Israelites themselves (2). Sir Isaac Newton makes the pastors to have been the Canaanites who fled from Joshua and went into Africa, but in their flight seized on the kingdom of the Lower Egypt in the reign of Timaus, whom the same author calls Thamus or Thammuz (3). Greaves, after a parallel drawn by him between the history of the shepherds and of the Israelites, which seems as natural and as plausible as that of Perizonius, will by no means allow them to have been the same (4).

(C) Sir John Marsham and Sir Isaac Newton think that no such king ever reigned, and that what is said concerning his cruelty is merely fabulous (5). Perizonius, on the contrary, that there was such a king of Egypt, but who was not so ancient as Diodorus makes him; taxing that historian with too great indulgence towards the Egyptian vanity (6).

(D) If we rely on Sir John Marsham, we should call Osymandyas, Amenophis and Memnon; as also Imandes, Imandes and Osmandes: This perhaps, says he, derived from Osiris, and that from Isis. What seems to be his chief argument in support of this opinion, is, that in the description of the city they pretend he besieged, it is said to have

(1) Vid. MARSH. ubi supr. (2) PERIZON. ubi supr. (3) Sir ISAAC NEWT. ubi supr. (4) GRAVES'S pyramid: p. 21, 22. (5) MARSH. ubi supr. (6) PERIZON. ubi supr.

His tomb.

sitting of 400,000 foot, and 200,000 horse. Of all the ancient monuments of the kings, for which the city of Thebes was so renowned, his was of the greatest note. It consisted of vast courts, portico's, shrines, temples, a library, his own tomb, and other buildings. The first court, which was of various kinds of stone, was 200 foot in extent, and 45 foot high. Next to this was a square portico, each of whose sides was 400 foot long; and instead of pillars, supported by representations of animals of 15 cubits high, all of one stone, and adorned with figures after the ancient manner. The cieling was blue and bespangled with stars. From this portico they went into a second court, in all respects like the first, except that it was more richly adorned with various sculptures. In the entrance thereof were three statues, all of one stone, the workmanship of Memnon the Scinite: One of them was in a sitting posture, and the largest in all Egypt, the length of its foot exceeding 7 cubits. This was his own statue; the other two, which stood one at each knee, represented his mother and daughter. This wonderful piece was not so admirable for the exquisite art of the carver, as for the beauty of the stone, which was free from the least flaw or blemish. It had this inscription; I am Osymandyas, king of kings, he that would know my grandeur, or where I lie, let him surpass me in any of my works. Here was also another statue of his mother, standing by herself, of 20 cubits high, and cut out of one stone: She had three queens on her head, signifying that she had been the daughter, wife, and mother of a king. This court lead to a second portico or piazza, far exceeding the first. On the first wall of this the king was represented with his army besieging a town encompassed by a river, and fighting in the front of the battle accompanied by a lion: Concerning which some said he always fought with a tame lion at his side; and others, that the figure of that beast was purely emblematical of his extraordinary courage. On the second wall were the captives, with their hands and privities lopped off, to express their cowardice. On the third were various sorts of sculptures and paintings, which represented his sacrifices and triumph. In the middle of this piazza was an altar in the open air, built of the most beautiful marble, of excellent workmanship, and wonderful proportion. On the fourth side, or wall, were two gigantic statues, all of one stone, in a sitting posture, and 27 cubits high. Near unto these were three passages which gave admission into a great hall, supported by columns after the manner of a music theatre, and 200 feet square. In this place were many wooden statues, representing parties engaged in law, and the judges hearing the causes. These last, to the number of thirty, were carved on one side, with their president in the midst of them, at whose neck hung an image with its eyes shut, to represent truth, and with many books about him. By this they chose to signify, that judges ought to be proof against bribery, and respect nothing but truth and equity. From hence they went into a gallery or long walk, in which were apartments stored with the most delicious eatables. Here the king was most curiously wrought, and painted in the most lively colours, as presenting to God the gold and silver annually dug out of the mines in Egypt, the amount whereof was 3,200,000,000 minas, or 96,000,000 of pounds sterling. Next was the sacred library with this inscription; The dispensary of the mind. Contiguous thereunto were the images of all the Egyptian gods, with the king paying the offerings peculiar to each of them; that Osiris, and the rest of the deities placed beneath him, might know that he had passed his life with piety towards the gods, and with justice towards men. Next to the library was an edifice of curious architecture, wherein were twenty couches to feast on, and the statues of Jupiter, Juno, and the king; who was thought to be here intombed. About this were several pavilions, in which most curious pictures of the consecrated animals were seen. From hence was the ascent to the sepulchre, which being ascended, you saw a ring or circle of gold 365 cubits in circumference, and one in thickness, surrounding the monument. This ring was divided by the days of the year, and shewed the rising and setting of the stars, and their aspects, according to the Egyptian astrology. This circular border was carried away by Cambyfes the Persian. Such have been surrounded by a river, which he will have to have been the river Euleus, and the city itself Susa; for Pliny says that river surrounded the fortrefs of the Susians, and observes, that Susa was commonly called, by the Greeks, Memnonia. He observes moreover, that Memnon's expedition into Asia, was more celebrated by the Greeks than that of Sesostris, which he attributes to the poets who sprang first up in or near his time: And concludes, that he dwelt some time in Susa. All this, according to his custom, he endeavours to prove from ancient testimony (7).

Perizonius uses much argument upon this king's reign, and who he was; but comes to no positive decision, and scarce offers a conjecture, so dark this period appeared to him (8). We have already told you, that Sir Isaac Newton takes Osymandyas and Menes to have been the same.

(7) Vid. MARSH. ubi sup.(8) PERIZ. ubi sup.

- a was the tomb of Osymandyas, whose descendants reigned after him to the eighth generation. The last of whom was called Uchoreus<sup>1</sup>.

THE building and fortifying of Memphis, already ascribed to Menes, are likewise attributed to this UCHOREUS (E). He is said to have given that city a circuit Uchoreus of 150 stadia, or near 20 miles, and by mounds and trenches to have secured it from the insults either of the Nile or of an enemy. He adorned it with palaces, which though they surpassed those in any other country, yet fell short of what had been done in that way by his predecessors. For the inhabitants held this transitory life in no estimation, if compared with the joys the virtuous were to possess hereafter; and were proportionably less splendid in the lodgings they prepared for the former, than b in the repositories they founded for the latter. This king translated the imperial seat from Thebes to Memphis<sup>2</sup>.

AFTER him reigned SASYCHIS the second Egyptian legislator.

Sasychis.

WE have now brought Diodorus down to Myris; and that we may do the same by Herodotus, we must relate what he has recorded concerning NITOCRIS (F). She succeeded her brother, an Ethiopian, whom the Egyptians murdered, but afterwards admitted her to the succession. She meditating revenge for her brother's untimely end, put many of the Egyptians to death privately and by stratagem; and is particularly said to have contrived a subterraneous building, whither she invited the principal actors against her brother to partake of a feast, and in the midst of their mirth c turned the river upon them by a private passage, and drowned them all, while herself took refuge in a place well fortified with ashes<sup>3</sup>. She was of a fair complexion, her hair was yellow, her person beautiful; but it appears, that though her mind was great, she was however inclined to cruelty. She is reported to have built the third great pyramid<sup>4</sup>.

AFTER twelve generations MOERIS or MYRIS (G) came to the throne. He it was who dug the famous lake which bore his name, and erected the two pyramids which stood in the midst of it<sup>5</sup>: He also built a sumptuous portico on the north side of Vulcan's temple at Memphis<sup>6</sup>. According to Herodotus, he was the 330th king from Menes, and the immediate predecessor to Sesostris.

- d SESOSTRIS, Sesostris, Sesofsis, Sefonchis, Sefonchosis, Sethosis, and several other Sesoftris, appellations are by (H) some held to belong to one man, whose reign is esteemed the

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. l. 1. p. 44. p. 58. See before, p. 230.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ubi sup. p. 46. <sup>3</sup> See before, p. 195.

<sup>4</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

<sup>5</sup> SYNCCELL.

<sup>6</sup> Idem ibid. DIOD. ubi sup. p. 47.

(E) The last mentioned author thinks the works of Uchoreus and Mæris confers the same genius, and therefore would willingly think these names belonged to one and the same person (1).

(F) Her name signifies Minerva Victrix. Sir John Marsham places her soon after the Israelites came into Egypt. He thinks Josephus mentions her by the name of Nic-aule, queen of Egypt and Ethiopia; but that he is mistaken in alledging that the Nitocris of Herodotus was she who visited Solomon (2). Father Pezron thinks much in the same purpose (3). Sir Isaac Newton makes her the sister and successor of Mycerinus (4).

(G) He recovered Memphis from the Pastors says Marsham (5). Perizonius fixes upon nothing concerning him. Mæris was also called Maris, Myris, Meres, Marres, Smarres, and more corruptly by changing M into A, T, B, S, TX, A, &c. Ayres, Tyris, Byires, Sores, Uchoreus, Labaris; according to Sir Isaac Newton (6).

(H) Sir John Marsham allows him to have been called by these several appellations, and others besides, which we may perhaps have occasion to mention hereafter. He is clearly of opinion, that the Sesostris of the prophane historians is the Sesac or Shishak of the sacred: He takes notice, that the more ancient kings of Egypt, with whom the patriarchs and Israelites were formerly concerned, are always stiled Pharaohs; whereas Shishak is the first Egyptian king in scripture called by his proper name; except Rameses be rather the name of a king than a country. This famous chronologer thinks, that when Sesostris or Shishak as he terms him, set out to invade Asia, he could not well avoid falling upon Judæa, and accordingly took the capital thereof Jerusalem, which he stripped of its riches, and reduced Rehobam; for there is express mention made in the LXX and vulgate versions, that he was followed by multitudes of Libyans, Troglodytes and Ethiopians, nations whom, according to the prophane accounts, he had previously conquered. He then lays a stress upon Josephus, who says, That Herodotus through mistake ascribed the actions of Sesac to Sesostris: And again; That Herodotus was only mistaken in the king's name. This does not seem to us so conclusive as it appeared to this gentleman; for we do not see how from thence it must naturally follow that Sesostris and Shishak are the same person. However, our author admits, that since Herodotus and Josephus agree as to fact, there is no great matter in the difference of the names they use; and because Herodotus professes to have seen some pillars of ignominy erected by Sesostris in the Syrian Palistine; and because it is said by the scripture and Josephus, that Rehobam gave up the city without the least resistance, he seems to be clearly of opinion that Sesac or Shishak set them up upon that very account (7).

Let us now see what Perizonius says, who, as we have

(1) Vid. Sir ISAAC NEWT. ubi sup. (2) MARSH. ubi sup. (3) PEZRON. ubi sup. (4) Sir ISAAC

NEWT. ubi sup. (5) MARSH. ubi sup. (6) Sir ISAAC NEWT. ubi sup. (7) Vid. MARSH. ubi sup.

most extraordinary part of the Egyptian history. He is represented as potent at land, and on sea, wise, just, generous, valiant, magnificent, but ambitious almost beyond have already observed, makes it his chief business to confute the foregoing chronologer. He then lays it down with great positiveness, that Sesac and Sesoftris are distinct kings. How he proves this, we shall declare in the briefest and clearest order we are able.

1. He considered the expressions above cited from Josephus; and after proving that several of the learned, as well as Sir John Marsham, have taken them wrong, he proceeds thus. First, he insists, that by the common consent of the Greeks, Sesoftris was much older than the Trojan war. So says Herodotus; and the same is reported by Diodorus, only with this difference, that he makes a much greater space between this king and that war than Herodotus. This also is evidently confirmed by Strabo (8); and by Aristotle (9) who placed him before Minos the Cretan lawgiver: As also by the writers of the Argonautic expedition, the Icholiast of Apollonius (10); by Arrianus (11), who makes him contemporary to Jandys the Scythian; by Jornandes (12), who says he flourished before the Amazons; and lastly, by Justin and Ælian (13); the former declaring that Sesoftris lived before the days of Ninus, and the latter that he was instructed by Mercury, and so makes him equal to the Egyptian Mercury, who must certainly have been more ancient than the time of Rehoboam. After these citations, he blames Sir John Marsham for making slight of such abundant testimony, and for pronouncing the whole a mistake which arose from the ignorance of the Greeks, and then proceeds. But could the Greeks be strangers to the age of Sesoftris, if he lived so late? Memnon was celebrated, says Marsham, because he lived nearer to the poetical times; but Perizonius will have it that Homer wrote soon after the death of Rehoboam, and therefore must have followed him near enough to have had perfect information and fresh records of the deeds of Sesoftris: Besides Asia Minor at that time was all Greek, by the Æolic and Ionic colonies which were transplanted thither somewhat before the reign of Rehoboam; and the inhabitants must have principally been Greeks when Sesoftris invaded Asia Minor, if Marsham be right. What is here said of the Asiatic Greeks, is to clear the way for a farther confutation of Marsham, who observes, that if Sesoftris had extended the war into Greece, we should have had clearer lights concerning him, nor would he have been involved so much in obscurity; seeing that the Athenians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians had begun to preserve the memory of things, continuing, that the Greeks were not at this time very regardful of foreign transactions, were unskilful in letters, and that Homer was not yet born, who preceded any Greek historiographer very much: And from hence concludes, that we ought not to wonder that the Egyptian affairs are almost buried in ignorance. To this it is answered, that the Asiatic Greeks were more likely to transmit the history of Sesoftris down to posterity, as being superior and senior in learning to the European; that if they did not immediately keep written records, they undoubtedly preserved very faithful traditions of past occurrence, which they propagated from one generation to another, and particularly in the case of Sesoftris, the monuments of whose conquests they had before their eyes; and if his monarchy descended to his successors, as Marsham thinks it did to the first olympiad; and if Homer was not yet born, it is certain that he must have been born soon after, and whilst the fame and power of this monarchy must have subsisted. In a word, Perizonius prefers the Asiatic before the European Greeks, as to what concerns the remembrance of ancient matters, and proves that the latter received the greatest part of the arts and sciences, nay of their alphabet from the former; observing, that if not all, yet most of the ancientest Greek writers were Asiatics. He continues; Now if Sesoftris invaded Asia Minor after the Grecian settlement there, the Asiatic Greeks, who first of all delivered down the memory of things both in prose and verse, must certainly have known something of this celebrated expedition, either from the writings or the traditions of their forefathers, and have given as just and accurate an account thereof as the European Greeks could have given. But nothing of this appears; for Herodotus, the most ancient of the Greek historians we have, promises to have received the whole story of Sesoftris from the Egyptian priests. He thinks moreover, that supposing Marsham to be in the right, the European Greeks must have had sufficient knowledge of Sesoftris, seeing he carried the war into Asia, and that Lycurgus within an hundred years afterwards must have travelled into Asia, whence he brought over with him the works of Homer. He certainly would have also brought some account with him of so great a victory from the Asiatic Greeks, if it had been obtained only seventy years, or thereabouts before.

2. But, says he, the Greeks alone did not put Sesoftris many ages more backward than Sesac; the Egyptians did it also. Manetho expressly says that Aegyptus and Danaus were only different names for Sethus [Sesoftris] and his brother Armais: Now Danaus came into Greece, as is said, three ages before the Trojan war; and he could borrow this from no Greek author at least that is extant.

3. The sacred history does not favour the opinion of Sesoftris's being Sesac: For by the prophane accounts, Sesoftris, in a continued expedition of nine years, ran over all Asia: But the scripture mentions nothing farther of Sesac, than that he spoiled the temple and the city, and returned back. Josephus says expressly, that he returned into his own country.

4. What Marsham lays of the duration of Sesoftris's monarchy, as that it reached down to Amazias and Uzziah kings of Judah, and down to the beginning of the first olympiad; by the scripture it appears that the kings of Judah after Rehoboam, never served any foreign power, or paid any tribute, till the Assyrians came upon them. So that if Sesoftris and Sihabak be the same as Marsham would have them, it does not appear that the Egyptian monarchy was of any duration; so that here he is also mistaken. So far we have given you the substance of Perizonius against Marsham. We will now insert his opinion as to the times when this conqueror lived.

And concerning this he speaks with great uncertainty and caution. He begins thus; Herodotus declares that king Mæris had not been dead quite 900 years when he was in Egypt. Now the same historian makes Sesoftris the immediate successor of Mæris, and moreover says, that the Trojan war was about 800 years before the time in which he wrote, and

(8) Vid. l. 1. p. 38. & l. xvii. p. 824.
(9) Vid. Politic. vii. 10. (10) l. 4. v. 272.

(11) Apud Photium cod. 53. (12) Geticis c. 6.
(13) l. 1. c. 1. Var. Hist. l. 12. 4.

a compare. Both the Greeks and Egyptians who recorded his actions, whether in prose or verse, differed widely from each other; but they could never differ more, nor sure and that Hercules the son of Alcmena went about 900 years before himself. By this chronology Sesoftris lived about an age before the Trojan war, and was cotemporary with the above-said Hercules, or a little later. So it follows from this computation; but in fact he must have been older, if he was the same with Egyptus, whose brother Danaus was ancestor in the sixth degree to Perseus, who was the great grandfather of Hercules: And from hence he conjectures that Sesoftris may be fixed in the days of the Judges. But, continues he it may be objected that there is not the least mention made of Sesoftris and what he did in holy writ? To this he answers, that the Israelites when Sesoftris came into Palestine, were under subjection to the various nations which inhabited the country; for that Palestine was subdued by Sesoftris, appears plain from Herodotus, who there saw the pillars of ignominy which he used to raise in countries where he met with no resistance. And since the Israelites were not principals in this calamity, they might imagine it not primarily to concern them, but accidentally to have fallen upon them in common with their masters, and therefore took no notice thereof, as thinking it no immediate part of their own history. Add to this, that Sesoftris could make no long stay there, considering that they voluntarily submitted to him, and that he had no less a conquest in his eye than all the eastern parts of the world, if not the whole habitable earth, which required dispatch: And thence he takes occasion to speak in the words of Justin, that though Sesoftris grieved in his conquests, he abstained from empire; and made no change in the government of any country. Finally, he supposes also, that Sesoftris might have come into Palestine when Israel was under the Amorites; and owns, that it is no way important whether Danaus was the brother of Sesoftris; acknowledges what Manetho says on that head, to be calculated to please the Greeks; and in a word concludes, that he has destroyed Sir John Marsham's hypothesis, by proving that Menes is not Hum or Mixraim, or Sesoftris, Shibak (14).

We will now in general terms insert the opinion of Pezron. He teaches, that Sethosis and Sesoftris are one and the same person, and that he was the Egyptus brother to Danaus; that he was a prince widely distant from Sesanchbis, whom he will have to have been the same with Shibak; and that neither Sesanchbis, or Sesunchosis, was Sesoftris, but distinct both from him and from each other. We forbear entering into his reasons, and proceed to another learned man, who has no one notion in common with what has entered into the heads of these three celebrated chronologists (15).

We mean Mr. Whiston, who because he is singular in that he takes this king for the very Pharaoh who perished in the Red-sea, and the very Typhon of the Mythologists, we will give you his own words. And first he premises this proposition. Harmesses Mi-Amoun, or Ramestes the Great, the grandfather of Sesoftris, was king of the Lower-Egypt when Moses was born: Amenophis III, his son was there king after him, during Moses's youth; and Seth-os, or Sethosis, or Sesoftris the Great, the son of Amenophis III, was so during the rest of the servitude of the children of Israel in Egypt; and was that very Pharaoh who perished in the Red-sea. He then offers thirteen reasons or arguments in support of this proposition; but passing over to the tenth of them, he there says, that "the preservation of Moses, and his education by Pharaoh's daughter (16), are very agreeable to what her brother, Amenophis III, did about, or soon after the birth of Moses; I mean, when he called together and educated with his son Sesoftris no fewer than 1700 boys (17), or all the male children that were born in Egypt the same day with him; which might well be in imitation of Thermutis [the daughter of this Pharaoh, who was otherwise called Harmesses Mi-Amoun, or Ramestes the Great] when she drew Moses out of the river, and educated him for her own son (18). And, by the way, if this Thermutis were but as sagacious and learned as her great niece Atyries, the daughter of Sesoftris, is described by Diodorus (19), we shall have no reason to wonder at what St. Stephen informs us, that Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds, even before he received any particular commission from God for the delivery of his people out of Egypt. Nay indeed, these last words concerning Moses, that he was so early mighty in words and in deeds, seem to me to confirm those accounts we have in Artapanus an heathen, and Josephus the Jew, concerning Moses's wife and valiant conduct under the king of Egypt, when he was young, against the Ethiopians; who attempted the conquest of that country at that time. Which successes of these Egyptians under the conduct of Moses, might probably enough encourage king Sesoftris to undertake those other vast expeditions, which raised the Egyptian monarchy, and spread his empire over almost all the then known world. Nor is it impossible to suppose, that the Ethiopic war, which is known to have been undertaken both at sea and land by this Sesoftris, might be when he was young; and might be that very Ethiopic war which was managed by Moses under the king of Egypt, as mentioned by Artapanus and Josephus.

Mr. Whiston's eleventh argument runs thus: "There are evident remains of this Sesoftris's perishing in or near the Red-sea, as did this Pharaoh at the Exodus out of Egypt. Diodorus assures us, that Sesoftris at last became blind; and that he was voluntarily the occasion of his own death; and that he deservedly obtained the admiration of the priests and people of Egypt on account of that his magnanimous death. But what sort of voluntary and magnanimous death this was, it seems the Egyptian priests did not inform him. But then, if we consider that Sesoftris's real or Egyptian name was Seth-os, or Seth-ofis; and that there was an ancient famous Egyptian king, whose fictitious name among the Greeks, was Typhon, the proud; but his real or Egyptian name was no other than Seth, as Plutarch himself, a great master of old Egyptian learning, more than once assures us; that Typho's own city Pelufum was peculiarly the city of this Sesoftris, whither he first came when he returned from his famous eastern expedition; and where he and his queen received a sort of miraculous deliverance from the murderous designs of his brother Armais, and was by the Egyptians called according to his own name Seth-ron; and the Nomos thereto belonging, the Seth-roite Nomos; we shall find that what the Egyptians could not, or would not directly inform

(14) Vid. PERIZON. ubi sup.
PEZRON.

(16) Exod. ii.

(15) Vid.
(17) MARSH.

p. 353. (18) Exod. ii. 10.
lib. i.

(19) Diod. Sicul.

so much as our modern chronologers and historians do in fixing his age, and in speaking concerning him : However, we shall collect the best account we can of his reign.

“ form Diodorus of in the way of plain historical “ fact, and thereby concealed the true manner of “ his death from foreigners ; yet did some of those “ Egyptians preserve the memory of it under ano“ ther form ; and that this Seth, or Seib-os, or “ Seth-osis, or Typho, came to the same end that “ the Egyptian Pharaoh did, and was drowned in “ or near to the same Red-sea. For as they, in “ some places at least, long kept the memory “ of Osiris, the usual name of any beloved king “ of Egypt that was murdered ; as was Isis, the “ usual name of such a king's wife, or queen ;
“ and Typho, the usual name of such a murderer ;
“ so was it here. Osiris seems to have been some “ beloved king that Sesostris had slain [perhaps “ his own brother Ramesses] and himself seems “ thence to have had the hateful name of Typho
“ given him by the other's subjects. And cer“ tainly this name Typho, or the Proud, was ne“ ver applied more fitly than to this Sesostris ;
“ who after his conquest used sometimes to take “ his horses out of his chariot, and to harness “ a certain number of his captive kings, and to “ be drawn in state by them instead of the other.
“ And as to the death of this Typho, the Egyptian “ records are plain and direct, and assures us, that “ he was struck by a Thunderbolt, and his blood “ run out at Heroopolis, a city very near the “ place where the Israelites entered the Red-sea ;
“ the very same, I suppose, that Moses calls by “ its elder name Baalzephon ; that the same city “ was called Blood, or the bloody city, from that “ first shedding of the blood of Typho there ; and “ that he lies drowned under the waters of the lake “ Sirbon, which is not far from the Red-sea ; and “ was anciently supposed to communicate there“ with under ground. The city also itself seems “ to me to have had its later name Heroopolis, “ or the city of Heroes, on this very account, that “ near thereto the most potent Egyptian king, and “ his mighty commanders, with their entire army, “ those great heroes, became martyrs for the “ Egyptian idols, idolatry, and tyranny, in op“ position to the God of Israel and his people :
“ Nor do I meet with any other in history for that “ appellation. And very remarkable it is, how “ exactly all this agrees to the other more direct “ Egyptian account already set down ; viz. That “ Sesostris's death was voluntary and magnani“ mous, and such indeed as was highly extolled “ both by the priests and people of Egypt. And “ what Paulinus in Ausonius could mean, when,
“ in the distinct mention of two of the most il“ lustrious kings of Egypt, Necrops and Sesostris, “ he says of the latter, Et qui regnavit, sine no-
“ mine mox, Sesostris ; That he who had been so “ great a king, was by and by without a name ; un“ less he refer to some such ignominious death “ of his, as we have here described, is hard to “ say. Nor is that thunderbolt, or storm of thun- “ der and lightning, mentioned in this account of “ Typho's destruction, other than what we have “ hinted at in the case of Pharaoh's destruction “ in our present copies of the Pentateuch ; where “ we find, that God looked through the pillar
“ of fire, and of the cloud, and so troubled the hosts “ of the Egyptians, that their chariot wheels were “ taken off, and they drove heavily ; and the Egyp- “ tians resolved to flee from the face of Israel, be“ cause they now perceived that God himself “ fought for them against the Egyptians ; while “ with the blast of his nostrils the waters were ga“ thered together ; and directly set down by Jose- “ phus and Artapanus in the history itself ; and also “ by the psalmist in his celebration of this most “ wonderful deliverance and judgment ; who de“ clares, that besides the pouring out of water “ from the clouds at that time, the skies then sent “ out a sound, and God's arrows went abroad “ that the voice of his thunder was in the heaven ; “ that the lightnings lightened the world ; and that

“ the earth trembled and shook : In exact agree“ ment with the heathens account of the destruc“ tion of Typho.” To conclude ; the same writer “ thinks it a plain solution to the question, of what “ became of the famous Egyptian monarchy after “ the death of Sesostris ? that he and his numerous “ host was lost in the Red-sea, which together with “ the loss of 600,000 slaves, as the Hebrews were “ no better in Egypt, he thinks must have given “ a great shock to the Egyptian power, and natu“ rally ruin their newly acquired monarchy. In a “ word, it is his opinion that the sudden extinc“ tion of this vast monarchy at the death of its “ founder Sesostris, is a demonstration, that he was “ that very Pharaoh who with all his host perished “ in the Red-sea, and no other (20).

The great Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion that Sesostris is the Osiris of the Egyptians, the Bacchus of the Greeks, and the Sesac or Sisibak of the scripture ; towards the proof of which he produces the following arguments :

“ 1. Bacchus the Conqueror loved two women.
“ Venus and Ariadne ; by the last of these he had “ sons who were Argonauts ; therefore the great “ Bacchus flourished but one generation before the “ Argonautic expedition. This Bacchus was po“ tent at sea (21), conquered eastward as far as “ India, returned in triumph, brought his army
“ over the Hellepont ; conquered Thrace, left music, “ dancing, and poetry there ; killed Lycurgus king
“ of Thrace, and Pentheus the grandson of Cad- “ mus ; gave the kingdom of Lycurgus to Tharaps ;
“ and one of his minstrels, called by the Greeks “ Calliope, to Oeagrus the son of Tharaps ; and of “ Oeagrus and Calliope, was born Orpheus who “ sailed with the Argonauts : This Bacchus was “ therefore cotemporary with Sesostris ; and both “ being kings of Egypt and potent at sea, and great “ conquerors, and carrying on their conquests in-
“ to India and Thrace, they must be one and the “ same man.

“ 2. Dicæarchus, as he is cited by the Scholias
“ upon Apollonius (22), represents Osiris and Orus, “ two generations older than Sesostris, saying, that “ after Orus, the son of Osiris and Isis, reigned Se- “ fonchosis. The people of Naxos made Bacchus
“ two generations older than Theseus, and for that “ end feigned two Minos's and two Ariadne's. Now,
“ by the consent of all antiquity, Osiris and Bac- “ chus were one and the same king of Egypt :
“ This is affirmed by the Egyptians as well as by “ the Greeks ; and some of the ancient mytholo“ gists, as Eumolpus and Orpheus (23), called Osiris
“ by the names of Dionysus and Sirius. Osiris was “ king of all Egypt, and a great conqueror, and “ came over the Hellepont in the days of Tripto- “ lemus, and subdued Thrace, and there killed “ Lycurgus ; and therefore his expedition falls in “ with that of the great Bacchus. Osiris, Bacchus, “ and Sesostris lived about the same time, and by “ the relation of historians were all of them kings
“ of all Egypt, and reigned at Thebes, and adorn“ ed that city, and were very potent by land and “ sea :

(20) Vid. WHISTON's Appendix.
HERMIPPUM apud Athenæum, l. 1.

(21) Vid.

(22) ARGONAUT. l. 4. v. 272.
l. 1. p. 7.

(23) DIOD.

■ SESOSTRIS, then is by some thought to have been the son of Amenophis; but who ever was his father, it is said that the god Vulcan appeared to him in a dream, and admonished him that the son which was or should be born to him, “ sea: All three were great conquerers, and carried on their conquests by land through Asia, as far as India: All three came over the Hellepont, and were there in danger of losing their army: All three conquered Thrace, and there put a stop to their victories, and returned back from thence into Egypt: All three left pillars with inscriptions in their conquests: And therefore all three must be one and the same king of Egypt; and this king can be no other than Sesac. All Egypt, including Thebais, Ethiopia and Libya, had no common king before the expulsion of the Shepherds, who reigned in the Lower Egypt; no conqueror of Syria, India, Asia, Minor and Thrace before Sesac; and the sacred history admits of no Egyptian conqueror of Palestine before this king.

“ 3. Bacchus had Libyan women in his army, and they were commended by Minerva, herself a Libyan (24). Diodorus (25) calls her Myrina, and faith, that she was queen of the Amazons in Libya, and there conquered the Atlantides and Gorgons, and then made a league with Orus the son of Isis, sent to her by his father Osiris or Bacchus for that purpose; and passing through Egypt subdued the Arabians, and Syria and Cilicia, and came through Phrygia, viz. in the army of Bacchus, to the Mediterranean; but passing over into Europe was slain with many of her women by the Thracians and Scythians, under the conduct of Sipylus a Scythian, and Mopsus a Thracian, whom Lycurgus king of Thrace had banished. This (says our most sagacious author) was that Lycurgus who opposed the passage of Bacchus over the Hellepont, and was soon after conquered by him and slain: But afterwards Bacchus met with a repulse from the Greeks, under the conduct of Perseus, who slew many of his women, as Pausanias (26) relates, and was assisted by the Scythians and Thracians under Sipylus and Mopsus; which repulses, together with the revolt of his brother Danaus, put a stop to his victories; and in returning home, he left part of his men in Colchis and at Mount Caucasus, under Eetes and Prometheus; and his women upon the river Thermodon near Colchis, under their new Queens Marthesia and Lampeto; for Diodorus (27) speaking of the Amazons who were seated at Thermodon, faith, that they dwelt originally in Libya, and there reigned over the Atlantides, and invading their neighbours, conquered as far as Europe: And Ammianus (29), that the ancient Amazons breaking through many nations, attacked the Asbaniens, and then receiving a great slaughter retired to Thermodon: And Justin (28), that these Amazons had at first, he means at their first coming to Thermodon, two queens who called themselves daughters of Mars; and that they conquered part of Europe, and some cities in Asia, viz. in the reign of Minerva, and then sent back part of their army with a great booty under their said new queens; and that Marthesia being afterwards slain, was succeeded by her daughter Orithya, and she by Penthesilea; and that Theseus captivated and married Antiope the sister of Orithya. Hercules made war upon the Amazons, and in the reign of Orithya and Penthesilea; they came to the Trojan war: Whence the first wars of the Amazons in Europe and Asia, and “ their settling at Thermodon, were but on generation before those actions of Hercules and Theseus, and but two before the Trojan war, and so fell in with the expedition of Sesostris: And since they warred in the days of Isis and her son Orus, and were a part of the army under Bacchus or Osiris, we have here a farther argument for making Osiris and Bacchus contemporary to Sesostris, and all three one and the same king with Sesac.

“ 4. The Greeks reckon Osiris and Bacchus to be sons of Jupiter, and the Egyptian name of Jupiter is Ammon. Minetbo (30) in his eleventh and twelfth dynasties, as he is cited by Africanus and Eusebius, names these four kings as reigning in order; Ammenemes, Gefongeser or Sefonchoris the son of Ammenemes, Ammenemes who was slain by his eunuchs, and Sesostris who subdued all Asia and a part of Europe: Gefongeser and Sefonchoris are corruptly written for Sefonchoris; and the two first of these four kings, Ammenemes and Sefonchoris are the same with the two last Ammenemes and Sesostris, that is, with Ammon and Sesac; for Diodorus faith, that Osiris built a temple at Thebes to his father Jupiter Ammon, who reigned in that city (31): And Thymæstus who was contemporary to Orpheus, wrote expressly that the father of Bacchus was Ammon, a king reigning over part of Lybia; that is, a king of Egypt reigning over that part of Libya anciently called Ammonia: Πάσα ἡ Λιβυή ἡτοῦ ἐκαλεῖτο ἐπὶ Ἀμμωνίου (32). All Libya was called Ammonia from Ammon; that is, that king of Egypt from whom Thebes was called No-Ammon, and Ammon-No, the city of Ammon, and by the Greeks Diospolis, the city of Jupiter Ammon. Here again our author seems to demonstrate that Sesostris and Osiris were the same person.

5. And to corroborate what is said in the preceding article; Sesostris upon his returning home divided Egypt, and this gave a beginning to surveying and geometry: And Jamblichus derives this division of Egypt and the beginning of geometry, from the age of the gods of Egypt. And because Sesostris, or Sesac, to render the Nile more useful, dug canals from it, and thereby made a general distribution of its waters; this chronologer is of opinion, that the river was consecrated to him, and he was called by its names, Agyptus, Siris, Nilus; and observes from Plutarch, that the syllable O, put before the word Siris by the Greeks, made it scarce intelligible to the Egyptians.

6. He thinks it appears “ That Sesostris was also Shishak or Sesac, because the first conquests this king is said to have made were Troglodytica, Lybia, and Ethiopia, and in the first year of Rehoboam, Sesostris [Sesac] came out of Egypt with a great army of Libyans, Troglodytes and Ethiopians, and spoiled the temple, and reduced Judea into servitude, and went on conquering, first eastward towards India, and then westward as far as Thrace; for God had given him the kingdoms of the countries (33). ”

7. There is no one argument on which this great chronologer lays a greater stress for the proof of what he lays down concerning Sesostris, than the following: “ Solon having travelled into Egypt, and conversed with the priests of Sais about their antiquities, wrote a poem of what he had learned, but did not finish it (34); ”

(24) Vid. DIOD. l. 3. p. 140. (25) Lib. 3. p. 131, 132. (26) PAUSAN. lib. 2. c. 20. p. 155. (27) Lib. 3. p. 130. & SCHOL. Apolloni. lib. 2. (28) Lib. 22. c. 8.

(29) Lib. 2. c. 4. (30) See before, p. 229. (31) See before, p. 239. (32) STERN. in Ἀμμωνία (33) 2 Chron. xii. 2, 3, —8. (34) PLAT. in Timæo. & Critia.

would be lord of the whole earth. Full of this vision, he collected all the males in a Egypt born on the same day with his son, and appointed nurses and proper persons to take care of them, persuaded that they who were the constant and equal companions of his sons childhood and youth, would prove his most faithful ministers, and most affectionate fellow-foldiers. They were abundantly furnished with every thing needful, and as they grew up they were by degrees inured to laborious and manly exercises, and were in particular never permitted to taste of any thing till they had performed a course of 180 furlongs, or upwards of 22 miles. By this exercise of the body, and by a proper cultivation of the mind, they were equally fitted to command and to execute whatever they were commanded. Amenophis, after he had been at this vast expence and trouble in laying the foundation of his son's future grandeur, b resolved to give him and his companions an opportunity of displaying the good effects of their institution; and therefore he sent him and them with an army into Arabia. In this expedition the young Sesostris surmounted all the dangers of serpents and venomous creatures, all the wants and hardships of a dry and barren country, and in the end subdued the Arabians, who till that time had never been conquered. His father then ordered him westward, and he subdued the greatest part of Africa, nor stopped his career (as should seem) till he saw the Atlantic ocean*. Whilst he was on this expedition his father died: And having now the reins in his own hands, and being elated by the success which had hitherto attended him, he grasped at no less than universal empire. Or he called to mind the prediction of the god, and prepared for the enterprize. Some reported that his daughter Albyrte, a young lady c of great wit and sagacity, excited him thereto by her counsel, representing it as an easy matter; others, that she received assurances of her father's success by divination, by dreams in temples, and prodigies in the air, and the like; so that according to these, he could be no very young man at this time. Lastly, it was said that he was instructed by Mercury, who gave him counsels proper for carrying on the war*.

HAVING this view of a general conquest, and knowing that he must be long absent, and in countries remote from Egypt, he bethought him how he might retain the hearts and affections of his own people: Wisely foreseeing that it would be the most natural means of preparing those who followed him, to lay down their lives cheerfully in his service; and of preventing those at home from attempting any innovations during his absence. He therefore endeared himself to all his subjects, by largesses in money * DIOD. lib. i. p. 48. * LUCAN. 10. v. 27. * DIOD. ubi sup. p. 49. * JELIAK. Var. Hist. l. 2. c. 4.

“ and this poem fell into the hands of Plato, who relates out of it, that at the mouth of the Straits, near Hercules's Pillars, there was an island called Atlantis, the people of which, nine thousand years before the days of Solon, reigned over Libya as far as Egypt, and over Europe as far as the Tyrrhenus-sea; and all this force collected into one body invaded Egypt and Greece, and whatever was contained within the pillars of Hercules, but were resisted and stopped by the Athenians and other Greeks, and thereby the rest of the nations, not yet conquered were preserved: He saith also, that in those days, the gods, having finished their conquests, divided the whole earth amongst themselves, partly into larger, partly into smaller portions, and instituted temples and sacred rites to themselves; and that the island of Atlantis fell to the lot of Neptune, who made his eldest son Atlas king of the whole island, a part of which was called Gadir; and that in the history of the said wars mention was made of Cecrops, Erechtheus, Erichthonius, and others before Theseus, and also of the women who warred with the men, and of the habit and stature of Minerva, the study of war in those days being common to men and women. By all these circumstances it is manifest that these gods were the Dii magni majorum gentium, and lived between the age of Cecrops and Theseus; and that the wars which Sesostris, with his brother Neptune, made upon the nations by land and by sea, and the resistance he met with in Greece, and the following invasion of Egypt by Neptune, are here described; and how the captains of Sesostris shared their conquests amongst them“ selves, as the captains of Alexander the Great did his conquests long after, and instituting temples and priest and sacred rites to themselves, caused the nations to worship them after their death as gods: And that the island Gadir or Gades, with all Libya, fell to the lot of him who after death was deified by the name of Neptune. The time therefore when these things were done, is by Solon limited to the age of Neptune the father of Atlas; for Homer tells us, that Ulysses presently after the Trojan war found Calypso the daughter of Atlas in the Ogygian island, perhaps Gadir, and therefore it was but two generations before the Trojan war. This is that Neptune who with Apollo or Orus fortified Troy with a wall, in the reign of Laomedon the father of Priamus, and left many natural children in Greece, some of which were Argonauts, and others were contemporaries to the Argonauts; and therefore he flourished but one generation before the Argonautic expedition, and by consequence about 400 years before Solon went into Egypt: But the priests of Egypt in those 400 years had magnified the stories and antiquity of their gods to exceedingly, as to make them 9000 years older than Solon, and the island Atlantis bigger than all Africa and Asia together, and full of people; and because in the days of Solon this great island did not appear, they pretended that it was sunk into the sea with all its people: So great was the vanity of the priests of Egypt in magnifying their antiquities.” (35) These are the most obvious and direct arguments concerning Sesostris, which we meet with in Sir Isaac Newton.

(35) The chronology of ancient kingdoms, &c. p. 228.

- a money, by donations in land, or by the remission of punishments: He discharged all who were charged with treason without inquiry, and paid the debts of all that were thereby incumbered, of which he had many in his army. In fine, he wrought upon the minds of all by fair and familiar deportment. In the next place, he divided the whole kingdom into thirty six nomes or provinces; assigned a governor to each of them; and constituted his brother Armais supreme regent, investing him with ample power; but forbade him the use of his diadem, and commanded him to be observant to the queen and her children, and to abstain from the royal concubines. Having thus settled the government, he picked out the choicest of his subjects, out of whom he formed an army equal to the vastness of his designs, and bestowed the chief commands in it on his beloved companions, who were upwards of 1700 in number. As an earnest of his benevolence, and besides the favours he had bestowed on them in common with the rest of their countrymen, and that he and his successors might always have a regular force ready at hand, he settled certain districts by lot, of the most fertile land in Egypt, on his army; whence a comfortable income arising to them, neither they nor their posterity might lie under the necessity of seeking a livelihood by mercantile or mechanic callings, but wholly apply themselves to military exercises. His army consisted of 600,000 foot, 24,000 horse, and 27,000 warlike chariots. He first marched into Ethiopia, and reduced the inhabitants, obliging them to pay a tribute of ebony, gold, and ivory. He is generally believed to have been the first conqueror of Ethiopia and Troglodytica, and is said to have reached the promontory of Dira, near the streights of the Red-sea, where he set up a pillar with an inscription on it in sacred characters; and went on as far as the country where cinnamon grows, or at least some place from whence cinnamon was brought, where he raised monuments and pillars with inscriptions, which were to be seen many ages afterwards.

- His land forces alone were not answerable to the conquest he intended; and therefore breaking through the ancient superstition of the Egyptians, he was the first of their kings who fitted out fleets of tall ships. He had two; the one of 400 sail in the Arabian Gulph, if we may credit Diodorus who gives us this number, and Herodotus who mentions the same fleet in general terms; and the other in the Mediterranean sea, if we believe Manetho, by Sethosis designed Sesostris. By these naval armaments, and by the great services they are said to have done, it should seem that Sesostris took away the aversion the Egyptians had to sea affairs at least for a time, and instituted the order of sailors as he did the military order. But to have done with this conjecture, we shall only add, that the spacious and magnificent ship he consecrated to the supreme god of the Thebans, looks as if he designed to bring navigation into credit in Egypt. With the first of these fleets he sailed out of the Arabian Gulph into the Red or Indian-sea, and subdued the coasts thereof, and continuing his course till he was stopped by certain shoals and difficult places, returned back to Egypt: Or according to another author, he went not on board himself, but sent them out to reduce the islands and maritime places of the continent as far as India. With his Mediterranean squadron he conquered Cyprus, the sea coast of Phoenicia, and several of the Cyclades. This is what we know concerning his exploits be sea.

- Now as to his further conquests on the land; it is by almost all antiquity agreed that he over-ran and pillaged all Asia, and some part of Europe. He crossed the Ganges, on the banks of which river he erected pillars; and did the same in the mountains of India; indeed he is said to have marched on till he was stopped by the ocean eastward. From thence returning he invaded the Scythians and Thracians; but the accounts of his war with the former, do not agree in giving him a complete conquest over them. Herodotus, Diodorus, Agathias Scholasticus, and others represent him victorious; but some relate, that he met with a repulse, and fled from the Scythians, and was worsted by the Colchians. For Justin tells us, that Vexores or Sesostris dispatching heralds to summon the Scythians to surrender, they sent back his messengers with contempt, and defiance, and immediately took up arms. Sesostris being informed that they were advancing towards him by hasty marches, suddenly faced about, and fled from them, leaving all his baggage and warlike apparel to the pursuers, who followed him till they came on the borders of Egypt<sup>a</sup>. Pliny relates, <sup>a</sup> that he was overthrown by the king of Colchis<sup>b</sup>; and Valerius Flaccus insinuates that he was repulsed with great slaughter, and put to flight in these parts<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 50. <sup>q</sup> MANETH. apud Joseph. contra Appion. l. 1. p. 1041. <sup>r</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. <sup>s</sup> Vid. STRABO, lib. 16. p. 769, 770. Vid etiam lib. 17, p. 790. PLIN. Hist. Nat. lib. 6. c. 29. <sup>t</sup> Ubi supr. <sup>u</sup> Ubi supra. <sup>v</sup> Apud Joseph. contra Appion, ubi supr. <sup>x</sup> See before, p. 257. <sup>y</sup> See before, ibid. <sup>z</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>1</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. <sup>2</sup> MANETH. apud Joseph. contra Appion. ubi supr. <sup>3</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 51. <sup>4</sup> DIONYS. in Peric. v. 625. <sup>5</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 50. <sup>6</sup> Lib. 2. p. 55.

BUT whatever success he had in these countries, it is a common opinion that he settled a colony in Colchis, though Herodotus, whom we chiefly rely on in this matter, does not decide whether it was of his own planting, or whether part of his army tired out, loitered in the rear, and voluntarily sat down on the banks of the river Phasis in that kingdom. He says, from his own experience, that the inhabitants were undoubtedly of Egyptian descent, as was visible from the personal similitude they bore to the Egyptians, who were swarthy and frizzle-haired; but more especially from the conformity of their customs, particularly circumcision, and from the affinity of their language with that of Egypt. And many ages afterwards at Æt, the capital of Colchis, they shewed maps of their journies, and the bounds of sea and land for the use of travellers<sup>d</sup>, and hence came geography. This relation to each other was acknowledged on both sides<sup>e</sup>.

Supposed to settle a colony in Colchis.

His pillars and statues.

WE now attend upon him into Thrace, the utmost boundary of his progress westward in Europe. Here he was in danger of losing his army through want of provisions and the difficulty of the passes; and therefore he here stopped his progress<sup>f</sup>. But the more probable opinion is, that his return was hastened by advice he received from the high priest of Egypt, concerning his brother's revolt and disobedience<sup>g</sup>. However this was, his pillars were no where to be seen in Europe beyond Thrace<sup>h</sup>. For it was his custom to set up pillars in every country he conquered, with this inscription, or one to the like effect; Sesostris king of kings, and lord of lords, subdued this country by the power of his arms. If the nation had ignobly crouched to him, he, besides the inscription, caused the privities of a woman to be carved, as a mark of their effeminacy and baseness<sup>i</sup>; if they had defended themselves bravely, their pillars bore the distinction of the contrary sex, in testimony of their courage<sup>j</sup>. Besides these he left statues of himself behind him, two of which were still to be seen, as we are told by Herodotus, the one on the road between Ephesus and Phocæa, and the other between Smyrna and Sardis: They were armed after the Ethiopian and Egyptian manner, were five palms high, and held a javelin in one hand, and a bow in the other. Across the breast they had a line from one shoulder to the other, on which there was this inscription; This region I obtained by these my shoulders. They were vulgarly mistaken for images of Memnon<sup>k</sup>.

Return to Egypt.

UPON advice therefore of the rebellious proceedings of his brother, who encouraged by his long absence and great distance, had assumed the diadem, violated the queen, and taken to himself the royal concubines<sup>l</sup>, he hastened from Thrace, and at the end of nine years came to Pelusium, attended by an infinite multitude of captives of all nations, and laden with the spoils of Asia<sup>m</sup>. Here the rebel Armaïs or Danaus received him with outward submission and joy, but with an inward design to take away his life, and root out his family. Accordingly he invited the king his brother, the queen, and her children to a banquet he had prepared for their refreshment, which they accepting, and drinking very freely, were overcome thereby, and betook them to rest. In the mean time he caused a great quantity of dried reeds to be laid all round the apartment where they slept, and setting fire thereto he hoped to burn them all together. Sesostris perceiving the danger he was in, and that his guards, overcharged with liquor, were heavy and incapable to assist him, lifted up his hands, and imploring the gods in behalf of his wife and children, rushed through the flames, and they followed him. In the thanksgiving for this wonderful deliverance, and to perform the vows he had made in his extremity, he presented donations to several gods, and particularly to Vulcan<sup>n</sup>, as will be observed hereafter. Herodotus <sup>f</sup> seems to have been misinformed in the particulars of this happy escape; saying, that his wife persuaded him to lay two of his sons across the fire, and to tread over them. He then took revenge on his brother Armaïs<sup>o</sup>, who is said to have been the Danaus of the Greeks<sup>p</sup>, and is thought to have been now driven out from Egypt, and to have withdrawn into Greece.

His works.

THE publick works of Sesostris were of three sorts; religious, military, and civil. And first he erected a temple in every city in Egypt, which he dedicated to the peculiar and a supreme deity of each place. In the course of so universal an undertaking as this no Egyptian was set to work ; and therefore upon all these temples there was this inscription : Built without the labour of a native *. In the city of Memphis, before the temple of Vulcan, he raised six gigantic statues, each of which was of one stone ; two were 30 cubits high, representing himself and his wife ; the other four were 20 cubits, and represented his four sons †. These he dedicated to Vulcan, in remembrance of his and his family's preservation at Pelusium ‡. Many ages afterwards it was said, that Darius would have placed his own statue above this of Sesostris ; but the priest of Vulcan stiffly opposed it, urging that the Persian, though great, had not yet equalled the Egyptian, and particularly had never conquered Stybia ; and that therefore it was unjust to prefer him to one he had not yet excelled, and thereby checked the attempt. He moreover raised two obelisks of 120 cubits high ; with inscriptions, which described the greatness of his power, the amount of his revenues, and the nations he conquered. These are such of his works as may be said particularly to commemorate his own piety and glory. Let us now take a view of what he did for the benefit and lasting welfare of his people.

<sup>a</sup> Lib. 2. c. 3. <sup>b</sup> Lib. 33. c. 3. <sup>c</sup> ARGONAUT. l. 5. v. 420. <sup>d</sup> APOLLON. Rhod. Argon. l. 4. v. 272. <sup>e</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>f</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 51. <sup>g</sup> MANETH. apud Joseph. contra Appion, ubi supr. <sup>h</sup> HEROD. DIOD. ubi supr. <sup>i</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>j</sup> Vid. SYNCCELL. p. 59. 60. <sup>k</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>l</sup> MANETH. ubi supr. <sup>m</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>n</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 53. <sup>o</sup> Ubi supr. <sup>p</sup> MANETH. ubi supr.

In order to prevent the incursions of the Syrians and Arabians, he fortified the east side of Egypt with a wall, which ran from Pelusium through the desert to Heliopolis, 1500 furlongs, or 187 miles and a half. He moreover raised an incredible number of vast and lofty mounts of earth, to which he removed such towns as had before too low a situation, to secure the men and cattle from the dangers of the Nile, to which in its inundations they stood exposed. All the way from Memphis to the sea he dug canals which branched out from the Nile, and not only gave an easy communication from one place to another, and greatly advanced the trade of the kingdom ; but also rendered the country impassable to an enemy, or at least very inconvenient and difficult. So that Egypt, which had hitherto been famous for her horses and chariots, and was admirably well adapted for either, was now no longer the same place in those respects, but put on quite a new face *. In the mean time it is said that some of the captives grew desperate under the intolerable hardships imposed on them, and that particularly the Babylonians resolved at all hazards to shake off their bondage. They seized upon a considerable fortress, and acting offensively against the Egyptians, wasted the country round about them. But on the offer of pardon, and a place for their dwelling, they were pacified, and built them a city which they called Babylon : The like is said of the Trojan captives †. According to Herodotus there was a report that this king, after he returned from his wars, divided the land equally amongst all the Egyptians : But as this is inconsistent with what has been said of the lands he bestowed on his army before his irruption ; which we take to be more conformable to the policy of this warlike prince, we therefore are inclined to think that as to this Herodotus was misinformed. The same author upon this occasion says ; that the king reserving to himself a small rent out of the lands so divided, whenever it happened that the waters of the Nile in their retreat washed away any part of a person's ground, he gave information thereof to the king, who in such case remitted a proportionable part of the rent, and by sending surveyors to measure it, brought to perfection the science of geometry ‡.

His behaviour towards the conquered princes who waited on him with their tribute, was most remarkably insolent ; for upon certain occasions he would unharness his horses, and yoke kings together, and make them draw his chariot † : This practice he continued, as is said, till one day, observing that one of the kings who drew him looked with great steadfastness back on one of the wheels, he asked what took up his thoughts that he kept his eye so fixed on this object ? He answered, Ob king, the going round of the wheel calls to my mind the vicissitudes of fortune ; for as every part of the wheel is uppermost and lowermost by turns, so it is with men, who one day sit on a throne, and on the next are reduced to the vilest degree of slavery. This answer brought the insulting conqueror to his senses, so that he gave over the practice, and treated them with great humanity. At length he lost his sight, and in the end laid violent hands on himself. § The manner of his death was extolled by the priests into the highest act of magnanimity ¶ ; and that nothing might be wanting to make his history completely glorious, they reported that the phoenix came to Thebes during his reign †. By what has been here said concerning Sesostris, it may be gathered that he was the first who divided Egypt into nomes, and its inhabitants into orders and classes ; that he was the first Egyptian king who was considerable at sea; and that he erected the first great empire in the world. Justin however says he neither aimed at it, nor kept it, being contented with the bare glory of the conquest he made<sup>a</sup>. But all are not of his opinion.

* DIOD. ubi supr. p. 51, 52. † HEROD. ubi supr. * DIOD. ubi supr. p. 53. ‡ HEROD. ubi supr. § DIOD. ubi supr. 52. ¶ Idem ibid. * HEROD. ubi supr. † DIOD. ubi supr. p. 53. PLIN. lib. 33. c. 3. * DIOD. ubi supr. ‡ TACIT. Ann. 6. p. 154.

Pheron or Sesostris II.

PERON was the son of Sesostris, and succeeded him. He is also stiled Sesoosis, [Sesostris] II. The story of his reign, as it is handed down to us, favours more of fiction than of truth. He performed nothing in the military way; but had the misfortune, in common with his father, to be struck blind. Though this might be properly owing to some infirmity derived from his parent, yet is it reported that his loss of sight was a punishment inflicted on him for his impiety towards the river. For upon a time that the Nile had overflowed the country to an unusual height, a gale of wind arose and greatly disturbed the waters, whereat he capriciously took offence and insolently darted a javelin among the waves. Upon this he was immediately seized with a pain in his eyes, and soon after by a total darkness, which oppressed him for ten years. In the eleventh year the oracle at Butus declared that the term of his affliction was elapsed, and that his sight would return to him if he paid particular devotions to the god at Heliopolis, and washed his eyes with the urine of a woman who had never known any man besides her husband. He began with his own wife, but receiving no benefit from her, went on from one woman to another, till at length a poor gardener's wife afforded him the relief the oracle had promised. Her therefore he made queen; but as for the adulteresses he sent them to a city called Erythibolus, which, together with them he burnt. He paid his vows to the gods in several rich donations, and particularly raised two magnificent obelisks in the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis<sup>b</sup>.

Amasis or Ammosis, a tyrant.

MANY ages after the sceptre fell into the hands of AMASIS or AMMOSIS. He oppressed his people with the utmost violence and injustice. Many he condemned to death without a cause; many he deprived of their possessions, upon no other motive than his own imperious will, and towards all he behaved with insupportable arrogance. Under this oppression they groaned for a while, not daring to resist so dreadful a power. But in time Atifanes king of Ethiopia made war against Ammosis, and entering Egypt the people joined him, and assisted to drive their unnatural prince d from the throne<sup>c</sup>.

The expulsion of the shepherds.

BUT before we proceed in the history of Atifanes, we must observe that a king, whose name nearly approaches that of Ammosis, blocked up the shepherds in the city of Abaris or Pelusium with an army of 480,000 men; but despairing, as is said, to carry the place by siege, he made a capitulation with them, by which it was agreed that they should go out of Egypt, and march which way they pleased without molestation (1). This article they executed, and went away with their families to the number of 240,000, and taking the way of the desert entered Syria, but fearing the Affyrians they built them a strong city in Judaea called Jerusalem. This favours the opinion of those who take the shepherds to have been the Israelites themselves; but the Egyptian history being hitherto, and for a considerable time to come, involved in the thickest darkness, we shall only say that this is confessedly a contradiction to the history of Moses, by whom it plainly appears that these shepherds could not be the Israelites, and him we choose to confide in. This king is called Amosis, Thummosis, Tetbmosis, Tbmosis, and Themosis, the son of Halispbragmuthosis. One Amosis is also said to have abolished the custom of sacrificing men to Juno at Heliopolis, and instead of them to have substituted waxen images. They were examined and sealed like pure calves, and were called Typhonians<sup>e</sup>. Three of them were burnt in a day, and their ashes were scattered abroad so as to be no more seen, and this publicly every year during the dog-days. This is said to have been done at the city of Idithya<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Lib. 1. c. 1. <sup>b</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. DIOD. ubi supr. <sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>d</sup> JOSEPH. contra Appion. l. 1. p. 352, &c. <sup>e</sup> MANETHO apud Porph. de abst. l. 2. c. 55.

(1) We have already observed, that Perizonius reckons what is called the expulsion of the shepherds, and the Exodus of the children of Israel, to be one and the same event (1).

Sir John Narsham is of a quite different opinion, but decides nothing (2).

Father Pezron says nothing of the expulsion of the shepherds in particular, but thinks he has sufficiently proved that the Israelites went out of Egypt under Moses in the reign of Themosis, the same who is said to have expelled the shepherds (3).

Sir Isaac Newton places this expulsion in the year 1070 before CHRIST, or 62 years before the first expedition of Sesostris or Sesac, as he calls him, into Africa (4).

(1) Vid. PERIZ. ubi supr. ubi supr.

(2) MARSH.

ISAAC NEWTON'S short chronology.

(3) PEZRON. ubi supr. (4) Sir

- a As to the 200,000 shepherds which we are told came from Jerusalem to assist the leprous Egyptians under Osarsiphus, and the wars they were engaged in with Amenophis king of Egypt, we refer our reader to Josephus against Appion, not knowing where to give a place to these transactions in the course of the Egyptian history. To this we rather incline, because Josephus arraigns the whole story as fabulous<sup>a</sup>.

WE now return to ACTISANES who united Egypt and Ethiopia under him, and <sup>Actisanes the</sup> was the king of both. He used his prosperity with great moderation and prudence, <sup>Ethiopian.</sup> and behaved affectionately towards his new subjects. He caused a general search to be made after the Egyptian thieves and robbers, and giving them a just hearing, commanded the guilty to have their noses cut off, and sent them away to the remotest

- b part of the desert between Syria and Egypt, where he built them a town which was called Rhinocolura, from the disfigurement of its infamous inhabitants. This part was so barren, that it scarce afforded any one necessary of life; for even the few wells and ponds there found were brackish, bitter and most unpleasant to the palate. Hither he banished them, that they might not injure their honest neighbours by living among them, nor be hid in corners among the innocent. But as frightful and barren as their situation was, necessity, the mother of invention, suggested a means to them of supplying themselves with food; for it is reported, that they made long nets of slit reeds, and with them caught great numbers of quails which came in flocks from the sea-shore; and of these they had barely sufficient to live upon<sup>a</sup>.

- c ACTISANES died, and the Egyptians were left to their own disposal; and there- <sup>Mendes or</sup> fore they chose them a king, named by some MENDES, and by others MARUS, <sup>Marius</sup> He is celebrated for the sepulchral labyrinth he built. It was not so admirable for its extent as for its inimitable contrivance, which was so intricate and perplexing that it was impossible to find the way out but by the help of a most experienced guide<sup>a</sup>.

AFTER Mendes there ensued an inter-regnum for five generations. At length <sup>Proteus is</sup> a Memphite of obscure birth was chosen king. His Egyptian name was CETES, <sup>chosen king.</sup> which the Greeks rendered PROTEUS (K). Both Herodotus and Diodorus make his reign fall in with the Trojan war. The priests gave him out for one skilled in the weather, or a magician, and pretended he could assume any shape or form he pleased,

- d even that of fire. This fable, as it was told by the Greeks, drew its origin from a custom among the Egyptians (and perhaps introduced by Proteus) who were wont to adorn and distinguish the heads of their kings with the representations of animals or vegetables, or even with burning incense, as ensigns of royalty, and to strike the beholders with dread and superstition<sup>a</sup>. Whilst Proteus reigned, Paris or Alexander was driven on the coasts of Egypt by a storm, and there landed with Helen, whom he was carrying from Greece to Troy. But when he heard the perfidious breach of hospitality this young man had committed, he seized upon him, his mistresses, and his companions, with all the riches he had brought away with him from Greece. As for Helen and her husband's effects, he detained them, promising to restore
- e both to the injured party whenever demanded, and so he did; but Paris and his companions he commanded to depart out of his dominions in three days, upon pain of being treated as enemies. In fine, he had a very rich and sumptuous temple erected to him at Memphis, and left a son and successor behind him called Rhemphus<sup>a</sup>.

- RHEMPHIS* is also called RHAMPSINITUS (L), and had a strong inclination to hoard <sup>Rhemphus or</sup> up money. Diodorus reports him to have been so sordidly avaritious, that during <sup>Rhampsinitus</sup> his whole reign he rather acted the part of a mean-spirited steward than of a king; and never could find in his heart to be at the least expence in any thing that might tend either to the honour of the gods, or the good of men; and that to this retentiveness it was owing that he left so immense a treasure behind him, no less than
- f 400,000 talents<sup>a</sup>. Now Herodotus sufficiently insinuates that he was fond of riches;

<sup>a</sup> JOSEPHUS ubi supr.    <sup>a</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 55.    <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. See before, p. 193.    <sup>a</sup> Idem p. 56
<sup>a</sup> HERON. ubi supr.    <sup>a</sup> DIOD. ubi supr.

(K) According to Perizonius Proteus was the Sethos of Manetho and the Typhon of the poets. He thinks that Homer's Proteus and this king are the same; and that he was stiled a sea-god, because he had commanded the coasts of Egypt. He gives no credit to Herodotus as to the arrival of Paris and Helen under this king, because that is not consistent with his hypothesis (1).

Sir Isaac Newton, on the contrary, seems to give credit to Herodotus as far as relates to Paris and Helen, but makes him cotemporary with Amenophis, who, as we have already observed, he makes the same with Menes. He thinks he might have been governor of some part of the Lower Egypt under Amenophis; and observes, that Homer places him on the sea-coast, and calls him the servant of Neptune, and that his Greek name signifies only a prince or president (2).

(L) Sir John Mayham is inclined to think him the eldest son of Sesofstris, and to be the same with Rampses,

(1) Vid PERIZON. ubi supr.    (2) Sir ISAAC NEWTON. Chronol. of anc. kingdoms amended T t t    but but does not speak of him as sunk to so wretched a degree of baseness as this. Let us <sup>a</sup> hear what he says. Rhampsinitus added the western portico to the temple of Vulcan, and erected two statues before it, each 25 cubits high; one of them faced towards the north, and was adored by the Egyptians under the title of Summer; the other looked towards the south, and went by the name of Winter, and was abhorred. Moreover, he had accumulated a far greater wealth than any king of Egypt that succeeded him; and being desirous to deposite it in some secure place, commanded a treasure-house to be firmly built for that purpose. The architect employed in this work, placed one of the stones in so artful a manner that it might be taken out and put in again by one man only, it being his intention to participate with his prince in the riches of the place. But about the time that the treasure was lodged in it, this <sup>b</sup> man fell into a violent sickness; and finding himself at the point of death, sent for his two sons. To them he declared the whole artifice, and gave them the most exact directions in the management of the business which he foresaw would never be his fate to accomplish. The father died, and the young men went to the treasury, and finding every thing to be as their father had told them, they gained an easy admittance and robbed the king to a considerable value; and this they repeated every night. Some time after Rhampsinitus went in to view his heaps, and was surprized to find a visible diminution of them; and the more, because his seal was whole on the door, the only part of the building that could give entrance. The two brothers continued their nightly pillages, till the king after two or three surveys was perfectly sensible that some how or other his wealth suffered a successive decrease. And <sup>c</sup> now convinced that some body must do this, he ordered snares to be laid all round the vessels which held his money. The Brethren failed not to come at night, and taking out the stone, one of them went in, and going up to a vessel full of silver was immediately ensnared. Under this surprize he called to his brother who stood without, and earnestly besought him to come in to him and cut off his head, that so he might save his own life, and effectually prevent the discovery of their intrigue. The brother perceiving the reasonableness of this request, went in and did as he was desired, and putting the stone in its place again, took the head away with him. Early the next morning the king came in to see the event of his project, but was <sup>d</sup> quite astonished to find a man caught without a head. He went out again in great confusion of thought, but however directed that the body should be hung on the outside of the wall and exposed to publick view; charging the guard appointed to take care of it, that they should make a narrow inspection into the countenances of all spectators, and in whomsoever they perceived signs of sorrow and mourning to bring such person into his presence. When the mother of the deceased heard that the body was exposed in this manner, she was distracted with grief, and upbraiding her surviving son, threatened that if he did not procure her his brother's body, and bring it home, she would let the king know who had robbed his treasury. The young man did his utmost to bring her to some temper, by remonstrating to her the impossibility of gratifying her in her request; but to no purpose; for she persisted still <sup>e</sup> in her threats. Therefore finding that something must be contrived, he consulted how he must succeed in such an enterprize; and at length loading his asses with skins of wine, he drove them towards the place where the body hung up. Having reached the guard, he privately opened some of the skins, and as soon as the wine poured down he struck himself upon the head, and counterfeited the trouble and consternation of a person utterly undone. In the mean time the soldiers upon duty ran to the asses with pots, to save as much of the liquor as they could for themselves; which he seeing, fell on them with the most bitter reproaches, and reviled them for Rampses; and this he advances, on the authority of Manetho who calls him the son of Setos: He thinks also that the famous inscription which was interpreted to Cæsar Germanicus at Thebes, related to him; and indeed there is no very great difference between the Rhampses of Tacitus and the Rampses of Manetho. In fine, that he enjoyed by right what his father had obtained by conquest (1).

Perizonius supposes that the Rhampses of Tacitus is Sesostris himself. But Ramestes or Rhampsinitus, the son of Protus, he makes cotemporary with the Trojan war, in which he is supported by a passage from Pliny (2).

Sir Izaak Newton conjectures him to have been the son of Amenophis or Menes, and to be intended by the different names of Rhampsinitus, Rampses, Ramises, Ramefes, Ramestes, Ramestis, Rhampses and Rhempsis; and that the obelisk which was sent to Rome by the emperor Constantius, with an inscription interpreted by Hermapion an Egyptian priest, expressing that he was long-lived and reigned over a great part of the earth, as also that pompous intercription mentioned by Tacitus, belonged to him (3).

(1) Vid. MARSH. ubi. supr.

(2) PERIZ. ubi. supr.

(3) Sir ISAAC NEWT. ubi. supr.
the

a the pleasure they took in his misfortune, instead of giving him their assistance : But they speaking him fair, he pretended by degrees to be pacified, and leading his affes out of the way, feigned to be very busy in securing the remainder of his wine. Whilst he was doing this the guards stood about him, and laughing and joking with him, he at last consented to give them a skin of wine ; and they in return for so great a favour pressed him to stay and take a part of it with them. He did so, and when this skin was emptied he gave them another ; so that by excessive drinking the whole guard were overcome, and fell into a deep sleep. Then it was that watching his opportunity, and perceiving it to be dead of night, he went to the body, and taking it down, laid it across an ass ; and shaving the right cheek of each b of the soldiers in derision, went away with the body and carried it home to his mother. The news of this was matter of additional wonder to the king, who, that he might find out the person who had done it, bethought him of the following expedient. He ordered his daughter to prostitute herself in a certain apartment of the palace to all comers promiscuously ; but under this restriction, that she should previously extort from each of them a confession of the most ingenious intrigue he had ever managed, and the most wicked crime he had ever committed. His daughter obeyed, and did as she was instructed ; and when the thief heard of this extraordinary procedure, he resolved to perplex the king still farther. With this view he took the arm of a newly-dead body, under his cloak, and went in to the king's c daughter. She examined him in the same form, and to the same purpose as the rest who had been with her before him ; and in return, he frankly confessed, that the most wicked action of his life was the cutting off his brother's head when ensnared in the treasury ; and that the most ingenious thing he had ever done, was the stealing the body from the guard who were appointed to keep it. She then offered to lay hold on him ; which he perceiving, held out the dead arm to her ; which she grasping, he ran out, and by the favour of the night made his escape. Rhampsinitus's rage was now converted into an admiration of the boldness and ingenuity of the man ; and therefore he caused it to be proclaimed in every city, that if the person, who:ver he was, would discover himself, he should not only be pardoned, d but also largely rewarded. The young man confiding in this, went directly to the palace, and made himself known. In the end the king gave him his daughter in marriage, accounting him far superior in wisdom to any man then living upon earth. Our authors does not warrant every particular of this story.

AFTER this it was pretended that Rhampsinitus descended alive into the infernal Rhampsinitus regions, where he played at dice with Ceres, but did not either win nor lose ; and that at his departure she presented him with a golden bowl. The space between his descent and return was observed with great solemnity by the Egyptians many ages afterwards. And now that we may conclude the history of this king with some air of truth and probability, he reigned with great prudence and justice, and was a constant and strict observer of the good order, which, till his death, had without interruption subsisted throughout the kingdom from its first foundation <sup>goes down to hell.</sup>.

THIS king was succeeded by seven others, all of whom performed so little, that Nilus. even their names are not recorded except one, called NILUS. He is celebrated for the canals he dug thro'out the country, and for his endeavours to make the Nile as universally serviceable as possible. Whence it was that the river which had been hitherto called Ægyptus, was thenceforward called after his name <sup>1</sup>.

CHEOPS, CHEMMIS OR CHEMBES, (M) is by Diodorus reckoned the eighth from Cheops, Rhampsinitus. Herodotus places no distance between them. This king is branded for Chemmis or his impiety and tyranny. He began his reign with shutting up the temples, and for-Chembes, a bidding all public sacrifices. And thus trampling on the laws and invading the liber-<sup>tyrant,</sup>ties of his people, reduced them to a state of most ignominious slavery. Great numbers he sent to dig in the quarries among the mountains of Arabia, and to transport them into Egypt <sup>2</sup> : And harrassed them in the end, in raising the largest of the three great pyramids <sup>3</sup>. By this, and other vain-glorious works of the same kind, he was reduced so low, that he exposed his daughter as a common prostitute ; telling her in general terms to earn what she could. She obeyed, and by her father's example desiring to perpetuate her memory, required each of her gallants only to contribute a

<sup>1</sup> HEROD. l. 2. <sup>2</sup> DIOD. ubi supr. p. 57. <sup>3</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>4</sup> Idem ibid. & DIOD. ubi supr. See before, p. 184.

(M) Sir Isaac Newton suspects that he intended to be worshipped himself after death ; and supposes that he was also called Chemmis, Phiope, Apatbus, Apappus, Suphis, Saaphis, Syphoas, Syphaasis, Sorphis, Syphuris, Anosphis, and Anosis.

stone towards a building she had in view. With the stones so collected, she built a small pyramid. * This tyrant reigned fifty years and died *.

Cephrenes,
Cephren, or Chabryis a tyrant.

HE was succeeded by CEPHRENES, CEPHREN or CHABRYIS. It was doubted whether Cephren and Chabryis were one and the same person; some saying that Cephren was the brother, and that Chabryis was the son of Cheops. But leaving this obscure controversy, let us proceed; this king trod in the foot-steps of his predecessor, particularly in building a pyramid; but it fell much short of the former. He reigned fifty six years. Though both he and his predecessor designed these pyramids for their eternal mansions, to use the Egyptian phrase, yet neither of them were deposited in them after death: Dreading what the rage of the multitude might prompt them to, their friends buried them where no body could ever find them.

Mycerinus or Cherinus, a good prince.

AFTER Egypt had been thus afflicted by tyranny for one hundred and six years, MYCERINUS or CHERINUS (N) the son of Cheops, a serene and merciful prince, ascended the throne. Abhorring the impiety and injustice of his father and his uncle, he opened the temples, revived the ancient sacrifices, and left the miserable people to the pursuit of their private affairs. His clemency is reported to have been such, that if at any time complaint was made to him of a severe decree pronounced in matter of property, he would repair the defendant, out of his own treasure *. Whilst he was thus intent upon the happiness of his people, a heavy misfortune fell upon him, in the death of his daughter. He mourned her with much sorrow, and honoured her with an extraordinary monument: For causing an hollow image of a cow to be made and richly gilt with gold, he therein deposited her body. This cow was exposed in a magnificent chamber of the palace in the city of Sais; where they burned most exquisite odours by day, and illuminated the place by night with lamps; in a room contiguous to this, were twenty naked images of women, which the priests of Sais reported to have been the concubines of Mycerinus. But, as it generally happens in cases of remote antiquity, this was not the only report that was spread concerning this cow and these statues. A story went that Mycerinus falling in love with his daughter, despoiled her; whereupon she fell into a deep melancholy and hanged herself. The twenty naked statues in the next room, said they, were her women who had been instrumental in betraying her to her father's unnatural lust, and therefore had their hands cut off by the queen. They appeared indeed without hands; and our author, who was an eye witness of these things, tells us they were dropped off with age, and lay scattered upon the floor. He tells us also that the cow was in a kneeling posture, and as big as the largest living cow. Its neck and head were richly laid over with gold, and between the horns there was a golden circle in imitation of the sun, and its body had a fine Tyrian carpet thrown over it. This sepulchral image was removed once a year from the apartment where it stood, and exposed to the open day, in pursuance of a request the deceased made to her father, that she might behold the sun once every year.

The oracle at Butus declares him to be short lived.

Now to return whence we digressed; the death of his daughter was not the only misfortune that befel Mycerinus; a more dreadful one ensued: For it was declared by the oracle at Butus, that he had but six years to live, and that in the seventh he should certainly die. At this he was greatly troubled, and sent to expostulate with the oracle, and remonstrated, that since his father and uncle, who had been monsters of impiety and cruelty, had been blessed with great length of days, it would be ungrateful to requite his piety and humanity by the execution of so rigid a sentence. To this it was answered; That his father and uncle knew the decree of fate which had condemned the Egyptians to an hundred and fifty years of bondage and misery, and acted conformable thereto; but that his ignorance of this, which had induced him to interrupt the course of their affliction, was the cause that he was so suddenly to be cut off. Finding therefore that his doom was irreversible, he considered how to make the most of the small remainder of his life; and commanding a great number of lamps to be lighted up every night, he spent his whole time in drinking and revelling. So thence forward making no distinction between day and night, he roved about in the groves and meadows, and spent his whole time amongst merry and jocund company. Thus he went on, thinking to convict the oracle of falshood, and instead of six, to live twelve years. Finally Mycerinus is said to have a built a pyramid, which from the basis to the middle was Ethiopian stone; and on the northern front of it he inscribed his own name. This pyramid the Greeks, by a gross mistake, attributed to the courtesan Rhoapis, who flourished in the days of Amasis, several reigns lower <sup>a</sup>.

* HEROD. ubi sup. See before, p. 185. * HEROD. ubi sup. † Idem ibid. DIOD. ubi sup. p. 57. 58. * Idem ibid. HEROD. ubi sup.

(N) The last cited chronologer calls him also Cheres, Bicheres, Mofcheres, Mencheres.

WE now proceed to GENEPHACTHUS the father of Bocchoris the wife. He is also Gnephaethus, named Technatis by Plutarch <sup>b</sup>, and Necobabis by Alexis. What interval there was between him and Mycerinus, or whether any, does no where plainly appear. This king is famed for his abstinence, and for the execration he denounced against Menes. For it is recorded of him, that leading an army into Arabia, and travelling the vast and barren deserts, he there fell into great straits and want of provision: And being one day obliged to take up with the poor and slender diet he met with, he afterwards fell into a profound sleep. This so delighted him, that he forbade all excess and luxury, and cursed MENES, who first introduced them: And so earnestly did he persecute the memory of this his predecessor, that, by the consent of the priests, he engraved his curse upon a pillar, which was seen in the temple at Thebes by the curious succeeding generations.

Bocchoris, the son of Gnephaethus, was surnamed the wife. He was a despicable person to look at, but for prudence and wisdom far beyond any of his predecessors. He is reckoned the fourth Egyptian law-giver; but his laws <sup>c</sup> seem not to have concerned any thing, except commerce and the regulation of the public revenue. His judgments were for their excellence retained many ages after his death; but his great qualities were somewhat debased by his propensity to avarice <sup>d</sup>. So great was the veneration his subjects paid him, that they fabled Isis to have sent an asp to prevent his sight, that he might judge righteously <sup>e</sup>. However, he drew a general odium upon himself, by letting in a wild bull to the sacred one, called Mucvis; but this got the better, and killed his antagonist. At last <sup>f</sup>, he is said to have been taken by Sabbaco the Ethiopian, and burnt alive <sup>g</sup>.

Asychis is by Herodotus placed next in order to Mycerinus; but in compliance Asychis with Diodorus, we have put two reigns between them, notwithstanding our full persuasion that Bocchoris and Asychis were the same king, as we shall hereafter take occasion to observe: In the mean time it is recorded of Asychis, that he built the eastern portico to the temple of Vulcan, with a magnificence that eclipsed the rest. And finding that the riches of Egypt were lodged in a few hands, and that credit was decayed, he enacted that a man might borrow money upon his deceased parent, and deposit the body, as a pledge, in the hands of the creditor. And till it was redeemed, the debtor himself could not be buried in the sepulchre of his father, or put any of his descendants there. This king, to surpass all his predecessors, built him a pyramid of brick, which he charged with a vain-glorious inscription <sup>h</sup>.

AFTER Asychis, a blind man named Anyfis, from a city of the same name, Anyfis became king. In his reign Sabbaco king of Ethiopia broke into Egypt with a powerful army, and Anyfis fled for shelter to the fens, leaving the kingdom to the invader <sup>i</sup>.

BUT before we enter upon the reign of Sabbaco, let us take a retrospective view of these three last reigns, and perhaps we may find reason to think that Bocchoris and Asychis are different names for the same king, and that the blind man Anyfis was his contemporary. For the law said to have been instituted by Asychis, hath so much of Bocchoris's genius as to incline our belief that it is the same fact variously related. And if it be true that Bocchoris was burnt alive by Sabbaco, they must not only have been so, but Anyfis must also have been king of another part of Egypt at the same time. It is farther declared by Herodotus that Necus, the father of Psammitichus was slain by the same Ethiopian <sup>k</sup>. Here we have three kings subdued by one and the same enemy, and all in Egypt. From whence it appears, that many of the kings of Egypt are placed in order of succession, that were collateral, merely out of ostentation, and to support the pretensions the priests made to the excessive antiquity of their kingdom.

WE now return to SABBACO; and if it be true that he dealt so rigidly with Bocchoris, those are surely right who suppose he began his reign with barbarity and cruelty towards others. But no sooner was he established firmly on the throne, than he became a new man; so that he is highly extolled for his mercy, clemency and po-

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. See before, p. 191. <sup>b</sup> De Iside & Osirid. <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 203. <sup>d</sup> Diod. l. 1. p. 59. 85. <sup>e</sup> PLUT. vel Augustus, p. 529. <sup>f</sup> Ælian. de Anim. l. 11. c. 11. <sup>g</sup> SYNCCELL. p. 74. <sup>h</sup> HEROD. l. 2. See before, p. 185. <sup>i</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>j</sup> Idem ibid.

His first vision. licy. He is thought to have been the So in scripture, and to have entered into a league <sup>a</sup> with Hesbea, king of Samaria, against Shalmanassar king of Assyria. He was excited to the invasion of Egypt by a dream or vision, which assured him he should hold Egypt fifty years, and when that term was expired, he voluntarily retired into Ethiopia again, resigning his conquered kingdom. But whilst he was in Egypt, he gave the highest proofs of his wisdom and piety, and yielded to none of his Egyptian predecessors in the art of governing. He never would consent to the death of any criminal though capitally condemned; commuting the punishment into hard labour, which purely consisted in raising of mounds, and digging of canals; so that the cities of Egypt were raised higher, and rendered more commodious than by Sejstris; and particularly the city of Bubastis, where stood a most delightful temple to the goddess <sup>b</sup> of the same name, whom the Greeks interpreted to be their Diana. At length Sabbaco had a vision as he slept, wherein the tutelar god of Thebes admonished him that he could not hold the kingdom of Egypt with safety and happiness, except he massacred the priests as he passed through them with his guards. This vision was several times repeated; but his heart abhorring so dreadful an undertaking, he sent for the priests, and declared to them what the gods would have prompted him to, and that thereby he began to apprehend it was their pleasure he should remain no longer in Egypt; wherefore with pure hands and a clear conscience he would return into his native kingdom, rather than be guilty of so general a bloodshed, to preserve himself on the throne of Egypt. And upon the whole, considering that the predicted fifty <sup>c</sup> years were expired, he accordingly retired into his own country <sup>1</sup>.

Anyfis again. As soon as Sabbaco had departed the kingdom, Anyfis came out from his hiding-place, and reassumed the government. He had been absent fifty years, and in that time had formed an island for his habitation, composed of ashes and earth; for when any Egyptian came to him with provision, he always desired that ashes might be brought to him unknown to the Ethiopian. This island was called Elbo, and lay undiscovered seven hundred years and upwards, till the reign of Amrtaeus.

Sethon king and priest. AFTER him there reigned one SETHON, who was both king and priest of Vulcan. He not only neglected the military order, but injuriously divested them of their privileges and lands; whereat they were so incensed that they thought themselves absolved from their allegiance, and entered into a combination not to bear arms under him if he should ever stand in need of them. But he, regardless of their threats and murmurs, gave himself wholly up to contemplation and the functions of religion. This was the state of affairs when Sennacherib king of Assyria drew near to Pelusium, designing to enter Egypt. Sethon perceiving his danger, and that now his only trust must be in the military order whom he had so unjustly dealt with, he sought their assistance; but in vain: They obstinately persisted in their refusal to march under his banner. The priest now destitute of all other advice and support, repaired to his god, and in the utmost dejection of mind implored his aid. Whilst he was yet in the temple, he fell into a deep sleep, during which it seemed to him that the god <sup>c</sup> stood at his side, and exhorted him to take courage, and promised that if he would but go out against the Assyrians, he should obtain a compleat victory over them. Full of this vision, he assembled a body of artificers, shopkeepers and labourers; and with this unexperienced multitude, bent his march towards Pelusium. The very night after his arrival there, an infinite number of field-rats entered the enemy's camp, and gnawed their quivers, bow-strings, and shield-straps to pieces. This is very consonant to the prophecy of Isaiab, if we may be allowed to insert it here: The king of Assyria shall not come into this city, (meaning Jerusalem) nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with a shield <sup>a</sup>. For Sennacherib, as should seem, had broke up from before Jerusalem for a time to fall upon Egypt; but whether this Sethon be the same with Tirhakab or Sevechus, is more than we can decide. But to return; when Sethon next morning found the enemy thus disarmed, and retiring as fast as they could, he pursued them, and made a great slaughter. In memory of this miraculous event, there was a stone statue of this king erected in the temple of Vulcan, with a rat in one of his hands, and these words proceeding from his mouth; Who beholdeth me, let him be pious <sup>b</sup>. <sup>f</sup>

The twelve kings. A SHORT time after the death of Sethon, Egypt was (upon what motive is not precisely known) divided into twelve principalities, and to many of the chief Egyptian lords assumed the government of them. These twelve entered into the strictest alliance for the public welfare. The league between them was conceived in the strongest <sup>g</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. DIOD. SIC. ubi supr. p. 59.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Kings xix. 32.

<sup>b</sup> HEROD. ubi supr.
 terms

- a terms, and cemented by all the methods that could possibly conduce to preserve a perpetual union and harmony among them; because it had been foretold by an oracle, upon their assuming the government, that he of their number that should perform a libation in a brazen cup, would in time be king of all Egypt. This new regulation was attended with peace and happiness, and the twelve princes resolved to raise a monument which might perpetuate their names to latest ages; and accordingly they erected the famous Labyrinth near the lake Maris. At length it so fell out, that at a stated time they all met together to sacrifice in the temple of Vulcan, and being to offer a libation on the last day, the high priest, through mistake, brought out only eleven of the twelve gold bowls, which were reserved for the use of the twelve princes; and Psammitichus standing the last in order, and being unprovided for the ceremony, took off his helmet, which was of brass (they all twelve wore the like) and performed his libation therewith. This he did inadvertently; but it being observed by the rest, they called to mind the oracle which predicted he should be sole king of Egypt, who should happen to perform a libation in this place with a brass bowl. Wherefore, though they were satisfied he had no ill intention, and for that reason would not sentence him to die, yet they were unanimously for driving him to the marshy country, for divesting him of the greatest part of his dominions; and for obliging him not to concern himself in the affairs of the public. The reason of this discord is differently told by some, and the whole is attributed to envy: For
- c at the division of the country into twelve provinces, as has been observed, the sea-coasts fell to the lot of Psammitichus; and he greatly encouraging all commerce with the Grecians and Phœnicians, not only accumulated great wealth, but acquired also the favour and friendship of several foreign kings and nations, which drew on him the envy of his colleagues; who fearing he should grow too formidable, and affect to rule over them, resolved to reduce him betimes. Wherefore they all declared war against him; and he finding himself unequal to the allies, hired an army of mercenaries, consisting chiefly of Ionians, Carians, and Arabians, and repelled force by force, and in the end subdued the other kings, and put an end to the duodecenvirate. On the other hand it is related, that, in pursuance of his sentence, he retreated to the fens; but greatly resenting the severity of his usage for so trifling a thing, in which he meant no harm, either present or future, he sent to the oracle of Latona at the city of Butus, to know how, and when, he might hope for redress. The answer he received was, That Brazen men would suddenly rise out of the sea and avenge his cause. This he looked on as an absurdity: But not long after some Ionian and Carian pirates landed in brass armour. And an Egyptian, who had never seen men armed so before, going up to Psammitichus, and acquainting him, that certain brazen men had risen out of the sea, and were pillaging the land near the sea-shore, he perceived that the oracle was about to be fulfilled: Therefore, persuading them to stay by the large promises he made them, if he succeeded; and joining to them such Egyptians as were well affected to him, he subdued and dethroned the eleven confederate princes, and seized on the whole kingdom for himself. It is said, the decisive battle was fought at Monemphis, and that some of the kings were slain, and others took refuge in Afric. Thus was the government by twelve dissolved after it had subsisted fifteen years.
- d
- e

f HITHERTO the Egyptian history hath continued not a little obscure, we are now coming to a brighter period. PSAMMITICHUS of the tribe of Sais thus possessed of the whole kingdom of Egypt, reigned with as much wisdom, magnanimity and splendour as any of his predecessors. He was the son of Nechus, whom Sabbaco put to death when he conquered Egypt: And had he not fled into Syria, would have shared his father's fate. He made good his engagements with his allies, and over and above presented them with certain lands on each side of the Nile, and called their settlements the camp. He also put several children under their tuition, that they might be instructed in the Grecian language; and those who in after times performed the office of interpreters descended from these. They had their habitation near the sea, below the city of Bubastis in the Pelusian mouth of the Nile: And here they continued till Amasis removed them to Memphis, as will be shewn in its proper place. However, it is here proper to observe, that these Grecians are said to have been the first foreigners that were permitted to dwell in Egypt; and that from the intercourse and correspondence which was constantly kept up between them and their countrymen

* See before, p. 193.

† HEROD. ibid.

‡ DIOD. SIC. ubi sup. p. 60.

§ HEROD. ubi sup.

• DIOD. ubi sup.

in Greece, we are tollerably well assured of the truth and exactness of the Egyptian <sup>a</sup> history from the days of Psammitichus.

His public buildings.

CONCERNING the public edifices he erected, there is amongst authors some variations: Herodotus says he added the southern, and Diodorus, that he added the eastern portico to the temple of Vulcan. The former says that he built a spacious edifice opposite to this portico for the reception of the god Apis whenever he should appear; and that it was enriched with sculptures, and surrounded with gigantic statues of twelve cubits high instead of pillars. The latter, that he encompassed the temple with a wall, in which he substituted colossuses instead of pilasters <sup>c</sup>.

His wars.

Now in consideration of the fidelity and warlike experience of the foreigners, by whose aid he seated himself on the throne, he always kept some of their countrymen <sup>b</sup> in pay, and went so far as to compliment them with the post of honour when he marched his army into Syria; where he carried on a war many years. This so incensed the Egyptians, that upwards of 200,000 deserted him, and marched off in a body. Perceiving his error in thus affronting his own subjects, he at first sent some of the chief officers after them to excuse the matter: But finding that their persuasions had no effect, he took shipping with some of his friends, and overtook them on the banks of the Nile. And there, entreating them to halt, in consideration of all the natural obligations that could endear their country to them, their gods, and native seats; they unanimously struck their spears upon their shields, and cried out, that as long as they had arms they did not doubt but they should find a convenient country <sup>c</sup> to settle in: Then betraying their nakedness; that they should never want wives and children whilst they were so perfect. This done, they suddenly marched on till they came into the territories of Ethiopia, where they sat down on a fertile spot, and settled there.

Opens the ports of Egypt to strangers.

To repair this loss, he earnestly applied himself to the advancement of commerce, and opened his ports to all strangers; whom he greatly caressed, contrary to the cruel, tho' political maxims of his predecessors. At the same time that he was thus intent upon his affairs at home, he also entered into, or renewed an alliance with the Athenians, and others of the Greeks <sup>a</sup>. But his reign is for nothing more remarkable

His siege of Azotus, and transaction with the Scythians.

than for the long and tedious siege he laid to Azotus in Syria, on the borders of Egypt, and which a short time before had been taken by Asar-baddon, king of Babylon; for it was twenty nine years before he reduced it <sup>a</sup>. His conduct towards the Scythians, who about this time conquered the Medes, and possessed themselves of Asia, and were now marching with design to pour their armies into Egypt, is highly commended: For, instead of opposing them, he joined them in Syria, and by his presents and intreaties prevailed on them to march back again <sup>a</sup>. After a reign of fifty four years <sup>b</sup> he died, and was buried in the temple of Bubastis or Minerva, at Sais, the place where the bodies of all the Saitic kings were deposited. He is reported to have been the first king of Egypt that drank wine <sup>a</sup>, to have sent to discover the springs of the Nile <sup>a</sup>, and to have made an experiment to find out which was the most <sup>c</sup> ancient nation in the world: To this purpose he took two new-born children, and brought them up after such a manner that they never heard any body speak; and because when at two years old they pronounced a word (beccos) which signified bread in the Phrygian tongue, the Egyptians no longer vaunted of their seniority before all other nations, but submitted to the Phrygians <sup>a</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 2383.
Year before
Christ, 616.
Nechus.

NECHUS was the son and successor of PSAMMITICHUS. He is the Pharaoh Necho of Scripture. He was a prince of a magnificent and warlike genius, and great both at land and sea. In the beginning of his reign he attempted to cut a canal from the Nile to the Red Sea <sup>a</sup>; and after the loss of 120,000 of those employed on this work, he was warned by an oracle to desist, and leave the finishing of it to a Barbarian or foreigner. The oracle he obeyed; but thenceforward, turning his thoughts towards warlike enterprizes, he built a fleet of gallies in the northern (Mediterranean) sea, and another in the straits of the Arabian gulph, where footsteps of his naval armaments were seen many ages afterwards. The warlike actions of this naval force, if any, are no where extant; but, as his mind was bent upon the empire of the sea, he sent some of the expertest Phœnician mariners he could procure to go out in order to make a discovery of the African coasts. Accordingly, sailing out of the Red sea through the straits of Babelmandel, as now called, they steered down the eastern shores of Asie;

Affects the empire of the sea.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. DIOD. ubi supr. p. 61.    <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi supr.    <sup>a</sup> Idem
1. 1.    <sup>b</sup> Idem 1. 2.    <sup>a</sup> Eudox. apud PLUTARCH. de Iside & Osiride, p. 333.    <sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi
supr. & ATHENÆUS, l. 8. p. 345.    <sup>b</sup> HEROD. ubi supr.    <sup>c</sup> See before.

a and, doubling the Cape of Good-Hope, coasted up northward, till they came to the straits of Gibraltar; by which they entered into the Mediterranean, and so returned into Egypt; and this voyage they performed in three years<sup>a</sup>.

He was not only great at sea, but was also formidable by land. Josephus following His wars at land. Clefiar, says, that he made war upon the Medes and Babylonians; who had just then dissolved the Assyrian monarchy, and were grown dreadful to the nations bordering on their Dominions<sup>b</sup>: But the scripture expressly says, that he went out against the king of Assyria, who was then on the river Euphrates, perhaps at Babylon. In his march thither, Josiab king of Judab, refused to let him pass through Judæa, and drew out an army to prevent his design, which was to besiege Carchemish<sup>c</sup>. Finding therefore that Josiab opposed him, he sent messengers to him to remonstrate that he had not taken arms with design to do Josiab the least prejudice; that the war he was going to engage in, was undertaken by the express command of God; wherefore he would do well not to incur the anger of providence by withstanding its decree. But, finding that Josiab gave no ear to this, he resolved to give him battle; and both armies being drawn up in the valley of Megiddo (or Magdolus, as Herodotus, has it<sup>d</sup>) Josiab was wounded mortally with an arrow, as he was driving his chariot up and down the ranks; and perceiving his end to be near, he commanded his army to retreat, and Necho held on his march<sup>e</sup>. He arrived on the banks of the Euphrates, and there overthrew the king of Assyria, and took the great city of Carchemish; where he lodged a sufficient garrison, and after three months, returned towards Egypt<sup>f</sup>. As he drew near to Jerusalem, he heard that Jeboahaz had taken upon him to be king; and sending him an order to meet him at Riblah in Syria, he there bound him in chains, and sent him away prisoner to Egypt. After which he went to Jerusalem, and made Eliakim, whose name he changed into Jeboiakim, king over Judab, imposing on him at the same time a tribute of an hundred talents of silver, and one talent of gold<sup>g</sup>. And thus he became master of Judæa and Syria. Herodotus say, that he took the great city of Cadytis in the mountainous part of Palestine, which is very rationally understood to signify Jerusalem. It is plain Nechus was there; but it is almost as plain that he entered it in a peaceful manner<sup>h</sup>. Hitherto then he was successful in his wars, by which he weakened the declining power of Assyria; which very soon after ceased to give name to a monarchy: And in commemoration of his good fortune, or in gratitude to the god, he is said to have consecrated the garments he wore in these actions to Apollo, and sent them to Branchis in the land of the Milefians<sup>i</sup>.

But he did not long enjoy his new acquisitions; for about three years afterwards, came from Babylon Nebuchadnezzar, who, in conjunction with the Medes, had sub-<sup>His turn of fortune.</sup> verted the Assyrian empire, designing to drive the Egyptians from Carchemish, and recover the Syrian and Phœnician Provinces, which Necho had subdued<sup>k</sup>. But he, no way daunted at the formidable power of this newly-erected monarchy, marched towards the Euphrates with a very numerous army, against Nebuchadnezzar; but in the end Necho was routed with a terrible slaughter, and lost Carchemish, and all Syria and Judæa, quite to Pelusium<sup>l</sup>. He afterwards entered into a confederacy with Jeboiakim, and made as if he intended to renew the war against the Babylonians; but he did nothing of moment afterwards, nor stirred out of Egypt; and died about eight years after he had been defeated by Nebuchadnezzar<sup>m</sup>, having reigned sixteen years, and left his son Psammitis to succeed him in the kingdom<sup>n</sup>.

In the reign of PSAMMITIS the son of Necho there came ambassadors into Egypt from <sup>Year of the</sup> the Eleæans, to know if the most sage Egyptians could add any thing to their regula-<sup>Flood, 2399.</sup> tions concerning the olympic Games, or could perceive any defect in them. When <sup>Year before</sup> the king was informed of their business, he called a council of the wisest heads in the nation; and sending for the ambassadors to come before this assembly, he asked them, <sup>Christ, 600.</sup> if their own citizens were allowed to contend at their games: To which they answered in the affirmative. Whereupon the Egyptians pronounced, that they erred from all the rules of hospitality; observing, that it was natural for them to favour their fellow-citizens more than strangers. That if they were come to be informed concerning what ought, or ought not to be done in the matter they had proposed, the most equitable law they could make, would be to exclude their own countrymen, and admit none but strangers to contend for the prizes. Psamis reigned six years, and died in an expedition against the Ethiopians, leaving his son Apries to succeed him.

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. • JOSEPHUS Antiq. l. 10. c. 6. <sup>f</sup> 2 Kings xxiii. 29. 2 Chron. xxv. 20. <sup>g</sup> HEROD. ubi sup. <sup>h</sup> 2 Chron. xxxv. JOSEPHUS Antq. ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>k</sup> 2 Kings xxiii. <sup>l</sup> Vide PRIDEAUX Connect. p. 56, 57. HEROD ubi sup. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>n</sup> Jerem. xvi. 1, 2. 2 Kings xxiv. 9. <sup>o</sup> JOSEPHUS ubi sup. <sup>p</sup> 2 Kings xxiv. 9. JOSEPHUS ubi sup. <sup>q</sup> HEROD. ubi sup.

Year of the
Flood, 2405.
Year before
Christ, 594.
Apries.

His affairs with the Jews.

APRIES is the Pharaoh-hophra of scripture. The first part of his reign was great and prosperous, the last, insolent and miserable. In the first year of his reign he received ambassadors from Zedekiah king of Judah, and with them he concluded a treaty, promising to assist their king against the king of Babylon; in consequence of this about two years afterwards he marched out of Egypt with intent to relieve Jerusalem, then closely besieged by Nebuchadnezzar; who no sooner heard of his motions than he raised the siege, and resolved to meet Apries half way. He did so; but the Egyptians, afraid of venturing a battle, retreated as fast as the Babylonians approached, and so continued till they had fallen back into their own country, leaving the Jews to the merciless rage of their enemy, in violation of the most solemn engagements. And for this breach of faith it was that Ezekiel denounced the heavy doom against them, that they should be confounded and desolate for forty years ensuing: And that afterwards they should degenerate to so base a degree, as not to have it in their power ever to set up a king of their own for the time to come; the accomplishment of which will be seen in the course of this history. The scriptures paint him in very disadvantageous colours, and in the end threaten him with a violent death; which came to pass, as we shall see anon. In the mean time it may not be amiss to take notice, that Herodotus gives this king twenty five years of greater prosperity than any of his predecessors, except Psammiticus, had enjoyed; though Diodorus allows his whole reign no more than twenty two years. However, they both agree in giving him the character of a martial prince, and speak of successful wars which he waged, both by sea and land, against the Tyrrians and Sidonians, and Cypriots. The city of Sidon he took by storm, and vanquished both the Phœnicians and Cypriots in a sea-fight; and returned with immense spoil into Egypt. And all this no way clashes with what the sacred writings say of him; but is rather agreeable thereto: For sure it must have been a mighty king, in whom the Jews dared to confide against the monarch of Babylon? And as to the saint Apries made to relieve Jerusalem and his shameful retreat, that rather reflected dishonour on him, than amounted to a misfortune.

His victories.

BUT now, in order to reconcile the sacred and prophane historians, let us hear the former denounce judgment against him, and then see how the latter execute it; which is the most obvious and distinct method we can think of, in this case where we are obliged to resort to both. We have already in general terms observed that the scripture threatened this king with a violent death, let us attend to the words of the prophet himself: Thus saith the Lord, Behold I will give Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life; as I gave Zedekiah king of Judah into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon his enemy, and that sought his life. Many predictions of the same kind are uttered against him in Ezekiel, but there he is only involved with the rest of his subjects, and therefore we shall pass them over. We are now to see how his destruction was brought about. The Cyrenæans, a colony of the Greeks, had a very numerous accession of their countrymen under their third king Battus the Lapp; and being led thereto by an oracle from the Pythian, fell to sharing the lands, and unjustly driving the Libyans, their neighbours, from their possessions, their king Andrian sent an embassy of submission to Apries, and implored his protection from the violence of these new comers. Apries condescended to his request, and sent a powerful army to relieve him. But the Egyptians were beaten by the Cyrenæans with so cruel a slaughter, that the few who escaped were incensed with the fiercest rage against their king, as if he had sent them to certain destruction, in hopes that they being cut off, he might tyrannize at will over the remainder of his subjects. What ground there was for this clamour does not appear, but so it was that the multitude were so taken with it, that almost an universal defection ensued. Upon news that they were assembled in a tumultuous manner, and were talking loud of a revolution, Apries sent a trusty friend, as he thought and one much respected by the people, called Amasis, to appease them. He went; but instead of reconciling them with Apries, he made application to them himself; and as he was pretending, to reproach them and recall them to their allegiance, one of them came behind him, put an helmet on his head, and saluted him king of Egypt; and from that instant he prepared himself to carry on the war against his

The cause of his ruin.

Is betrayed by Amasis.

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>2</sup> Ezek. xvii. 15. <sup>3</sup> Jerem. xxxvii. 5. <sup>4</sup> Idem ibid. c. 7. <sup>5</sup> Ezek. xxix. <sup>6</sup> Idem xxx. 13. <sup>7</sup> HEROD. ubi. supr. <sup>8</sup> DIOD. ubi. supr. p. 62. <sup>9</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>10</sup> Jerem. xlv. 30. master.

a master. Apries finding himself so foully betrayed, commanded one Patarbemis, the most considerable of all the Egyptians, who as yet adhered to him, to go to the camp of the rebels, and bring Amasis to him alive. He obeyed; and coming in sight of Amasis, called out to him, and charged him to attend on him to the king. At this, Amasis, who was sitting on horseback, lifted up his thigh with the utmost scorn, and breaking wind, bid him carry that back to his master. Notwithstanding this, Patarbemis still urged him to obey the royal summons; but all he could obtain was this answer from Amasis, That indeed he had been some time preparing to visit the king, but that he might do it in a proper manner, he would bring a suitable equipage along with him. Patarbemis had now heard and seen too much to imagine he should succeed in the business he was charged with, and began to think, that the best service he could do for Apries, at this conjuncture, would be to give him the most early notice of the posture and temper of the rebels. He therefore returned back; but when the king saw him come into his presence without Amasis, he spoke not one word to him, but ordered his ears and nose to be cut off. This insolent and tyrannical behaviour compleated his ruin: For when the rest of the Egyptians, who had continued faithful to him, beheld the inhuman mutilation of so worthy and noble a person, they all withdrew from him and went over to Amasis. And now the tyrant on the one hand, and the usurper on the other, prepared for war; the one having the whole body of the natives under his banner; the other only such Carians, Ionians, and other mercenaries and foreigners as he could engage in his service.

c DURING these intestine broils, and these divisions, which must have greatly weakened Egypt, it is probable that Nebuchadnezzar, who much about time broke up his thirteen years siege of Tyre, and had at last nothing but an empty town for his pains, took advantage of the troubled state of this kingdom, in hopes here to acquire such spoil as might make amends for what he missed at Tyre. And this is perfectly consonant to the scripture, where it is said; Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus . . . yet had he no wages nor his army for Tyrus . . . Therefore, saith the Lord God, Behold, I will give the land of Egypt unto Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon . . . and it shall be the wages for his army. A nation in such distraction as the people of Egypt must have been in at this time, was an easy prey to a number of experienced veterans; and besides, must have been in the most proper condition to gratify an army already worn out with fatigue, as the Babylonians doubtless were. Nebuchadnezzar therefore entered Egypt, and miserably harassed the country, and slew, and led away great numbers of its inhabitants; so that some think it did not recover this incursion for forty years, as had been foretold. At length he left the ruined land of Egypt; but whether he appointed Amasis for his lieutenant, or what terms he made with him, is what we do not take upon us to say; any more than whether Amasis and Apries stood their ground at last, and made head against the enemy; or whether they left him to act his pleasure in Egypt. This alone is certain, d that the Babylonian carried away immense spoil with him.

e AND now we resume the history of the civil war, which we have been obliged to interrupt, by taking a view of the devastation of the country by a foreign enemy. Apries marched from Sais, where he had a most sumptuous and delightful palace, at the head of 30,000 Carians and Ionians, and Amasis, on the other hand, was in motion at the head of an army of Egyptians. They met in the fields near Memphis; and Apries was so far from doubting the victory, that he is said to have entertained a notion, That it was not in the power even of any god to divest him of his kingdom, as he is upbraided by the prophet, the river is mine, and I have made it. Yet his confidence availed him nothing; the armies engaged near Memphis, and though the foreigners did wonders, yet they were overpowered by the multitude of the Egyptians, and were utterly overthrown, and Apries himself taken prisoner.

f AMASIS of the tribe of Sais now possessed the whole kingdom. He confined Apries in the palace of Sais, formerly his own; and treated him with great care and respect. But the people were implacable, and could not rest whilst Apries enjoyed life: And therefore, murmuring against Amasis, and remonstrating that his lenity was wrong applied in extending it to his and their common enemy, he found himself under a necessity of delivering Apries into their hands. And being thus fallen under the power of those who sought his life, they strangled him, and laid his body in the sepulchre of his ancestors, which was in the temple of Minerva, adjoining to the palace, on the left hand going in. Here it was that all the princes of the tribe of Sais were intombed<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. DION. ubi supr. <sup>c</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>d</sup> Ezek. xxix. 18, 19. <sup>e</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. DION. ubi supr. <sup>f</sup> HEROD. ubi supr. <sup>g</sup> Ezek. xxix. 3. <sup>h</sup> PLATO in Tim.

<sup>a</sup> Jerem. ubi supr.

WE know it is said that Amasis did not thus seat himself on the throne; and that he did not succeed Apries. It was one Partamis, say they, whom Amasis succeeded, and that, by the following incident. Partamis celebrated his birth-day, Amasis, as yet a private person, presented him with a most beautiful and elegant garland of flowers: Whereupon, being invited to the table as a guest, and thenceforward added to the number of the king's friends; he was at last sent at the head of an army to reduce the Egyptians, who had rebelled; but the army made him king out of the hatred they bore to Partamis *. We are inclined to think, that the Partamis here, and the Palarbemis above, are the same man; and, if so, he was rather the idol of the people's affections, than the object of their hatred. But we forbear enlarging any farther on this, and shall only say, that the author, in whose writings we find this, is not always the most faithful transcriber.

WHOEVER Amasis succeeded, and which way soever he came by the crown, it is universally allowed, that he was of plebeian extraction. And perceiving at first that it was with reluctance, the people payed him the respect due to the sublimity of his station, he took a golden cistern, in which his guests were used to wash their feet, and ordered it to be melted down, and cast in the shape of a god. This precious idol was set up in the most frequented part of the city; and all paid devout reverence and honour to it. He then called an assembly of the Egyptians, and acquainted them, That the god they now worshipped was made of the vessel in which they had often pissed, vomited, and washed their feet: That his own case was the same; formerly he was a mean person, but, being now their king, he expected and required they should honour and obey him as such. It was a rule with him to attend closely to business every morning, and to divert himself with his friends the remainder of the day, drinking and making merry with them: But his mirth was mixed with somewhat of too base an alloy for a king; at which some of his friends were scandalized, and assured him, that such forgetfulness of his dignity would draw the contempt of all his subjects upon him. To this he replied, that as a bow always bent would undoubtedly lose much of its spring and force, and in the end be wholly useless; so a man who should, uninterruptedly, attend to serious matters, would grow stupid and lose his senses: And being perfectly convinced of this truth, he was determined to divide his time between business and diversion. And indeed it is said of him, that when a private man, he delighted in his cup and his jest; and was so averse to business, that he supported himself in his riot and luxury by thieving. And in consequence of this heinous practice, being oftentimes accused, and continually denying his guilt, they were wont to carry him to the oracle of the place, wherever he was, by which he was sometimes convicted, and sometimes acquitted. When he came to the throne, he recollected the former transactions of his life, and calling to mind the deceitfulness and ignorance of the oracles, who had pronounced him innocent, he slighted the temples of such gods, abstained from their sacrifices, and refused to present them with any donations. On the contrary, he highly revered those for veracity and sapience who had not spared to disclose his crime.

The public works of Amasis.

HE built a portico to the temple of Minerva at Sais, which was of the utmost magnificence, both in respect to its grandeur, and the wonderful materials which composed it, adorning it with colossuses, and the monstrous images of Androsphynges. Part of the stones of this building were taken out of the quarries at Memphis; but the largest of them came by water from the city of Elephantis, twenty days passage on the river, and a great many of these he prepared for other works. But what is most to be admired, he removed a house all of one stone from the same city to Sais. The exterior dimensions of it were twenty one cubits in front, fourteen deep, and eight high: The interior measures were eighteen, twelve, and five cubits. Two thousand mariners were employed three years in transporting this extraordinary edifice. It stood near the entrance of the temple, and was never carried quite in, either, as was said, because the chief engineer sighed one day, as if he was tired out with the work, and therefore Amasis, who stood by, taking offence, would never suffer him to have any thing more to do with it; or, because rolling it in towards the temple, one of the men was crushed to death by it, and therefore it might not be advanced any farther. He was very magnificent in the gifts and ornaments he bestowed upon * HELLANIC. apud Athen: Deipno. l. 15. p. 680.

<sup>1</sup> HEROD. ubi supr.

- a the other celebrated temples, and particularly at Memphis; where, before the temple of Vulcan, he caused a colossus of seventy five foot in length to be laid on its back, the face looking upwards: And on the same basis or pavement whereon this lay, he erected two statues of twenty foot high, cut out of the same stone, and standing one on each side of the great one. In Sais there was just such another colossus as this. To conclude this head, It was this Amasis who built the great temple of Isis at Memphis.

- Moreover, Egypt is said to have been perfectly happy during his reign, in the regular overflowing of the Nile, and to have contained no less than 20,000 populous cities. And, that good order might the better subsist in the midst of so vast a multitude, Amasis enacted a law, whereby every Egyptian was bound once a year to inform the governor of the province by what means he earned his living, and in default thereof to suffer death; which also was the punishment now ordained for those who were not able to give a very satisfactory account of themselves<sup>1</sup>: And for this, and for other laws he enacted, he is stiled the fifth law-giver of Egypt<sup>2</sup>.

- He was a great friend to the Greeks, received a visit from Solon<sup>3</sup>. And, besides the favours he conferred on particular persons and cities of that nation, he allowed as many as pleased to come into Egypt, and to settle, either in the most celebrated mart of Naucratis, or drive on their trade upon the sea-coasts; and granted them places where they might erect altars and temples to their own deities. Accordingly they erected several temples, the most frequented and noted of which was called the Grecian temple, being built at the joint charge of the Ionian cities of Chio, Teos, Phocæa, and Clazomene; together with the Dorians of Rhodes, Cnidus, Halicarnassus, Phaselis, and of the Eolians, except the city of Mytelene. Those of Ægina also built a temple to Jupiter at their sole expence; the Samians another to Juno, and the Milesians, a third to Apollo. And to conclude, the Greeks elected officers to preside over their commercial affairs, and over their religion, and from henceforward were a considerable body in Egypt.

- So great was the fame of Amasis for his generosity and humanity, that when the Delpbians, whose temple had been burnt, were going about from city to city to raise such a contribution as might enable them to pay that part of the expence which was imposed on them, they applied not only to the Greeks in Egypt, but also to Amasis himself, who gave them a thousand talents of Alom. He made an alliance with the Cyrenæans, and being desirous of a Grecian woman, or else willing to give an ample testimony of the affection he had for that people, he married Ladice, the daughter of Battus, according to some; but others said she was daughter of Arcefilaus; and others again, of Critobulus, a person of high authority among the Cyrenæans. This marriage was very extraordinary in its beginning, and could not be consummated without the intervention of a deity. For Amasis, though he at the same time found no impediment in himself with regard to other women, was sensible of a total inability in reference to his wife. Whereupon he, after some time, concluded she had enchanted him, and practised some infernal art to debilitate him; and therefore told her one night as they lay together, That as deeply verfed as she was in supernatural contrivances, she should not have it in her power to escape the vengeance he intended to take on her, for the wickedness and ingratitude she had been guilty of towards him. She earnestly denied the unkind accusation, and endeavoured to give him a better opinion of her; but in vain. In this distress she sighed out a prayer to Venus, and implored her aid, vowing, in case of deliverance, to send a statue of her to Cyrene, and erect it there. The goddess was propitious, and Amasis found himself like other men (the only expedient that could be effectual in this extremity) and continued to use Ladice as his wife, with the greatest tenderness and affection. Ladice performed her vow to the goddess, whose statue set up by her was seen without the gates of Cyrene some ages afterwards. This miracle, as it was doubtless called, brought the gods of the Grecians into as much credit with Amasis as themselves; as should seem by the consecrated donations he sent into Greece. To the city of Cyrene he sent a gilded statue of Minerva, and his own picture done from the life. To the city of Lindus he gave two stone statues of the same goddess, with a linnen pectoral or stomacher wonderfully wrought and adorned. To Samos he sent two wooden images of himself, which remained standing, several ages afterwards, behind the gates of the great temple of Juno. This donation he made to Samos for the sake of Polycrates, with whom he was in especial alliance. As for Lindus, it was reported that the daughters of Danaus founded the temple of Minerva.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 202. HEROD. ubi supr.<sup>2</sup> DION. ubi supr. p. 85.<sup>3</sup> HEROD. lib. 1.
nervæ

Conquers Cyprus.

nera there, when they fled from the sons of Egyptus. And add to all the great things <sup>a</sup> which have been hitherto said of him, he was the first that subdued Cyprus, and that exacted tribute from its inhabitants *.

His latter days unhappy,

HITHERTO we have represented this reign in the pompous colours the Egyptian priests bestowed on it; and under so prudent a prince as it is likely Amasis was, the greatest part of what they said may be true enough: But they dwell so much on the glory of this reign, as well as of those that preceded it, as to forget all the ignominy that was mixed with it. Xenophon writes, that Cyrus conquered Egypt<sup>o</sup>; and if so, it must have been during this long reign; and Herodotus says, that Amasis and Cresus were leagued together against Cyrus *. It is certain, that Nebuchadnezzar almost ruined the whole kingdom; but we find no acknowledgment of it among profane <sup>b</sup> authors, who, so far as they have touched upon the Egyptians, have copied their archives, or depended upon the oral traditions of their priests. But now that it was no longer in their power to conceal their dishonour, they frankly confessed it. For, according to themselves, the latter days of Amasis were darkened by a dreadful storm, which threatened the utter ruin of Egypt; and though he died just soon enough to escape the rage of it, yet his dead body was so cruelly abused and destroyed, that could he have been sensible of the hard fate he was doomed to in that particular, he, according to the Egyptian superstition, would have thought the loss of his kingdom a trifle, if compared with it.

and why.

FOR by some means or other Amasis had incensed Cambyfes the Persian (who was <sup>c</sup> naturally a rash and hot-headed prince) against him to so implacable a degree as has scarce its parallel in the history of any nation. The seeds from whence this enmity sprang are not positively, nor perhaps at all known to us. On the one hand it is said, That Amasis sending an Egyptian oculist to Cyrus king of Persia, who had desired to have the best in his kingdom; the man whose fortune it was to be chosen by the king for this purpose, took it much at heart that he should be thus as it were exiled from his wife and children, and sent into Persia; and especially since Cyrus had desired the best oculist in Egypt, which he was conscious himself was not. The angry Egyptian continuing in Persia, and plainly perceiving the turbulent genius of Cambyfes, prevailed on him to send an herald to Amasis, to demand his daughter to wife, assured <sup>d</sup> that whether Amasis complied with this request or not, he should have his full measure of revenge on him. Cambyfes hearkned to this man, and did as he had suggested. When the Persian herald came to Amasis, he knew not which way to resolve: He dreaded the Persian power if he refused, and was ashamed of the dishonour which must be reflected on his family if he complied, knowing, that instead of being a wife, his daughter would be no better than the Persian's concubine. At last he bethought him, that his predecessor was survived by an only daughter, of great beauty and majestic deportment, called Nitetis. Her therefore he sent with all the pomp and splendor befitting his own daughter, to Cambyfes in Persia; who, when he saw her, saluted her by the title of daughter to Amasis. To this she immediately answered, <sup>e</sup> that Amasis had deceived him; that she was not his daughter; but the unhappy child of the unfortunate Apries, whom Amasis had put to death, and whose throne he had ungratefully usurped. At this Cambyfes was fired with indignation, and vowed destruction to Amasis. This was the story the Persians told: But this is not likely to be true; for at this time Nitetis must have been somewhat upwards of forty years old, or at least near it; and therefore but ill qualified for the bed of Cambyfes. But secondly, the Egyptians, to give themselves some credit, even in this destructive misunderstanding, claimed kindred with Cambyfes, and said, that it was Cyrus who sent for the daughter of Amasis, and that Cambyfes was the son of Nitetis. This may give a better account of the dreadful malice he wrecked upon Amasis in revenge of <sup>f</sup> his unhappy grandfather Apries; which, as is said, he was excited to by his mother. But Herodotus declares it was contrary to the custom of the Persians to admit of a son of the half-blood to succeed as heir to the kingdom. Thirdly, it was reported, that a Persian lady being admitted to the presence of the king's women, and admiring the children of Cassandana, was answered by her, That notwithstanding she was the wife of Cyrus and the mother of those fine children; yet he neglected her, and preferred an Egyptian servant, meaning Nitetis, before her: Which Cambyfes her eldest son, at that time but ten years of age, hearing, told her, that when he came to be a man he would for her sake ruin all Egypt. This, say they, he remembered, and acted accordingly: But, notwithstanding what is here said, we choose to think <sup>g</sup> a with Dean Prideaux, that Amasis having subjected himself as a tributary to Cyrus, upon his death withdrew his obedience from his successor. Having thus laid before you the several causes of this war, as we find them, we leave Cambyfes to his preparation for it, and return to Amasis.

* HEROD. ubi supr. DIOD. ubi supr. ° CYROPÆDIA sub fine. ° HEROD. l. i.

WHILST this cloud was gathering, Phanes of Halicarnassus, a commander of Amasis is betrayed by Phanes of Halicarnassus. the Grecian auxiliaries, in the pay of Amasis, took some private disgust, and quitted Egypt to go into Persia. He was a prudent counsellor, a valiant captain, perfectly well acquainted with every thing that related to Egypt; and besides, had great credit with the Greeks in these dominions. Amasis was immediately sensible how great the loss of this man would be to him, and how much he had it in his power to strengthen the hands of Cambyfes, or any prince else, who should undertake to invade him; and therefore in all haste he sent a trusty eunuch with a swift galley to pursue him; and he was taken in Lycia. However, he was not brought back to Egypt; for making his guard drunk, he continued his journey to Persia, and presented himself to Cambyfes, as he was meditating the downfall of Egypt, which he forwarded by his counsel and discoveries, as Amasis had rightly foreseen.

We have already observed, that there had been an especial harmony between Amasis and Polycrates the tyrant of Samos; but a misunderstanding arising between them, Polycrates, when occasion offered, joined Cambyfes against the Egyptian his former ally. For Amasis receiving continual accounts of the uninterrupted successes and depredations of this Samian, feared that in the end some heavy disaster would fall upon him, equal to the glory of his triumphs; and therefore sent him this letter, to the following purpose: Amasis to Polycrates, greeting. . . . It is with pleasure I hear of the happy state of my friend and ally. Nevertheless I fear for thy great prosperities, knowing the unsteadiness of fortune. For my part, I should rather choose, that my affairs and those also of my friends should be sometimes prosperous, and sometimes unhappy, than have them go on with continued success. Therefore do thou now bearken to my counsel, and do as I shall bid thee, to take away from thy happiness: Consider then with thyself what thou possessest of greatest value to thyself; and what would the most bitterly grieve thee, if lost: And when thou hast found it, cast it away from thee, so that it may never more be beheld by man. If thy happiness, after this, knoweth no mixture of evil, preserve thyself against the sorrow that may come upon thee, by repeating the remedy I have shown thee. When Amasis heard that Polycrates had taken his advice, and had accordingly thrown a very valuable signet into the sea, but that it was found a few days afterwards in the belly of a fish, and restored to him; he gave him over as the most unhappy of men, and dreading to partake as a friend in some dismal calamity, which he feared must befall him, he dispatched a herald to Samos to renounce the alliance, and all the obligations between him and Polycrates, that he might not mourn his misfortune with the sorrow of a friend. Amasis, by thus dissolving the league between him and the Samian, left Polycrates to act against him, if his inclination led him so to do; and accordingly he offered a fleet of ships to Cambyfes, to assist him in his invasion of Egypt. Thus we see Amasis in danger from an inexorable, cruel, and most powerful enemy, in concert with a disgusted and formidable friend. But before the dreadful day came his life ended, after he had reigned forty four years. His dead body was embalmed, and deposited in a sepulchre he had built for himself in the temple at Sais; but there, to speak in the ancient Egyptian phrase, he enjoyed but a short repose, as will be seen hereafter. He was succeeded by his son, called Psammenitus. His death.
Year of the
Flood, 2474.
Year before
Christ, 525.

THE following reign, in which Egypt submitted to a foreign yoke, was of very short duration, and deeply calamitous. For PSAMMENITUS the son of Amasis was scarce seated on the throne, when he was forced to put himself at the head of an army, with which he marched to Pelusium, and there encamped to give battle to the Persian, who now drew near, to vent his fury upon Egypt. Under this new king a fearful prodigy happened; showers of rain fell at Thebes, where it had never been known to rain before. This was doubtless construed to portend a change, and a great one soon followed it: For now Cambyfes, by the aid and assistance of the king of Arabia, and the politic counsel of Phanes, had crossed the dry and sandy deserts, and coming in sight of the Egyptian camp, immediately drew up to give them battle. The Egyptians prepared themselves for an assault, and in the interim their Carian and Ionian auxiliaries gave a dreadful instance of their zeal in the cause of Psammenitus, and detestation of their traiterous countryman Phanes. For they led his sons he had left behind him out of the camp, and butchered them over a bowl, <sup>a</sup> which received their blood in sight of the father and his new friends; and pouring wine and water into the same, drank off of that cruel and unnatural mixture, and then began the onset. The fight was obstinately maintained on both sides; but in the end the Egyptians gave ground, and fled in great confusion to Memphis. Here they soon after were guilty of a horrid and imprudent outrage towards a herald whom Cambyses sent to them in a ship of Mytelene; for they no sooner saw her come into the port than they flocked down to the shore, destroyed the ship, and tore the Persian herald and all the crew to pieces, carrying their mangled limbs in a barbarous triumph into the city. Not long after, they were closely besieged by the Persians, and in the end obliged to surrender; and therewith fell the glory of Egypt. <sup>b</sup> The news of this struck such a terror upon the minds of the Libyans, Cyrenæans and Barcæans, that they humbled themselves to Cambyses, and implored his protection.

He is overthrown by Cambyses.

Taken prisoner, and loses his kingdom.

The particulars of his captivity

UPON the tenth day after Memphis had been taken, Psammetus and the chief of the Egyptian nobility were sent ignominiously into the suburbs of that city to act a part in one of the most doleful tragedies that can be conceived: For, being there seated in a proper place, he saw his daughter coming along in the habit of a poor slave, with a pitcher, to fetch water from the river, and followed by the daughters of the greatest families in Egypt, all in the same miserable garb, and going on the same errand, with pitchers in their hands; all weeping and wailing with the utmost lamentation. When the fathers saw their children in this distress, and reduced to so fordid a degradation, they burst out into tears, and could not contain themselves, all but Psammetus, who, though ready to sink under the burthen of his grief, only cast his eyes towards the ground, and there fixed them. These past by; came the son of Psammetus and two thousand of the chief Egyptian youths, all with bits in their mouths, and halters round their necks, going to be executed, to expiate the murder of the Persian herald, and Mytelenean sailors. But Psammetus, like one perfectly stupified, as they passed by, observed the very same conduct as before, whilst the Egyptians about him cried out with the loudest lamentations. A short space afterwards he saw an intimate friend and companion, who now that he was advanced in years, was plundered of all he had, and walking up and down the suburbs begging his bread. <sup>c</sup> As soon as he perceived this man he wept bitterly, and calling out to him by his name, struck himself on the head as one frantic. Now Psammetus had spies privately set over him to mark his behaviour, and they instantly repaired to Cambyses, and gave him a particular account of it; and soon after a messenger came from him to the captive king to know what might be the reason of it. To this he answered, "That the calamities of his own family confounded him, and <sup>d</sup> were too great to be expressed by any outward signs of grief; but the distressed necessity of a bosom friend gave him more room for reflection, and therefore extorted tears from him." By this answer he wrought so much upon Cambyses, that he sent to stop the execution of his son; but his orders were given too late; for the young prince was the first put to death. At the same time Psammetus himself was sent for into the city, and restored to his liberty: And had he not betrayed a desire of change and revenge, he might have been entrusted with the administration of Egypt; but being vindictively disposed, he was seized, and condemned to drink bull's blood; and so ended his life after a dismal reign of six months, and a short captivity; and with him fell the ancient splendor and liberty of Egypt.

and death.

The dead body of Amasis burnt; and the god Apis slain.

THE Egyptians now felt the heavy pressure of conquest in a very extraordinary manner. They saw their late king Amasis inhumanly taken out of his tomb, cruelly mangled, and finally burnt. They saw their god Apis slain, and their priests ignominiously scourged; all which made such dreadful impressions on the minds of the whole nation, that they afterwards bore a most uncommon aversion to the Persians, and never remained quiet under their dominion. <sup>e</sup>

Egypt a province of the Persian empire.

THUS were the Egyptians reduced to the lowest degree of submission; their royal line was extinct; their religion was trampled on in the most outrageous manner; and themselves persecuted and despised for the profession they made of it.

A PEOPLE who had been bred up to such a solemn observance of the institutions of their forefathers, must needs think themselves unhappy under such governours as held their laws in derision; and therefore they continually consulted how they might shake off the intolerable yoke of their Persian oppressors. <sup>f</sup> a AT length they broke out into an open revolt in the reign of Darius Hystaspes and The Egyptians continued in a state of rebellion against the Persians all the first year of Xerxes<sup>1</sup>; but <sup>revolt from</sup> in the second year<sup>2</sup> of the same prince they were reduced to harder subjection than <sup>the Persians;</sup> before, as is usually the case; and had one Achæmenes, brother to Xerxes, for their <sup>but subdued</sup> again. governour.

BUT the more severity they suffered, the more they were exasperated. In the <sup>Year of the</sup> fifth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus they revolted again, chose INARUS king of Li- <sup>Flood, 2539.</sup> bya to fill their throne; and called in the Athenians to their assistance, who cheerfully <sup>Year before</sup> embraced this opportunity of expelling the Persians out of Egypt<sup>3</sup>. The Egyptians <sup>Christ, 460.</sup> almost succeeded in their design. The Athenians falling on the Persian fleet at sea, <sup>Revolt a se-</sup> took and destroyed fifty sail of them; and then sailing up the Nile, landed under the <sup>cond time, and</sup> command of Chiritimis, and joined the Egyptians and Libyans under Inarus. They <sup>of Inarus</sup> all attacked Achæmenes the Persian general, though his army was 300,000 strong; <sup>for the 1. 2.</sup> of whom there fell 100,000, together with the general himself. The rest betook themselves to flight, and returned to Memphis; but being pursued by the Egyptians, they took refuge in a very considerable, and by much the best fortified part of that city, called the white castle. The Egyptians had the rest of it, and blocked up the Persians three years within this citadel.

BY this success the Egyptians hoped they had wrought a total deliverance for themselves and descendants; but their prosperity was by no means of long duration. c They were at the end of three years obliged to raise the siege of the white castle by the Persian army, under the command of Artabazus governour of Cilicia, and Megabyzus governour of Syria<sup>4</sup>. Yet in the mean time, when Inarus heard of the formidable preparations which were making by these Persian governours to relieve the besieged, he redoubled the attacks on this strong castle, and made the utmost efforts to carry it; but the Persians within defended themselves with such bravery, that the Egyptians made no considerable progress towards the reduction of the place<sup>5</sup>.

IN the third year of this siege, and the ninth of Artaxerxes, Inarus and his auxiliaries were not only obliged to raise the siege of the white castle, but also defeated with a fearful slaughter, which fell chiefly on the Egyptians. In this fight Inarus was d wounded by Megabyzus; but nevertheless he retreated with his Athenian confederates, and such of the Egyptians as adhered to him, to the city of Biblus in the island of Prosopitis, which being washed on each side by navigable branches of the Nile, the Athenian fleet was stationed in one of them; and here they held out a siege of a year and a half. But the bulk of the Egyptians submitted to the conqueror, and acknowledged Artaxerxes for their sovereign; all but Amyrtæus; he retreated with a party into the Fens, where he ruled many years; not in the least molested by the Persians, who were never able to get at him through the inaccessibleness of the place.

IN the mean time Inarus and his auxiliaries on the island of Prosopitis were busy <sup>Inarus taken</sup> in defending themselves against the Persians, who attacked them with great-vigour: <sup>prisoner, and</sup> But these finding that bare strength was not like to effectuate a reduction of the be- <sup>Egypt reduced</sup> sieged, had recourse to art and stratagem; for, draining the branch of the Nile in <sup>again to the</sup> which the Athenian fleet rode, they at once rendered the shipping useless, and made a passage, by which the whole body of their army might march over to the island. When Inarus saw this, he, and all the Egyptians and fifty of his Athenian auxiliaries delivered themselves up to Megabyzus, on the condition of being secured in their lives: The rest of the Athenians, being six thousand in number, set fire to their ships, resolved to die sword in hand; which the Persians perceiving, thought it advisable to offer them some reasonable terms: And this they did, and their proposals were accepted<sup>6</sup>. The Athenians had sent a fleet of fifty sail to relieve the island of Prosopitis, where their citizens were in conjunction with the Egyptians; but they arrived f too late, and as soon as they entered the river, were assaulted by the Persians, both on the river, and from the shore; so that they all perished<sup>7</sup>. And thus ended the war between Inarus king of Egypt and Artaxerxes king of Persia, under whom the Egyptians ever afterwards remained quiet, and made no attempts to recover their liberties. Sartamas was appointed governour of Egypt, and Inarus was carried prisoner to Susa, and was there crucified, notwithstanding the promise he had of his life when he surrendered<sup>8</sup>.

AMYRTEUS the Saïte in the mean time held the Fens, and in the fifteenth year of Artaxerxes, was joined by a fleet of sixty sail of Athenian ships<sup>c</sup>; but nothing of moment was transacted at this time to the prejudice of the Persians in Egypt.

<sup>1</sup> HEROD. lib. 7.    <sup>2</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>3</sup> THUCYDID. lib. 1. CTESIUS.    <sup>4</sup> THUCYDID. ubi sup. CTESIUS. DIOD. SIC. l. xi.    <sup>5</sup> CTESIUS DIOD. ubi sup. p. 281.    <sup>6</sup> THUCYDID. ubi sup. CTESIUS. DIOD. ubi sup. p. 282.    <sup>7</sup> THUCYDID. ubi sup.    <sup>8</sup> CTESIUS.

The Egyptians revolt a third time, and Amyrtæus
heads them.

In the tenth year of Darius Nolbus the Egyptians revolted once more from the Persians. For Amyrtæus being apprized of the discontents of the Egyptians, and that they were ripe for any attempts to regain their liberty and independance, sallied out of his Fens, and being joined by all the Egyptians, he drove the Persians out of the kingdom, and became king of Egypt in its full extent<sup>d</sup>.

Year of the
flood, 2583.
Year before
Christ, 416.

Amyrtæus
king.
Pausiris.

AMYRTÆUS thus in possession of the kingdom of Egypt by the total expulsion of the Persians, resolved to attack them in Phœnicia also, having the Arabians in confederacy with him in this undertaking<sup>e</sup>. But he was engaged by Darius in person and overthrown; about which time Amyrtæus either died or was slain in the battle.

PAUSIRIS his son succeeded him in the kingdom, with the consent of the Persians<sup>f</sup>. And now the Egyptians, though perhaps tributary to the Persians, had a governour of their own nation to alleviate the burthen of it.

PSAMMITICHUS succeeded Pausiris. He was descended from the famous Psammitichus, whose history we have given above. He was a barbarous and ungrateful man, as appears by the only incident we have of his reign; For Tamus, who had been admiral in the Persian service, though he was a Memphite by birth, thinking it advisable for reasons of state to leave the Persian service, and confiding in the friendship of Psammitichus, whom he had formerly obliged by many friendly offices, put all his family and effects on board his ships, and sailed for Egypt. But when Psammitichus heard of his arrival, and that he had brought great riches with him, he, unmindful of what Tamus merited of him, and of all the laws of humanity and hospitality, fell upon him as an enemy; and having slain him, his family and all his followers, seized on those treasures which Tamus hoped to have enjoyed in his native country<sup>g</sup>. This is all we know concerning this cruel prince.

Nephereus.

NEPHEREUS was his successor. This king was invited by the Lacedæmonians into a confederacy against the Persians; and he sent them a squadron of an hundred gallies to carry on the war by sea, and 600,000 measures [busbels] of corn for the subsistence of their army; but the vessels which were laden with this valuable present ignorantly putting into Rhodes, whose inhabitants had just then thrown themselves under the protection of the Persian fleet, which then rode at anchor there under the command of Conon the Athenian, they fell a prey to him, and never reached the Lacedæmonians<sup>h</sup>.

Acoris.

ACORIS succeeded Nephereus. He joined in league with Euagoras king of Cyprus, and the Arabians and Tyrians, and Barcæans, a people of Libya, against the Persians. Acoris sent some forces to the assistance of Euagoras, the chief of this confederacy, who being defeated, came into Egypt to engage Acoris to assist him with his utmost strength; but Acoris could not be prevailed on to come so totally into his measures, and dismissed him therefore with a supply of money, by no means equal to the necessities of that distressed prince. Soon after Gaus, the only survivor of the family of Tamus, whom Psammitichus murdered for the sake of his wealth, and as well as his father had been now promoted to the degree of an admiral in the Persian service, being disgusted at the ill usage of Tiribazus the king of Persia's general in the former part of the Cyprian war against Euagoras, revolted from the Persians, in which he was followed by a great part of the fleet and army; and entered into a league with Acoris and the Lacedæmonians. But the year after Gaus was treacherously slain by some under him; and Tachos, who had undertaken to execute the same project, dying in the midst of it, the whole fell to the ground, and the Persians were freed from the troublesome effects which threatened them from this new alliance<sup>i</sup>.

It was now thirty years since the Egyptians had shaken off the Persian yoke under Amyrtæus, and had all along, upon all occasions, signalized their aversion to the Persian government. But Artaxerxes Mnemon being at full leisure to chastise them, they once more were threatened with a cruel war. Great preparations were made on both sides. Acoris joined a great number of Greeks and other mercenaries, under the command of Cabrias the Athenian, to his own subjects<sup>j</sup>; but the Persians being

<sup>c</sup> PLUTARCH in vita Cimon. THUCYDID. ubi supr. DIOD. ubi supr. p. <sup>d</sup> EUSEBIUS in Chronico. <sup>e</sup> DIOD. SIC. lib. 13. p. 355. <sup>f</sup> HEROD. lib. 3. <sup>g</sup> DIOD. SIC. lib. 14. p. 415. <sup>h</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 438. JUSTIN. lib. 6. c. 2. OROSIUS lib. 3. <sup>i</sup> THEOPOMP. in Excerpt. Photii. DIOD. SIC. lib. 15. p. 459. <sup>j</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>k</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 471.

- a dilatory in their proceedings as usual, Acoris died before it commenced, and was succeeded by

PSAMMUTHIS, who reigned only a year<sup>a</sup>

Psammuthis.

AFTER him NEPHEROTES (who is called the last of the Mendesian race) reigned four months<sup>b</sup>.

AND then NECTANEBIS, the first of the Sebennytic race*. In the second year of his reign the Persian army and fleet came upon his coasts and borders, and made attempts first upon Pelusium: But Nectanebis having had time sufficient to prepare himself, that city and the county about it, were so well provided for the reception of an enemy, that no impression could be made there. The commanders on the Persian side differing in their counsels, and entertaining jealousies of each other's glory, they did nothing in this war; for, though they entered the Mendesian mouth of the Nile, and possessed themselves of the fortress that guarded it, and struck the Egyptians with the utmost consternation; yet they gave them time to recover heart again: For Nectanebis lodged a sufficient garrison in Memphis, and taking the field, with the rest of his forces, so annoyed Pharnabazus the Persian general, that he could make no considerable progress up the country; and the Nile, at the accustomed period, overflowing the land, the Persians were obliged to march off; which they did with considerable loss<sup>c</sup>. Thus ended this war.

- b an side differing in their counsels, and entertaining jealousies of each other's glory, they did nothing in this war; for, though they entered the Mendesian mouth of the Nile, and possessed themselves of the fortress that guarded it, and struck the Egyptians with the utmost consternation; yet they gave them time to recover heart again: For Nectanebis lodged a sufficient garrison in Memphis, and taking the field, with the rest of his forces, so annoyed Pharnabazus the Persian general, that he could make no considerable progress up the country; and the Nile, at the accustomed period, overflowing the land, the Persians were obliged to march off; which they did with considerable loss<sup>c</sup>. Thus ended this war.

- c ABOUT five years afterwards Agésilas king of Sparta came as an ambassador to Nectanebis to solicit succours for the Lacedæmonians, then driven to great distress by the Thebans<sup>d</sup>. Seven years after this Nectanebis died.

TACHOS succeeded him. He gathered together all the strength he was able, to defend his country against the ambitious designs of the Persians, who, notwithstanding their many miscarriages, had not laid aside the thoughts of subjecting Egypt to their dominion once more. To strengthen himself the better, he sent to Greece to raise mercenaries; and succeeded so well in his application to the Lacedæmonians, that they dispatched a good number of forces to him, under the command of Agésilas<sup>e</sup>. Tachos had promised this king, that he should be generalissimo of all the forces; but upon the first interview, he conceived such disadvantageous ideas of the good old Monarch,

- d that he thenceforward slighted his counsels, and despised his person. He expected to have seen a gay and magnificent man, whose habit and train were equal to the same and splendor of his exploits, and not a plain, mean-looking old man. This hasty and ill-grounded impression may be properly enough said to have been the ruin of Tachos, as will be plainly seen. For Tachos allowed Agésilas to be nothing but general over the mercenaries at land, which alone had been sufficient to disgust so great, so old, and so experienced a commander, and was the first cause of his aversion to Tachos. The command of the fleet he gave to Chabrias the Albenian, reserving to himself the supreme direction of all. Having joined his mercenaries and Egyptians together, he marched out of Egypt, designing to attack the Persians in Phœnicia, contrary to the advice of Agésilas, who represented to him the unsettled state of Egypt, and remonstrated how much more it would be for his interest to manage the war by lieutenants, and stay himself in his kingdom. The event shewed, that Agésilas's counsels was the result of a very prudent forecast; for while Tachos was in Phœnicia the Egyptians revolted, and set up his kinsman Nectanebus in his stead. Agésilas taking this opportunity to vent his resentment against Tachos, joined Nectanebus, and deprived the other of his kingdom, who fled through Arabia, and went to the king of Persia.

- f NECTANEBUS was scarce seated on the throne when a Mendesian rose up in opposition to him with a force consisting of 100,000 men. Nectanebus was now advised by Agésilas to fall on them immediately, and disperse them before they had formed themselves into a regular body by discipline: But he took it into his head, that Agésilas intended to betray him, as he had betrayed Tachos, and therefore gave no ear to him. In the mean time the enemy gathered strength and regular order, every day, and became so formidable a body, that Nectanebus was constrained to shut himself up in one of his towns, and endure a siege. He would now have urged Agésilas to sally out upon the besiegers, that putting them into disorder, he might in the mean time march out himself and take the field : And because he refused to comply, Neftanebus grew more and more jealous of him. The enemy had run their lines almost round the town ; which when Agefilaus perceived, he told Neftanebus, that now was his time to sally out ; that by the line the besiegers had raised, they would not be able to encompass him ; and that the gap which was not yet filled up, was wide enough for him to march through with safety and convenience. Hereupon a battle ensued, in which the besiegers were defeated ; and the remaining part of the war being left to the management of Agefilaus, Neftanebus's competitor was every where driven out of the field, and at length taken prisoner. And thus was Neftanebus settled in the full and quiet possession of the kingdom of Egypt.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 253. <sup>b</sup> See before, ibid. <sup>c</sup> See before, ibid. <sup>d</sup> DIOD. ubi sup. p. 478, 479. CORNEL. NEPOS, in Iphicrate. <sup>e</sup> PLUTARCH. in Agésilas. <sup>f</sup> Idem. ibid. DIOD. ubi sup. p. 506.

He is joined by the Sidonians, Phœnicians, and Cypriots, against the Persians.

In the twelfth year of his reign, the Sidonians and Phœnicians revolted from the king of Persia, and entered into a confederacy with him against that monarch. This happened very opportunely for him ; for as the Persians had been in constant agitation against him, and were now making vast preparations to reduce Egypt, he had a very good barrier, seeing the Persian forces could not approach his borders, but by marching through Phœnicia. Therefore, to keep up their spirits, Neftanebus detached a body of four thousand Greek mercenaries under the command of Mentor the Rhodian, to join them, in hopes to manage the war at a distance. The Phœnicians, encouraged by this supply, drove the Persians out of their territories ; and immediately after, the Cypriots joined in the alliance against Persia. Darius Oebus finding that his lieutenants made no progress in the suppression of these revolters, resolved to head his troops in person, keeping his eye chiefly upon Egypt. Mentor the Rhodian when he heard this, and the prodigious numbers of the Persian army, went over to the king of Persia, by whom he was kindly received, as one who might do him signal service by his knowledge of the country of Egypt, and every thing that related to it : But we are not now on the affairs of Persia, which will be particularly treated in their proper place ; let us therefore turn our eyes towards Neftanebus. When he found that the king of Persia was thoroughly resolved to ruin him, and that he was by all means endeavouring to do it without interruption, and effectually, he got together an army of 100,000 men, consisting of 20,000 mercenaries from Greece, as many from Libya, and the rest Egyptians ; but all of them did not amount to a third part of the

Is invaded by the Persians.

Persian army. With some of them he garrisoned his frontier-towns, and with the others he guarded the passes through which the Persians were to march. The Persian detached three bodies from his army. The first of them commanded by Lachares the Theban, sat down before Pelusium, garrisoned by five thousand Greeks. The second, under the command of Nicostratus the Argive, embarked on board a squadron of the Persian fleet, and sailing up the Nile into the midst of the country, landed there, and entrenched themselves strongly. Hereupon the whole country being alarmed, Clinius of the island of Cos mustered all the neighbouring garrisons, and offered to dislodge Nicostratus from his intrenchments. This led them to a battle, which was fought with great obstinacy ; but at last the Egyptians gave way, having lost Clinius and five thousand more of their number, and were utterly broken and dispersed. The loss of this battle was the ruin of Egypt. For when Neftanebus heard it, he drew off from the passes, where he had very prudently posted himself, and marched for Memphis to defend that city against Nicostratus, who he feared had a design upon that capital with his victorious fleet and army. When the Greek garrison in Pelusium heard that Neftanebus had deserted his post, they thought there was no further room for hope ; and therefore they came to a parley with Lachares, and delivered up the city to him, upon condition that they and their effects should be safely conveyed to Greece. Mentor the Rhodian who commanded the third body of the Persian detachment, finding the passes unguarded, entered the country through them, and causing it to be universally spread abroad, That Oebus would graciously receive all that submitted ; but put to the sword such as resisted, as he had been known to have done before ; but the Egyptians and the Egyptian Greeks strove which should make the most early, and humble submission. This when Neftanebus saw, he was driven to despair, and taking what treasure he could carry with him, he fled from his palace in Memphis into Ethiopia, and never returned more. He was the last native Egyptian who governed Egypt, which has ever since been under foreign subjection.

And thus into Ethiopia.
Egypt finally reduced by the Persians.
Year of the
Flood, 2642.
Year before
Christ 337.

Neftanebus lost his kingdom by relying too much on himself. He, as hath been shewn, was seated on the throne by Agefilaus : His wars against Persia (for they were always attempting a reduction of Egypt) were managed by the prudence and va-

Idem ibid. PLUTARCH. ubi supr. * DIOD. lib. 16. p. 531, 532, 533. † Idem ubi supr. p. 532.

a our of Diopbantus the Albenian, and Lamius the Lacedæmonian; but arrogating to himself a share of their successes, he took upon him to act from his own notions and so brought ruin upon himself, and ignominy and slavery upon his subjects. For henceforward Egypt was a province of Persia, till Alexander subverted that monarchy and was received by the Egyptians with open arms, as their deliverer from the Persian tyranny. They never had any tolerable understanding with that nation; which, it is likely, may have partly, if not chiefly, been owing to the wide difference between them in religious matters. We now conclude this section with the severe prediction of the prophet; There shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt.*

* Idem ubi supr. p. 534, 535. * Ezek. xxx. 13.

SECT. VI.

The succession of the kings of Egypt, according to the oriental historians.

b THE oriental history of Egypt differs so widely from that which is derived to us from the Greeks, that as it would be inexcusable to pass it entirely by; so to have mixed it with what we have lately transcribed from western historians, would have served only to increase that confusion which we have seen to be inexplicable already. Here therefore we intend to treat distinctly of the Egyptian history as it is represented to us by oriental authors; but we do not pretend to vouch for what we copy from them, or to make ourselves accountable for the difficulties which will at first sight arise from the accounts we are about to give. The Arabian and Persian writers pretend to draw their materials from the chronicles of the ancient Copts; they have therefore a just right to our attention, provided what they relate be credible in itself; if not, we are sure it cannot be more fabulous than the tales we have already heard from Manetho and the Greeks. No reason therefore can be assigned why we should prefer those to these, or why we should account the study of eastern fables folly at the same time that we dignify the reasonings of able men, on the unintelligible stories of the Greeks, with the specious name of learning<sup>a</sup>.

c It must be allowed, that there are many more original histories of this country to be found (even in Europe) in the oriental tongues, than are yet to be met with in Greek. It must likewise be granted, that the former are more methodical, more copious, and though in many things they may be as fabulous, yet experience hath demonstrated, that they contain as much, or more truth. The nature of this work will not allow us to unravel again the geography, natural history, and antiquities of Egypt, in order to demonstrate the justice of this assertion; and therefore, we shall content ourselves with a note on this subject, and pass on immediately to the proper matter of the section, (viz.) the history of the Egyptian kings in that order in which the most celebrated of the oriental writers have given them. (A)

<sup>a</sup> See the whole III. and IV. § in this chapter, and compare them with what follows.

(A) It is certainly without any great justice, that some over nice writers amongst the moderns, inveigh with such bitterness against the oriental authors in general, as if they wrote altogether without method, and delighted in nothing but prodigies and fables. What we have asserted above, is a fact of such unquestionable truth, that several sheets might be spent in forming the catalogue of all the oriental writers who have come even to our knowledge; but as we are by no means fond of perplexing our readers with useless citations, we will content ourselves with only marking a few, that they may be assured they are not imposed upon, but that the thing is as we represent it. The famous Khondemir wrote in the Persian tongue a universal history, under the title of a collection of the purest and most authentic accounts of the most remarkable events, drawn from the best ancient historians. This body of history was divided into twelve parts. The first, which was a kind of preface, contained the cosmogony. The second, the history of the prophets. The third, a chronological history of learning and learned men. The fourth, an account of the ancient monarchs of Persia, and of their kingdoms before Mohammed, in which we have an account of Egypt. This author finished his work A. D. 1471. and we beg leave to say, there were few authors in Europe, at that time, who could have wrote more methodically. As to the particular histories of Egypt, we will mention only two. The first, relating to the country, the latter, to its monarchs. The first is that of Abmed Al Makrizi; he divided his book into seven parts. 1. He treated of the land of Egypt and its revenues. 2. Of its inhabitants. 3. Of the ancient Babylon in Egypt. 4. Of the city of Caire as it was in the time of the author. 5. Of the revolutions which had happened in Caire. 6. Of the castle of Caire, and of the princes who have resided therein. 7. Of the causes which have induced the ruin of Egypt. He wrote besides a copious history of all that happened in this country from the time it fell under the dominion of the Caliphs, to the year in which he died, viz. of the Hefira, 845. A. D. 1441. The other, Joussuf Ben Tagri Wirdi, who obtained the glorious surname of Monazakh Mejr, i. e. The historian of Egypt, by a work he composed in four volumes, containing the entire history of this country to the year 1449. Of which work he also made an abridgment, fearing, as he expresses it in his title, that it might be mutilated by another. The larger history was translated into Turkish by the command of the emperor Selim, which is sufficient to shew, that in the east there is no want either of historians, patrons, or critics, however barbarous we are pleased to think them. (1)

(1) Vid. HERBELOT, Biblioth. Orient. Artic. Mejr, Macrizi, Joussuf Ben Tagri.

In the first place we must take notice, that these authors divide the ancient Egyptian monarchs into three classes. The first of these are said to have ruled in this country before the creation of Adam, and amongst these they place Gian Ben Gian, to whom they ascribe the pyramids<sup>b</sup>. We shall not dwell at all upon this opinion, because it is certainly void of all foundation; that is, taking it in the light in which we are here obliged to consider it, viz. of an historical fact; but in itself this notion is no more ridiculous than that of Descartes concerning the origine of this world, which does not differ very far from it: For, if the earth was heretofore quite a different mass from what at present it is, and was afterwards reduced into a chaos from whence this world arose in the state it now is<sup>c</sup>, that body of matter, might, for ought we know, be inhabited by a race of beings such as the Arabs stile Gin, the Persians Gin-mian, and the Turks Ginber; that is to say, these stories, in our opinion, are alike incredible, and alike ingenious.

The second class of Egyptian kings are said to have reigned before the deluge. The account that is given of the people of this country in these early times stands thus: Kraus, who stood in the fifth degree from Adam, growing into dislike of the conduct of these who inhabited the country wherein he was born, drew together a company of seventy eight persons, and removing into Egypt, cleared that country of its woods, and finding it equally pleasant and fruitful, built the city of Mesr, so called from the name of his father, which he made the capital of his new kingdom. Authors are not agreed whether he derived from Cain, or from some other son of Adam; but the greatest part of them incline to think he was a Cainite of a gigantic stature, which opinion of theirs seems not altogether irreconcilable to the writings of Moses<sup>d</sup>. He is said to have reigned 180 years, but in what year of the world he acceded to the throne is not said. To him succeeded his son Tegur, or as others call him Natras, of whom we find nothing recorded that deserves mention.

MESRAM, whom some call the son, others the brother of the last mentioned prince, succeeded him; he was a great magician, and is said to have performed many strange things, and dying, left both his skill and his crown to his son.

GANCAM. He was a priest, a philosopher and magician, and in his reign it is said Enoch was translated. He had for his successor his son<sup>e</sup>.

ARTAK, who excelled all his predecessors in his skill in the occult sciences, by dint of which, it is pretended, that he did many wonders. We must remember that all the eastern historians agree in this notion, that the study of magic, and commerce with spirits, was the great crime of the Antediluvians; in which, if we may so speak, they are supported by those writings which go under the name of the patriarchs, particularly, that treatise which is ascribed to Enoch. It is likewise said, that in the reign of this Egyptian monarch, the angels, Harut and Marut, descended from heaven, and conversed with men, which is likewise of a piece with what is recorded in the book beforementioned; whence it appears, that these fables are very ancient, and have been generally received, no doubt, because they were forged from some hints in the mosaic writings<sup>f</sup>.

His son Louchanam succeeded him, and performed nothing worthy of notice.

CHASALIM, or as some call him, Hafsim, the son of Louchanam, is celebrated for his invention of the Nilometer; which, without question, passed for a wonderful effect of magic in those days.

HARSAL, or as others call him, Hufal, the son of Chasalim, reigned over his people with great lenity; and in his reign it is said the prophet Noah was born.

IADONSAC succeeded Harsal; of him we are told, that he first thought of rendering the Nile of greater use by cutting canals, which is thus far probable, the inland parts of Egypt being by this time thoroughly peopled, must necessarily require such an assistance.

SEMROND received the crown from his father Jadonsac; but of him we know nothing more, than that he transmitted it to his son.

SARIAC, or Sarkak, who left it to

SAHALUC, or Sablick, a famous monarch, of whom, very probably, we should have had some notable account, had not his glory been eclipsed by that of his son and successor.

SAURID, a monarch equally remarkable for his wisdom, justice and power. He

<sup>b</sup> TARIEH AL THABARI. <sup>c</sup> See CHAMBERS's dictionary Artic. VORTÈX. <sup>d</sup> EBN. ABD AL HOKM. ap. Greaves pyramid: & MURTAD EBN GAF. in mirabil. pyramid. <sup>e</sup> EBN ABD AL HOKM. ubi supra Khondemir in Khelassat Alakhar. mirabil. pyramid. <sup>f</sup> Vid. lib. Enoch. ap. Fabric. Pseudepigraph. veter. testament. HERBELOT, biblioth. orient. art. Edris. mirabil. pyramid.

In the first place we must take notice, that these authors divide the ancient Egyptian <sup>a</sup> monarchs into three classes. The first of these are said to have ruled in this country before the creation of Adam, and amongst these they place Gian Ben Gian, to whom they ascribe the pyramids <sup>b</sup>. We shall not dwell at all upon this opinion, because it is certainly void of all foundation; that is, taking it in the light in which we are here obliged to consider it, viz. of an historical fact; but in itself this notion is no more ridiculous than that of Descartes concerning the origine of this world, which does not differ very far from it: For, if the earth was heretofore quite a different mass from what at present it is, and was afterwards reduced into a chaos from whence this world arose in the state it now is<sup>c</sup>, that body of matter, might, for ought we know, be inhabited by a race of beings such as the Arabs stile Gin, the Persians Gin-b nian, and the Turks Ginber; that is to say, these stories, in our opinion, are alike incredible, and alike ingenious.

The second class of Egyptian kings are said to have reigned before the deluge. The account that is given of the people of this country in these early times stands thus: Kraus, who stood in the fifth degree from Adam, growing into dislike of the conduct of these who inhabited the country wherein he was born, drew together a company of seventy eight persons, and removing into Egypt, cleared that country of its woods, and finding it equally pleasant and fruitful, built the city of Mesr, so called from the name of his father, which he made the capital of his new kingdom. Authors are not agreed whether he derived from Cain, or from some other son of Adam; <sup>c</sup> but the greatest part of them incline to think he was a Cainite of a gigantic stature, which opinion of theirs seems not altogether irreconcilable to the writings of Moses <sup>d</sup>. He is said to have reigned 180 years, but in what year of the world he acceded to the throne is not said. To him succeeded his son Tegar, or as others call him Natras, of whom we find nothing recorded that deserves mention.

MESRAM, whom some call the son, others the brother of the last mentioned prince, succeeded him; he was a great magician, and is said to have performed many strange things, and dying, left both his skill and his crown to his son.

GANCAM. He was a priest, a philosopher and magician, and in his reign it is said Enoch was translated. He had for his successor his son<sup>e</sup>.

ARTAK, who excelled all his predecessors in his skill in the occult sciences, by dint of which, it is pretended, that he did many wonders. We must remember that all the eastern historians agree in this notion, that the study of magic, and commerce with spirits, was the great crime of the Antediluvians; in which, if we may so speak, they are supported by those writings which go under the name of the patriarchs, particularly, that treatise which is ascribed to Enoch. It is likewise said, that in the reign of this Egyptian monarch, the angels, Harut and Marut, descended from heaven, and conversed with men, which is likewise of a piece with what is recorded in the book beforementioned; whence it appears, that these fables are very ancient, and have been generally received, no doubt, because they were forged from <sup>e</sup> some hints in the mosaic writings <sup>f</sup>.

His son Louchanam succeeded him, and performed nothing worthy of notice.

CHASALIM, or as some call him, Husilim, the son of Louchanam, is celebrated for his invention of the Nilometer; which, without question, passed for a wonderful effect of magic in those days.

HARSAL, or as others call him, Husal, the son of Chasalim, reigned over his people with great lenity; and in his reign it is said the prophet Noah was born.

IADONSAC succeeded Harsal; of him we are told, that he first thought of rendering the Nile of greater use by cutting canals, which is thus far probable, the inland parts of Egypt being by this time thoroughly peopled, must necessarily require <sup>f</sup> such an assistance.

SEMROND received the crown from his father Iadonsac; but of him we know nothing more, than that he transmitted it to his son.

SARIAC, or Sarkak, who left it to

SAHALUC, or Sablick, a famous monarch, of whom, very probably, we should have had some notable account, had not his glory been eclipsed by that of his son and successor.

SAURID, a monarch equally remarkable for his wisdom, justice and power. He

<sup>b</sup> TARICH AL THABARI. <sup>c</sup> See CHAMBERS'S dictionary Artic. VORTEX. <sup>d</sup> ENN. ABD AL HOKM. ap. Greaves pyramid: & MURTAD ENN GAF. in mirabil. pyramid. <sup>e</sup> ENN ABD AL HOKM. ubi supra KHONDEMIR in Khelassat Alakhhar. mirabil. pyramid. <sup>f</sup> Vid. lib. Enoch. ap. Fabric. Pseu- dipigraph. veter. testament. HERBELOT, biblioth. orient. art. Edris. mirabil. pyramid.

adjacencies according to this History

- a is said to have dreamt that he saw the earth with all its inhabitants subverted; the men lying on their faces, the stars falling from heaven, and all things filled with discord and confusion. A year after he had a second dream of this sort, which so affrighted him, that he immediately summoned the most learned of the priests together, with all the wise men and professors of the occult sciences in Egypt. To them he related his dreams, and besought them to inform him what they portended. These sages having consulted together, and having taken all the necessary precautions for satisfying the king's request, declared to him at length, that a mighty deluge would cover the earth, and that the effects thereof had been represented to him in his dreams. The king, when he had heard and considered this, caused pyramids and other prodigious
- b structures to be erected, to serve for places of refuge for himself and his domesticks, as also for sepulchres wherein to conserve their bodies. He likewise designed to cover the roofs and the walls of these places with hieroglyphick lectures, explanatory of all the various sciences known to the Egyptians, as invaluable treasures set apart, and consecrated to the service of posterity. He likewise designed to represent the figure of the stars, the celestial signs, with their Effects and significations, the secrets of nature, the productions of art, the virtues of drugs, and the fundamental propositions in geometry. In consequence of this project, he built the three great pyramids; and of the manner of building of these, and of the subterraneous apartments allotted to each of them, the author from whom we take this account, gives a large and parti-
- c cular description. He concludes it with observing, that the Egyptians built these prodigious structures in the fulness of their prosperity, when they were extremely numerous, and proportionably rich. When they were compleated, Saurid caused them to be covered with silks of several colours from the top to the bottom, proclaiming on this occasion a general feast which lasted a considerable time, and to which, our author tells us, all the inhabitants of Egypt resorted. When this feast was over, the king caused thirty great vessels made of a kind of artificial green stone, to be placed in the bottom of the eastern pyramid. These vessels he filled with all kinds of jewels and precious stones, and then placing covers over them, he poured over these melted lead, scattering on the floor a considerable number of pieces of gold to delude the
- d eyes of any greedy intruder, and to hinder them from prying into the vessels. The second pyramid he made the receptacle of all that related to civil history, laying up the books and records in such vessels as he had laid up his jewels. In the third pyramid he collected whatsoever related to their ecclesiastical history, and to the sublime sciences. In all of them he laid up mighty treasures, and disposed in them all things fit for the reception of a prince who should fly thither for shelter, and appointed also in the middle of them convenient places for the interment of him and his domesticks. These, and many other particulars, are said to be taken from the ancient books of the Copts; wherein it is also recorded, that Saurid reigned three hundred years before the deluge, and that he governed Egypt one hundred and seven years. When
- e he found himself near the time of his dissolution, he sent for his son into his presence, and having made before him a long discourse of the duty of a king, and of the regard which he owed to him as his father and his sovereign, he then directed that his corps should be carried into his pyramid; that the room in which it should be laid, should be strewed with camphire and santal-wood; that his body should be embalmed with spices, and that his rich armour, and whatever valuable things he had used about his person, might be left in the same room. All which directions were punctually complied with.

His son and successor HARGIB, whom some writers call HUGIB, and will have to be his brother, governed according to the instructions the deceased king Saurid

f had given him, being no less careful to secure the hearts of his subjects by a kind and gentle administration, than he was to secure their prosperity by ruling wisely and justly. He is said to have built the first of the pyramids of Debasoura, into which he caused immense wealth, and a vast quantity of precious stones to be brought, and there interred, as his father Saurid had done. His favourite science was chymistry; and it is reported, that he had the art of multiplying gold, whereby he filled his Treasury, after he had adorned his kingdom with many magnificent structures. He governed Egypt ninety nine years, and after his death was interred in the pyramids. His successor was his son

MENAS, or as others call Mankaus, one who deviated widely from the Exam-g ples of his father and grandfather, being excessively proud, intollerably insolent, and outrageously cruel. Many women of quality he ravished, slew many of the most deserving of his subjects, and wasted in scandalous debauches a large proportion of a that treasure which his ancestors had drawn together, and set apart for publick uses. At last, he came to such a height of folly and extravagance, that he built palaces of gold and silver, into which he brought canals from the Nile; the bottoms of which were covered with precious stones, that glittered through the water in the eyes of the spectators. To maintain all this, he had recourse to all the arts of tyranny and oppression, whereby he became excessively hated by his subjects, who were wonderfully rejoiced when the king's horse started, threw him, and broke his neck: However, they did not alter the succession, but raised to the throne his son

* SEN ABD AL HOKM. ubi supra, mirabil pyramid.

ECROS, of whom we have little or no account; only it is rendered probable, that he was as great a tyrant as his father by the course his subjects took to secure b themselves: For either on his death or deposition, they laid aside hereditary sovereignties, and made choice of a person who was of the royal family, on whom they bestowed the crown.

ERMELINOUS, whom some call Malinus, having thus attained the regal dignity, governed with lenity and justice; and on his decease the Egyptians submitted to FIRAOUN, who was the cousin of the late king, and the last monarch in Egypt who ruled before the deluge. He was a most tyrannical prince, and looked upon his subjects in no other light than that of slaves, destined to do whatever he thought fit to command them. Religion and justice were almost forgotten under his base and luxurious administration; and when he was informed that Noab had preached c repentance and amendment of life, threatening the disobedient with destruction by water, he wrote to king Darmasel, in whose dominions the prophet dwelt, to put Noab to death, and burn the ark which he was building. However the high priest of Egypt, who had read and considered the sacred books carefully, being persuaded in his mind, that what Noab had threatned would certainly come to pass, procured himself to be sent to enforce the counsel given to Darmasel, whereby he had an opportunity of joining himself to Noab, and of matching his daughter in his Family, as will be hereafter shewn. When the deluge came, Egypt was overspread with d luxury, and the king was so excessively drunk, that he had not a perfect idea of his danger till the moment that he was swallowed up and drowned. The description these writers give of the deluge is very frightful; and they affirm, that the waters continued upon the earth for eleven months, and that it happened two thousand one hundred fifty six years after the creation <sup>e</sup>.

The Kings of Egypt after the deluge.

WHEN Noab and those that were with him came out of the ark, the high priest of Egypt besought him to send their grandson Banfar or Beifar, with him into Egypt, speaking to him wonderful things of the pleasantness, fertility and riches of that country, which quickly induced Noab to grant him his request. On their arrival in his native country, the Egyptian priest explained to them the nature of the Nile, the necessity of cutting canals, the peculiar method of cultivating and improving that soil, the means of opening the pyramids and other sacred edifices, and the manner of reaching the true sense of the inscriptions, and of acquiring the sciences which the ancient Antidiluvians had possessed. Banfar, by the direction of this priest, settled himself in this country, which he wonderfully improved, or rather retrieved, building for the place of his residence, and the capitol of his dominions, a large and beautiful city, which was afterwards called Memphis; but had then no other name than that of Masar or Mefr, which signifies the great city; and a son being born to him while he was employed in this work, he called him Masar or Mefr, who succeeded f him in the kingdom, and was the great restorer of Egypt.

SOME oriental writers vary in their account of this matter, attributing the settlement of Egypt entirely to Masar, to whom they say it was solemnly assigned by his sovereign ancestor Noab, to whom he was not a little dear, on account of his great capacity, and the innocency of his manners; insomuch, that Noab having cursed Cham his Grandfather, and breathed out many bitter execrations against him and his posterity, on Masar's interposition he retracted them with regard to him; and in a pathetick address to God, besought him to bless and preserve this young man, and to give him all the riches of the land of the river. However this might be, Masar g

<sup>a</sup> TARIRK AL THABABRI. mirabil. pyramid: AL SOYUT. <sup>b</sup> Mirabil. pyramid: TARIRK AL THABARI.

- a certainly established the form of government which afterwards subsisted in Egypt, built various cities, and amassed together great treasures. When he found himself near his end, he, by his will, divided the kingdom into several little sovereignties. One district he gave to his son Coptim, or rather Kibt, whose descendents are called Copts. To his son Asmoumus, whom some call Asmun, he gave the Upper Egypt. And to his son Abribus, or Attrib, he gave the flat country, and the fens beyond Barod, directing each of them to erect a fair city in his territory for the place of his residence, and to take all imaginable pains to improve and fertilize the adjacent country. He likewise gave orders about the manner of his own burial; pursuant to which, when he expired, his sons laid his body in a cave a hundred and fifty cubits long; which cave they filled with treasures and precious stones, causing this inscription to be engraven on a plate of gold, which was placed upon the marble monument within which the body lay. Masar the son of Bansar, the son of Cbaus, the son of Noah, died aged seven hundred years from the days of the deluge. Of this king they report, that he was a most wise, just and pious person, having never done the least wrong to any of his subjects, or bent his knee to any idol, but living without care, sorrow or sickness, till by the course of nature he was removed from this into another state, having first seen a multitude of people descended from his own loyns, and leaving several flourishing kingdoms to his children*.

- To Masar succeeded his son Coptim, but how long he governed, or what he performed, is not known. He was succeeded by his son

COPTARIM, of whom likewise we have no memoirs; and therefore we shall only say, that his son Budefir succeeded him, as he was succeeded by his son Gad, or Gadim; after whom, Sedeth his son ascended the throne, whose son and successor was Mancaous, whose son Casaous reigned after him, and on his decease his son Marbis, in whose stead reigned Asmar, then Citin, whose son Elfabas was his successor, who left the throne to Sa. This monarch built the city of Sais, and settled the Egyptian constitution. He was succeeded by his son Malil, after whom reigned Hadares; then his son Cheribas, to whom succeeded Calcan.

- TOTIS*, or as he is generally called Tulis, succeeded his father Calcan. He it was who governed the kingdom of Egypt when Ibrahim came down thither with his wife Sarab, whose beauty, even after she was past her bloom, struck all beholders with wonder. On their coming to Mesr, the capital of the kingdom, notice was presently given to Tulis, that a stranger was arrived, who had with him a woman the most beautiful that had ever been beheld. The king presently sent for Ibrahim, and having demanded of him what relation the woman stood in towards him, the prophet answered, that she was his sister. Then Tulis directed that she should be brought to him, which was accordingly done; but when he put out his hand with an intent to touch her, he found it suddenly shrunk and withered; whereupon apprehending that he was deceived, he besought Sarab to pray for him that his hand might be restored, which she did, and the king drew back his hand sound and well. Tulis then demanded of her in what degree she was related to Ibrahim. I am, said she, his wife. Why then, said he, did he deceive me, in saying that you was his sister? He did not delude thee, O king, replied she: For in that I am of the same religion, I am his sister in God, and the sister of every man who believes the unity of the godhead. Which answer so well pleased the king, that he sent for Ibrahim, and was instructed in his religion. We are farther informed, that this king of Egypt had an only daughter, a princess of great parts, and of a mild and pleasant temper; she was extremely delighted with the company of Sarab, and would have made her many and great presents, had she not, by the command of her husband positively declined them. The princess however obliged her to accept a female slave whose name was Hagar, and who was afterwards the mother of Ishmael. After the departure of Ibrahim and his wife out of Egypt, Tulis became a most intollerable tyrant, insomuch that his daughter perceiving that his subjects hated him extremely, and that there was some danger of their changing the succession, poisoned him when he had reigned seventy years, and after a short Inter-regnum succeeded in his stead.

- THE name of this princess was Juriak, tho' some writers call her Charoba. She governed with great art, pretending to be alike the mother of all her subjects, but in fact posing the power of the soldiery by that of the priests, and securing the quiet of her reign by a dextrous management of parties. Under her reign, or under the reign of her daughter, some historians affirm, that the Amalekites entered Egypt, which they held in subjection for a considerable time; but we have a very imperfect account of the monarchs of that Dynasty, amongst whom, however, they reckon the following <sup>a</sup> princes :

* ΚΗΟΡΕΜΙΝ ubi supra. Mirabil. Pyramid: ΑΙ ΣΟΥΤΙ.

RIYAN, He is said to have differed from all his predecessors, that is, from all the Amalekite kings of Egypt. For whereas they were idolators in respect to religion, and tyrants, with regard to their administration, this Riyan was on the contrary a worshipper of the true God, and a very just and good prince. In his time it is affirmed that Joseph came into Egypt, and very probably it was from him that he received instructions, which wrought upon him so powerfully, as to make him act in quite a different manner from his ancestors. We have many long and fabulous stories concerning the administration of that Patriarch; but as these would swell our work excessively, and are in themselves not at all worthy of credit, we think <sup>b</sup> it better to omit them, and to pass on to the successor of this monarch, who was his son

DAREM, a person altogether unlike his father. He was, as to religion, an impious person, one who affected to despise and affront divine providence, and therefore no wonder that in his government he was a tyrant and an oppressor. He did not however enjoy, or rather abuse the regal dignity long, but by the just judgment of God was drowned in the Nile. To whom as some historians write succeeded

CATHIM an Amalekite, who was a magnificent prince, and rendered himself famous by a variety of noble buildings, with which he adorned this country. Others <sup>c</sup> allege that this Riyan left no son, but a grandson, whose name was

KABUS, who succeeded him, and reigned in the time of Moses, but this is absurd or rather impossible, and therefore rejecting this notion, we ought rather to take up with what other oriental writers have said on the same subject, tho' that too come but indifferently recommended either in point of authority or credibility; however as it will take up no great room, it is proper to insert it, tho' it may be doubted. <sup>d</sup>

VALID, or rather Walid, the brother of Kabus is by most of the Arabian authors said to be the king of Egypt, with whom Moses had to do, and who perished in the Red Sea. He was, say they, an Arab, and of the Tribe of Ad, tho' others <sup>d</sup> say of that of Amlak, i. e. an Amalekite. Here it is necessary to take notice that tho' Walid be truly a proper name, yet it is also used by the oriental writers to signify such a one. Hence whenever they meet with the actions of a Prince without finding his name, they presently substitute that of Walid. We must not therefore be surprized to find that some authors have given this prince another name, because that will make no alteration in the history, neither will it at all affect the credit of one relation, or the other. This prince is represented as a most cruel tyrant; but at the same time as a man of great abilities, and of much cunning. With respect to the Israelites he pretended, they were all his slaves; and thus he made out his title. Joseph said he who brought them here was himself a slave, and <sup>e</sup> purchased with the money of Egypt. He brought his kindred hither, who could not therefore be better than himself, consequently they and all their descendants were slaves. Upon this pretence he refused to set them at liberty when Moses demanded them. But if he treated them harshly, he treated his own subjects no better; on the contrary, after having impoverished them by excessive taxes, and wasted them in many foolish expeditions, he at length pretended to exact divine honours from them; and tho' he was apparently one of the worst of men, would needs pass for a god. On this account, if we may believe these writers, the Almighty was pleased to punish him in so exemplary a manner, as he did by drowning him in the Red Sea, the justice of which, according to their Notions, will be more <sup>f</sup> fully explained in a note. <sup>a</sup> (B)

DALUKA

<sup>a</sup> TARIKH AL THABARI. Mirabil. Pyramid. <sup>b</sup> KHONDEMIR. AL SOYUTI. <sup>c</sup> AL SOYUTI. KHONDEMIR TARIKH AL THABARI.

(B) The oriental writers in general agree in a story they tell us concerning the destruction of Pharaoh. As they relate it, it takes up a great deal of room, but as we have it not to spare, we shall deliver it in as few words as we can. When Pharaoh was in the height of his glory, the angel Gabriel presented himself before him under the appearance of a shepherd, and after having made obeis-fance to him, complained that he had a servant, upon whom he had heaped continual favours, which he particularized, and that notwithstanding all this, that servant had deserted him, and was even so ungrateful as to endeavour to do him a mischief. When Pharaoh had heard his complaint; endeavour said he to have him apprehended, and I will order him to be thrown into the Red Sea. Great king

- a DALUKA, the daughter of Walid succeeded him, she was a Woman of great wisdom, and is said to have surrounded the city of Messer with Walls of an amazing extent, and of stupendous thickness. Some authors assert that she was not the daughter of the last king, but a distant relation, and that upon her death she bequeathed the crown to a Coptish prince of the ancient blood royal. His name was ° (C)

- b DARKUN, a young man of an excellent disposition, who ruled mildly, and with great wisdom; after him we find in the oriental histories, the names of five or six kings, but without any account of their actions, excepting only Asbyaf, who appears to have been the Sbybak of the scriptures: Then there follows another, large chafin in the history the last king mentioned being Feraoum al Araj. That is Pharaoh the lame, who we are told was invaded by Nebuchadnezzar whom the eastern writers call Baltaknassar, and after sustaining a long Siege in his capital, Mesr was taken by the conqueror, and put to death. * After this the oriental agrees better with the western history of Egypt, as will appear in its proper place.

* Mirabil. Pyramid.

° KHONDEMIR. TARIKH AL THABARI. Mirabil. Pyramid.

king said Gabriel will you give me this in writing. I will, answered Pharaoh. Then the angel wrote such an order, and Pharaoh subscribed it. Afterwards when at the passage of the Red Sea, Pharaoh found himself in danger of drowning, he cried out to the Almighty, and besought mercy and forgiveness. Then Gabriel appeared, and producing his own writing. Thou art the rebellious slave, said he, and thus is thy own judgment executed on thyself. Some of our readers may be surprised when we intimate that this is no fable, but rather a parable or allegory, which is, however an opinion that may be well justified by reason and authority. (2)

(C) The eastern historians are unanimous, as to the invasion and conquest of Egypt, by the Amalekites, but they differ extremely as to the time when this conquest was made. For some say that it happened so early as in the days of Coptarim the third king of Egypt after the deluge, and they give us a particular account both of their invasion and expulsion. Others again place this revolution as low as the times of Abraham, or rather lower, and according to these, Joseph was Wafir or first minister to an Amalekite king of Egypt (3). These variations are not however greater than the critics have observed in the ancient Greek historians, with respect to the shepherds who subdued Egypt. The truth therefore is most likely to be discovered by comparing the best historians of both sorts; and this might be easily done if the Egyptian histories in the French king's library were printed. But what hope is there of this, while after spending our youth in the study of Greek and Latin, we acquire from thence an aversion and contempt for all writers of another stamp.

(2) TARIKH AL THABARI. KONDEMIR. Mirabil. Pyramid.

(3) KHONDEMIR. Mirabil. Pyramid.

C H A P. IV.

The History of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Edomites, Amalekites, Canaanites, and Philistines.

S E C T. I.

c The History of Moab.

DESIGNING in this chapter to write the histories of those nations with whom the children of Israel had to do, before or upon their settling in the land of the Moabites. Canaan, we shall begin with that of the Moabites.

THIS people were descended from Moab the son of Lot, by his eldest daughter: But before we mention the occasion of that incest, it may be proper to take the history a little higher.

LOT was the son of Haran, the brother of Abraham; and after his father's death was brought by his grandfather Terah, together with the rest of his family, from Ur their ancestor.

of

of the Chaldees, their native city, to Haran in Mesopotamia<sup>a</sup>; where Terah dying, Abraham afterwards took his nephew under his protection, and, as Josephus tells us<sup>b</sup>, adopted him, despairing of any children of his own. He therefore carried him with him into Canaan<sup>c</sup>; where, after they had dwelt some time, they were obliged by a famine to go into Egypt<sup>d</sup>; soon after their return from whence, they parted: For their flocks and herds were so much increased by this time, and their substance was so great, that they could not dwell together any longer; the pasture and water not being sufficient for both; which occasioning disputes between their herdsmen, Abraham proposed, to prevent any misunderstanding between so near relations, that they should separate; and gave Lot the choice of removing to what part of the country he thought fit. Whereupon Lot chose the plain of Jordan, lying eastward of Bethel and Ai, between which Abraham and he then dwelt, and which, at that time, before the terrible destruction of Sodom and Gomorrab, was so fruitful and well watered, that it is compared to the land of Egypt, and even to Paradise it self<sup>e</sup>. To this delightful plain or valley therefore Lot came, and pitched his tent not far from Sodom, infamous for the unnatural wickedness of its inhabitants; and afterwards dwelt in the city it self<sup>f</sup>: But that city, with others in the same plain, being not long after taken by Chedorlaomer and his allies, Lot, who, as Josephus tells us<sup>g</sup>, assisted the Sodomites, had the misfortune to be taken by the enemy, with his family and all his substance; and had been carried into captivity, had he not been timely rescued by Abraham, who not only delivered him, but recovered all his goods<sup>h</sup>. Notwithstanding this warning, and the abominable wickedness of the inhabitants, Lot still continued to live in Sodom, and had been involved in the fearful catastrophe of that people, if he had not been miraculously preserved, and that partly for Abraham's sake<sup>i</sup>. Two angels, who were sent to destroy the place, came to Sodom in the evening under the appearance of travellers; and Lot sitting in the gate, so sooner saw them than he invited them to be his guests that night, according to the hospitality of the eastern nations. They had scarce refreshed themselves when the inhabitants of the city, both old and young, being informed that Lot had strangers with him, and in all probability tempted by the beautiful forms which the angels had assumed<sup>j</sup>, encompassed the house, and demanded them to be delivered to them, that they might abuse them. Lot endeavoured to dissuade them from their purpose; and, rather than violate the rights of hospitality, offered to give up his two virgin daughters to their discretion, if they would not molest his guests; but instead of accepting this offer, they came to violence, and pressed forward to break open the door: Whereupon the angels suddenly pulled Lot into the house, shut the door, and struck the riotous assembly with blindness (A); so that they fought in vain to find the door, till they were tired.

WHILST they were thus busied, the angels acquainted Lot with their commission; that they were sent to execute the divine vengeance upon that sink of iniquity; and advised him, if he had any friends, for whose safety he was concerned, that he would immediately let them know their danger, and warn them to depart in time. Whereupon Lot, before it was light, went to his sons-in-law, to whom his daughters were contracted (B), and telling them what they must expect if they staid longer in the city,

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 132. <sup>b</sup> Antiq. l. 1. c. 7. <sup>c</sup> Gen. xii. 4, &c. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. v. 10. & ch. xiii. 1. <sup>e</sup> Gen. xiii. 10. <sup>f</sup> Gen. xiv. 12. <sup>g</sup> Antiq. l. 1. c. 10. <sup>h</sup> Gen. xiv. 16, &c. <sup>i</sup> Gen. xix. 29. <sup>j</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 11.

(A) It is a very probable opinion, that those men were struck, not with actual blindness, but with a dizziness, which disturbed their sight, and represented objects falsely, and in confusion (1), as were the Syrians, who were sent to take Elisba (2): And this is the sense of the Septuagint. The author of the book of Wisdom supposes some change in the air, saying, that they were compassed about with horrible great darkness, which he compares to that with which Moses plagued the Egyptians: He adds, that they could not even find the way home; but every one sought the passage of his own doors (3).

(B) The Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, and other translations, and some of the Rabbins suppose these were the husbands of other daughters of Lot, who were married, and had left their father's house: Which seems to be confirmed by the angels ordering Lot to take with him his wife and his two daughters which were there present (4). But the original words, which in our version are rendered his sons-in-law which married his daughters (5), may be translated, according to the interpretation of Onkelos, his sons-in-law, which were to marry, &c. the contract having been passed, but the marriage not consummated: And there is no mention in scripture of any daughters Lot had, except the two who were saved with him; but if he had, they must have perished with their husbands.

(1) Vid. AUGUSTIN. de civit. Dei. l. 22. c. 19. HILDEGG. Hist. Patr. T. 2. Extr. viii. § 16.

CLERIC. in Loc. (2) 2 Kings vi. 18. (3) WIL. xix. 17. (4) Gen. xix. 15. (5) Ibid. v. 14.

- a earnestly persuaded them to leave it: But they thinking he either laughed at them; or was out of his wits, rejected his advice <sup>b</sup>.

THIS circumstance is the only one which Moses mentions of Lot's admonishing his fellow-citizens; though it is probable this just person omitted no opportunity of endeavouring their reformation; for it is said, that in seeing and bearing he vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds <sup>c</sup>: Which words give countenance to the traditions adopted afterwards by Mohammed, of Lot's being sent to preach to the inhabitants of Sodom <sup>d</sup>.

- Lot* not having been able to prevail on his sons-in-law to save themselves; as soon as it was day-break, the angels ordered him immediately to depart, with his wife and two daughters, lest they should be involved in the common ruin: But he delaying to go, being probably intent on preserving some of his most valuable goods, the angels hastily laid hold on them, and brought them out of the city, commanding them to make a speedy escape, for that their lives were in danger; and in particular directed them not to look behind them, nor to stay in the plain; but to make the best of their way to the mountains. Upon which Lot, considering the mountains were at a good distance, began to fear he could not reach them time enough, and begged he might be permitted to escape to a small city not far from Sodom, then called Bela, but from this accident Zoar, or the little, which was else to have been destroyed with the other cities of the plain. This request was granted; and the angels promised him that their commission should not be executed till he got thither; which he did by sun-rise. Immediately upon which the fearful destruction of those cities ensued: And Lot's wife, contrary to the express command of the angel, looking back, was changed into a pillar of salt <sup>e</sup> (C), which Josephus <sup>f</sup> tells us was remaining in his days, and that himself had seen it.

AFTER this dreadful judgment, Lot staid not long in Zoar, fearing some further misfortune; but went with his daughters to the mountains on the east of the Dead Sea, and dwelt in a cave there. In this solitude the two young women seeing no

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xix. 1—14. <sup>c</sup> 2 Pet. ii. 8. <sup>d</sup> Korân. c. vii. v. 81, c. xxvi. v. 159. c. xxvii. v. 55. c. 29. v. 28, &c. <sup>e</sup> Gen. xix. 15—26. <sup>f</sup> Antiq. l. i. c. 11.

(C) It is not agreed by commentators what was the crime for which Lot's wife was thus severely punished. Some are of opinion she deserved it merely for disobeying the command of the angel, and expressing too much concern for a people who deserved no compassion (6): Which yet she might be the more apt to entertain, as she was probably a native of Sodom (7), and had near relations among them. Others say, that being anxiously solicitous for her daughters, who were married there, and turning about to see whether they followed her, she saw the divine Shechinah or majestic appearance of God, descending to destroy the place, which was the occasion of her metamorphosis. The writer from whom we take this, calls her Adith (8). Mohammed, from some traditions he met with, goes farther, and represents her as rebellious to her husband (9); and the commentators on the Korân, who name her Wailab, say she was in confederacy with the Sodomites; telling them her husband was distracted, and giving them notice when any strangers came: to lodge with him, by a sign of smoke by day, and of fire by night (10); or, according to others, by knocking at the wall, and crying, Give me some salt (11). Others however think the scripture does not represent the fate this woman met with as a punishment for any crime; but suppose it merely accidental, as will be observed immediately.

The manner of her transformation or death is also differently apprehended. From the various acceptations of the word we render pillar, some have fancied she was turned into a heap of stones (12); others into a pillar (13), without any resemblance of human shape: And a third party have imagined she was changed into a statue (14), having the perfect form of a woman. Nor is there any better agreement as to the matter of this monument, than the figure of it. Some suppose it to have been of rock salt, which lasts a long while, and is not subject to be waited or dissolved by the weather, as common salt is (15). Aben Ezra is of opinion that Lot's wife was burnt with fire mixed with salt; and Grotius is of the same sentiment (16). But others think the word salt does not relate to the matter of the pillar or statue, but either describes the place where it stood; and then the meaning of the passage is no more, than that it was in a salt, or barren soil (17); or else that it signifies only the permanency of the statue's duration; as a covenant of salt is elsewhere (18) used to express a lasting or perpetual covenant (19). Hence the Rabbins take occasion, according to their custom, to carry the matter farther, and say this statue was designed for an everlasting monument of divine justice, and shall remain till the day of judgment (20). They add, that though it is continually licked by the cattle, yet it is always miraculously repaired again (21); that it has not only the lineaments of a woman, but also the distinction of sex, and regular purgations, as if it were alive (22): Which fable has been swallowed by some Christian writers hopes of their ever being married (D), and being very desirous of having children, <sup>a</sup> the want of which was reckoned a great reproach and scandal in those days, plotted together to deceive their father, and have issue by him. Accordingly they put their project in execution; and making him drink wine plentifully one evening, the eldest daughter lay down by him the first night, and the old man knew not when she lay down, nor when she arose: Not that we suppose he was so far overcome as not to be sensible of what he did, which would have rendered him rather unfit than fit for their purpose; but he knew not who it was he lay with, imagining, probably, that it was a servant, the use of whom was in those days lawful. The next night they employed the same artifice, and the youngest took her turn. They both proved with child; and from this incestuous commerce proceeded two sons; that of the eldest daughter was therefore named Moab, signifying (though not in pure Hebrew, yet perhaps in some dialect of that tongue) Of a father, and was the progenitor of the people we are now speaking of.

(6) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. i. c. 12. HEIDECK. ubi sup. § 18, p. 23. (7) Targum Hierosol. (8) R. ELIEZER, Pirke, c. 25. (9) KORÂN, c. 66. (10) JALLALODDIN, &c. (11) Pentat. Ebn Sina. (12) SULPIC. SEVER. (13) SEPTUAG. (14) HIERON. ONKELOS. (15) Vide WITSII Miscell.

Tom. 2. and HOWELL's Hist. of the Bible. (16.) Deut. xxix. 22. (17) Psal. cvii. 34. (18) Numb. xvii. 19. (19) Vide CLERICI Dissert. de statua salina. (20) Targ. Hierosol. (21) R. ELIEZER, ubi sup. BENJAM. Itim. p. 44. (22) R. ELIEZER, ibid.

Of the country possessed by the Moabites.

THE posterity of this person settled in the country bordering on the mountain where he was born, which some authors make part of Calii Syria <sup>b</sup>, others of Arabia <sup>c</sup>; and, having driven out the old inhabitants, possessed a large tract, thence called Moabitis, or the land of Moab, bounded on the west by the mountains on the east of the lake Asphaltitis, or the Dead Sea, and by the river Jordan; on the north by the country possessed by the Ammonites, the descendants of Lot by his younger daughter; on the south by the brook, or little river Zered, which runs into the Dead Sea, and by the countries of Midian and Edom; and on the east by the deserts of Arabia; which tract might be about forty miles long, and as many broad. This country, which is chiefly mountainous, intermixed with vallies proper for pasturing of cattle, was given by God to the children of Moab; and the Israelites, notwithstanding the great provocations they received from them, were expressly forbidden to disturb them <sup>d</sup>. However, by the time of Moses, the Amorites, who had possessed themselves of great part of the land of Ammon, took also the adjoining part of the land of Moab, reducing their limits on that side to the brook Arnon, called also the river of Gad, which empties itself into the lake Asphaltitis, and before passed through the midst of their territories. This the Israelites seizing on as part of Sibon's kingdom, which was theirs by right of conquest, kept it for several centuries, till recovered by the Moabites, when they brake into the borders of Ruben and Gad, on the declension of the kingdom of Israel, as will be hereafter observed.

THE chief city of Moab was Ar <sup>m</sup>, situate on the river Arnon, called also Rabbab <sup>n</sup>, or, The Great; and to distinguish it from a city of the same name in the land of Ammon, Rabbath Moab <sup>o</sup>. In after-times it was called Arcopolis <sup>p</sup>, by addition of a writers (23). Some late commentators (24), after all, think that there was no miraculous metamorphosis at all in the case; but that she either turned back out of curiosity to see the burning nearer, and so perished in the dreadful shower, or by some poisonous vapour; or else that the horror of the sight, when she looked back and plainly beheld the terrible destruction of a place she had but just quitted, struck her stiff and motionless like a statue, and that she died of the fright. And as to what is urged from Josaphus (25) and some books of travels (26), that this statue or pillar was many ages after or is now to be seen, it is answered, that Josaphus might be deceived therein, as many others have been, and daily are, in things of this nature. Which really seems to have been the case; because the more intelligent and credible travellers say they could never see it; and when they have asked the people of the country after it, they either assured them there was no such thing (27), or pretended it stands somewhere in the mountains, where the access to it is very dangerous, because of the wild beasts and serpents, but more so on account of the Arabs (28).

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xix. 30—37. <sup>b</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 12. <sup>c</sup> STEPHAN. de urb. in Maced. <sup>d</sup> Deut. i. 6. Judg. xi. 15. <sup>e</sup> 2 Sam. xxiv. 5. <sup>f</sup> Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29. Numb. xxi. 15, 28. Isaiah xv. 1, &c. <sup>g</sup> Josh. xiii. 25. <sup>h</sup> Hieron. in Moab. <sup>i</sup> Idem ibid.

(D) Several writers (29) excuse this act of Lot's daughters, by supposing what they did was for the reparation of mankind, which, as they thought, had been utterly destroyed, and none left, except their father and themselves. But there is no manner of foundation for such an opinion; wherefore St. Austin very justly condemns the action, saying, they ought never to have been mothers, rather than to have made such use of their father (30). One of these daughters a Jewish writer calls Pelotish (31).

(23) TERTUL. vel Auctor Carm. de Sodoma. IRENÆUS, l. 4. c. 51. (24) VATABLUS BODINUS, P. SIMON, Bibl. Crit. T. 4. Let. 44. CLEMIC. Dissert. de statua salina. (25) See also Wisd. dom x. 7. (26) Vide QUARESIM Elucid. terræ sanctæ. Tom. 2. l. 6. c. 14. (27) RADZIVIL, Itiner. Hierosol. p. 95. (28) BROCHARD, Descr. terræ sanctæ.

p. 1. c. 7. Numb. 24. (29) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 12. CHRYSOST. Hom. 34. in Gen. IRENÆUS, l. 4. c. 51. AMBROS. de Abrah. l. 1. c. 6. THEODOR. in Genes. quæst. 69. c. 5. (30) AUGUST. cont. Faust. l. 22. c. 43. (31) R. JEHUDA, apud Eliczer, Pirke, c. 25.

a Greek word signifying a City. The other cities of Moab were Mizpeh, Lubith, Horonaim, and some others, whose situations are not certainly known.

THE customs and manner of life of these people we know very little of. They were governed by kings, used circumcision<sup>a</sup>, and seem to have employed themselves mostly in pasturage, and breeding of cattle, wherein their riches chiefly consisted. They were one of the nations whose good the Jews were forbidden to seek<sup>b</sup>; nor were they to be admitted to intermarry with the Israelites, even to their tenth generations<sup>c</sup>. However, they appear to have cultivated a good understanding with that people after their settlement in Canaan, as is evident from the sojourning of Elimelech there<sup>d</sup>, and the reception David met with in his troubles at Mizpeh<sup>e</sup>. What language they used we cannot say; but suppose they spoke a dialect of the Canaanitish or Hebrew.

THAT this people had once the knowledge of the true God, we may not only conclude from the piety of their great ancestor, who, without doubt, instructed his offspring in their duty; but it appears from scripture; for they retained this knowledge till the time of Moses, even after they had monstrously corrupted their religion by introducing the worship of false gods<sup>f</sup>; which they seem to have done very early, though the exact time cannot be fixed.

THE idols of the Moabites taken notice of in scripture are Chemosh<sup>g</sup> and Baal-peor<sup>h</sup>, sometimes simply Peor<sup>i</sup>; or, as the Septuagint write the name Pbegor. But what gods these were, the learned are not agreed. St. Jerom supposes that they were both names of one and the same idol<sup>j</sup>; and from the debaucheries into which those fell who defiled themselves with their worship, several writers, both ancient and modern, have represented them as obscene deities, not much different from Priapus<sup>k</sup>. This opinion they endeavour to support from the etymologies of the names, and fancy some filthiness is implied therein (E). Others<sup>l</sup> however imagine, that though the Israelites and Solomon were drawn in to worship those idols by debauching themselves with Moabitish women<sup>m</sup>; yet it does not thence follow, that any immodest ceremonies were used in their worship; nor are any such mentioned in the most ancient authors<sup>n</sup>; and the etymologies, we think are not much to be built on. Peor was the name of a mountain, where the high places of Baal<sup>o</sup>, which word signifies no more than Lord, and was a title of the sun, were situate; and probably was added to that name by way of distinction, to denote the deity adored in that place<sup>p</sup>, though he had probably also a temple in Beth Peor, which stood in the plain<sup>q</sup>. Vossius<sup>r</sup> supposes Baal-peor to be Bacchus; and Dr. Cumberland<sup>s</sup> says he was properly called Meon, and will have him to be the same with Menes, Mizraim, and Osiris (F), who, according to his hypothesis, were all one and the same man<sup>t</sup>. Chemosh seems to have been a different idol. Nebo =

<sup>a</sup> Jerem. ix. 25, 26. <sup>b</sup> Deut. xxiii. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. v. 3. <sup>d</sup> Ruth i. 1, 2. <sup>e</sup> 1 Sam. xxii. 3, &c. <sup>f</sup> See Numb. xxiv. 11. <sup>g</sup> Numb. xxi. 29. <sup>h</sup> Kings xi. 7. Jerem. xlviii. 13. <sup>i</sup> Numb. xxv. 1, and 3. <sup>j</sup> Ibid. v. 18. Josh. xxii. 17, &c. <sup>k</sup> Hieronym. in Esai. l. 5. <sup>l</sup> Idem in Oseam, & contr. Jovin. i. 1. c. 12. <sup>m</sup> ORIGEN. in Numer. Homil. 20. <sup>n</sup> THEOPHYLACT. in Hoseam. <sup>o</sup> CUMBERLAND on Sanchon. p. 67, &c. <sup>p</sup> SELDEN de diis Syris, Syntag. 1. c. 5. <sup>q</sup> CLERIC. in Numer. PATRICK'S Comment. on Numb. xxv. <sup>r</sup> Numb. xxv. <sup>s</sup> See PATRICK'S Comment. ubi supr. <sup>t</sup> Numb. xxiii. 38. <sup>u</sup> THEODORET ad Psal. cv. Vid. SUID. in Etymologia. <sup>v</sup> See Josh. xiii. 17 and 20. <sup>w</sup> De idololatr. l. 2. c. 7. <sup>x</sup> On Sanchon. p. 67. <sup>y</sup> See before, p. <sup>z</sup> Isai. xv. 2. Jerem. xlviii. 1—22.

(E) Peor they derive from פער paar, to open or stretch, because they used an indecent posture before the idol (distendebant coram eo foramen pedicis) and offered him dung, which the Jews pretend was the worship proper to this idol (32). If this derivation be true, it was most probably a name of contempt imposed by the Jews; and the nasty ceremonies they mention may have been invented to give some reason for the name.

Chemosh, for want of a better etymology, they will have to come from the verb חשח Mashech, to feel: But Dr. Hide derives it from the Arabic Khamush, which signifies gnats, though in the particular dialect of the tribe of Hodan supposing it to have been an astrological Talisman in the figure of a gnat, made to drive away those insects (33): And Le Clerc, who takes this idol for the sun, from Camosha, a root in the same tongue, signifying to be swift (34).

(F) This learned prelate supposes Peor was not his true name; and finding Baal Meon (35), and Beth Meon (36), and Beth Baal Meon (37), mentioned in scripture, as a place lying within the old territories of Moab, concludes Meon was the proper or honourable title of this deity, whom he will have to be the same with Osiris, because of the obscene processions used in honour of the latter, agreeing very well with the immodest ceremonies used in the worship of the former, and from the affinity between the names of Meon and Menes. The chief reasons he gives why Meon was the name of an idol, and the same with Peor are, 1. The xxxii. 28. (35) Numb. xxxii. 38. 1 Chron. v. 8. Ezek. xxv. 9. (36) Jerem. xlviii. 23. (37) Josh. xiii. 17.

(32) SOLOM YARHI in Numer. 25. 3. MAIMONIDAS More Nev. part. 3. c. 46. Vid. PHILON. Jud. de nomin. mutatione, p. 1061. (33) HIDE de rel. vet. perf. c. 5. p. 131. (34) CLERIC. in Numb.

is thought by some to have been another deity of the Moabites. It was without dispute an idol of the Babylonians, and possibly the same with Mercury: But whether the Moabites worshipped it is not so certain. There was a town of this name in that part of the ancient dominions of Moab, conquered by Sibon, which the Israelites rebuilt, and changed its name<sup>a</sup>; and a part of mount Abarim in the same tract was also called Nebo.

Of their religious rights and ceremonies we can say very little. The obscenity attributed to them by some authors we have already mentioned; of which, however, the Psalmist takes no notice in speaking of those who were joined to Baal-peor; but says only that they eat the offerings of the dead: By which words he may either mean that the idol to which they impiously gave divine honour, was no more than a dead man; or else that their oblations were made to the infernal gods. They sacrificed both in the open air, on mountains dedicated to that service<sup>b</sup>, and also in temples built to their idols in their cities; and besides oxen and rams, on extraordinary occasions, offered human victims, according to the Phœnician custom; an instance of which will be hereafter given.

The Moabites drive out the Emims.

THE first inhabitants of the land, afterwards possessed by the posterity of Moab, were the Emims, a great and powerful people, and of extraordinary strength and stature<sup>c</sup>. They were, most probably, descendants of Ham, and of the same gigantic race with the Anakims and Rephaims, though the Moabites called them by the name of Emims<sup>d</sup>, which in Hebrew signifies terrible. These having been much weakened by the invasion of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and his allies<sup>e</sup>, became the easier conquest to the Moabites; who drove them out, and took possession of their country; but when is uncertain. However, they kept not their new dominions long entire; for in the days of Moses, Sibon king of the Amorites, who bordered on them eastward, fought against the king of Moab, the predecessor of Balak, and took from that nation all their land, to the north of the river Arnon<sup>f</sup>.

Balak sends for Balaam to curse the Israelites.

Year of the Flood, 1547.
Year before Christ, 1452.

BALAK the son of Zippor, was on the throne of Moab when the Israelites, having subdued Sibon, were incamped in part of their new acquisitions, called the plains of Moab, because they had lately belonged to that nation<sup>g</sup>. This prince being exceedingly dismayed at the approach of the victorious people, whom he was not in a condition to resist, and not knowing that God had forbidden them to attempt the conquest of his remaining territories, assembled the nobles, and also the princes of the Midianites (a branch of which nation dwelt within the borders of Moab, as we shall observe hereafter) and acquainted them with his apprehensions, that the Israelites should, as he expressed it, lick up all that were round about them, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field. Having consulted together, and not daring to trust to their arms alone, the assembly agreed to send for Balaam the son of Beor, a famous prophet (G) or diviner of that time, in the prevalency of whose prayers and imprecations they

<sup>a</sup> Isai. xlv. 1. <sup>b</sup> Psal. cvi. 28. <sup>c</sup> See Numb. <sup>d</sup> Deut. ii. 10. <sup>e</sup> Ibid p. 10, 11. <sup>f</sup> Gen. xiv. 5. <sup>g</sup> Num. xxi. 26. <sup>h</sup> Numb. xxii. 1.

The Septuagint and Arabic versions have Meon for a proper name or title of a deity (38). 2. The Targum of Jonathan (39) calls Baal Meon a city of Balak, in which Israel destroyed the idol Peor in the house of altars. 3. Meon was so great a title of honour, that it is given to God himself in scripture (40), though it is translated dwelling place. But we think nothing can be concluded from passages where the word is plainly an appellative. 4. Beth Meon signifies the house or temple of Meon; and no other than a supposed deity can be said to have a temple dedicated to it. Yet there are several names of places compounded with the word Beth, which have no relation at all to idols. 5. The Israelites changed the name of the city Baal Meon, when they had rebuilt it, as they did that of Nebo, because they were so named from false gods (41). But this is no necessary consequence.

(G) Some Jews imagine this Balaam was an astrologer, who observing when men were under a bad aspect of the stars, pronounced a curse upon them; which sometimes coming to pass in neighbouring nations, gained him a great reputation. Several of the ancient fathers suppose him to have been no more than a common soothsayer (42), who pretended to foretell future events, but by no justifiable arts. Origen will have it that he was no prophet, but only a forcerer, who went to enquire of the devil; but that God was pleased to prevent him, and to put what answer he thought fit into his mouth. It cannot be denied however, but that the scripture expressly calls him a prophet; and therefore some later writers (43) are of opinion that he had been once a good man, and a true prophet, till, loving the wages of unrighteousness (44), and prostituting the honour of God to his covetousness, he apostatized from God, and betaking himself to idolatrous practices, fell under the delusion of the devil, of whom he learned all his magical enchantments; though at this juncture, when the preservation of his people was concerned, it might consist with God's wisdom to appear to him, and vouch-

(38) Ibid. 1 Chron. v. 8. Jerem. xlviii. 23. (39) On Numb. xxxii, xxxviii. (40) Psal. xc. 1, and xci. 9. 41 See CUMBERLAND on Sancton.

Chap. 2. (42) See JOSEPH. 13. 22. (43) See PATRICK'S Comment. on Numb. xxii. (44) 2 Pet. ii. 15.

- a had great confidence, that he might come and curse the people, which gave them so much uneasiness (H). Accordingly ambassadors of both nations were sent, not empty handed, but with presents, as usual in such cases, to Balaam, who dwelt at Peibor, a city of Mesopotamia, situate on the Euphrates, and told him the occasion of their coming. The prophet desired them to stay with him that night, that he might enquire of God whether he should go with them and curse the Israelites or not: But being commanded not to go, nor to curse a people whom God had determined to bless; the next morning he told them, he could not disobey the divine command, and so dismissed them. On their return with this answer, Balak, whose sole hopes lay in the prophet, sent a second embassy to him, consisting of persons of more distinguished quality, and in greater number, with promises of great riches and preferment if he would comply with his request. Balaam told them, that if he might gain ever so much wealth, he durst not act contrary to the divine directions: However, being willing to gratify Balak, and tempted by the large offers which had been made him, notwithstanding he knew it was a thing disagreeable to God, yet he consulted the oracle once more, and had then leave given him to go, provided he said nothing but what God should put in his mouth. Balaam therefore went with the ambassadors, resolving, as it seems, with himself, to do his utmost for the service of those who had employed him. But his intentions being displeasing to God, he sent an angel to withstand him by the way, who placed himself in the road with a drawn sword in his hand, as Balaam came riding on his ass, attended by two servants only, and at a distance from the rest of the company; the ass seeing the angel (though her master did not) turned out of the way into the field; on which Balaam struck her: Then the angel went forward, and stood in a path between two walls; against one of which the ass thrusting her self to avoid the angel, crushed Balaam's foot, and provoked him to strike her again. At length the angel went farther, and stood in a place so narrow, that there was no room for the ass to turn out of the way; but she fell down under the prophet, and enraged him so that he struck her a third time. Whereupon God miraculously opened the ass's mouth (I), and she spoke to her master with an articulate voice, and asked him why he had given her those three blows?
- d Balaam, in the heat of his passion not considering the prodigy (K), angrily answered, that she had purposely provoked him; and wished he had a sword to kill her. But on the ass's demanding if ever she had served him in that manner before, he confessed that she had not. Immediately on this Balaam's eyes were opened, and he saw the angel standing before him armed with a naked sword; whereupon he fell prostrate on his face, and the angel told him, that he had struck his ass without cause, since it was he that opposed him because of his perverseness; and that if the ass had not vouchsafe him revelations. Balaam indeed was a man of no great probity, and might by profession be a diviner; but by the free access he had to God, it seems apparent that he was no common forcerer or magician (45).

* Genes. xv. 10, 18. Josh. xxiv. 2—15.

The Jews say Balaam was not his true name; but that he was so called, because by his counsel בלע עמ Bala am, i. e. he destroyed the people of God (46): And some have taken him to be the same person who in the book of Job is named Elifaz (47). The prophetic traditions of Balaam the Perfian Magi are said to have had (48), and it is thought, that from his prophecy (49) the wise men knew the signification of the star which appeared of our Saviour's birth (50).

(H) It was a received opinion among the heathen nations, that imprecations might be made which would have effect, not only on private persons, but even whole armies and nations; and there were particular forms and ceremonies for that purpose (51).

(I) This was so extraordinary an event, that some Jews, as great lovers of miracles as they are, have not been able to persuade themselves that it really came to pass. Philo (52) in relating the story of Balaam, wholly omits this circumstance; and Maimonides (53) pretends it happened to Balaam in a prophetic vision. But as there is no doubt of God's power to effect such a miracle, and the words of scripture are very express, there can be no reason for disbelieving it. The heathens cannot reproach Moses with any absurdity in this story, since they themselves relate so many of the like nature, but not near so well supported. Witness what they say of the ass upon which Bacchus rode; of the ram of Phryxus; the bull of Europa; the horses of Achilles and Adrastus; the elephant of Porus in India, and the lamb in Egypt, when Bocchoris reigned there (54).

(K) This seems to be the true reason why Balaam expressed no more surprize on this occasion. But some suppose Balaam might have imbibed the doctrine of transmigration of souls, which was, and still is too common in the east, and from thence might be the less astonished to hear a brute speak (55). Josephus indeed tells us, but without authority, that he was affrighted at the accident (56).

(45) STACKHOUSE'S Body of Divinity, p. 465, &c.
(46) Vid. HOTTINGER. Smegma Orient. p. 444.
(47) See PATRICK'S Comment. ubi supr. (48) D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient. p. 528. (49) Numb. xxiv. 17. (50) THEODOR. TARSENSIS, apud Hyde de rel. vet. Pers. p. 384. (51) Vid. MACROB. Satura turned out of the way he should have killed him, and saved her alive (L). The a prophet on this reprimand offered to return home again; but the angel bid him go on, taking care only to say no more than what God should direct him *.

l. 3. c. 9. PLUTARCH. in vita Crassi, p. 553.
(52) De vita Mosis, l. 1. (53) More Nevoch: part. 2. cap. 42. (54) See PATRICK'S Comment. ubi supr. (55) Vid. CLERICI Comment. in locum. (56) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c.

BALAAM being come to the borders of Moab, Balak went out to meet him; and after some expostulations for not coming on the first message, brought him to Kinjab-buzzoth, where the king offered sacrifices and feasted Balaam and the princes who were with him. The next day Balak brought the prophet up into the high places of Baal on mount Abarim, where he might have a full prospect of the camp of the Israelites, whom he had hired him to curse *. There Balak, by the prophet's direction, built seven altars, in which number there might possibly be some superstition; but the altars, as it appears, were erected to the true God, to whom they offered a b bullock and a ram on each altar; and the same they did afterwards in two other places on the mountain. The two first times Balaam sought for enchantments *, or used such means as he was able, to obtain leave of God to curse the children of Israel; but without success; for on the contrary he was commanded to bless them, sore against his inclination, and to the great mortification of Balak *. Wherefore the third time, finding that no enchantments could prevail against Jacob, nor any divination against Israel, he omitted his former arts, and not only blessed them a third time, but pronounced those cursed who should utter any imprecations against that people. Balak was exceedingly enraged at this disappointment, and ordered him to depart immediately; but Balaam before he went, pronounced in Balak's presence a noble and magnificent prophecy of the future successes of the Israelites, and what should befall several nations and kingdoms *. As to Moab in particular, he foretold, that a star (M) should come out of Jacob, and a sceptre should arise out of Israel, which should smite the corners (or, as it may be better translated, the princes) of Moab, and destroy all the children of Setb (N). Which prophecy the most judicious interpreters take to be primarily spoken of David, and fulfilled by his victories over that nation; though it be allowed also secondarily, and in a more exalted sense, to refer to the Messiah. After this Balaam returned home c; but not without giving a most wicked counsel (O) to Balak and the Midianites, which proved very pernicious to the children of Israel: For he told them that it was in vain to expect that God would ever desert that nation, so long as they d continued in their duty; and therefore the only way to hurt and distress them, would be to tempt them to idolatry and disobedience, which he thought no means so proper to effect, as by enticing them to debaucheries with the Moabitish and Midianitish women. And therefore he advised them to send the most beautiful virgins they could find to the Israelitish camp, with proper instructions *.

THIS was put in execution; the chief men among them making no scruple to prostitute their daughters on this occasion *: And the stratagem succeeded but too well. For the Israelites were immediately smitten with the charms of these fair idolatresses; and having begun to commit whoredom with them, were easily seduced to another false step, and prevailed on to comply with the worship of their idols. e This occasioned a dreadful plague, which destroyed 24,000 of them, besides those who were put to death by the order of Moses *.

* Numb. xxii. 2, 35. * Numb. xxii. 36—41.

† See before, p. 220, 221.

* Numb. xxiii.

† Ibid. c. 24.

† Ibid. v. 17.

† Ibid. v. 25.

* JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 4. c. 6.

* Numb. xxv. 15.

† Ibid. v. 1—5.

(L) An instance of a prophet's being slain for disobedience, and his ass being saved alive, we have in the first book of Kings (57).

(M) The eastern nations denoted a king by a star or comet, the appearance of which they thought portended the rise of great princes, and revolutions in empires (58).

(N) According to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, wherein it is elegant to repeat the same sentence in different expressions, by the children of Setb, the Moabites should be intended; but why they are so called we cannot find. There is a passage in Jeremiah, which seems to prove, that in his time this place was differently read. A fire says that prophet, shall come out of Heshbon, a flame from the midst of Sihon, which shall devour the corner of Moab, and the crown of the head of the tumultuous ones, or, as is better rendered in the margin, of the children of noise (59). The former part of this passage is taken from another text (60), and the latter from that which we are now speaking of. The difference between them is very little in the original: Jeremiah instead of קרקר karkar, shall destroy, having קרקר karkad, the crown of the head (which is the reading of the Samaritan pentateuch in this very place) and instead of שש Sesh, שש Sesh, noise. But we dare not hence make any correction.

(O) Though Moses mentions not this where he describes the interview between Balaam and Balak, yet in another place (61) he lays the whole blame on

(57) Chap. xiii. 23, &c.

(58) Vid. CLERIC. in loc.

(59) Jerem. xlviii. 45.

(61) Numb. xxxi. 16.

(60) Numb. xxi. 28.

See also Revel. ii. 14.

- a THEIR hiring of Balaam to curse Israel was the reason why the Moabites were not to be admitted to mix or intermarry with that people, as has been observed<sup>1</sup>; but the Midianites, who seem to have been more particularly the instruments of seducing them to idolatry, were more severely punished soon after, as will be related in a more proper place: And Balaam himself had his reward, being slain by the Israelites when they took their revenge on Midian<sup>2</sup>.

- THE next action which is recorded of the Moabites, is that they were the instruments of the second oppression of the Israelites after their settlement in the land of Canaan. For that people, on the death of Othniel the son of Kenaz, being without a head, returned again to idolatry; whereupon God raised up Eglon king of Moab to punish them. This prince therefore having entered into an alliance with the Ammonites and Amalekites his neighbours, with their assistance, successfully invaded Israel, and seized on the eastern part of their country, and particularly on a city called by Moses the city of palm trees, by which is generally understood Jericho (P), which was in the lot of the tribe of Benjamin; and having left garrisons to keep the inhabitants in subjection, obliged them to pay tribute, and exercised great tyranny over them for no less than eighteen years. At the expiration of which time, the children of Israel returning to a better mind, had recourse to God in their distress, who raised them up a deliverer, a Benjamite, named Ehud. This person being deputed by his countrymen to carry a present, or rather the tribute which was exacted of them, to Eglon, formed the design of freeing them from that excessive load of oppression they had so long undergone, by taking off their tyrant; he therefore provided himself with a dagger fit for the execution of his purpose, though short enough to be hidden under his garments; and, being left-handed, he girt it on his right thigh, which hindered any suspicion of his being armed. Having delivered the tribute to the king, he sent away those who had brought it, and followed them so far homewards as the quarries near Gilgal (Q); but when he came thither he turned back again, and being admitted into the king's presence, who was then in a summer apartment, he pretended to have something particular to impart to him in private. Whereupon Eglon ordered his attendants to withdraw: And Ehud told him, that he had a message to deliver him from God; which the king rising from his seat to receive, Ehud stabbed him with his dagger in the belly, and that with so violent a thrust, that the haft went in after the blade; and Eglon being a very fat man, the fat closed upon it, so that he was obliged to leave it in his body. Having thus executed his purpose, he locked the door of the apartment upon the king, and went out unsuspected (R). The servants, after Ehud was gone, coming, and finding the door locked, concluded the king was easing himself, and therefore waited at the door till they were ashamed; but at length they opened it, and found their master breathless on the floor. Ehud in the mean time escaped beyond Jordan, and gathering together what forces he could, attacked the Moabites that were garrisoned on the west side of the river within the land of Canaan, and slew ten thousand of their best men; which utterly broke the power of Moab, and freed the Israelites from the yoke of that nation<sup>3</sup>.

WE hear no more of the Moabites after this disaster, till the time of Saul, who on Balaam, saying, that the Israelites trespassed through his counsel. Josephus is very particular in relating this circumstance; and tells us, that Balaam bethought himself of it when he came to the Euphrates, and thence sent to speak with Balak and the princes of Midian (62). The Targum of Jonathan and that of Jerusalem suppose he gave this counsel just before he pronounced the last prophecy; and that the same is intimated by these words, I will advise or counsel thee (63).

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 285. <sup>2</sup> Numb. xxxi. 8. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 5. c. 5. <sup>3</sup> Judges iii. 12—30.

(P) Jericho was famous among other things for the great numbers of palm-trees of different kinds which grew in its neighbourhood (64). Josephus says, that Eglon removed his court to this city (65): But he seems to have been mistaken: For after it had been burnt by Joshua (66), who cursed the person that should rebuild it (67), it lay in ruins till the days of Ahab (68). However, the place might serve for a garrison to keep the country in awe, for which use it was very well situated.

(Q) The word Penfilim, which in our version is rendred the quarries, is by the Septuagint translated τὰ γλυφῆματα, and in the vulgate, the idols, the sculptures, which some suppose to have been set up there by Eglon (69).

(R) This action of Ehud some justify, by supposing he had God's express command for it (70). But as the scripture intimates no such thing, others think he might lawfully rid his country of a tyrant, who had unjustly enslaved it, by any means (71). A position which may encourage assassinations in every case, where the actor judges the cause he engages in to be righteous.

(S) This

(62) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 4. c. 6. (63) Numb. xxiv. 14. Vid. etiam CLERIC. in loc. (64) Deut. xxxiv. 3. JOSEPH. de bello Jud. l. 5. c. 4. (65) Idem Antiq. l. 5. c. 5. (66) Josh. vi. 24. (67)

Ibid. v. 26. (68) 1 Kings xvi. 34. (69) CHYTRAËUS, &c. See before, p. 81. in the notes. (70) Vid. PATRIC, in loc. (71) CLERIC. in loc.

warred against them with success<sup>k</sup>. The enmity which subsisted between him and this nation probably induced David, when persecuted by that prince, to ask the king of Moab's protection for his parents, till his affairs should be in a better posture<sup>l</sup>; which the Moabite readily granted, and treated them with great hospitality, while David lay in the cave of Adullam. However, when he came to the crown the Moabites entered into a confederacy against him with several of the neighbouring nations<sup>m</sup>: Whereupon he declared war against them; and having obtained a signal victory, put two thirds of them to the sword (S), and made the rest his vassals and tributaries<sup>n</sup>.

FROM this time they continued subject to Solomon and Rehoboam till the revolt of the ten tribes; upon which it seems they became tributaries to the kings of Israel b though they had all along kings of their own, which were little better than viceroyes. Mesha, one of them, paid Ahab a yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs, and as many weathers, with the wool; his wealth consisting chiefly in sheep<sup>o</sup>. But when Ahab was dead he rebelled against his son Ahaziah p, whose short reign not permitting any attempt to reduce him, his brother and successor Jehoram, assisted by Jehoshaphat king of Judah and the king of Edom his tributary, made an expedition for that purpose, and took a compass of seven days march through the desert of Edom, in order to surprize the enemy. Having reached the land of Moab, the army was distressed for want of water, and must have perished, had not the prophet Elisba obtained a sudden and large supply for them by a land flood. The Moabites being by this time alarmed, got together all that were able to bear arms, and early in the morning, seeing the water to the westward look red, like blood, by reason of the reflection of the sun, and never suspecting it to be water in that dry desert, and in so great a quantity, they immediately took it to be blood, and supposing the confederated princes had fallen out, and turned their arms one against another, concluded they had no more to do than to take the spoil. On this suspicion they ran in confusion to the camp of Israel, but soon found their mistake; for not being able to sustain the first attack of the Israelites, they presently turned their backs, and great numbers of them were slain by the enemy, who pursued them into the very heart of their country, wasted their lands, and demolished their cities, except Kir-baraseth, where the king d of Moab shut himself up. Mesha being besieged and closely pressed, made a sally with 700 choice men, and endeavoured to escape, by breaking through the quarters of the Edomites, which were the weakest; but failing in the attempt, in the height of despair he took his eldest son, who should have succeeded him in the throne, and offered him for a burnt-sacrifice on the wall (T). Which barbarous act struck such horror and indignation into his enemies, that they immediately raised the siege, and returned home<sup>q</sup>.

IT was not long before the Moabites attempted to revenge the losses they had sustained in this invasion, on Jehoshaphat king of Judah (U), by whose assistance chiefly Jehoram was enabled to undertake it; and to strengthen themselves, entered into c

<sup>k</sup> 1 Sam. xiv. 47. <sup>l</sup> 1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 6. c. 14. <sup>m</sup> Psal. lxxxiii. 5, 6, &c. <sup>n</sup> 2 Sam. viii. 2. 1 Chron. xviii. 2. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 7. c. 5. <sup>o</sup> 2 Kings iii. 4. <sup>p</sup> 2 Kings i. 1, & iii. 5. <sup>q</sup> Ibid. v. 6, 27. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 9. c. 1.

(S) This is the meaning of the sacred historian, when he says, That David measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he, to put to death; and with one full line to keep alive. It seems to have been a custom in the east, to order the prisoners of war to lie down, and to measure by a line such a part of them as they designed to put to death. Le Clerc thinks this probably was a just retaliation for some cruelties of the same kind which the Moabites had been guilty of. As the scripture does not say whether David put to death two thirds of the whole nation, or only of those who appeared in arms against him; it is more for the honour of that prince to suppose the latter (72).

(T) Several writers (73) suppose Mesha did not sacrifice his own son, but the son of the king of Edom, whom they say, he took in the sally; and that this is the same action with that mentioned by the prophet Amos, who threatneth Moab, because he burnt the bones of the king of Edom into lime (74). But they seem to be different actions; for not to insist on the strict acceptation of the two passages, one speaking of a king of Edom, and the other of a king's son, it was a known custom in ancient times, for princes in extreme calamities of the publick, to offer their most beloved child as an expiatory sacrifice, to avert the impending vengeance of the gods (75).

(U) Some make this action prior to the invasion of Moab, by this prince and Jehoram; but we shall elsewhere shew that it ought to be placed after it.

(W) Who

(72) Idem, in 2 Sam. viii. 2. (73) See the Argument to the iii. chap. of 2 Kings in the English Bible; and USHER's Annals, ad Annum Mundi, 3109, &c. (74) Amos ii. 1. (75) See before, p. 138 &c.

Vide etiam PORPHYR. de Abst. l. 2. AELIAN. var. Hist. l. 12. c. 28. JUSTIN. l. 18. c. 6. PLUT. in Pelopida, &c.

- a alliance with the Ammonites, the Edomites of mount Seir (who were almost ripe for rebellion, and actually did rebel against Jehoshaphat's son) and some other neighbouring nations (W), and formed a very large army, carrying on their design with such secrecy and dispatch, that they had entered the kingdom by the way of Edom, and were got to Hazazon-samar or Engedi, on the west of the dead sea before Jehoshaphat had any advice of their motion. That good prince was greatly dismayed at the news, and being unprepared for the reception of his enemies; had recourse to God, who promised him by the prophet Jabaziel to deliver him from his enemies without his striking a blow. And it happened accordingly: For while Jehoshaphat and his army, in confidence of the prophecy, were marching towards the enemy, with the priests and b fingers at their head, praising God, the several nations that had leagued against them destroyed each another by falling into the ambushes which themselves had laid against the men of Judah; so that the Ammonites and Moabites first fell upon their confederates of Edom; and having put them to the sword, began to cut one another's throats till none were left alive. And when Jehoshaphat and his people came up with them, they had no more to do than to seize the plunder, which was very rich, and in such abundance, that they spent three days in collecting it.*

- AFTER this we do not find that the Moabites disturbed Israel for many years; however, between this and the reign of Uzziah king of Judah, they had invaded their neighbours of Edom; and having the better of them, inhumanly burnt their king
 c (whether alive or dead is not said) and reduced his bones to ashes: For which piece of cruelty God denounced severe judgments against them by the prophet Amos†. And on the declension of the kingdom of Israel, they also seem to have retaken from the tribes of Reuben and Gad, great part of the land which had formerly belonged to them before the invasion of Sidon; for in the prophecies of Isaiab and Jeremiab against Moab, several cities in those territories are mentioned, as then in the possession of that nation, or of the Ammonites‡, who were probably their confederates in oppressing the Israelites. These successes elated the Moabites so much, that for their pride and insolence God threatened them with utter destruction, by several of his prophets§: And Isaiab in particular foretold, that within three years Ar and Kir-Harasheth, two of d their principal cities, should be destroyed, and the rest of their country brought to misery and desolation¶. This prophecy being dated in the first year of king Hezekiab‡, must have been executed the very year that Samaria was first besieged by Salmaneser king of Assyria, who probably subjected Moab, and placed garrisons in those towns, to stop the diversions which the Arabs might that way have given him, before he began the siege¶.

- AFTER the fearful destruction of the army of Sennacherib the son of Salmaneser, the Moabites often revolted from his successors, and were as often reduced, till they were entirely subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, into whose hands their king was given according to a prediction of Jeremiab‡, the fifth year after his taking Jerusalem‡. For e the Babylonish yoke sat so uneasy on them, that though they took advantage of the low condition of Judah, and missed few or no opportunities of harrassing that nation‡, yet on Nebuchadnezzar's departure from Judea and Syria, after his second expedition into those parts, they with the other neighbouring nations proposed to Zedekiab to enter into a league with him against the Chaldeans; which that prince‡, notwithstanding

* 2 Chron. xx. 1—25. JOSEPH. ubi supr. † Amos ii. 1, 2, 3. ‡ Isaiab xv. & xvi. Jerem. lxiii.
 § Ibid. & Ezek. xxv. 8, & 9. Zeph. ii. 8, 9, 10, 11. ¶ Isai. xv. 14. ‡ Ibid. c. xiv. 28. † Vide PRID. Connect. part. 1. B. 1. p. 18. ‡ Jerem. xxvii. 3—6. xxv. 21. ‡ JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 10. c. 11.
 ‡ 2 Kings xxiv. 2. ‡ Jerem. xxvii.

(W) Who these nations were is uncertain. The original word Mebanmonim should be translated (as it is in the Vulgate) with the Ammonites, were it not that the children of Ammon are mentioned before. To avoid the absurdity of which repetition, the Septuagint, if their copies were not different from the present Hebrew in this place, render it some of the Minzans; of which name Bochart supposes there were two people, one of the race of Shem, dwelling in Arabia Felix, and the other of the race of Ham, who settled in Arabia Petraea, and are meant in this place, being, as he thinks, by the Jews called Meonim, which word occurs in two places of the book of Chronicles (76) though the English translation in the first place takes it for an appellative, and renders it the habitations, and is in both by the Septuagint translated Minzans. Wherefore Bochart prefers the Greek reading in the passage before us, to the Hebrew; being of opinion that there is a transposition of the letters Mim and Ain (77). The Chaldees paraphrast has it, with the Edomites. But there seems to be no occasion for any change, since the particle prefixed may, agreeably to its force elsewhere, be rendered beyond or besides (78); for which reason the English version is judged to have rightly interpreted the words, and others besiege the Ammonites.

(76) 1 Chron. iv. 41. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. (77) (78) Vide CLERIC. in Loc. BOCHART, Phaleg. l. 2. c. 23. PATRICK in Loc.

the remonstrances of Jeremiah to the contrary, consenting to, on the accession of the Egyptians to their confederacy, it became the occasion of his utter ruin; his new allies deserting him in his distress.

FROM this time history makes very little mention of the Moabites, who were henceforward subject to the great empires, and at length mingled among, and were swallowed up in the neighbouring nations which inhabit the deserts of Syria; so that though Josephus mentions the Moabites as a distinct nation long after, saying they were subdued by Alexander Jannæus king of the Jews<sup>4</sup>, and tells us they were a populous nation, even in his time<sup>5</sup>; yet by the third century after CHRIST they lost their ancient name, and fell with the neighbouring nations under the more general denomination of Arabians<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>4</sup> JOSEPH. de bello Jud. l. 1. c. 4. <sup>5</sup> Idem Ant. l. 1. c. 11. <sup>6</sup> ORIGEN. in Job. l. 1.

SECTION II.

The history of Ammon.

THIS people were the posterity of Ammon, otherwise called Ben Ammi (though that is not positively known) signifying the son of my people our kindred, the offspring of Lot and his younger daughter<sup>1</sup>. We have given the history of this incestuous birth in speaking of Moab the son of the elder sister by her father<sup>2</sup>.

Of the country possessed by the Ammonites THE children of Ammon possessed themselves of the country called after their own name, Ammonitis, adjoining to the north of the Moabitis, after having driven out the Zamzummins, as they called them, who were giants, and the ancient inhabitants of the land<sup>3</sup>. This country<sup>4</sup>, as well as Moabitis, is by some reckoned a part of Cale Syria<sup>5</sup>, and by others of Arabia, and was in its first state under the Ammonites, bounded by the river Jabboc on the north<sup>6</sup>; though elsewhere it seems as if it extended beyond that, northward, into the mountains of Gilead<sup>7</sup>: On the west, it had the river Jordan; on the south, the river Arnon<sup>8</sup> or the confines of Moabitis; on the east, the deserts of Arabia. But in the days of Moses the Amorites had dislodged them from their first boundaries at the same time they disturbed the Moabites, driving the Ammonites from the western part of their possession into, and across the mountains, which served them for an immediate defence, perhaps, against the farther pursuit of the Amorites, and as a strong barrier to protect them, in part, from invasions thereafter<sup>9</sup>. Their exact boundaries, especially after this expulsion, we cannot settle. We have only to add, that their kingdom, probably, was not of very wide extent, any more than that of Moab; and that it was chiefly a corn country, as may be gathered from the tribute on its inhabitants, of which we shall speak in the course of their history.

THE cities of this kingdom we know little enough of. The metropolis was called Rabbab, which, to distinguish it from the chief city of Moab, which bore the same name or epithet, was called Rabbab of the children of Ammon<sup>10</sup>. It was also known by the name of Ammana<sup>11</sup>. This capital seems to have been distinguished into two parts, Rabbab properly so called, and the city of waters. Whence the waters were derived to it, whether from the river Jabboc, or whether from exuberant springs in or about it, cannot be determined. This only we have some authority to say, that it was the most delightful part of the city, and that the king's house stood there; from whence this part may have been stiled the royal city<sup>12</sup>. Rabbab, moreover, was famous for being the place where the great iron bedstead of Og king of Basan was to be seen<sup>13</sup>. In process of time this city was called Philadelphia<sup>14</sup> from Ptolomy Philadelphus, who rebuilt it in a sumptuous manner; and for ages after, it was a city of first note: Nay, of such eminence as to impose its name upon the countries of Ammonitis and Moabitis; from hence stiled the Philadelphian Arabia<sup>15</sup>. The other considerable cities of this kingdom were Minnith (concerning which there is some doubt) and Abel of the vineyard<sup>16</sup>. Jaser or Jazar is also reckoned among the cities of Ammon<sup>17</sup>, but inaccurately<sup>18</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> Gen. xix. 38. <sup>3</sup> See before p. 284. <sup>4</sup> Deuter. xi. 20. <sup>5</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 16—5. <sup>6</sup> Steph. de urb. in Αμμαν. <sup>7</sup> Judg. xi. 13. <sup>8</sup> Josh. xiii. 24, 25. <sup>9</sup> Judg. ubi supr. <sup>10</sup> See Numb. xxi. 24. <sup>11</sup> Deut. iii. 11. <sup>12</sup> STEPH. in Αμμαν. <sup>13</sup> See 2 Sam. xii. 25, 27. <sup>14</sup> Deut. ubi supr. <sup>15</sup> Vide EUSEB. Onomast. urbium & locorum. <sup>16</sup> Vide CELLARIJ notitias Orbis Antiqui. c. 14. <sup>17</sup> Judg. xi. 33. <sup>18</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 12. c. 11. <sup>19</sup> Maccab. v. 8. <sup>20</sup> Vide CELLAR. ubi supr.

- a We know very little of the manners and customs of this people. They had kings, and were circumcised<sup>a</sup>, and seem, to have been principally addicted to husbandry. They, as well as the Moabites, were among the nations, whose peace or prosperity the Israelites were not to strive after. Neither the one nor the other of them were to be admitted into the congregation to the tenth generation; so wide was the distance between the Israelites and them! The reason, because they did not come out to relieve them in the wilderness; and because they joined to hire Balaam to curse them<sup>b</sup>. However, we find there was afterwards a very good understanding between their king Nabash and David<sup>c</sup>.

- THE religion of the Ammonites, as we have already observed, concerning that of Their religion.
b the Moabites, was originally as pure as it could flow from so clear a stream as the instruction of Lot; but they also swerved therefrom by degrees, and at length degenerated into the most stupid, and as is generally supposed, the most cruel idolatry.

- THEIR chief and peculiar deity is in the scripture called Molech, or Moloch. He is thought also to be understood under the names of Baal, Milcom, Melech, Adramelech, Anamelech and the like. These names or titles signify no more than lord or king, and sometimes have a pre-junctive epithet, as in the two last, where he is stiled the mighty and rich Melech, Moloch, or king: These two were the gods of the Sepharvites. We shall only speak of the Ammonitish Moloch in this place. The learned are not positively agreed in what relates to him. It is on all hands allowed that they addressed him under the title of king or Moloch<sup>d</sup>. His image is said to have been hollow, and to have been divided into seven receptacles. The first was opened for an offering of fine flour; the second for an offering of turtles; the third for a sheep; the fourth for a ram; the fifth for a calf; the sixth for an ox; the seventh for a child. It had the head of an ox, and the arms of a man stretched out in act to receive<sup>e</sup> (A). Now these seven receptacles are also called seven chapels; and instead of being within the image itself, are placed orderly before it<sup>f</sup>. Whatever was the disposition of these seven places, their number corresponding with that of the sun, moon, and five planets, has given room to suppose that they worshipped the sun intentionally<sup>g</sup>; and the rather as the oblations seem to rise in such proportion as might, according to this c people, best fit the degree of each of these heavenly bodies. But it were endless to expatiate in a conjectural way upon so obscure a matter, as the learned have done. Some accounts there are farther concerning this idol, but they are very doubtful (B). Chemosh also was a god of the Ammonites, concerning whom we have said all we can already<sup>h</sup>.

As to the superstitions paid to Moloch, there is a wide discrepancy among authors. By the scripture it is often said, that the Ammonites passed their seed through fire to Moloch. This expression is taken in a literal sense by some, in a figurative sense by others. The first sentiment is embraced by the Jewish writers (C), who for the most

<sup>a</sup> Jerem. ix. 25, 26. <sup>b</sup> Deut. xxxiii. <sup>c</sup> 2 Kings xi. <sup>d</sup> Vide Voss. de Idololat. & SELDEN de Diis Syr. Syntag. l. c. vi. <sup>e</sup> PAUL FAGIOS apud eund. ubi supr. <sup>f</sup> See BEDFORD'S Script. Chronol. p. 259. <sup>g</sup> Vide Voss. ubi supr. <sup>h</sup> See before, p. 285.

(A) An ancient Jewish traveller says, "that when he was in these parts, there were yet standing remains of the ancient temple of the Ammonites, and therein their idol seated upon a throne. This idol was of stone, gilt over with gold, and had on each hand the image of a woman in a sitting posture (79): Before the idol was the altar on which the Ammonites offered their sacrifices and incense". Selden thinks this idol and this temple cannot be thought to have been erected to Moloch, that most ancient deity of the Ammonites (80). And indeed we think this traveller must have been imposed on, or rather intended to impose on others. However, we must not apprehend, that the images of Moloch were always large and fixed: They were likewise small and portable, and carried up and down in shrines, according to appearance, and as the custom was with other idolaters, as will be observed at due times (81).

(B) To give you the various opinions of some learned men, Moloch has been taken for Priapus, for Mercury, for Saturn, and for Venus or the morning star (82).

(C) Some of the Jewish writers hold, That the children were solemnly delivered to the priests;

(79) BENJAMIN Itinerar. (80) In Syntag. prim. de diis Syr. (81) Vide eund. ibid. (82) Vide Voss. de Idolatria, lib. 2. c. 5. (83) MOSES. MA-who returning them again, they were carried by their parents upon their shoulders, between two fires. According to others, the priests carried them. A very eminent writer of this sort says, "That the priests or servants of fire, persuaded men that their children would die if they did not pass them through fire: Wherefore parents being anxious for the lives of their children, and perceiving there was neither danger nor difficulty in performing the ceremony, no one neglected it, considering that the children were not to be consumed by fire, but only to pass through it" (83). This also is the opinion of Solomon Yarbi, Joseph Kara, and others; but Aben Ezra dissents therefrom, and affirms, that passing through fire must be here understood of burning. Vossius insists on it, that wherever the expression of passing through fire is met with, it must be taken in the strictness of the letter; but allows, that in cases of great calamity, and upon other particular occasions, they gave up their offspring as an expiatory sacrifice to their god (84). Selden is of a quite different sentiment, and will have it, that they not only led their children through fire, but burnt them also at the same time. This he proves as far as a matter of this nature can be ascertained (85). 1M. More Nieboch lib. 3. c. 38. (84) Vide Voss. ubi supr. (85) Vide SELDEN. ubi supr.

part hold, that the children were barely carried or led between two fires, by way of purification : The latter is adopted by the christian writers chiefly, who think that they actually burnt their children, by way of sacrifice to this grim idol. There was a place near Jerusalem where this horrid custom was observed. It was called the valley of the sons of Hinnom <sup>(D)</sup>, so named from the shrieks of the children sacrificed : As also Tophet <sup>1</sup>, from a Hebrew word, Toph, signifying a drum or tabret, which they used among other instruments, to drown the dreadful outcries of the unhappy victims. Whence this cruelty took birth, is what we may have occasion to discuss at large hereafter.

They drive out the Zamzummins. As the Moabites drove out the Emims, and possessed themselves of their country, so the Ammonites forced the Zuzims or Zamzummins, as they called them, from their habitations, and settled themselves there. These Zamzummins, as well as the Emims, are stiled giants <sup>2</sup>, and were doubtless both derived from the same stock <sup>3</sup>. This gigantic race had been invaded by Chedorlaomer king of Elam <sup>4</sup>, who destroying great numbers of them, as should seem, made it the easier for the children of Ammon to dislodge them. When this expulsion was effected, or in what manner, we know not. However, the Ammonites themselves underwent the same fate in the days of Moses, being dispossessed by Sibon the Amorite, who drove them into, and to the eastward of the mountains.

Their history. THE names of their first kings do not occur. They joined Eglon king of Moab against Israel <sup>5</sup>, and shared in the successes of that war ; but who was their leader at this time is not said.

They war with the Israelites under an anonymous king. ABOUT two hundred years after this, we find the Ammonites as principals in a war, under an anonymous king, against the Israelites. This prince took it into his head to attempt the recovery of the ancient country of Ammonitis ; and making an irruption into it, he bore down all before him, and kept it in subjection eighteen years. Encouraged by his success, he crossed over the river Jordan, and insulted the tribes of Judab and Benjamin, and Ephraim <sup>6</sup>, but returned to the other side again, and prepared (E) to make a compleat conquest of the country on both sides of the river <sup>7</sup> ; or at least to get a handsome portion of it. For it is said that the Philistines also at this time invaded Israel ; but whether with separate views, or in combination with the Ammonites, does not appear ; though it is most likely they intended to share the spoil between them. But to speak of the king of Ammon singly, he persevered in his purpose, and encamped in Gilead ; and the Israelites having turned to God, who had suffered them to be so long oppressed for their wickedness, they were inspired with a courage to oppose this arrogant invader, and to drive him out of Gilead, where he had lorded it for eighteen years. Accordingly, messengers came to him from their new general Jephthab, to demand his reasons for persisting in his enmity against them, and threatening them with farther calamities. His answer to them was, that the remembrance of the injuries his fore-fathers had sustained when the Israelites dispossessed them of their country, had excited him thereto ; and therefore required them forthwith to restore that district to him, as in justice they ought. In reply to this pretension, there came ambassadors to him again from Jephthab : And these made an historical remonstrance to him of his mistake, in saying the Israelites had driven out the Ammonites, and stily expiating upon the truth of the story throughout the several circumstances, expected his answer : But he gave no ear to them, and was bent at all hazards upon a war. And therefore as he lay near Aroer, he was attacked by Jephthab, who gave him a total overthrow ; and being put to flight, he was pursued with great loss of blood, even into his own dominions, to Minnish, and from thence as far as Abel of the vineyards : So that not only his army was slaughtered, but good part of his country also was pillaged and wasted <sup>8</sup>. This was the event of <sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. xxviii. 3. <sup>2</sup> 2 Kings xxiii. 10. <sup>3</sup> Deut. ii. 20, 21. <sup>4</sup> See before, p. 286. <sup>5</sup> Gen. xiv. 5. <sup>6</sup> See before, p. 289. <sup>7</sup> Judg. x. 8. <sup>8</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 5. c. 9. <sup>9</sup> Judg. xi.

(D) This valley was a very delightful place, watered by the springs of Siloab. It was shady and beautified with gardens. And indeed it is remarkable that the heathens commonly chose fountain heads and solemn groves for the scenes of the homage they paid their deities, which custom, our author supposes they borrowed from the Ammonites (86).

(E) There is pretty considerable difference here between the scripture and Josephus. He says the Ammonites and the Philistines had only prepared to cross the river Jordan. The scripture says, the Ammonites did actually cross over to fight with Judab, and Benjamin, and Ephraim ; so that the Israelites were in great distress.

- a the war, which put an end to the tyranny of Ammon over the Israelites on the other side Jordan, and which had lasted, as we observed, eighteen years.

THE next of their kings we find mentioned, is called NAHASH. He flourished in Nabash king the days of Saul, from whom he received the just reward of his great insolence and barbarity. For reviving the old claim to the territory inhabited by the Israelites on the other side Jordan, he waged war with them, which in the beginning was attended with all the success imaginable. At length coming to the city of Jabesh, he besieged it. The terror of his arms was so great, that the inhabitants were at once for throwing themselves at his feet, and acknowledging him for their lord and king. This submission, which might have mollified a prince of generous heart, served only to harden his. He would hearken to them upon no other condition than their consenting every man to the loss of his right eye, that in them he might stigmatize the whole body of Israel. The inhabitants returned for answer, That if he would allow them but seven days to endeavour a deliverance from him, they would submit to his terms after the expiration of that time, if none was found to deliver them. This he granted them, and secure within himself, waited for the cruel satisfaction he proposed shortly to enjoy. But he was assaulted in three several parts of his camp by Saul, very early on the eighth morning, when he expected the inhabitants to march out to him, as they deceitfully told him they should the night before; and his army was put into such confusion that the Israelites had little else to do but to put them to the sword. Instead of a battle it is termed a slaughter, which lasted till the heat of the day; at which time the surviving remnant of Nabash's army was so perfectly dispersed, that there was no two of them to be seen together. Thus ended this war. We are informed that Nabash did some kindnesses to king David. Josephus differs from scripture in his account of this war (F.)

HANUN succeeded his father Nabash (G) in the kingdom; but whether this Na-Hanun king bash be the very same who was defeated by Saul at Jabesh, we are not told. However this was, we are informed that Nabash, the father of Hanun, had lived in a very fair intelligence with David. Wherefore when this latter heard that Nabash was dead, and that his son succeeded, he, for the father's sake, sent ambassadors to the young king, to condole with him for his loss, to congratulate him upon his accession, and to offer a continuance of the friendship which had been cherished between the late king and him. Hanun seems to have been a weak prince, and had very ignorant counsellors about him. Whence it came to pass that when he received these compliments from king David by the mouth of his ambassadors, he, in the room of improving them to advantage, took a false step which he never could recover. For instead of entertaining these ambassadors with the hospitality and decency which became him, he suffered himself to be persuaded that they were no better than spies; and accordingly, forgetting the sacredness of their character, he shaved off the half of their beards, cut away their garments by the buttocks, and in that shameful disguise sent them back to their king. This amazing defect in policy, and contempt of David, in open defiance of the laws of nature, hospitality and gratitude, brought on a war, which ended in the destruction of him and his kingdom.

It was soon told him how grievously David relented the affront, and what preparations he was making to chastise him for it. Hanun, therefore, perceiving himself on the brink of a war, to which he singly was unequal, dispatched ambassadors to the neighbouring princes, to hire and solicit the assistance of troops from them, to enable him to withstand the invasion which threatened his kingdom. What the troops he

* 1 Sam. xi.    * 2 Sam. x.    1 Chron. xix.    JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 7: c. 6.

(F) There seems to be something very unaccountable in Josephus's history of this war: He says that Nabash began it, and carried it on for some time with the violences usual in the like cases, and with this political addition, of plucking out the right eyes of all those he took, that they might lose the use of their bucklers, which covered the left eye, or the use of that eye at all; and so reduce them to a slavery for life, seeing they would be unable to defend themselves. But may it not be asked how it could come to pass that those who pressed on so hastily to relieve Jabesh, could have suffered Nabash to have gone on in a course of this cruelty for even the shortest space of time? This historian seems here to be quite wide of the sense of the sacred text.

(G) Notwithstanding Josephus informs us that Nabash was killed upon the breaking up of the siege of Jabesh, (87) we cannot forbear thinking that he lived many years afterwards, and was the father of this Hanun. His behaviour at Jabesh, speaks him to have been a rash, hot-headed young man at that time, and he might naturally enough have lived many years afterwards.

(87) JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 6. 6.

procured were, either in quality or number, is not clearly evident, inasmuch as the scripture varies (H) concerning them. First, we are told that Hanun sent to the Syrians of Beth-rebub, and to the Syrians of Zobab, from whom he had twenty thousand footmen; to the king of Maachab, who furnished one thousand men; and to the king of Ishob, who sent twelve thousand men<sup>1</sup>. With this Josephus agrees pretty well in respect of number, retrenching only the one thousand men supplied by the king of Maachab, and allowing him and the king of Ishob to have contributed twelve thousand men between them<sup>2</sup>. Whence, instead of making the number of these mercenaries to have amounted to thirty three thousand, as the scripture does, he computes them at thirty two thousand. Again, we are told that Hanun sent a thousand talents of silver, therewith to hire chariots and horsemen out of Mesopotamia,<sup>3</sup> and out of Syria Maachab; and out of Zobab; and that he actually hired thirty two thousand chariots besides the king of Maacha's men<sup>4</sup>. Between Josephus and this passage of scripture there is a more material difference than before: He says, those which came out of Mesopotamia were footmen<sup>5</sup>. Here also we see the scripture keeps to the number of thirty three thousand. However, though the number be the same as before, the difference is very great. But let us proceed to the actions and events of this war.

HANUN having thus drawn a considerable force from the neighbouring countries, and raised an army of his own subjects, marched out of Rabbab to fight Joab, whom David had sent at the head of his army. The Ammonites and their auxiliaries drew up in two distinct bodies; viz. the Ammonites under the walls of their city, and the auxiliaries at some distance on the plain. By this disposition they thought to have charged Joab's front, and at the same time to have fallen upon his rear; but this took no effect. For the Ammonites were attacked by Abishai, Joab's brother, whilst Joab himself charged the Syrians. The Ammonites (I) sustained Abishai's charge with great constancy, and maintained the conflict with intrepidity, till perceiving their Syrian friends to give ground, they thought it most advisable to retreat into their city, and they did so.

THE next year their Syrian allies, ashamed of their last defeat, made head again, (K) but being utterly routed by David in person, the Ammonites were left to defend themselves against the violent and just resentment of their injured enemy<sup>6</sup>.

It came down heavily upon them. For the very next year, the third of this war, the country was entered by Joab, who harassed and wasted it far and wide; and at length besieged Hanun in Rabbab, the capital of his kingdom. The place held out about two years; during which Hanun made one desperate sally, and cut off many of the besiegers, and, among the rest, Uriah the husband of Bathsheba. At length the city was reduced to the utmost extremities of famine, and was stormed by David in person, who came to have the honour of completing the work. In the assault Hanun was slain, and his crown, which weighed a talent of gold (one hundred thirteen pound ten ounces, one penny-weight 10  $\frac{3}{4}$  gr. of our Troy weight<sup>7</sup>), or was worth so much, and was adorned with precious stones (a sardonyx, Josephus says) was taken from off his head by David. What other spoil was found in this metropolis, is nowhere specified. The inhabitants were treated with extraordinary severity, being led out and put to death by the most exquisite torments, harrowed, sawn, and hacked with axes, and passed through the brick-kiln. This dreadful usage extended to the rest of the cities of Ammon (L), which held out against the conqueror; all such shar-

<sup>1</sup> 2 Sam. ubi supra. <sup>2</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. ubi supra. <sup>3</sup> 1 Chron ubi supra. <sup>4</sup> ubi supra. <sup>5</sup> Sam. ubi supra. JOSEPH. Antiq. ubi supra. <sup>6</sup> See ARNUTH. Tab. of ancient coins, weights and measures, Tab. XX.

(H) There is no reason for quitting the letter of the scripture to follow Josephus, who says expressly, that the head of this league was Syrus king of Mesopotamia, whereas the scripture calls Haderazer. Josephus is so professed an admirer, and so constant a copier of the Greeks, that he frequently chuses to err with them, rather than be in the right with his own nation, which was very probably the case here (88).

(I) In what concerns this battle we reject Josephus<sup>8</sup>, and choose to interpret the scripture according to reason and the nature of things.

(K) Thus it appears by scripture, which, in-verting the order of things, makes the Syrians principals in this war, rather avenging their last overthrow than espousing the cause of the Ammonites. Josephus strays here again very unaccountably. He makes the Ammonites send to one Balama, a king of the Syrians beyond the Euphrates, for another army thrice as big as that they hired before (89).

(L) The scripture says it extended to all the cities of Ammon; but we cannot forbear thinking that this expression means, only, all such as held out obstinately, and defied the king of Israel; and herein we are supported by Josephus.

(88) Id. lib. 7. <sup>8</sup> Antiq. lib. 7. c. 7. (89) Ubi supra.

- a ing in the fate of the city of Rabbah, which was destroyed, and laid level with the ground *. And thus did the Ammonites suffer excessively for the rashness of a young king, and the foolish advice of unexperienced counsellors.

AFTER this terrible execution, it is no wonder we hear nothing of a king of Ammon, nor indeed of the nation itself, till the reign of Jehoshaphat king of Judah. At this time we find them united with their brethren the Moabites, and the inhabitants of mount Seir, against the said king of Judah. The particulars of this war, and how it ended, we have given in the history of Moab †.

AFTER this they were overthrown by, and made tributary to, Uzziab king of Judah ‡.

- b THE Ammonites bore this yoke as long as Uzziab lived, but in the reign of his son Jotham they had an anonymous king over them, who stirred them up to rebellion against him. The nation at this time must have been pretty well recovered, and having a martial prince at the head of them, they resolved to free themselves from the oppressions of their old enemies in Judah. The event was unhappy; they were overthrown in battle, and were reduced to compound for their peace with Jotham, by paying a tribute of one hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley †, in all about one hundred sixty thousand of our bushels; and this same tribute did they pay for three successive years ‡.

- A T length when the Babylonians grew mighty, and threatened all the kingdoms of this part of Asia with subjection, it is likely they might have entertained thoughts of withstanding the common enemy with their joint force. From hence, possibly, a good understanding between Baalis the last king of Ammon, and Zedekiah the last king of Judah * might arise. But when destruction came upon Zedekiah and Jerusalem, the Ammonites shewed themselves, and exulted over the ruins of that unhappy city †, for which they were severely threatened by the Prophet. It seems impossible that they should have refrained from it, considering the implacable enmity which had so long subsisted between the nations. However, Baalis received all the Jews that fled into his dominions, to avoid the captivity, and among those one Ishmael, of the royal blood, whose interest he pretended to have much at heart. And to give him an instance of his readiness to assist him, with his counsel at least, advised him to go back again into his own country and assassinate Gedaliab, who, by the express appointment of the Babylonians, was left there and set over the poor remnant of the Jews. By this stirring up a pretender, he seems to have aimed at the utter extirpation of the nation, either out of a pure desire of revenge, or with some view to his own advantage at the same time. His bloody counsel was taken, and the assassin did his work, and was obliged to fly back again to Baalis, who received him into his protection ‡. But Baalis lived not long unpunished for having been so evidently accessory to the murder of the innocent Gedaliab: For, a short time afterwards he was attacked by Nebuzaradan the Babylonian general, who put his country to fire and sword, and destroyed his chief city Rabbah, and carried away Baalis and most of the nobles of Ammon into captivity, as had been prophesied by Amos: I will kindle a fire in the wall of Rabbah, and it shall devour the palaces thereof, and their king shall go into captivity, he and his princes together, saith the Lord; and by Ezekiel: And I will deliver thee for a spoil † unto the men of the east, and will give them the Ammonites in possession, that the Ammonites may not be remembered among the nations ‡.

- THIS last prophecy was in due time compleated, their name being blotted out from the book of nations in the end. But in the mean time they are mentioned as conjoined with the Arabians, Moabites, and Samaritans, in giving all the disturbance they were able to the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem; which they endeavoured f to prevent as much as in them lay. One Tobiab, called the servant, is said to have been at the head of them upon these occasions ‡.

LIVING in peace and quietness under the great monarchies, the Ammonites in process of time grew to be more considerable, and in the days of Judas Maccabeus were assembled together in a very great army under their governor Timotheus, to fight against that heroic Jew. They came to a battle, wherein Timotheus and the Ammonites had the worst, and the same ill-fortune attended them in other subsequent conflicts under the same leader, and against the same enemy. In the end their city Jaser (it was not antiently reckoned a city of theirs) and the neighbouring towns, fell a prey to the Jews, who slew the men, and carried their wives and children into captivity, and plundered and burnt this city of Jaser; and thus ended this, as it seems, their last warfare with the descendants of Israel<sup>1</sup>.

* See 2 Sam. xii. 1, 29, 31. JOSEPH. ubi supra. c. 7. 1 Chron. xx. * See before, p. 291. † 2 Chron. xxvi. 8. JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 9. c. 11. ‡ Vid. ARBUTH. ubi supra. † Idem ubi supra. * 2 Chron. xxvii. 5. † See Jerem. xxvii. 3. ‡ See Ezekiel xxv. † See Jerem. chap. xl, xli. c. 1. 14, 15. ‡ xxv. 7—10. * See Nehem. ii, iv, vi, xiii.

NEVERTHELESS, towards the beginning of the second century of the christian era, they were declared a numerous nation<sup>2</sup>; but towards the latter end of the same their name was vanished, and they themselves blended among the Arabians<sup>3</sup>, as happened also to the Moabites, Edomites, and others.

<sup>1</sup> See 1 Macc. v. 6—8. JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 12. c. 11, 12. Prideaux Connect. Part II. Book IV. p. 212. <sup>2</sup> Vide JUST. MART. in dial. cum Tryph. p. 272. <sup>3</sup> Orig. lib. 1. in Job.

S E C T. III.

The History of MIDIAN, or MADIAN.

Their descent. IT is generally agreed that this people drew their origin from Midian, the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah, from whom they were called Midianites. He received large gifts from his father, as did the rest of his brethren, and was, as well as they, sent into the east country, to be at a proper distance from Isaac<sup>a</sup>. The sons of Midian were Ephah, and Epher, and Henoch, and Abidah, and Aldaah<sup>b</sup>.

THE Midianites were, in their most early times, evidently confounded with the Ismaelites<sup>c</sup>; and many ages afterwards they are mentioned in conjunction with the Nabataans and Kedarenes, the posterity of Nabaioth and Kedar, the sons of Ismael<sup>c</sup>. Doubtless, remembering their kindred, they adhered to each other, and were pretty much blended together. On the other hand, we find them to have been so incorporated, as it were, with the Moabites, that Moses almost considered them as but one nation<sup>d</sup>. Their religion was the same, and they acted in the strictest concert together against him and the Israelites. The ties of blood united these likewise, as on the one side they were descended from Abraham, and on the other from Lot. So, just as they happened to live in the northern or southern parts of their country they joined themselves either to the Moabites or the Ismaelites from hence we, in part, gather the extent of their territory, and that it was pretty wide.

The country possessed by the Midianites.

THE country of Midian was a part of Arabia Petraea. Its exact limits cannot be ascertained. From what we find in scripture, it must have laid south-east-ward of the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead sea<sup>e</sup>. On the north, it was bounded by Moab, or rather mixed with it<sup>e</sup>. Its boundary on the east is uncertain. On the south it was bounded by the Red sea. On the west, by Edom, or Idumaea, and, partly, also on the north, as we apprehend<sup>f</sup>.

BEING a part of Arabia Petraea, it was mostly rocky, mountainous, and sandy. These defects however were pretty well ballanced by the numbers of camels and dromedaries it abounded with; creatures most admirably adapted for the use of such as were to live upon so dry and craggy a soil. It was also well stored with other cattle, which in great herds were driven about to pasture, and to springs of water<sup>g</sup>. Though it is certain that this country was not very well furnished with fixed habitations, such as boroughs and great towns, yet we read of their cities and goodly castles: But these we must understand to have stood in the neighbourhood of Moab only<sup>h</sup>. Two of its cities we have express mention of, and both called Midian or Madian; the one, situated in the north towards Rabbah of Moab, or Areopolis; the other in the south by the Red sea<sup>i</sup>; and was very probably the same which Ptolomy calls Modiana, and is perhaps the same with a ruined place which the Arabs call Madyan to this day. Finally, we must not forget that mount Sinai is placed within this territory<sup>j</sup>.

Their manners.

THE Midianites were a very numerous race, and may be distinguished into two sorts, shepherds and merchants. The shepherds moved up and down in tents, and

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xx. 2. 6. 1 Chron. i. 32. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. v. 33. Gen. xxv. 4. <sup>c</sup> See Gen. xxxvii. 25—28. Judg. viii. 24. <sup>d</sup> Isa. lx. 6, 7. <sup>e</sup> See Gen. xxxvi. 35. 1 Chron. i. 46. <sup>f</sup> See Exod. iii. 1. xvi. 5. Judg. vi. 3. vii. 12, 24, 25. <sup>g</sup> See Numb. xxii. 4. <sup>h</sup> See 1 kings xi. 18. <sup>i</sup> See Judg. vi. 5. <sup>j</sup> Num. xxi. 10. <sup>k</sup> Hieron. in Numb. xxxi. 8, 10. <sup>l</sup> Vide Euseb. Onomast. in vocem Xωγῆς.

- a drove their cattle before them, even when they went to war<sup>a</sup>. The merchants also travelled from place to place in companies<sup>c</sup>, or caravans, as the merchants of those parts do at this day, and left the care of their cattle to the women, as appears by the story of Jethro's daughters (A). The shepherds, it is likely, had few or no fixed habitations, except some strong holds near their borders: The merchants probably had few or none except marts and stations, in places convenient for their trade. These grew to be exceeding rich, and by exchanging their gold and jewels with their brethren for their cattle, the shepherds became thereby rich in precious ornaments<sup>d</sup>. Their manners must have been in many respects as different as their way of life. However, they are in general represented to have been very sumptuous in their household stuff and dress. We read of their jewels of gold, chains, bracelets, rings, earrings, tablets<sup>e</sup>, the purple raiment of their kings, and the gold chains or collars round the necks of their camels<sup>f</sup>.

It appears very plain from Job, that they had the use of writing very early in these parts<sup>g</sup> among the descendants of Abraham; and the Midianites being also of the number, we cannot suppose them to have been ignorant therein (B). Sir Isaac Newton affords them the honour of having instructed Moses in writing<sup>h</sup>. The merchants must also have been versed in some measure in arithmetic; and there being ships on the mediterranean so early as in the days of the patriarch Jacob<sup>i</sup>; and these being themselves traders, and situated on the Red Sea, it cannot be supposed that they could refrain from ship-building, and visiting the shores of their own sea, and the coasts thereunto contiguous. From hence we may naturally enough extend the circle of their sciences beyond bare writing and arithmetic, and allow them a competent skill in geography, geometry, and astronomy.

It is very apparent that the Midianites varied as much from each other in their religion, as in their manner of life. At first they were, to be sure, pure and right in their way; how long they persevered in it is not said. But in the days of Moses they partly wallowed in all the abominations of the Moabites<sup>k</sup>; those we mean who were nearest to that idolatrous nation; nay, exceeded them in their endeavours to pervert the children of Israel when they lay in the plains of Moab, in persuading them to bow down to Peor<sup>l</sup>; but we are indeed told that Peor was worshipped by the Midianitish women chiefly<sup>m</sup>. Thus stood religion in the north of Midian. Now in the south we find them enlightened by a rational and sublime system, long after their brethren had fallen into the foulest corruption. As a proof of this, we need only mention Jethro, who is commonly stiled the priest of Midian, and is said to have lived<sup>n</sup>, and is by some thought to have presided<sup>o</sup> over the Midianites near the Red Sea. His behaviour<sup>p</sup> in the camp of Israel is a sufficient argument in favour of them; yet, though their religion was otherwise very pure, it is remarkable they could not bear circumcision<sup>q</sup>. They offered up praises and thanksgivings and sacrifices to God, but their religious rites or ceremonies are not spoken of.

c We know not whether they were divided as much from each other in form of government as in occupation and religion: Excepting the case of Jethro, their government is represented rather as aristocratical than monarchical. Their chiefs however are stiled kings, and therefore we shall dignify them with the same title.

<sup>a</sup> See Judg. vi. 5. <sup>c</sup> See Gen. xxxvii. 28. <sup>d</sup> See Numb. 50, 51, 52. Judg. viii. 24. <sup>e</sup> Numb. ubi supr. <sup>f</sup> Judg. ubi supr. v. 26. <sup>g</sup> See Job. xix. 23, 24. <sup>h</sup> Chron. of ancient Kings. amend. ed. p. 210. <sup>i</sup> See Gen. xlix. 13. <sup>k</sup> See before, p. 285. <sup>l</sup> See Numb. xxv. 18. JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 6. <sup>m</sup> HIERON. in Numb. Hom. xx. <sup>n</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 2. c. 11. <sup>o</sup> Vide TREMELLII Bibl. Lat. Exod. iii. <sup>p</sup> Exod. xviii. 10—12. <sup>q</sup> See ibid. iv. 25, 26.

(A) That story seems to inform us, that the men in the south part of Midian were not shepherds; and therefore we imagine they were merchants. Josephus expressly tells us, that it was the custom of the women in this part (which he by mistake calls Troglodytica) to over look the cattle; though indeed in this he seemingly contradicts what he says but a line or two before (vix.) that the shepherds of the country were continually at strife which should get first served with water; and from thence infers the irregularity committed upon Jethro's daughters (1).

(B) It is almost plain that Jethro himself had the art of writing, and, though we dare not positively assert it, sent a letter to prepare Moses for his reception, when he was on his way to the Israelites with his daughter Zipporah and her two sons. This is very rationally inferred from Jethro's form of addressing himself to Moses, and what is said to have happened thereupon: I, thy father-in-law, Jethro, am come unto thee, and thy wife, and her two sons with her. What was the consequence of this? Moses went out to meet his father-in-law. Had these words been uttered face to face, Moses could, with no manner of propriety, be said to have gone out to meet his father-in-law. As to the manner of writing in these days, and in these parts, there is mention made of graving with an iron pen or style, upon lead, in the book of J. 6 (2).

(1) JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 2. c. 11.

(2) Chap. xix. 24:

Their history.

THE most ancient record we find concerning this nation, after what has already <sup>a</sup> been said, is, their war with Hadad the Horite, when Midian was smitten by him in the field of Moab <sup>1</sup>.

THE next is their purchasing of Joseph from his brethren for twenty pieces of silver, and carrying him away with them into Egypt, where they sold him to Petiphar, one of Pharaoh's chief officers <sup>2</sup>.

Jethro.

MANY years after this there lived a priest or prince (C) of the southern Midianites called Reuel or Jethro, or the Kenite the father of Moses <sup>3</sup>. This person resided, in the city of Madian by the Red Sea <sup>4</sup>. It happened that his daughters, who were seven in number, met with some disturbance, one day, from certain rude shepherds, in watering their father's flock. Just before this, Moses had set himself down to rest in <sup>b</sup> the same place, being then upon his flight from Pharaoh; and perceiving the outrage of the shepherds, who drove the maidens and their cattle from the water they had been at the pains of drawing, he rose up and withstood them, and assisted the young women in completing their work. When they went home to their father, he wondered to see them come back sooner than usual; and enquiring into the cause of their dispatch, they gave him an account of the insult they had received at the well; and how an Egyptian (so they called Moses) had protected and assisted them. The good man enquired where this worthy stranger was, and reproved his daughters for being so unkind as not to bring him home with them; and straitway sent them to invite their friend and protector to refresh himself. They obeyed, and brought Moses <sup>c</sup> to their father Jethro; who taking a fancy to the man, retained him in his family, committed the care of his flocks to him, and in process of time gave him his daughter Zipporah to wife; and Jethro had Moses with him forty years. At length, understanding that his son-in-law was commissioned by God to lead out the children of Israel from bondage, he consented to part with him and his daughter, and his grandchildren, who set out for Egypt: But a dispute arising between Moses and his wife <sup>d</sup> about circumcising a child upon the road <sup>5</sup>, she came, or was sent back again by her husband, and he went on without her <sup>6</sup>.

WHEN Jethro heard of the mighty things which the LORD had done through Moses, and how he had delivered his people, and brought them out of Egypt, he <sup>d</sup> took his daughter Zipporah and her two sons, and his own son Hobab, and set out with them towards his son-in-law Moses, to congratulate him, and reconcile him with his daughter Zipporah. They were all received very affectionately by Moses, and Jethro hearing from him the wondrous works which had been done for Israel, he blessed God for the same, acknowledged him to be far superior to all other gods, and took a burnt-offering and sacrifices for God: And Aaron and all the elders of Israel came to assist at the solemnity, and to pay him the respect due to so venerable a person.

THE next day Jethro had an opportunity of displaying his great wisdom and skill in the due regulation of government. He observed that the people crowded about <sup>e</sup> Moses all day long; and asking him the meaning of it, Moses answered him, that he had been sitting in judgment. Upon this Jethro told him, he was quite wrong to charge himself with so grievous a burden, too much for any one man to bear; that it would be enough for him to attend upon the sublimer concerns only, to consult with God, to declare his holy laws and ordinances, to instruct the people in the right way and the like, and commit the judging and well-ordering of the people to a select number of the most righteous men among the multitude, who should, according to their abilities, be appointed over thousands, and over hundreds, and over fifties, and over tens; abstaining from every business himself that was not of the highest moment. Jethro gave not this counsel in vain, and thereby administered great ease to <sup>f</sup> his son-in-law Moses <sup>7</sup> (D).

ANY thing farther concerning Jethro we know not, except that Moses dismissed

<sup>1</sup> Gen. xxxvi. 35. <sup>2</sup> Ibid. xxxvii. 28, 36. <sup>3</sup> Exod. iii. 1. Judg. i. 16. <sup>4</sup> JOSEPH. ubi supr.
<sup>5</sup> Exod. ii. iii. iv. <sup>6</sup> Ibid. xviii. 2. <sup>7</sup> Ibid. v. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, & seqq.

(C) The Hebrew word is חֹבֵן choben, which signifies a prince or a priest, and is promiscuously rendered by both the one and the other.

(D) A very eminent divine contends that this whole story is misplaced, and ought to stand between the tenth and eleventh verses of the tenth chapter of Numbers (3): First, because Jethro is said to have taken burnt-offerings and sacrifices for God. Secondly, because Moses is said to have sat to judge the people, and to have made known to them the statutes of God and his laws. As this story now stands, says our author, it refers to a time when as yet the tabernacle was not erected, nor any altar built; Moses had not yet received any laws from God; nor had they reached mount Sinai.

(3) LIGHTFOOT ubi supr. § xxx.

him;

- a him; that he seems to have left his son Hobab (E) behind him, with a friendly intent that he should serve as a guide through the wilderness; but it was with reluctance he went through with them; nor was he prevailed on to do it without very large promises<sup>a</sup>. We read farther concerning the descendants of Jethro, that they were called Kenites, and that they joined the children of Judab, and marched with them from the city of palm trees [Jericho<sup>a</sup>] into the wilderness of Judab<sup>b</sup>. That upon the taking of Hebron they were rewarded with a large portion of ground, in consideration of their having forsaken their native place, and suffered with the Israelites all the toils of their wars, and all the distresses in the wilderness<sup>c</sup>. That Heber the husband of Jael, who killed Sisera, was particularly of this family<sup>d</sup>. That on the aforelaid consideration also, the Kenites were many years afterwards warned by Saul to move off from the Amalekites when he had it in charge to extirpate that nation, that they might be no way prejudiced thereby. Thus were they preserved, and fixing their seat upon a rock, and there possessing a strong hold, they grew wanton and presumptuous, and were carried away into captivity by the Assyrians, together with the ten tribes of Israel, as Balaam had prophesied long before: And he [Balaam] looked on the Kenites . . . and said, strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest on a rock. Nevertheless the Kenites shall be wasted, until Ashur shall carry thee away captive<sup>e</sup>. And thus have we traced down the posterity of Jethro to their exit.

- THE Midianites we shall have now occasion to mention as at enmity with Israel, c we apprehend to have been chiefly those who bordered upon, or lived, as it were, in common with the Moabites. EVI, REKEM, (F) HUR, ZUR, and REBAH, were all Evi, Rekem, five of them kings or dukes of Midian (G), when Moses overcame Sibon the Amorite, Hur, Zur, and greatly fearing for themselves, they entered into counsels with Balak king of Moab and Rebah. to consider upon what methods they could take to avoid the dangers which they thought threatened them. We shall not repeat here what we have already said concerning this absurd and iniquitous matter in the history of Moab<sup>f</sup>. Only it will be necessary for us to remark here once more, that the Midianites seem to have signalized themselves in a most extraordinary manner in their endeavours to turn the children of Israel from God. For, it must be remembered that Balaam had sent them word
 d either upon, or after, his return home, that it was in vain they hoped to hurt the darlings of heaven by any other means than enticing them to sin, the sole means whereby God could be brought to forsake them: That upon this occasion it would be proper for them to take the most beautiful of their young women and deck them out in the most gorgeous manner, and send them to the Israelites, with such instructions for their behaviour, as that might ensnare their hearts, and corrupt their minds also<sup>g</sup>. This counsel they swallowed down very greedily, and were so sanguine upon the matter, that we find Zur, one of their kings, made no scruple to send his daughter Cozbi among the rest; but it was a tragical business for her; she was killed by a wound in the belly, given with the same weapon, and with the same stroke
 e that made an end of her paramour Zimri. For the rest, these fair idolatresses played their part so well as to captivate many of the Israelites, and so absolutely to prevail over them, as to bring them to bow down before Baal-peor, from whence great trouble and destruction came upon the whole body of them (H)<sup>h</sup>.

THE Midianites herein, enjoyed but a short-liv'd satisfaction; their forwardness upon this occasion, and treacherous practices, kindled the wrath of God against them, and Moses had positive orders to smite them particularly. When they heard that the divine command was on the point of being executed upon them by twelve thousand of the Israelites, under the conduct of Phinehas, they made the best prepa-

<sup>a</sup> Numb. x. 29—32. <sup>b</sup> See before in the Notes, p. 289. <sup>c</sup> Judg. i. 16. <sup>d</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 5. c. 2. <sup>e</sup> Judg. iv. 11. <sup>f</sup> Numb. xxiv. 21, 22. <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 287, 288, 289. <sup>h</sup> p. 289. <sup>i</sup> Numb. xxv. 15—18. JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 6. See before, p. 289.

(E) It is very strange that those who know not how to think that Raguel and Jethro were both names belonging to one man, will yet have it that Hobab and Jethro mean one and the same person. And, contrary to the apparent reason of things, that it was Jethro himself under the name of Hobab who is here intreated to serve as a guide to the Israelites (4). Josephus frequently calls him by the name of Raguel, and says he was Moses's father; so says the scripture, under the name of Raguel, in the place where Hobab is mentioned. In scripture he is constantly called Raguel or Jethro, till he departed from the camp. Shall we suppose that he came back again, and was from thenceforward called Hobab? That Jethro returned to his own country, is expressly said.

(4) Vide CLERIC. in Exod. xi. & Numb. x.

(F) Josephus calls these five kings Ozus, Sares, Rabear, Ures, and Rekem, and says, that this last built and gave name to the city of Rekem, the capital of Arabia, by the Greeks, called Petra (5).

(G) They are also stiled princes of Midian, and dukes under Sibon king of the Amorites (6).

(H) Josephus mentions a plague on this occasion which carried off fourteen thousand souls (7).

(5) JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 7. (6) Josh. xiii. 21. (7) JOSEPH. ubi supra.

rations they could to withstand the invasion, by fortifying their castles, and mustering their strength. But their castles availed them but little, nor the strength they mustered. They were defeated, and every man of them put to the sword, and among the rest Balaam<sup>1</sup> (I) and all their cities and goodly castles were laid in ashes. Not one male of any age or degree was spared, they were put to the sword, as were all the females likewise that were not pure virgins. The country was laid waste, and all the cattle driven off before the conqueror, to the number of six hundred seventy five thousand sheep, seventy two thousand beeves, and sixty one thousand asses. The virgins which were carried away captive were thirty two thousand in number; and there is mention made of great riches in gold, and silver, and iron, and other metals, which were carried off in this general devastation *.

Thus was a branch of the Midianites utterly cut off; but in process of time this loss was supplied, and it pleased God, for the punishment of Israel, that they rose up in war against that sinful nation, and in their turn were very near destroying the whole generation of them by fire, and sword, and famine, for seven successive years. For, about one hundred and fifty years after this slaughter of the Midianites, there appeared two kings at the head of them and the Amalekites and Arabians.

Zebah and Zalmunna.

THESE two kings are called ZEBAB and ZALMUNNA, who waged so cruel a war against the Israelites, that not daring to stay in the low country, they betook them to the mountains, and there, they made themselves caves and fortresses to shelter them. The Midianites having therefore no enemy that withstood them, they wasted the fruits of the earth, and drove off all the cattle. This destruction they continued for seven years together, marching every summer season in vast multitudes, with numberless camels, and herds of cattle, about the time the fruits were far advanced, all which they reaped for themselves; so that there was scarce any sustenance left for the Israelites, who continually fled to the mountains upon their approach<sup>1</sup>.

BUT God put a stop to these merciless incursions of Zebab and Zalmunna, who meant to possess themselves of the land *. Gideon was chosen by heaven for the delivery of his country, and he did it so effectually, that the Midianites never durst afterwards contend with Israel. Zebab and Zalmunna, and their confederates marching into the country, according to custom, pitched their tents in the valley of Jezreel, on this side Jordan. Here as they lay, taking up a vast tract of ground, their camp was explored by Gideon in the night, who overhearing one in the camp telling his dream to another, who interpreted it in favour of Gideon, he was encouraged to carry into execution a stratagem which he had formed for their destruction, with only three hundred men, armed with a rams horn in one hand, and a light concealed in a pitcher in the other. Accordingly about midnight the Midianites were alarmed in three quarters of their camp, by the sound of a hundred trumpets in each; and starting from their sleep, perceived also as many lights breaking in upon them on so many sides. The sound of the horns, the glare of the lights, the gloom of the night, and the loud shouts they heard, struck them with horror and amazement, and having no time to recover from their immediate consternation, they fell into confusion; and being of different languages, attacking on each other, a dreadful slaughter ensued. The kings Zebab and Zalmunna, found means to extricate themselves, and fled with a body of about fifteen thousand men: Oreb and Zeeb, two princes of Midian also found means to escape for the present; but they immediately fell into the hands of the Ephraimites, who put them to death; and by the slaughter upon this occasion, and what happened in the camp, there fell one hundred and twenty thousand men. The kings Zebab and Zalmunna, got over the river, to Karkor, and there thought themselves safe; but being briskly pursued by Gideon, they were surprized and put to further flight, and being overtaken again, their fifteen thousand men were dispersed<sup>2</sup>, and themselves taken prisoners, and carried back by Gideon *. When he had them home with him, he asked them what kind of men they were whom they had slain at Tabor; they answered they were such as himself, of majestic deportment; to this he replied, they were his brethren, and therefore he would not spare their lives: Wherefore he ordered his son to kill them; but they perceiving the youth to be but weak and fearful, requested of Gideon, as a favour, that he would dispatch them

<sup>1</sup> Numb. xxxi. 1—8. * Ibid. v. 9, 10, 11. & seqq. JOSEPH. ubi supra. c. 7. <sup>2</sup> Judg. vi. 1—6. JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 5. c. 7. * Psalm lxxxiii. 11, 12. * Judges ubi supra. 10, 12, 13. & seqq. vii, viii. 1—18. * Vide JOSEPH. ubi supra. c. viii.

(1) Balaam is positively said to have returned home; (8) but whether he came back again in compliance with the second message, or whether of his own accord, to see the issue of his wicked counsel, or to forward it, is not said.

(8) Numb. xxiv. 25.

a himself, and he did so, and they were no sooner dispatched than the ornaments were taken from the necks of their camels. Thus were the Midianites discomfited a second time, and plundered of immense wealth in cattle, gold, jewels, rich attire and the like. The very ear-rings only, taken from them, weighed 1700 shekels b. This downfall is, by the prophet, termed, the day of Midian c, and the slaughter of Midian at the rock of Oreb d. From henceforward they gave over the trade of war e.

THEY were, however, a famous nation many ages afterward, and are mentioned for their industry and riches, f and the magnificence of their tents g; but in the first century their name was disused, being by that time swallowed up by b the more famous of Arabia. Between three and four hundred years ago, there was a ruined city which bore the ancient name (R); in the neighbourhood of which they pretend to shew the place where Moses watered his father-in-law's cattle.

S E C T. IV.

The History of Edom.

c ESAU, called also Edom, was the progenitor of this people. He was the son Their ancest- of Isaac, the son of Abraham, by Rebekah, and born at a birth with Jacob, ter. being his twin-brother and the elder of the two (A). These twins contended while yet in their mother's womb; an early presage of the strife which was to take birth between them, and revive between their descendants, as God himself explained it to their mother. Esau was born with red hair all over him (B); and as he grew up he proved to be a very strong and active person, and delighting in the chase, became a man of the field; by which means providing plentifully and deliciously for d his father's table, he won his particular affection. On the other hand; being of a very masculine turn of mind, and much absent from home; he retained not the kind inclinations of his mother Rebekah, who prided herself wholly in Jacob, who was a gentle spirited man, and more frequently in her eye. On a day it happened that Esau came home quite spent with fasting and exercise, and perceiving that his brother Jacob had cooked some pottage, begged he might have some of it, being quite empty and ready to faint. Jacob taking advantage of his brother's distress, tells him, if he would make over his birth-right to him, he would grant his request. Whereupon Esau, thinking himself at the point of death, and that his birth-right was of no value to himself, consented to Jacob's ungenerous motion, and sware away his e birth-right to him, and accepted of a mess of pottage in consideration thereof; for which he is rightly said to have despised his birth-right. Upon this occasion he was called Edom, which signifies red, the colour of the pottage which Jacob so dearly

b Judg. viii. 18, 26. c Isa. ix. 4. d Isa. x. 26. e Judg. ubi. supr. ver. 28. f Isa. lx. 6. g Habak. iii. 7.

(R) Abulfeda, from whom we have authority to say this, calls it Madjan, and Moses's father-in-law, Shoaib (20), and the place is still one of the stations in the pilgrimage from Egypt to Mecca, under the name of Shoaib's Cave. (21).

(A) It is remarkable, that as he came into the world, his brother Jacob had him fast hold by the heel, to intimate that he would supplant him, as he afterwards did, says a learned commentator (1).

(B) Much is said concerning this extraordinary hairyness of the new-born Esau: but not to enter into the little uncertain niceties of a subject of this kind, it is in general thought, that he had not only hair on his head, but all over his body; and that this hair was as strong as bristles; in short, that he was as rough and shaggy as a satyr (2): and this indeed seems to be the meaning of the text, which says he was red all over, like an hairy garment. This expression has given birth to a conjecture, that the hair garments they wore in those days, were of a reddish colour, like the hair of Esau (3). Instead of garment the LXX render it σκέδινος, a bristly, shaggy skin, and the Vulgate has the same interpretation. It is thought that each interpretation has an eye to the fashion among the Arabs of wearing skins (4), as some of them do at this day, but they are sheep-skins, warm and soft, sown together, the wool being worn innermost (5).

(20) Descrip. Arab. p. 42. inter Geo. Vet. Script. Grec. Min. (21) See RAY's Collect. of curious Travels and Voyages, Tom. 2. p. 158. (1) PATRICK's Comments. upon Gen. xxv. 26. (2) Idem. ubi supr. v. 25. (3) CLERIC. in Gen. Loc. supra cit. (4) Idem ibid. (5) TRAVENOT. Part 1. lib. 20 Chap. 32.

Year of the
Flood, 1239.
Year before
Christ, 1760.

fold him (C). * At the age of forty years, he gave great trouble and sorrow to his parents by marrying among the daughters of Heib; he took two of them, Judith the daughter of Beer, and Bashemath the daughter of Elon<sup>b</sup>; but this wore off in time, and he was received into favour with his father again. Isaac now grown old and very dim-sighted called Esau to him, and told him, that he knew not how few the remainder of his days might prove, and therefore should be glad if he would take his weapons, his quiver and his bow, and get him some venison, and dress it for him in a savoury manner as he had often done, that his soul might bless him before he died (D). Esau obeyed, but while he was absent, his mother, who heard the words which passed between his father and him, dressed her son Jacob in Esau's cloaths (E), and preparing a dish of savoury meat, sent him in with it to his father, who pronounced the irrevocable blessing over Jacob. Thus was Isaac deceived and Esau supplanted,<sup>b</sup> who coming in with his venison just after Jacob was gone, Isaac in a great agony told him he had been circumvented by his brother, and that he neither could nor would recal the blessing. When Esau heard this he wept bitterly, and upbraided

* Gen. xxv. 24 — 34. <sup>b</sup> xxvi. 34, 35.

(C) We are well apprized of all that has been said by commentators and others upon this great transaction between these brethren; but it will hardly be expected we should run the same lengths they have, nor enter into their infinite representations of this matter; and therefore we shall briefly touch upon some general points only. The Pottage it seems was red, or yellowish, and made of lentils (6) from Egypt (7); of which there were two sorts, one darker than the other (8), and each highly prized by the ancients, both of the east and west. Pliny relates from others, that equanimity is the usual effect of feeding upon lentils: and another writer says they inspire with joy (9). It is unlucky they should have kindled such a strife between Esau and Jacob. To this some answer, that Esau had never seen any afore (10); and this is pretended from Esau's saying only, give me some of that red, red, as it is in the original: but this is at first sight very unlikely to be true; for doubtless these lentils must have been a food which he and the rest of the family were well acquainted with; so that what the ancients held concerning the harmonious effects lentils have upon the mind, must fall to the ground. But to leave this subject, let us take a view of the birth-right which was exchanged for these lentils. The chief privilege of the Birth-right, say some, was the inheriting a double portion of the father's estate (11): others annex the priesthood thereto, and suppose that Esau's cloaths, with which Rebekah clad Jacob, were his sacerdotal vestments (12); but this notion is quite overthrown by what stands on record concerning Cain and Abel (13). Thirdly, a superiority over the rest of the children, is thought to have been the principal prerogative of the Birth-right. Again, the chief privilege of the Birth-right might have been to challenge the particular blessing of the dying parent. To conclude upon this head, the prerogatives of the primogeniture were not confined to the person of the son, on whom the blessing was conferred, so as to die with him, but descended to his posterity. So the promises made to Jacob in his blessing were not fulfilled in him, but in his children after him. Such was the Pottage, and such the Birth-right, which were set in opposition to each other. The Hebrew word בְּרִיתָהּ balhitani, which Esau uses in addressing Jacob, occurs no where but in this place, and has therefore been variously canvassed by interpreters. Some, with the LXX, that he asked but for a bare taste; others, with the Samaritan, that he asked for the whole, or for the largest share. We shall willingly pass by such idle inquiries, since neither sense can justify Jacob's insinuating, or Esau's parting with a Birth-right upon such terms, if we consider either action as merely human (14). But we shall find a more proper place to discuss this point when we come to the History of the Jews.

(D) It is thought that Isaac only sent out Esau by way of probation; that is, to try whether he had good success or not, thereby to satisfy himself in a scruple he had whether he should bless him or no. For as by his former ill success he was reduced to the necessity of making away his birth-right; so now if the same ill luck attended him, he should take it for a sign that the blessing was to depart from him: and though he had pronounced the great blessing over Jacob, yet when he perceived that Esau had brought home the venison he sent him for, he deemed it a tacit expression of the will of God that Esau should have his blessing also, and he blessed him accordingly (15).

(E) Concerning these cloaths, it is said they had been worn by Adam in his minority, and that they retained the ineffable fragrantcy of paradise (16). Others only suppose that they were laid up in aromatic flowers or other perfumes, to preserve them from moths, and to refresh the brain, when put on; and that it is groundless in the Jews to imagine they descended from Adam to Noah, and so downwards to Abraham's family (17). Besides, it may be asked how it came to pass that Isaac could part with so precious a relique to his son, during his own lifetime? Perhaps this is too early to suppose there was any such delicacy in apparel; but this is obviated by the near neighbourhood of Arabia (18). By the smell of the field some may understand a scent more manly than the steams of a perfume, especially as Esau was so great a hunter, and perpetually in the field; but that expression is supposed to have a different import, and to mean, that his cloaths were exquisitely scented; and this seems to be confirmed from the Samaritan reading, which after the מַלְחָה Shadeh a field, has מִלְּחָה full; and so the LXX have rendered it ὡς ὁσμὴ ἀγρῶ πλήρης and so the Vulgate has it, Sicut odor agrī pleni; as the smell of a full field, or as it is supplied, as the smell of a field full of sweet herbs and flowers.

(6) Gen. ubi supra, ver. 30, 34. (7) St. AUGUST. in Psal. xlvii. (8) PLIN. Histor. Nat. l. 18. c. 31. (9) Auctor Geopon. lib. 2. c. 35. p. 71. (10) See PATRICK'S Comment. ubi sup. ver. 30. (11) Ver. 31. LIGHTFOOT Observations in Genesin. c. xxvii. (12) Gen. iv. (14) Vide CLERIC. in Genes. ubi supra. (15) Vide LIGHTFOOT Observ. in Gen. c. p. xxvii. (16) Vide BRAUN. de Vestib. Hebr. sacerdot. c. 4. (17) See PATRICK'S Comment. upon Gen. c. xxvii. 15. (18) Vide CLERIC. in Gen. c. xxvii. 27.

<sup>a</sup> his brother with his unnatural and sordid dealing, first in extorting his birth-right from him, and now, in robbing him of his blessing. However, Esau did so far prevail with his tears, and his sorrowful pressing intreaties, that his father blessed him also to this effect; that his dwelling should be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above (F), that he should live by the sword and serve his brother, but that he should shake off the yoke at last. It was with a heavy discontented mind that he heard his lot, and his resentment wrought so strongly upon him, that at first he determined to kill Jacob as soon as their father should die; which coming to the knowledge of Rebekah, she sent Jacob away to Padan-Aram, under pretence of getting him a wife there from among her own kindred<sup>c</sup>. But Esau cooled again and quietly submitted to his lot, and finding that Isaac and Rebekah had a great aversion to the daughters of Canaan, he went over to Ismael and took his daughter Mahalab the sister of Nebaiotb (G), adding her to the wives he had already taken<sup>d</sup>; and removed with his family to mount Seir, not so much with a design to settle there, perhaps, as to serve a present convenience. The spot he occupied in this country took his name, and was called the field of Edom<sup>e</sup>, and in a few years he became a very considerable person.

FOR, when news came to him hither, that his brother Jacob was on his return from Padan-Aram, he went out to meet him on the road with a train of four hundred followers, with which he meant to honour and assist his brother, and not to inject fear into him as he did. The interview was very tender on both sides, but especially Esau, unmindful of what most men would ever have retained, accosted Jacob with tears of joy, and the most melting affection: he nobly refused the presents wherewith his brother would needlessly have bribed him to a reconciliation, and pressed him to hold on his way to mount Seir, that they might be neighbours and live together; and when Jacob artfully waved this invitation, under pretence of the tediousness of his marches for the sake of the children and cattle, and seemed to say he would follow him; Esau desired he would let him at least leave some of his followers behind to assist him and conduct him on his way: but this being rejected, he with reluctance left Jacob behind him, and took the presents away which had been utterly forced upon him by his timorous brother (H). Jacob, who was now as

Year of the
Flood, 1260.
Year before
Christ, 1739.

<sup>c</sup> Gen. xxvii. <sup>d</sup> Gen. xxviii. 6—9. <sup>e</sup> Gen. xxxiii. 3. in the Margin. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. & xxxiii.

(F) Some give this part of Esau's blessing a quite contrary turn, and will have it that his lot was to be in a barren land; and that his living should be by rapine and violence; and accordingly, that Edom was an ungrateful soil, nor refreshed with timely rains (19). The interpretation of the LXX, with a trifling variation of αὐτῷ, by making it either a preposition or an adverb, may be taken both ways. But, on the other hand, it is observed, that if we follow our own translation, which is directly in the sense of the Vulgate, and in the sense St. Hierom took it, there will be still a wide difference between Jacob's blessing and Esau's; that in the latter there is no mention made of corn and wine; no such dominion promised as in Jacob's; and that lastly, whatsoever fatness was in the soil of his country, it did not last long (20). Nevertheless, Moses seems to tell us, that the land of Edom was not so destitute as some may imagine; when he promises the king of Edom, that if he would permit the children of Israel to pass through his country, they should hurt neither the fields nor the vineyards (21): the fields may perhaps have been rather corn fields, than pasture; and, if this be true, the Edomites had their corn and wine too. As to what Malachi says of the infertility and desolation of the kingdom of Edom (22), that may, we think, be rather attributed to the cruel effects of their unfortunate wars, than to any failure in the usual product of the soil.

(G) It is manifest from hence, that Esau paid no regard to the divine revelation, or he would not have taken the descendant of a bond woman [Hagar] who could not inherit the promises made to Abraham and Isaac (23).

(H) It appears very plain from what now passed between Esau and Jacob at this meeting, that the former was not so great a reprobate, or naturally so bad a man, as some have unreasonably represented him. We had resolved to touch upon this matter in the behalf of Esau; but finding it generously done to our hands by a very worthy divine, we shall content ourselves with the substance of what he says: Esau was a plain, generous, and honest man; nor does he seem to have been more wicked than the other men of his age and times. His generous and good temper appears by his affectionate deportment towards his brother, and his speedy and utter oblivion of the injuries and slights he received from him: and though St. Paul calls him the prophane Esau, and says he was hated by God, it cannot thence be gathered that he was a wicked man, or that God punished him for an immoral life. 1. This sentence could not extend to his posterity, and is not said to be founded upon his actions. 2. God's hatred of Esau was not a hatred which induced him to punish him with an evil; for he was as happy in the blessings of this life as Abraham, Isaac or Jacob, if not more. His children became masters of the land of their possession much sooner than the Israelites; and God was pleased to command the Israelites not to disturb them in their rights. And if his earthly felicity was such, why should we despair of his being a partaker of the heavenly? 3. If he was excluded from being the heir of the blessing, so was Lot and Job, and other good and virtuous men. 4. St. Paul means no more than to shew the Jews, that God had all along bestowed the favours which led to the Messiah on whom he pleased; to Abraham, not to Lot; to Jacob, not to Esau; to the Gentiles, not to the Jews. 5. Though Esau be called βίβλος or prophane, he is never called ἀσέβης or ἀμαρτωλός, wicked or immoral. So that the only defect in his character is, that he does not seem to have much afraid to follow him, as he had been before to give him a positive denial, <sup>a</sup> (I) went and dwelt in Sbechem, and Efau remained in Seir till he heard that his father Isaac was either dead, or upon the point to die, and went to Mamre, where he assisted Jacob at the funeral of their deceased parent, and took possession of his inheritance. For Jacob's birth-right was a spiritual prerogative; and no ways related to his father's temporal estate; so that by this addition to his former store, and his brother being also very rich, and master of much cattle, they perceived it would be next to impossible to enjoy such large possessions together in a country where they were both strangers; and therefore as Abraham and Lot had done before, they parted. Efau returning to the country of Seir, being an hundred and twenty years old, married Abolibamah, a daughter of the country, but originally of Canaan; and from henceforward took such measures as might be most conducive to the good and peaceable settlement of his descendants in this country.

(19) Idem ubi supr. ver. 39. (20) PATRICK'S Comment. ubi supr. ver. 39. (21) Numb. xx. 17—20. (22) Malach. i. 3. (23) See PATRICK upon Gen. xxviii. 9.

Their country.

Now though Efau might have no positive knowledge of it, yet God designed this land for an inheritance to his line <sup>b</sup>, as he did that of Canaan for the line of Jacob: and this naturally leads us to give the best description we can of the realm so ordained for them; which we shall here do once for all. This country was originally, so far as we know, inhabited by a people called Horites or Horim, whether so named from one Hor or Hori<sup>c</sup>, which was a name amongst them, is what we know no more than whether mount Hor was so denominated from him, as some think<sup>d</sup>. It was called the mount or land of Seir, not from the hairyness of Efau as Josephus dreamed<sup>e</sup>, but from that Seir whose descendants Moses tells us (†) Efau destroyed, and settled himself in their land. In the Samaritan Version it is called Gablab; by Jonathan's Targum, Gobal; and by Josephus, Gobolitis; which several appellations are derived from Geboul, signifying a border; for it did border upon the land of Canaan on the south; but what was the extent of the antient country of Seir we take not upon us to say; and therefore can mention no other boundary. When the children of Edom seized on this country, it grew to be universally known under the name of Edom; but we cannot gather that they extended their limits till the time they erected their monarchy when they built Elatb and Esfongeber, as is likely, on the eastern shore of the Arabian gulf; but in the days of Moses no part <sup>d</sup> of their dominion abutted upon that gulf<sup>e</sup>. When the antient kingdom of Edom was in its meridian, it was, as we think, bounded on the north by the land of Canaan and the salt sea, or lake Asphaltites, on the east by Midian, on the south by the Arabian gulf, or the red sea, so called from the jurisdiction this people exercised over it, as is most likely (<sup>K</sup>); on the west it was bounded by Amalek.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Ubi supr. xxxv. xxvi. <sup>b</sup> Deut. ii. 5. Josh. xxiv. 4. <sup>c</sup> Gen. xxxvi. 22, 30. <sup>d</sup> See WELLS's Historic. Geogr. of the Old Test. Vol. 1. p. 533. <sup>e</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 1. c. 20. † Comp. Gen. xxxvi. 20, & seq. and Deut. ii. 12, &c. <sup>m</sup> See Numb. xx. 17—21. Deut. ii. 1. & seq.

have been so mindful of the promises made to his family as Jacob was; from whence, and from his temper, it appears that he was not quite so fit to be the heir of the mercies peculiar to his family (<sup>24</sup>).

(I) This interview, which Jacob took so large a compass to gain, was doubtless designed to shew his brother that the great store of wealth he was now possessed of, was not given him by good old Isaac in his wrong, but was the fruit of his own industry during his abode in Mesopotamia; and to which therefore he could lay no claim after their father's death. And it was in all probability owing to this same needless care of keeping them far enough out of his reach, that he chose to dwell in Sbechem, rather than to accompany his brother to Seir, or to return to his father and mother, after so long an absence from them.

(K) The Red Sea, as we commonly call it, is more properly termed the Arabian gulf. By the Hebrews it was called Yam Suf, the weedy or flaggy sea; by the Arabians, Bahr Alkolzum, or the sea of Kolzum, a small town at the northernmost end of it. But by the antient inhabitants of the adjacent countries it was called the sea of Edom, because it washed the southern skirts of the land of Edom. The Greeks finding that the Phœnicians called it Yam Edom, mistook the word Edom to signify an appellation instead of a proper name; and therefore rendered it ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα, Mare Rubrum, and thence we have the Erythrean or Red Sea (<sup>25</sup>). Others (<sup>26</sup>), however, derive the name from a certain king of the east, in, or towards Persia, called Erythras; but by the Red Sea they manifestly understand what we call the Indian ocean; and therefore we cannot think with Sir Isaac Newton (<sup>27</sup>), that this same Erythras is the Edom or Efau of scripture (<sup>28</sup>), and that he was actually the first that invented the vessels, vateri, in which they navigated that sea. Agatharcides expatiates on this, and will have it, that the Indian ocean was called the Red Sea; not because the Arabian gulf belonging to it, had hills on the west of it, which when the sun shone intensely upon them, looked somewhat like burning coals. On the east he says indeed there were some red hills, and the same there are at this day; but this, he says, was not

(24) SHUCKFORD's Connex. of the Sacr. and Prof. History of the World, vol. 2. 2d Edit. p. 174. & seq. (25) See PRIDEAUX's Connex. of the Old and New Test. Part 1. Book 1. p. 10. (26) PLIN. l. 6. c. 28. STRAB. l. 16. p. 766. POMF. MEL. l. 3. c. 8. (27) Chronol. of antient Kingdoms, Amend. p. 211. (28) Apud PHOT. in Biblioth. p. 1. 322.

- a THIS tract is very hilly and mountainous, and great part of it desert. It has few or no open streams, but latent springs of water sufficient for the use of the inhabitants, who know where to find them<sup>a</sup>. Corn and wine, nevertheless, it seems to have anciently abounded with in some degree<sup>b</sup>; so that Eſau may have enjoyed the fat of the land (L); and besides, his posterity, by their situation, were able to supply and enrich themselves with the produce of some of the finest and most fruitful soils on earth, by means of their commerce with foreigners by the red-sea, in those days the greatest and most considerable trading water in the world. Amalekitis is by some reckoned to have been a part or province of Edom<sup>c</sup> (M), but however it was considered in later days, it certainly was not so when the kingdom of Amalek flourished; and therefore we shall treat thereof separately, in the next section. We are positively told that the land of Uz, Job's country, lies within the limits of the ancient Edom<sup>d</sup>; but some very noted geographers<sup>e</sup> are unwilling to grant it, for reasons which are not altogether so valid as might be wished; but they are too obscure and uncertain to be discussed here.

Now the cities and remarkable places of Edom were, Teman, which being mentioned for the wisdom and counsel of its inhabitants<sup>f</sup> was, perhaps, the royal seat: The country around it was called Temani; of this part was Eliphaz, one of Job's friends<sup>g</sup>. Dedan, a city of great commerce with Tyre, some of whose commodities are mentioned, such as ebony, ivory, and fine cloaths<sup>h</sup>, seems to have been situated in an extremity of the country opposite to Teman<sup>i</sup>. Bozrah<sup>j</sup>, Bosor, Bazrab, and the like, are names of another city of Edom; its name implies a fortress, which has made some imagine that it was the capital of the kingdom<sup>k</sup>. By the manner of the prophet's introducing it, it may be guessed to have been a considerable place in his days. Selab or Petra being words of the same signification, the one in greek the other in hebrew, it is thought, the one is a translation of the other, and that they both intend one and the same city<sup>l</sup>. If this be right, it stood on a level spot of ground encompassed all round by steep rocks and craggy precipices; and within this inclosure were many gardens and rich springs; but beyond it the country was a desert<sup>m</sup>. That it was thus naturally fortified, appears by several authors<sup>n</sup>. By one it is called the chief place of the Nabateans<sup>o</sup>, whom in another place he calls Idumeans<sup>p</sup>, that is, Edomites; and says, that it was three or four days journey distant from Jericho. A second author also calls it a city of the Nabateans<sup>q</sup>. A third places it near mount Hor<sup>r</sup>, and calls it the capital of Arabia<sup>s</sup>. A fourth seats it ten miles westward of Elath<sup>t</sup>, a sea-port on the red-sea belonging to the Edomites. Moreover, this kingdom had two very eminent sea-not the reason why the ocean was called Red: nor was it because the sun in those parts, instead of darting forth bright and clear rays, shone out only with a sanguine light, which gave a bloody hue to the surface of the sea; but he will have it derived from one Erythras, an obscure and fabulous prince, concerning whom he tells a very absurd and puerile story, with a very grave air. From this it appears that the Erythrean, or Red Sea of the ancients is the Indian ocean of our days, and that what we call the Red Sea was considered as a branch of it.

<sup>a</sup> THEVENOT'S Travels, part 1. c. 32. SANDYS, book 2. p. 107. <sup>b</sup> See Numb. ubi supra.
<sup>c</sup> Vide Histor. Jul. in Edom. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 11. c. 1. <sup>d</sup> AUGUST. de Civit Dei, l. 18. c. 47. See also Lament. iv. 21. <sup>e</sup> Vide CELLARIJ Notit. Orb. Ant. & RELANDI Palest. Illustr.
<sup>f</sup> Jerem. xlix. <sup>g</sup> Job ii. 11. <sup>h</sup> Jerem. ubi supr. ver. 8. Ezek. xvii. 15, 20. <sup>i</sup> Idem xlv. 13. in the margin. <sup>j</sup> Isa. lxiii. 1. <sup>k</sup> See FULLER'S Pisgah sight, lib. 4. c. 2. <sup>l</sup> See PRIDEAUX'S Connect. of the Old and New Test. part 1. book viii. p. 544. FULLER ubi supr. <sup>m</sup> STRABO, lib. 16. p. 779. <sup>n</sup> JOSEPH. Ant. lib. 14. c. 9. DION. SIC. lib. 19. p. 722. <sup>o</sup> STRABO ubi supr. <sup>p</sup> Idem ibid. p. 760. <sup>q</sup> DION. SIC. ubi supr. <sup>r</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 4. <sup>s</sup> Lib. xiv. c. 25. <sup>t</sup> EUSEB. Onomast. urb. & loc. ad vocem Πέτρα.

(L) By modern travellers we are told, that this country at present is nothing less than a fertile spot (29). But it must bear a widely different face, now that it is only frequented by the Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, from what it did, when occupied by a settled nation, who doubtless must with great pains and industry have prepared the soil for propagation: but we have spoken of this already (30).

(M) Josephus divides Edom into Gobolitis and Amalekitis (31); but this is a division which cannot be accurately spoken of, while the Edomites and Amalekites were independant states. The habitation of the Edomites is also frequently called Gabalene (32); and especially by Eusebius, who uses the appellations Gabalene and Idumea indifferently to denote the same place (33). Some later writers have split the country asunder by a very violent and needless rent, placing one Edom in the land of Seir on the other side of Jordan to the north, and leaving the other in the place where the only land of Seir certainly stood; but this is a notion very solidly confuted by the best approved of the latest geographers.

(29) SANDYS, Book 2. p. 107.

(30) See before in the Notes, p. 307.

(31) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 11. c. 1.

(32) STEPHAN. ad voces Γαβλά and Γαβλά.

(33) In Onomast. urbium

ports, Elat and Esfongeber, on the shores of the Arabian gulf, or red-sea<sup>1</sup>. Esfongeber proved an unfortunate harbour, being rocky and very difficult, deriving its name from a ridge of rocks it had, which was thought to resemble the back-bone of a man<sup>2</sup>, and growing at length infamous for the many wrecks which beset the shipping that frequented it, it was deserted very early; and therefore its situation is not exactly known, any further than that it stood very near to Elat. This last was a fairer and more commodious haven, and for a long time was a station for the shipping which was sent from these parts into the Indies. It is also called Eloth, Aela, Ailat, Elat, Elana, from whence you have the Elanitic gulf whereon it stood, and by the Arabians, Ailab to this day (N). Upon the decay of Esfongeber, it grew into great credit and resort, and was thought worthy of being contended for; and anciently changed its masters several times: it was wrested from the Edomites by David<sup>3</sup>, it was afterwards forced from the house of David by the Edomites, when they rebelled against Jehoram<sup>4</sup>; Azariah got it from them again<sup>5</sup>; but his grandson lost it to the king of Syria<sup>6</sup>; the Syrians held it a long time, and after some revolutions and changes under the Seleucide and the Ptolemies, it fell to the share of the Romans. Remarkable places in this country were farther, mount Hor where Aaron died, and the valley of Salt, a spot on which the Edomites were twice defeated with a great slaughter; and had its name, probably, from its salt springs, or the salt found there<sup>7</sup>.

Now though the name of this kingdom is frequently rendered Idumea, and Idumea, as in our version of the bible; yet when that name occurs in the prophane<sup>c</sup> and the more modern writers, it must not be understood of the ancient Edom, which losing its old name, was comprehended under the general appellation of Arabia Petraea, and the third Pakistine. The southern part of Canaan came to be called Idumaea, and the whole nation of the Jews Idumeans sometimes. Whence this arose will in part be seen in the close of this section, and more amply in the history of the Jews.

Forms of Government.

To return to the ancient Edom. How it was in its more early times governed is a matter of doubt, and being so we can only embrace the most likely opinion. The Horites were at first ruled by patriarchs or heads of families, and after that by kings which were elected into the regal office. This elective kingdom was in process of d time interrupted and dissolved, and the ancient form took place again, the governors being stiled dukes, who seem to have succeeded in right of birth. Perceiving the imperfections of this kind of administration, they coalesced under one king, thereby to be the better enabled to withstand an invasion from the Israelites when they came out of Egypt. It was governed afterwards by Edomitish kings quite down to the days of David, who subdued the kingdom; and this second monarchy seems to have been hereditary. These are the various forms of government which seemed to have been exercised in the land of Seir and Edom, by the Horites and by the Edomites, as will be seen in the course of this section.

Their Character.

THE character we have of the Edomites, is that they were a bold and daring<sup>e</sup> people, fond of broils and tumults, which they as much delighted in, as others did

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings ix. 26. <sup>2</sup> See PRIDEAUX's Connect. of the Old and New Test. part 1. book 1. p. 7. and PATRICK's Comment. upon the above-cited passage of Kings. <sup>3</sup> Comp. 2 Sam. viii. 14. with 2 Chron. viii. 17. <sup>4</sup> 2 Kings viii. 20. <sup>5</sup> Ibid. xxiv. 22. <sup>6</sup> Ibid. xvi. 6. <sup>7</sup> Vide SALMAS. Exercit. Plinian, cap. 35. p. 613, 614.

(M) Ailab or Elat is near the road the Egyptian pilgrims take when they go to Mecca. In the fourteenth century there were considerable remains of it standing. At that time an Egyptian governour resided in a tower there: but it had no fields about it. There was formerly a castle which stood out in the sea, but that is destroyed. Our author calls it a small city, and adds, that it had belonged to those Jews who were turned into apes and swine (34). Elat and Esfongeber grew at last to be ambigui juris, according to Sir John MARSHAM (35). But not to anticipate what we may have to say upon this matter, let it, for the present, suffice, that we observe the Edomites to have been so well able to defend their claim of the empire of the Red-Sea, that the Egyptians were anciently unable to dispute it with them, and were obliged to submit to such conditions as the Edomites were pleased to allow them, which are said to have been hard enough; for they were allowed but one vessel of burthen wherewith to sail to the Indies, and not so much as one galley (36). Elat was particularly so considerable a place as to give name to the easternmost of the gulfs which terminate the Red-Sea, and had the famous metropolis of Petra, ten miles to the westward of it (37). It was situate on the utmost eastern verge of Palestine, which is the reason of its so often changing masters<sup>8</sup>.

(34) ABULFEDA in Descrip. Arab. (35) CANON. Chron. secul. xiv. p. 367. (36) See before, p. 226. Hist. de HUET, du Comm. & de la Navig. des Anc. c. 5. (37) EUSEB. Onon urbium & decorum ad vocem, 'Αλα. <sup>8</sup> Vid. HEDRON loc. Habr. & procop. bell. Pers. c. 19.

a in the softening pleasures of luxury<sup>1</sup>. But this, it must be owned, was more peculiarly the character of the latter Edomites, who migrated into Judea; nor should we have inserted it here, but that it seems to be of a piece with the genius of the whole people, as their great ancestor Isaac foretold it. However, though courage was to be one of their characteristics, and, perhaps, the chief, yet we are under no necessity to believe it to have been of so brutal a sort as Josephus represents above; for as they were, doubtless, a trading nation, it is incompatible to suppose they were a nest of robbers and incendiaries, fewer such being for ever found among those that are addicted to commerce, and consequently enjoy all the world can afford them, than among lazy and slothful nations, and such as condemn b industry out of a vain and ridiculous notion of honour. For these last are sure to be mean and beggarly, rude, ignorant, and base; the former quite the reverse, flourish in plenty and ease, are learned, ingenious and brave. What therefore their ancestor foretold of them, that they should live by the sword, perhaps, imports no more than that they should maintain their rights, whether natural or usurped, with a high hand and a jealous eye; as all those who, like them, claimed the empire of the sea, as they did, have for ever done. Thus, for want of better authority, have we attempted the character of the Edomites, by drawing a parallel between them and others of latter, and our own times. And abating the difference of climates, c which works a difference of tempers, we cannot be much out of the way in comparing them with other trading states that flourish within our knowledge, who are far from living upon plunder and rapine; and in this we shall be more confirmed when we come to view their behaviour towards Moses; when though they refused him to pass through their territories, yet they were ready to traffic with him, and supply him with necessaries, as we shall see anon. The Edomites, whose character Josephus draws above, seem to have been a slavish and degenerate race, quite aliens to the liberties and noble spirit of their forefathers, as we shall see in the sequel.

THEIR arts and sciences were doubtless great, considering the time; many, and well perfected; and though perhaps there may be no necessity to suppose, which d the excellent Sir Isaac Newton has done, that they were the parents of those amiable sisters; yet may we safely pronounce that they were not much, if any thing, behind hand with the most ancient learned nations. The invention and use of constellations appear by the book of Job<sup>2</sup>, to have been known among the Edomites, among whom he dwelt<sup>3</sup>; a rare instance of the early progress of astronomy, if we admit Job to have ever existed, or the book itself to be of such ancient date as many think. Writing is there mentioned<sup>4</sup> also, and ships<sup>5</sup>, and many hints given, sufficient to confirm us in a belief, that the secrets and beauties of nature, morality, and much sublime and truly-useful knowledge was cultivated among them. Nor is there e wanting very ample evidence from prophane authors to make this out, as we shall take proper opportunities of shewing: and indeed it has been a common opinion of the learned, that great veneration is due to their memory on that account.

CONCERNING their religion we are much in the dark. They at first were right in their belief and practice, as they were descended from Isaac, and used circumcision; but they by degrees forgot all, and fell into idolatry (for idols it seems they had<sup>6</sup>) and had wholly laid aside circumcision, till *Hyrca*n incorporated them with the Jews, from which time they were ever coalesced with the Jews, and were considered as but one nation with them in divine matters, as will be seen at the decay of their state.

f WE now resume the history of Esau the father of this people. The number of his family and domestics when he fixed his dwelling here is uncertain, though probably very numerous. According to the hypothesis<sup>7</sup>, which in this very obscure case we think ourselves obliged to adopt, he settled here under one of the Horite kings; and therefore he lived in a private manner, and was never considered any more than as the chief of his own house; and thence is dignified with no particular title by Moses. Concerning this matter, we cannot but think with bishop Cumberland, that the Horites were at first ruled by several independant chiefs or patriarchs, till they were overpowered by Cherdaloamer king of Elam, who swept them before him, with the neighbouring nations. To secure themselves therefore from so great an evil for the time to come, they united under a more stable and perfect kind of government, and formed themselves into an elective kingdom, and their kings a were,

<sup>1</sup> Josephus. Antiq. l. 13.    <sup>2</sup> Chap. ix. 38.    <sup>3</sup> St. August. de civitat. Dei, ubi supr. Lament. ubi supr.    <sup>4</sup> See before, in the notes, p. 300.    <sup>5</sup> Job chap. ix.    <sup>6</sup> See 2 Chron. xxv. in the argument.    <sup>7</sup> See Bishop Cumberland's Orig. Gent. Antiq.

BELA, the son of Beor: the name of his city was Dinbabab, situate on the eastern confines of Idumea †.

JOBAB, the son of Zerah of Bozrah, who, from a similitude of names, has been taken for the holy and patient Job, whose history we shall find a more proper occasion to enlarge upon, when we come to that of the Jews.

HUSHAM of the land of Temani.

HADAD, the son of Bedad, he smote Midian in the field of Moab, and the name of his city was Avith.

SAMLAH of Mareskab; in his reign, or in that of his successor, came Esau, as b we think, into this country.

SAUL of Reboboib.

BAAL-HANAN, the son of Acbbor.

HADAR; the name of his city was Pau, and that of his wife Mebetabel.

UNDER the three last, or four last of these kings, did Esau and his family live as sojourners in a strange land, as Abraham and Isaac their forefathers had done before them, in other parts. This monarchy, which was plainly elective, came some how or other to be interrupted and broken into several petty and independent principalities or dukedoms; and, seeing that the posterity of Esau exceed in the number of their dukes, it cannot be very incongruous to suppose that they had c the largest share in bringing about this revolution. It is very accurately observed by a late and learned writer, that the first dukes of the Edomites are not stiled dukes of Edom, but dukes in the land of Edom *. From whence we gather, that the grandchildren of Esau, grown strong and potent, could no longer brook subjection to a strange line, and would govern themselves; so that now the whole country became divided into several distinct jurisdictions, and under several petty princes, called dukes, both of the posterity of Esau, and of that of Seir, who were all collateral. The dukes in the land of Edom were, 1. duke Teman; 2. duke Omar; 3. duke Zepho; 4. duke Kenaz; 5. duke Korab; 6. duke Gatam; 7. duke Analek. These seven were the sons of Elipbaz the first-born of Esau. 8. duke Nabath; d 9. duke Zerah; 10. duke Hammab; 11. duke Mizzab: these four were the sons of Reuel, the second son of Esau. 12. Duke Ieush; 13. duke Jaalam; 14. duke Korab: these three were the sons of Esau himself, begot by him after he was an hundred and twenty years old, on Abolibamab his last wife. All these were the dukes in the land of Edom; that is, in that part possessed by the Edomites, and thence called after them. At the same time were seven dukes over the possession of the descendants of Seir. 1. Duke Lotan; 2. duke Shobal; 3. duke Zibeon; 4. duke Anab; he found mules (O) in the wilderness as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father; 5. duke † Gen xxxvi. 32. * SHUCKFORD'S Connect. of the sacred and prophane Hist. book vii. p. 192.

(O) Concerning this remarkable event there is some variety of judgment and interpretation. The Hebrew word is בַּיְמִים bayemim, which the LXX not knowing how to render, have retained, and accordingly have iaquil, and so have Theodotian, Aquila and Symmachus. From St. Jerom we have several traditions of the Jews concerning this matter. Some thought, that by the above word must be understood seas or large waters; for the same letters are used for the word which bears that import: and will have it, that while he fed his father's asses in the wilderness, he found a collection of waters, or seas, according to the Hebrew idiom, an uncommon discovery in a desert, and therefore worthy of notice. Some would have it to mean hot waters in the Phœnician tongue. Some again, that he suffered wild asses to cover his tame ones, and that the swiftest breed of those creatures, called Yamim, sprang from thence: and most of the Rabbins teach that he, first of all men, suffered asses to cover the mares in the wilderness; whence the unnatural breed of mules were shewn to the world. Now these interpretations or suppositions, are thus combated. 1. To make the Hebrew word mean seas, it must be altered in the reading contrary to all authority and likelihood: and besides, as the Hebrews call great ponds or lakes seas, it is no wonder that he found out such congregations of water; but there is nothing of that kind that can be considered as such in those parts, except the lake Asphaltites, which was not made till afterwards. 2. Those who render the word hot baths, as the Vulgate, according to the Phœnician signification, seem to have read בַּיְמִים bayemim, and to have believed that it was synonymous with בַּיְמִים bayemim, which signifies hot baths; but this is countenanced by no reading or interpretation. 3. Those who will have him to have first found out the breed of mules, are confuted by Bechart, with the following arguments; 1. Because mules were never called by that name; 2. Because the word מַרְאָה mar'ah, which Moses uses, imports the finding what exists already, and not the invention of what never had been before; 3. Because they were asses which Ana fed, and not horses; 4. Because in scripture there is no mention made of mules to the time of David. In the conclusion, it is the proper name of a people, the עַמִּים Emims for example, whom Moses † mentions as a famous people dwelling in the neighbourhood a 5. duke Dishon; 6. duke Ezer; 7. duke Dishan *. Now seeing that the dukes of Esaú's line in the land of Edom, being more in number, may have been greater in might than those of the Horites in the land of Seir, it seems not unnatural to suppose that these last were now expelled by the former, who seized on the land by the pre-ordained distribution of God †. At the same time Analek or his spurious offspring may have been driven out also.

† Conf. Gen. xiv. 5. and Dent. xi. 10.

ACCORDINGLY the next generation of these princes are styled dukes of Edom, and had no rivals of any other family in any other part of the country, which now we suppose to have been all conquered, and called Edom. The dukes of this second race were; 1. duke Timnab; 2. duke Alvab; 3. duke Jetheth; 4. duke Abeliba-
b mab; 5. duke Elab; 6. duke Pinon; 7. duke Kenaz; 8. duke Teman; 9. duke Mibzar; 10. duke Magdiel; 11. duke Iram † (P). These eleven were dukes of Edom when the children of Israel were come out into the wilderness; and being dismayed at the approach of so formidable a body, as yet unprovided with a seat, dreaded for their own country, not knowing that the Israelites were under a strict injunction by no means to molest them. Wherefore perceiving the imperfection and weakness of the regulation they were under, they united under one head or king, and prepared to maintain their ground against any invasion.

To this nameless king, or, perhaps, his successor, came messengers from Moses, then drawing near the end of his days, to entreat a passage through his country for him and his people. And though it was remonstrated to him that the Israelites were his brethren, and as he could not but know how they and their fathers had wandered from place to place, without any fixed habitation; how they had been oppressed in Egypt; how God had now led them out from under their bondage, and that they had reached his borders, being in or near the town of Kadesh; it was to be hoped he would let them pass freely through his country, in their way to the land of Canaan; that if he was willing to befriend them in this matter, they would keep the highway, and not offer to turn to the right or the left, to hurt the fields, or the vineyards, or drain the wells of water, until they had quite crossed his territories. To this the jealous king of Edom answered, that he would by d no means grant it, and advised them not to make the least attempt towards it; that if they did, they might expect to be opposed by the whole strength of his kingdom. And when these ambassadors, or, perhaps, those of a second embassy, urged him still farther upon this important business, and made a renewal of promises and assurances of the most peaceable behaviour, if they might have the passage they solicited, protesting that they would pay for every thing they might have occasion for on the way, and that they would be as expeditious in their marches as their feet would permit; he grew downright exasperated at their reiterated instances, and fearing that the Israelites might make some desperate attempt to force the passage he denied them, he took the field and marched towards them, to ine timidate them, and shew them that he was not to be prevailed on *. However, his enmity did not run to the pitch of distressing them in matters wherein he could * Gen. xxxvi.

† Deut. iv. 12.

* Gen. ubi sup.

* Numb. xx. 14, 21.

bourhood of Seir. And this is further confirmed by the Samaritan reading, which has it, that he found them suddenly, that is, fell on them by surprise, and discomfited them; and this is the most likely meaning of the Hebrew text in this place, it having the very same signification in several other places (40). However, the word is also thought to have been the name of some useful plant or herb (41), which Anab first discovered.

(P) In scripture the names of these kings and dukes run in a seemingly-confused order; and some are unwilling to think that they succeeded in the manner we have, from bishop Cumberland, placed them in (42). This difference in opinion proceeds from these words of the text prefixed to the list of the kings; and these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the land of Israel (43). This is supposed to be an interpolation; and if we do not allow all the kings of the list to have been elder than Moses, we must suppose the whole to be interpolated too; and accordingly some take Moses to have been the first king of Israel, and to be meant here. It cannot be proved that any of the said kings were of the line of Esaú; and this first monarchy set up by the Horites was plainly elective; whereas that monarchy erected by the children of Esaú was, by the very little or nothing we know of it, at least seemingly, hereditary; for Hadad was a minor when David conquered Edom. But we are afraid of trespassing too much on our readers' patience, by running into the many particulars of this debate, and shall only say, that we have embraced that opinion which, upon mature deliberation, seems to us to be the best founded.

(40) Vide CLERIC. Comm. in Gen. cap. xxxvi. ver. 24.

(41) Vide WAGNER. Annot. in Tit.

Talm. Sol. (42) See SHUCKFORD's Connell. of the sacr. and prof. Hist. book 7. p. 192, &amp; seqq.

(43) See PRIDEAUX's Connell. of the Old and New Test. part 1. book 5. p. 492, 493.

relieve them without danger to himself; and (perhaps too) to prevent their growing desperate, he furnished them with what his country afforded for their sustenance, or convenience, for their money<sup>b</sup>.

AFTER this there is scarce any history so obscure and interrupted as this of Edom; and particularly, we find no words concerning them, from these days to those of king David: however, we will supply this chasm in part, by observing that in the mean time the Edomites extended their dominion, and applied themselves to trade and navigation, and seized on the empire of the sea; we mean of the Arabian gulf at least, and the trade thereof: they dealt in very rich commodities as it seems; pure gold, gold of Ophir, the topaz of Ethiopia, coral, pearls, and the like<sup>c</sup>, and became a very considerable kingdom, as the most common opinion is.

BUT in the height of this prosperity, their country was invaded by the conquering arms of Israel, and Edom began to feel the effects of Isaac's prophecy, that the elder should serve the younger. David had by this time gained very considerable victories over the Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, and other neighbouring nations, and had brought a great part of their territories under subjection, and finished his conquests with Idumæa<sup>d</sup>: what drew upon them so dreadful a war is hard to guess, the sacred historians being quite silent about it (Q). But this they tell us in the whole, that 18,000 of them were cut off in the valley of Salt, and that the rest were either brought under the Jewish yoke, by the dreadful sword of Joab, David's general, or were forced to retire into some foreign countries (R). Thus was Edom subdued, wasted and depopulated; their cities garrisoned with Jewish troops, and the rest dispersed into foreign countries. Hadad their king, as yet a minor, and a party with him, took the way of Midian (S), thinking, perhaps, to cross the Red-Sea; and there understanding that they and their young king would be favourably received by Pharaoh, they carried him thither, and Hadad was accordingly received, and supported by Pharaoh with all the dignity becoming his royal rank; and, to compleat all the favours and kindnesses which were unsparingly heaped on him, he had the queen's [Taphnes's] sister given to him in marriage<sup>e</sup> (T). But at the same time that Hadad made his way towards Egypt, others took different routs; some flying to the Philistines, fortified themselves in Azoth or Azotus, and proved a considerable accession of power, and of very singular benefit to that people (U): and others that dealt in shipping, took the longest way they could to escape

Year of the
Flood, 1959.
Year before
Christ, 1040.

<sup>b</sup> Deut. ii. 28, 29.
15, 20.

<sup>c</sup> Job xxviii.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Sam. viii. 13.

1 Chron. xviii. 12.

<sup>e</sup> 1 Kings xi.

(Q) Indeed there is but very little room to guess at what might positively be the cause of this ruin executed upon the Edomites; but, probably, David treating with them for some of the advantages of Elath and Esfiongeber, they refused to hearken to him, and thereby provoked him to wreck those important places, the only marts of the very rich commodities he wanted, out of their hands.

(R) Sir Isaac Newton makes this dispersion to have been of very beneficial consequence to the several nations they went to, supposing they carried their arts, sciences, and industry with them wherever they went (44); and herein he is in part supported by very ample authority, as we shall immediately observe.

(S) From hence we have, after Rehob, supposed that Midian was partly bounded on the north by Edom (45); as if they were obliged to fly through Midian to go to Egypt: but it is more likely that they struck into Midian, as the shortest cut to get away from the enemy, with design to embark for Egypt, at Madian, or some other sea-port of that country, as the safest way to go into Egypt.

(T) According to Sir Isaac Newton's hypothesis, Hadad and his followers were the more kindly received by the king of Egypt, as he foresaw the advantage they would be of to him, by bringing with them their skill in letters, astronomy, navigation, and the like, in which the Egyptians were till then ignorant.

(U) The aforesaid chronologer holds, among other things, that some of them flying to the Philistines and the sea-ports, improved the inhabitants there in the arts of navigation and commerce; and indeed it is more than once said that the Phœnicians came from the Red-Sea. Herodotus (46) tells us so; and Stephanus (47) relates, that Azotus was built by the fugitives which fled from the Red-Sea. "The Phœnicians therefore came from the Red-Sea, in the days of Je and her brother Phœneus, king of Argos; and by consequence at that time, when David conquered the Edomites, and made them fly every way from the Red-Sea . . . And this flight gave occasion to the Philistines to call many places Erythra, in memory of their being Erythraeans or Edomites, and of their coming from the Erythraean sea; for Erythra was the name of a city in Ionia; of another in Libya; of another in Lacris; of another in Bœotia; of another in Cyprus; of another in Ætolia; of another in Asia, near Chius; and Erythra Acra was a promontory in Lybia, and Erythraeum a promontory in Crete, and Erythras, a place near Tibur, and Erythrai a city or country

(44) Chron. of anc. kingd. amended, p. 209.
c. 89.

(47) In vocem "Αζωτ.

(45) See before, p. 299.

(46) l. i. c. i. l. 7.

a escape the sword of the conqueror, and went towards, or into the Persian gulf<sup>a</sup>: in a word, they were dispersed into all parts, there being nothing but slavery for them in their native place.

HADAD, though he lived in great ease and splendor in the Egyptian court, yet being conscious of his birth, unwilling to live in dependance, and still thirsting after his kingdom, was waiting for some favourable opportunity of regaining it, but more especially when it was told him that David and the terrible Joab were both dead. At length the time came when Solomon wallowed in all kinds of impurity, and thinking this a proper opportunity to take his revenge, he disclosed his mind to his brother-in-law Pbaraob, entreating that he would dismiss him. The b wise king of Egypt perceiving the great troubles and dangers which he must be exposed to in executing his design, would have prevailed on him to lay aside all thoughts of so dangerous an undertaking; but Hadad, upon urging the matter, obtained a dismissal, and upon his return into Idumea, made several attempts to recover his dominions, but in vain, his subjects being over-awed by the garrisons which David had set over them†. He had a son by his Egyptian wife, whose name was Gemubath; he had a princely education in the palace of Pbaraob; but Hadad failing in his view upon his own kingdom, he, it is likely, established himself in Syria, where we find the royal family bore the name of Hadad.

In the mean time the kingdom of Edom continued under the house of David till c the days of Jebozaphat, being governed by deputies or viceroys, appointed by the kings of Judab. And, though we have in the history of Moab, made mention of a king of Edom, who assisted Jeboram king of Israel, and Jebozaphat king of Judab, in the reduction of Mesha king of Moab, we there speak only in the freedom of scripture-phrase; for that king, as he is called, attended upon Jebozaphat as a vassal, and not as an auxiliary<sup>e</sup>. However, though the history of that war does peculiarly belong to the reigns of Jebozaphat and Jeboram, kings of Israel and Judab, who were the principals in it, yet we have here occasion to repeat that this chief of Edom's son is thought to have been the person sacrificed by Mesha the king of Moab, upon the walls of the city, where he was blocked up, though he is believed by others to have been the Moabite's own son<sup>f</sup>.

We have now seen the time wherein Esau was to be a servant to his brother; d and now we come to that wherein he was to shake off his yoke, and be subject to him no more. For, finding a fair opportunity to recover their ancient liberty, the Edomites embraced it, and succeeded. They had already shewn how ill they were disposed, even towards Jebozaphat, when a part of them joined the Moabites and Ammonites in an attempt to surprize him when he was unprepared for the assault; but fell into such pannick confusion, that the Edomites were all cut off by the Ammonites and Moabites, who afterwards butchered each other<sup>e</sup>. But in the days of Jeboram the son of Jebozaphat, the whole nation of Edom arose, and assassinating or expelling their vice-roy, made themselves a king after their own liking; and upon advice that Jeboram was coming with a formidable power to reduce them, e they marched towards him, and managed so as to hem him all round in the night-time. Their project was however disconcerted with a great slaughter, and they were forced to their retrenchments; but though this proved but an indifferent beginning, yet so it happened, that the Edomites could not be annexed again to the house of David<sup>e</sup>.

Thus was the long-wish'd-for revolution brought about after one hundred and fifty years of oppression; but who was their chief upon this occasion, or what he did farther, or who succeeded him, we are wholly at a loss for.

AFTER this they had no attempts made upon them by the kings of Judab for upwards of sixty years; in which time they must have had time to recover themselves so well, as to retrieve, in a great measure, their ancient splendor. Not-

Year of the
Flood, 2110.
Year before
Christ, 889.

<sup>a</sup> See Sir ISAAC NEWTON'S Chronol. of anc. kingd. amended. p. 104, 105.    <sup>e</sup> See: Kings xxii. 47.    † Vid. Jos. Antiq. l. viii. c. 2.    <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 291.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid.    <sup>e</sup> 2 Chron. xxi. 8.

" try in Paphlagonia; and the name Erythra or " Erythra was given to the island of Gades, peo" pled by Pharicians. . . . Edom, Erythra, and " Pharicia are names of the same signification,
" the words denoting a red colour; which makes
" it probable that the Erythreans who fled from

" David settled in great numbers in Pharicia;
" that is, in all the sea-coasts of Syria, from Egypt
" to Zidon; and by calling themselves Pharicians
" in the language of Syria, instead of Erythreans,
" gave the name of Pharicia to all that sea-coast,
" and to that only" (49).

(49) See his Chronol. of anc. kingd. amended. p. 108, 109.

withstanding

withstanding which they suffered a signal overthrow from Amaziab king of Judab <sup>a</sup> in the valley of Salt, where ten thousand of them fell in battle, and as many of them were also taken prisoners (W). After which their capital Selab, which we have supposed to have been the famous Petra, was taken from them by storm, and the ten thousand captives were by Amaziab's order thrown down from the ragged precipices which stood about that city, and were torn and dashed to pieces. Selab was now by the conqueror called Jokibeel <sup>b</sup>.

WHETHER after or before this, we cannot discover, the Edomites had a war with their neighbours the Moabites, wherein, being unfortunate, their king fell into the hands of the enemy, who burnt him, whether dead or alive we cannot say, till his bones were reduced to ashes (X). Thus have we hitherto tacked together the <sup>b</sup> incoherent parts of this history in the best manner we have been able. In the mean time they became subject to the king of Babylon, in completion of what several prophets had threatned them <sup>c</sup>. And when utter destruction came upon the Jews, and that they were carried away captive, then did their fury blaze out, so far as to cut off such of them as attempted to escape the captivity, and as if they designed now to take a full revenge for what they had suffered under David's bloody general, they vented their rage on the sad remains of the temple, which they consumed with fire as soon as the Chaldees or Babylonians were withdrawn; and attempted to level the whole city with the ground, insulting the God of Israel with horrid blasphemies, butchering the few remains who by his help had escaped the <sup>c</sup> hands of the Babylonians, and flattering themselves with the pleasure of seeing shortly an utter end of the Jewish nation and commonwealth. For this they were severely threatned by the prophets above-mentioned with a severe retaliation, when, for the devastations they had forwarded in Judab, they should behold their land become desolate, when those of their now oppressed enemies should flourish <sup>d</sup>.

ACCORDINGLY they fell soon after into terrible confusion, and violent intestine commotions and persecutions; insomuch that a great part of them left their own country, and settled in the empty lands of Judea, and particularly in the south-western parts <sup>e</sup>; and it may be, that at this time they made an end of the temple of Jerusalem. Those of them that staid behind in Edom, joined the children of Nebaioth, and were called Nabateans ever afterwards; so that the ancient kingdom of Edom now lost its name, which was transferred to that part of the land of Judea which the refugees had pitched in, and which had never been any part of their old kingdom, but the lot of the tribes of Simeon and Judab. And this is the Idumaea, and these the Idumeans mentioned by Pliny, Ptolemy, Strabo, and other ancient writers. For because of their wicked dealing with their oppressed brethren, their kingdom was to lose all its glory, and become a desert; strangers from the south <sup>e</sup> were to possess it; it was never to rise, and from thenceforward to be called the border of wickedness <sup>e</sup>, though it pleased God to spare a remnant of this people, by permitting them to seize on a part of their brethren's portion; <sup>e</sup> by which means they came to be united into one family with them, as they were descended from the loins of one man.

WE have now pointed out the exit of the ancient kingdom of Edom, and shall proceed to the broken interrupted affairs of those Edomites who settled in Judea; concerning which we only know, that a decree was issued out against them from Darius Hystaspes, commanding that they should deliver up all they had belonging to the Jews; but what effect this took we cannot well say. That upon the decline of the Persian monarchy, and after the days of Alexander, they were under the power of the Seleucidae, when the ancient aversion they had to the Jews being stirred up in them, they warred against them, under the conduct of Gorgias their governor <sup>f</sup> for Antiochus Epiphanes: but they got nothing thereby but blows and great ruin;

<sup>a</sup> 2 Kings xiv. 7. <sup>b</sup> See Isa. xxi, xxxiv. Jerem. ix, xxv, xxvii, xlix. Lam. iv. Ezek. xxv, xxxii, xxxv, xxxvi. Joel iii. Amos i. 9. <sup>c</sup> See Ezek. xxv, xxxv. Joel iii. Amos i. Obad. i. <sup>d</sup> STRABO, lib. 16. p. 760. <sup>e</sup> Obad. ubi supr. <sup>f</sup> Malach. i. <sup>g</sup> Esdr. ubi supr. ver. 50.

(W) The same chronologer holds, that the Oes of Helladius, the Oannes of Berosus (48) and the Euhadnes of Hyginus (49), are several names given to an Edomite commander, who now fled to the Persian gulf, and first introduced the useful arts into Chaldea; but this, we apprehend, is allowing a little too much.

(X) It is doubted whether this be not the same war wherein Mesha king of Moab sacrificed his own son, or the son of the king or chief of Edom (50). Our translators of the bible take them to be one and the same event.

(48) See before, p. 90: (49) Feb. 274. (50) See before, p. 291.

- a being constantly worsted by Judas Maccabeus, who at last took and sacked their chief city Hebron<sup>r</sup>: their strong holds wherewith they awed the Jews, were forced by that valorous commander, who cut off twenty thousand of them in the assault; but a residue of nine thousand of them fled to two strong towers<sup>s</sup>, where they were well prepared to sustain a siege; whence by a bribe of 70,000 drachms, a good part of them were suffered to escape. But when the treachery was discovered by the Jewish general, a stop was put to this outlet; these two strong castles were also forced; and no less than twenty thousand Idumeans again<sup>t</sup> put to the sword. Thus was their zeal against their brethren rewarded as it deserved, as shall be more exactly particularized in the Jewish history.
- b AFTER these very troublesome times, we know not how it fared with the Edomites in Idumæa, except that they seem to have been continually agitated by broils and wars, till they were conquered by John Hyrcanus; who reduced them to the necessity of embracing the Jewish religion, or of quitting their country. They chose the former, and submitting to be circumcised, became incorporated with the Jews<sup>u</sup>, and considering their descent as well as their conversion, they were upon a double account reckoned as natural Jews; and accordingly, in the first century after Christ, the name of Idumean was lost and quite disused<sup>v</sup> (Y). And being so, we here break off, referring what further relates to this people, to the Jewish history.
- c We have seen then that the Edomites or Idumeans were partly swallowed up before by the Nabateans or Arabians, and partly, now, by the Jews, there remains now that we should add what the Rabbies have further said concerning that nation, though it were but to expose their ignorance and unaccountable vanity.
- We observed in the last note, that Edomite is one of the civilest names they give to the Christians; and the Talmudists make no scruple to call Rome and Italy the bloody empire of Edom. To make out this odious appellative, some pretend to omit many other impious absurdities; that the soul of Esau passed into that of Jesus of Nazareth (Z); that the Edomites were therefore the most forward to embrace his religion, which they carried and settled at Rome, and thence into Italy<sup>x</sup>.
- d BUT Gouvionides, or the pseudo Josephus, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, gives such an early account of this pretended Edomitish kingdom, as may be called a master-piece of Jewish fallacy, who makes Italy to have been in part peopled by Izeph the grandson of Esau. This fabulous hero, according to him, having made his escape out of Egypt, where Joseph had long detained him, sailed to Carthage, and from thence into Italy, where, among other feats, he took Lavinia from Turnus, and killed a monstrous satyr which infested that country: for this last the grateful inhabitants gave him the name of Janus, for so the monster was called, and of Saturn the planet, which they then worshipped; made him
- e king of Rome and Campania, and deified him after his death<sup>y</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 2869.
Year before
Christ, 130.

<sup>r</sup> 1 Maccab. v. 65, 68.

<sup>s</sup> Ver. 4, 5. <sup>t</sup> Maccab. x. 18, 23.

<sup>u</sup> Ibid. ver. 21, 23.

<sup>v</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 13. c. 17.

<sup>w</sup> PRIDEAUX's Connec. of the Old and New Test. book 5.

p. 307, 308.

<sup>x</sup> De his vid. ABEN Ezra. ABARBA. MOS. ALBO. & al.

<sup>y</sup> JOSEPH. BEN.

GOR. lib. i. c. 2, & 3.

(Y) The name of Edomite is not so wholly lost, but the Jews make use of it still. "The Rabbins speak of Edom and Edomites long after this; but thereby they do not mean Idumæa, or the sons of Edom, but Rome and the Christians of the Roman empire. For, fearing the displeasure of the Christians, among whom they live, for avoiding it whenever they speak any reproachful thing of Christians, or of their religion, they usually blend it under feigned names;

"sometimes calling us Cuthæans, i. e. Samaritans, and sometimes Epicureans, and sometimes Edomites; and this last is the civilest appellation they give us" (51).

(Z) This is according to their doctrine of transmigration; and the Cabalists pretend to confirm that blasphemous assertion from the similitude of the names of Y'W'Y Jeshuah (Jesus), and Y'W'Y Esau, by the transposition of a single letter (52).

(51) PRIDEAUX's Connec. of the Old and New Test. part 2, book 5. p. 708.

(52) Vid. BAU-

FAUG. Hist. des Juifs, lib. viii. c. 8. § 1.

S E C T. V.

The History of Amalek.

AMALÉK is generally allowed the father of this people, from whom a they had the name of Amalekites, and their country that of Amalekitis. He was the son of Eliphas (A), Esau's first born, but by a concubine named Timna; notwithstanding which he is reckoned among the princes, and is said to have succeeded Gatam in one of the dukedoms of Edom*, which is all we know of him. The early separation of his family from that of Edom is not without some great difficulties. It might, indeed, be reasonably enough ascribed either to the spuriousness of his birth, or to some other intestine broils; the former having been practised by Abraham towards Ishmael, and by the Gileadites towards the valiant Jephthab<sup>b</sup>; and the latter being very frequent in those early times. But when we call to mind the previous wars of the Amalekites with Cberdolaomer, hinted in the last b note; when we consider Balaam's calling them the first, or beginning of nations, as we shall see anon; that Moses never styles them the brethren of Israel or Edom; that the latter never held any confederacy or friendly harmony with them in all their wars, but suffered them to be invaded and butchered by Saul, without lending them any assistance; lastly, when we find them always mentioned with the Amorites, Philistines, and other Canaanitish nations, and with them involved in the same anathema, we can scarcely forbear looking upon them rather as a tribe of them, than as the descendants of Esau, contrary to the received opinion.

We are not quite so much in the dark as to their situation. Josephus, who looked upon them as the offspring of Amalek, divides the whole land of Edom into Amalekites and Gobolites<sup>c</sup>, but very inaccurately, as we think, with respect to those early days; seeing the scripture doth here, and elsewhere, distinguish those two kingdoms, between whom, we cannot find the least foot-step of alliance or friendship, and whose behaviour, on the contrary, was so opposite towards the children of Israel. We have settled, as well as we could, the situation of that of Edom in the last section; this of Amalek may still, in our opinion, be more clearly and satisfactorily fixed, if we consider that it had intercourse and commerce with Egypt<sup>d</sup> (B); that it had a way leading into the country of the Philistines, and into the land of Canaan (C). Whence we conclude it to have been bounded by Canaan

* Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16. 1 Chron. i. 36. <sup>b</sup> Gen. xiv. 6. Judges xi. 1. & seq. <sup>c</sup> 1 Sam. xv. 7. <sup>d</sup> See JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 6. c. 8. Ibid. l. 2. c. 1.

(A) The Arabians deduce his genealogy in a different manner, and make him some generations older than Abraham, as follows:

Noah, Ux,
Ham, Ad,
Aram, Amalek (1).

They say also, that the Amalekites in ancient times possessed the country about Mecca, whence they were expelled by the Jerhamite kings (2). Some hold that Ad was the son of Aws or Ux, the son of Aram, the son of Shem, the son of Noah. Others, that Ad was the son of Amalek, the son of Ham (3); but the contrary is the received opinion. Some commentators on the Koran (4) tell us, that the old Adites were of prodigious stature, the largest being an hundred cubits, and the least sixty; which they pretend to prove by the authority of the Koran (5). In fine, it is also said by the Arabian writers, that Amalek was the son of Azd, the son of Shem (6). Le Clerc (7) is willing to adopt this notion so far as to think, that the Amalekites were a great nation before the days of Abraham or Lot; because he finds that Cber- dolaomer made war on them under that name, which he supposes was proleptically taken at first. But considering that our Amalek was of the house of Esau, with whom the Israelites were commanded to be at peace, he changes his mind, and imagines they had no relation to our Amalek, but sprang from somewhere else.

(B) This seems to be clear, from Josephus (8), who makes Amalekitis to extend between Pelusion and the Red-Sea, and from the Arabian historians, who make the Amalekites to have been even masters of Egypt (9); for it were hard to suppose they have no manner of foundation for their story, and that the whole is entirely false in all its articles. That they had communication with Egypt may farther appear from the Egyptians they left behind them on their return from lacking of Ziklag, who fell into the hands of David (10). Finally, it is expressly said in scripture that they had of old inhabited the land . . . even unto the land of Egypt.

(C) This is naturally supposed by their expedition against Ziklag (11) in the country of the Philistines,

(1) Vide. RELAND. Palæst. Illust. c. 14. (2) Pocock Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 173. (3) D. HERBELOT. p. 51, 110. (4) JALLA LO' DDIM & ZAMAKSHARI. (5) KOR. c. 7. (6) EBN. SHONNAH. (7) In Genes. xiv. 7. & Numb. xxiv. 20. (8) Antiq. l. 6. c. 8. (9) See before, p. 280, 281. (10) 1 Sam. xxx. (11) Idem ibid.

a naam on the north ; by Egypt, or its dependant territory, on the south ; by Edom, on the east ; and by the deserts towards the sea, on the west ; or, perhaps, by the margin of the sea itself. And this we deliver simply as our own opinion, wherein, however, we are not alone †, and forbear to perplex the reader with a variety of opinions, which are not so happily supported as this. Here then, and hereabouts was there abode, till they ceased to be a nation ; their limits, in all likelihood, extending with their increase of power, and shrinking in again as they dwindled away.

We find but one city mentioned in the sacred writings, † and that without a name, except we follow Josephus, who places the famous city of Petra under the jurisdiction of the Amalekites * (D).

THEIR religious and civil customs we know nothing of positively, since we are in the dark about their descent. If from Esau, we may suppose they used circumcision, and that the decree of their total excision was owing to the inhuman outrage they committed on the distressed Israelites †. But if of Canaanitish race, doubtless their horrid idolatries subjected them to one common doom with them. If the former, they had, at least for some time, the same religion with their progenitors Abraham, Isaac, &c. If the latter, they gave probably into all the abominations of their neighbours. Josephus † mentions their idols, but the scripture terms them the idols of mount Seir † ; so that they seem to have more properly belonged to the Edomites than to the Amalekites.

THEIR arts, their sciences, and trade we can only guess at from their situation ; for it is probable they had the knowledge and commerce of those times pretty much in common with their neighbours the Edomites and Egyptians, and those of the sea-coasts of Judea. And this is the less disputable as their king is placed in so high a sphere of majesty, and themselves stiled the first of the nations, as we shall see anon. Much the same may be said of their manners, genius and policy.

CONCERNING their government, thus much appears that it was monarchical ; and that the first, or at least one of the first of their kings, was called Agag † ; as was also their last = ; from whence it has been imagined that all their intermediate kings bore the same appellation.

THE Amalekites stepped early, if not at the very first, into the government of this country ; and very remarkable it is, that they grew up to such a sudden height of power and splendor, that their king is spoken of as far above all others ; for Balaam foretelling the future majesty of the Jewish state, expresses himself, that their king shall be bigger than Agag, and stiles them, the first of the nations * (E) ; which seems † Vide RELAND. Palæst. illust.

TO

* Exod. xvii. † Antiq. l. 9. c. 10.

† 1 Sam. xv. 5.

* Vide JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 3. c. 2.

xv. 8. = Numb. ubi supr. & ver. 20.

† See before, p. 311.

† Numb. xxix. 7. = 1 Sam.

liphites, which they took and burnt, and from other instances of the same kind, which we shall not here enumerate : but this we rather insist on ; because so miserable and broken a people as they were at that time, cannot well be supposed to have been able to break through any other country to get at Ziklag : and had they not the situation we have given them, they must have crossed some part or other of the kingdom of Edom, at that time in its meridian, which it is not likely would have been allowed them ; for there seems to have been no manner of understanding between the nations, as we have elsewhere said : and it is plain that they lay to the south of the Philistines by the words of David, who being asked by Achish where he had been, he answered, that he had been against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the Kenites (12) ; but did not think fit to say he had been against the Amalekites, who lay in the south. Add to this, that the Simeonites lay next to them (13).

(D) We must here note, what Josephus says, that those who inhabited Gobolitis and Petra were called Amalekites (14) ; but seeing the same author divides the whole kingdom of Edom into Gobolitis and Amalekitis (15), how comes it that they dwelt not in this last division ?

(E) It was sudden, according to the hypothesis commonly adopted (16) : for thereby the kingdom of Amalek is not likely to have been much, if any thing at all, older than that of Edom, which we have shewn to have commenced at the Exodus ; and therefore when Balaam expressed himself in so high a strain concerning Agag and his monarchy, it could not have been of much above forty years standing. The expression of Amalek's being the first of the nations, our version turns otherwise in the margin, the first of the nations that warred against Israel. Much the same turn does Onkelos give it ; but if we compare what is said of Agag himself but thirteen verses before, we shall not be at any great loss for the right, or, at least, natural explication of the passage before us ; which doubtless means, that they were the greatest and most noble nation of that time ; and this is the most generally approved opinion. In Le Clerc's version they are stiled the first-fruits of the nations ; by

(12) 1 Sam. xxvii. 20.

(13) See 1 Chron. iv. 42.

(14) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 3. c. 2.

(15) See before in the notes, p. 309.

(16) See before, p. 311.

to countenance the extraordinary things the Arabian historians have related concerning the Amalekites; as that they conquered Egypt, and possessed the throne of that kingdom for several generations * (F).

BUT not to deviate from the authority we must rely on, it appears that this kingdom was haughty and insolent in its very cradle; and no sooner heard that the Israelites had crossed the Red-Sea, than they resolved to cut them off. The scripture mentions none but Amalek † upon this occasion; which, whether it is spoken of the king alone, or collectively of the whole nation, is not agreed. Josephus relates, that they had no less than five kings, who laid their heads together, and joined forces to carry on this turbulent design ‡ (G). To pass this over, so it was, that the Amalekites fell on the rear of the Israelites as they were on full march from Rephidim to mount Horeb. Some havoc they made; but it returned severely upon themselves, as soon as Joshua could get the fighting men into order; by whom, being in their turn assaulted, a long and bloody battle ensued: but in the end the Amalekites were put to a precipitate flight, with the heavy doom on their head, that for this outrage their name should be put out from under heaven §.

IN the mean time, however, it pleased God to make use of them in conjunction with some of the Canaanites, as his instruments for the punishments of the diffidence and disobedience of the Israelites, when they thought to have washed away their sinful perverseness by a fool-hardy attempt, in contradiction to the express decree of God, that not one of them from twenty years and upwards should have sight of the land of Promise ¶. The slaughter which the Amalekites did help to make of the Israelites upon this occasion, will be told in the history of Canaan.

FROM this time they seem to have missed no opportunity of vexing the Jewish nation, till they were ripe for the excision denounced against them. They confederated with Eglon king of Moab, and the Ammonites **, and afterwards with the Midianites under Zabab and Zalmunna, to root out the Israelites, and possess themselves of the land, as they had vainly projected; but what success they had in the attempt, and how they in the end fell by their own swords and those of their friends and allies, we have already related at large ††.

AFTER this there is a very wide gap in the history of this people, which reaches d even to the days of Saul. At this time their king was a very graceful person, and of noble presence and address, which stood him in good stead; for on account of these his personal accomplishments was his life spared, it seems, in the general massacre of his subjects *. But with all this specious outside, he is upbraided as an insolent and merciless tyrant, in whose reign the nation was grown ripe for the excision they had been threatened with about four hundred years afore. And, as a forerunner of it, the Kenites, their inmates, were warned to leave their country, and seek some other seat, lest they should be involved in the impending calamity †. As soon as the Kenites had obeyed the summons, the Amalekites were invaded by Saul, at the head of two hundred and ten thousand men (H). And by these numbers, being e sorely oppressed, and quite disabled from making any head, they were all cut off, except Agag, and some who were so happy, for the present, as to fly their country, or hide themselves in such retreats where they were not discovered: neither * See before, p. 280, 281. † Exod. xvii.

supr. † Numb. xiv: † See before, p. 289.
lib. 6. c. 8. † See before, p. 302.

‡ JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 3. c. 2. † Exod. ubi
‡ See before, p. 304. * JOSEPH. Antiq.

by which, in his commentary, he understands them to have been the most ancient and potent nation, and to have been before any of those which proceeded from the loins of Abraham and Lot.

(F) What the Arabic history says of these Amalekites, bears an affinity with what the Egyptians report concerning the Phœnician shepherds: for they were at length expelled by the natives (17), and are supposed, as is said by us of the Canaanites, to have fled into Afric (18); and that the Amalekites were sometimes comprehended under the general denomination of Phœnicians, may be observed hereafter.

(G) What Josephus here says need not be supposed to imply that the Amalekites were divided into many kingdoms. It is possible, and very probable, that some of the petty kings of Canaan joined the king of Amalekitis now, as he did some of the Canaanites afterwards, to prevent the Israelites from entering into their borders. This junction may have been passed over by Moses, who thought it enough that he mentioned the principal and ring-leader of the assault.

(H) Josephus makes this army to have consisted of no more than 70,000 men, and yet adds, that the country was so beset with them, that the Amalekites could hardly escape, if they attempted to fly any where (19); but this is said at random, as we think.

(17) Ex libro MIRAT. CAINAT disse.
JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 6. c. 1.

(18) Vide RELAND. Palæst. Illustr. p. 82.

(19) JO-

- a mother nor sucking child were spared; the whole country was made desolate, Agag and the best of the cattle only, were suffered to live. However, Agag did not long enjoy this favour; for it was no sooner related to Samuel that he was saved alive, than he was sent for by the prophet, with whom all his insinuating address, and hopes that the bitterness of death was passed, could not avail. He was hewn to pieces by Samuel, or at least by his order, in Gilgal, before the Lord<sup>a</sup>.

- THE small remnant of the Amalekites who escaped the sword of Saul possessed themselves of their desolate country again, and lived, for ought appears, in peace, till such time as David was driven to ask protection of Achish king of the Philistines, dreading the murderous jealousy of Saul, and had Ziklag allotted to him. At this time the Amalekites are mentioned as associated with the Geshurites and Gezerites (1). The Amalekites thus picking up again and gathering strength, were slaughtered once more by their new and near neighbour David, who thought it perhaps a duty incumbent on him to compleat the work which Saul had left unfinished. So once more were the Amalekites, man and woman, butchered and dispersed, their country in good part ruined, and all the cattle that came in the enemy's way driven off<sup>b</sup>.

- THE Amalekites meditated revenge for this cruel injury, as they doubtless called it, and mustering their strength, went up to Ziklag, the abode of David, who happened then to be absent with his small party, so that the town was left defenseless; wherefore they easily made themselves masters of the place, and burnt it with fire; but touched not the lives of any of the inhabitants, which, considering what they had suffered so lately from David, might well pass for a great piece of moderation in them, if they had not some further views in preserving them (K). Among their captives were David's two wives, Abinoam the Jezreelite, and Abigail, who had been wife to Nabal the Carmelite; and having thus succeeded to their wish, they thought to secure what they had got by an expeditious return homewards, and determined not to stop by the way till they should reach such a place, which was perhaps a pleasant spot, affording water and a refreshing shade, and pretty well out of the reach of the enemy. Hurrying on with this precipitation, they left behind them one of their number, an Egyptian by birth, who, by some means or other, was so weak that he could not keep pace with them. David in the mean time had notice of the revenge the Amalekites had taken on him, and pursued them very eagerly, and in his way took this Egyptian, who informed him of the place where they intended to halt, to rejoice and rest themselves. The Amalekites arrived at the appointed place, and gave a loose to their triumph, with great mirth and jollity; and it seems they recreated themselves several days together. As they were in this careless posture they were descried by David from the neighbouring hills towards the close of day; and after they had spent the whole night in debauchery, and were repaired to rest, which was towards the break of day, they were set upon by David and his men, and a slaughter was begun among them, which continued till the setting sun; so that not a soul of them escaped the edge of the sword, except four hundred young men, who rode upon dromedaries, and, who leaving all their companions and booty behind them, were burthened with nothing but the doleful news of so woful a mischance after such uncommon success in their attempt upon Ziklag<sup>c</sup>.

THUS by degrees were the Amalekites reduced; and at last the fatal blow was given to them in the days of Hezekiah, by the Simeonites<sup>d</sup>, who utterly destroyed and dispersed them, and kept their country in possession: and this is the imperfect account we have of the exit of the Amalekites, as Balaam had prophesied long before, Amalek was the first of the nations; but his latter end shall be that he perish for ever<sup>e</sup>.

BUT it happened afterwards that a man of Amalek blood had taken ample revenge on the Jews, had not God interposed, as it were, by a miracle; for Haman

<sup>a</sup> 1 Sam. xv. JOSEPH. Antiq. 1. 6. c. 9. <sup>b</sup> 1 Sam. xxviii. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. xxx. <sup>d</sup> See 1 Chron. iv. 40—43. <sup>e</sup> Numb. xxiv. 20.

(1) Who these Geshurites and Gezerites were is uncertain. They are taken for reliques of the Canaanites (20); but by the words of the text it might be imagined they were originally of this country; for those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land, as thou goest to Sinar, even unto the land of Egypt (21).

(K) It is said, indeed, that they were a poor covetous people, who intended to sell them for slaves, and make money of them (22); or wanted servants for their own use, and therefore shewed this mercy; but if we may be allowed a conjecture of our own, they kept their prisoners alive to supply the loss of those who had lately perished by the hand of David; and this does not seem to be a very unnatural supposition.

(20) Vide CLERIC. & PATRICK upon 1 Sam. xxviii. <sup>(21)</sup> 1 Sam. xxviii. 2. <sup>(22)</sup> See PATRICK on 1 Sam. xxx. 2, & CLERIC.

is called an Agagite or Amalekite; and it is well known how near he was to the fruition <sup>a</sup> of his bloody will against the Jews; but this fact being transacted in another country and period, must be related elsewhere. That, however, may be called the last act of the Amalekites; and here therefore this section concludes.

S E C T. VI.

The History of Canaan.

WE have already <sup>a</sup> given the history of the ancestors of this nation, and of their <sup>b</sup> origin, and therefore shall not repeat it here.

CANAAN the son of Ham, the son of Noah, had eleven sons, Sidon or Zidon, Heth, Jebusi, Emori or Amori, Girgasi or Girgash, Hirvi or Hevi, Archi or Arki, Sini, Arvadi, Zemari, and Hamathi. These were the fathers of the following tribes or nations; the Sidonians or Zidonians, the Hettites or Hittites, the Jebusites, the Emorites or Amorites, the Girgashites or Girgashites, the Hirvites or Hevites, the Arkites or Archites, the Sinites, the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hamathites <sup>b</sup>. Five of these are known to have dwelt in the land of Canaan, the Hettites or Hittites, the Jebusites, the Emorites or Amorites, the Girgashites or Girgashites, and the Hirvites or Hevites. To these are added two others, the Perizzites and Canaanites; and these make up the seven primary nations of the Canaanites: but how the Perizzites came to be a distinct body, or whence the Canaanites are peculiarly so called, can, at best, be only guessed at. These seven nations laboured in particular under the evil influences of the curse denounced by Noah against their ungodly ancestor Ham, being doomed in the end to expulsion, and subjection, and excision. Whether the six other nations we have mentioned, are to be reckoned among the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, by us commonly so called, is indeed affirmed by some, but as strongly denied by others, who think they were exempt from the ruin which was to light on the other seven; being herein countenanced by the silence which may be observed concerning them in the wars the other Canaanites had with Joshua <sup>d</sup> and his successors. For therein is no mention made of the Sidonians, the Arkites, the Sinites, the Arvadites, the Zemarites, or the Hamathites; which is much, seeing they were primary nations or families. We therefore, are of opinion, that they were not included, else so many pretty states or kingdoms could never have been particularized, and these passed over. We must therefore seek for these six original tribes elsewhere. It cannot well be otherwise, than that the seven nations, as they are called, were subdivided into many little kingdoms; for little, very little they must have been, since we find them all within the scanty limits conquered by Joshua. Within that small compass we have no fewer than the following number of Canaanitish kings, said to be subdued by him; the king of Jericho, the king <sup>e</sup> of Ai, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, the king of Eglon, the king of Gezer, the king of Debir, the king of Geder, the king of Hormah, the king of Arad, the king of Libnah, the king of Adullam, the king of Makkedah, the king of Beit-el, the king of Jappuah, the king of Hepher, the king of Aphek, the king of Lasharon or Saron, the king of Madon, the king of Hazor, the king of Shimron-meron, the king of Achishaph, the king of Taanach, the king of Megiddo, the king of Kedesh, the king of Jokneam of Carmel, the king of Dor, the king of the nations of Gilgal, and the king of Tirzah, thirty-one in all <sup>f</sup> (A); who were either all, or most of them, comprehended under the primary denominations of the seven nations, the Hittites, the Jebusites, the Amorites, <sup>f</sup> the Girgashites, Hirvites, Perizzites or Canaanites (B) properly or peculiarly so called.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 121.

<sup>b</sup> Gen. x. 15.

<sup>c</sup> Joshua xii. 9. 24.

(A) But we must not for this suppose there were no more than thirty-one in the whole country that bore the royal title. These are only all that were conquered by Joshua. The scripture history acknowledges, that the Canaanites were never wholly subdued by him; and we may infer, that many had the title of king, who never had much hurt from Joshua.

(B) These seven are a contraction, we must suppose, of the ten nations that were promised to Abraham; the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites (1). We may touch on this matter anon.

(1) Genes. xv. 19, 21.

a Nor were these all the branches of the Canaanites, who were possessed of the land of promise. But how to assign a place to each particular we know not; wherefore we shall only divide the country in general between the seven tribes or nations, as well as we can, which is all the geography we shall give of this Country here.

THE limits of the country of these Canaanites in general, as seems, are thus marked out by Moses*, From Sidon to Gaza, from thence over to Sodom, and thence to Lashab thereby, as is thought<sup>b</sup>, stretching out the four lines which comprehended the whole country. Whether all the descendants of Canaan were included within this compass, is not positively known, but it is likely to have been the original seat of them all; but whether those we must hereafter look for in Syria and elsewhere<sup>c</sup> were terrified thither by the successes of Josua, or whether growing too numerous for so small a territory, they naturally transplanted themselves into other parts, may be disputed by some; though we embrace the latter opinion, being therein in some measure, countenanced by Moses, who tells us, that the families of the Canaanites were spread abroad<sup>d</sup>, just before he gives us their first extent. Thus much we may add on this head, It is clearly evident from scripture and the Jewish writers, that no part of the country on the other side Jordan, not even that inhabited by the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseb, was reckoned into the land of Canaan<sup>e</sup>: but to it may be annexed what once made the most beautiful part of this land, though since a detestable lake; we mean the vale of Siddim, since called Pentapolis, from its five cities, Sodom, Gomorrab, Admah, Zeboijm and Bela. The soil of this vale was much of the same nature with that about the city of Babylon, being productive of Bitumen, and such combustible substances. It was watered every where before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrab, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar<sup>f</sup>. Such was this vale, which needs no further description to give us a due and perfect idea of it.

Now the seven nations above-mentioned, the Hittites, the Jebusites, the Amorites, divided, the Girgashites, the Hivites, the Perizzites, and Canaanites<sup>g</sup>, divided their country among them after this manner: The Hittites dwelt about Hebron; for of the children of Heb Abraham bought the cave of Mach-pelab<sup>h</sup>. The Girgashites had the Jebusites and Canaanites for their neighbours<sup>i</sup>, as is thought<sup>j</sup>, but it does not plainly appear. The Amorites were anciently in the neighbourhood of Hazezon-tamar<sup>k</sup>, and in the valley of Eschol<sup>l</sup>. The Amorites were also on the other side of Jordan and the dead Sea, by the conquest they made of the Moabites and Ammonites<sup>m</sup>; but that conquest, as we have already observed, was no part of Canaan. The Canaanites, peculiarly so called, were divided into distinct bodies, and inhabited two distinct divisions, the sea-side to the west, and the river-side to the east<sup>n</sup>. The Perizzites seem to have been near Beth-el; for Abraham pitched his tent in the beginning between Beth-el and Ali, and the Canaanites and Perizzites are said to have been then in the land<sup>o</sup>: moreover, we find that they dwelt in the mountains, together with the Hittite and the Jebusite<sup>p</sup>; though they are elsewhere forgot when these are mentioned<sup>q</sup>. It appears also, that the Perizzites were not far from Shechem, they being mentioned together with the Canaanites, to have been near the city<sup>r</sup>. They seem also to have extended beyond the portion of Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasseb as far as Beth-shean and the valley of Jezeel, and to the southward, where they seem to have been with the Repbaim<sup>s</sup>, into the tribe of Judab<sup>t</sup> (C). The Hivites are said to have dwelt under Hermion<sup>u</sup>, and in Gibeon<sup>v</sup>, and in mount Lebanon<sup>w</sup>. The Jebusites inhabited the mountains, and held the city of Jebus, afterwards Jerusalem (D).

* Gen. x. ver. 19.    <sup>b</sup> See WELLS'S Geog. of the Old Test. vol. I. chap. 7.    <sup>c</sup> Gen. x. 18.
<sup>d</sup> Vide RELAND. Palæst. Illustr. Tom. I. c. 1.    <sup>e</sup> Gen. xiii. 10.    <sup>f</sup> Deut. xii. 1.    <sup>g</sup> Josh. iii. 10.
<sup>h</sup> Ad. xiii. 19.    <sup>i</sup> Gen. xxiii. 3. & seq.    <sup>j</sup> Josh. xxiv. 11.    <sup>k</sup> Vide RELAND. Palæst. Illustr. I. 1.
<sup>l</sup> c. 27.    <sup>m</sup> Gen. xiv. 7.    <sup>n</sup> Ibid. ver. 13.    <sup>o</sup> Deut. xix. 24.    <sup>p</sup> See before, p. 287, 294.    <sup>q</sup> See
<sup>r</sup> Numb. xiii. 29. & Josh. xi. 3.    <sup>s</sup> Gen. xiii. 3. 7.    <sup>t</sup> Josh. xi. 3.    <sup>u</sup> See Numb. xiii. 29.
<sup>v</sup> Gen. xxiv. 30.    <sup>w</sup> Josh. xvii. 15, 16.    <sup>x</sup> Jud. i. 4, 5.    <sup>y</sup> Josh. xi. 3.    <sup>z</sup> Ibid. ver. 19.
<sup>a</sup> Compare Josh. ix. 7. with Jud. iii. 3. See also 2 Sam. xxiv. 7.

(C) The Perizzite appears to have been a wanderer, as the name imports; whence possible Josuephus divides the land of Canaan into no more than six provinces (2).

(D) Some (3) divide them into but two sorts by the lump, the Canaanites and Perizzites, merchants and shepherds, as the two words nearly import; for Perizzite originally signifies also a villager. Others, more properly perhaps, into merchants and soldiers. According to either, those appellations

(2) Antiq. l. 5. c. 1.
Script. Chronol. p. 202.

(3) CUMBERLAND'S Origin. Gent. Antiq. p. 132. See also BEDFORD'S

Their Customs, &c.

THE cities of this country, besides those of the Pentapolis when it flourished, a that can be fixed with any tolerable degree of certainty, were Hebron, Jebus, Jericho, Beth-el, Shechem, and Beth-shean, concerning which, as they stood under the Canaanites, we have nothing particular to add.

Now to speak of the customs, manners, arts, sciences, and language of these several nations, we may suppose that in some points they differed widely from each other, according as their situation led them into different courses of life (E). We need not say, that the Canaanites on the sea-side were merchants, in which capacity we shall consider them at large, when we come to speak of them as Phœnicians; for by that name, it is commonly agreed, they were afterwards known to the Greeks: accordingly the Seventy, instead of the kings of the Canaanites, which were b by the sea, have rendered it, the kings of the Phœnicians, on the sea-coast. And by the same, the whole land of Canaan is called the country of the Phœnicians*, though those only were properly so called who inhabited the sea-coast: and these we shall dwell upon more particularly under the head of ancient Phœnicians. The other Canaanites who had an inland situation, were employed in pasturage partly, and partly in tillage, and in the exercise of arms, in both which they will be seen to have been well versed. Those of them who dwelt in the walled cities and fixed abodes, cultivated the land, as we may suppose; and those who wandered about, as particularly the Perizzites seem to have done, by what we have just before said of them, were either graziers, or men of arms. So that it is easy to discern among them c the several distinct classes of merchants, and consequently seamen and artificers, foldiers, shepherds and husbandmen, if not students. As much as they were divided in interest and ways of life, we shall perceive by their history, that they were ready to join in the common cause; that they were very well appointed for war, whether offensive or defensive; that their towns were well fortified, and themselves well furnished with weapons to battle it in the field; that they particularly had warlike chariots, so dreadful among the ancients, and which they are thought

to

* Jos. cap. 5. Com. 1, 12.

appellations do not belong to any two particular tribes; nor is either of them descended from any single son of Canaan; but consisted of a mixed multitude: but as they are constantly named as distinct tribes, and in order with the rest, we know not how to decide upon this matter. The names indeed of these tribes and of this people in general are a little vague and uncertain: so the whole body of the seven nations is supposed to be signified sometimes by the Amorites, just as all the people of the seven united provinces are now properly called Hollanders, who are more potent than any of the rest (4).

(E) It is hard to say any thing particular of the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, and the Rephaim, or to point at the exact places where they dwelt. The Kenites we have largely insisted on already †; but however, though the name be the same, we know not how to think these the same people. These are mentioned as a tribe of the Canaanites, who were to be delivered up to the executive justice of the Israelites; whereas those we formerly touched on are represented as a people who lived in a great degree of friendship with them. The Chaldees interpreter calls them Schalmites; whereby they are understood to have been pacific, and at no enmity with Israel. This indeed sounds them the same with the Kenites of Jethro's family. Whether or no the appellation of Kenite may have belonged to two distinct families we know not, but it appears pretty plain by scripture, that there was a difference in their manner of life: for on the one hand we are told, that it was unlawful for them to drink wine, to plant, to sow, or to dwell in houses, and that they conformed to this injunction, and led their life accordingly (5). Where we find this we understand also, that for their obedience to their laws they were to escape the hand of Nebuchadnezzar: whereas the Kenites of Jethro's line and kindred are said to have pitched their nest upon a rock, which seems to imply, that they built them a city for a safe habitation; and what is more, they were carried off with the ten tribes of Israel by the Assyrian (6); but we have dwelt sufficiently on these. The Kenizzites there is little or nothing said of, nor do we know where they dwelt. The Kadmonites, from the import of their name, are allowed to have dwelt in the east, and the Jerusalem Targum (7) expressly calls them the children of the east. The Rephaim are mostly placed in Basban, where Og the last of their race reigned (8). They were, as their name declares, men of a gigantic stature. A writer (9) of great learning and repute has a remarkable thought concerning the Rephaim; he fancies, they were the Gephyraei who followed Cadmus into Greece. He observes, that in the Chaldees they are called גִּבּוֹרִים Gebari, or stout men; and hence he has room for his conjecture. The race of the Rephaim indeed was quite extinguished upon the death of Og; but the name may have been assumed by others. From the little here collected we may observe why these four are omitted in speaking of the land of Canaan in the days of Moses, though they seem all to have possessed the region designed for Abraham and his seed. The Rephaim we see, were in Basban, which, as we have observed, was no part of the land of Canaan; the Kadmonites also were on the east of Jordan; the Kenites were, as seems upon the whole, a tribe of the Midianites, and therefore these three could not be reckoned among the tribes of Canaan, they being

(4) See PATRICK upon Gen. xlviii. 22.

† Before, p. 302, a, b.

(5) Jerem. xxxv. Conf.

Num. i. Chron. ii. ver. ult.

(6) See before, p. 302.

(7) Gen. xv.

(8) Deut. iii. 11.

(9) RELAND. Palæst. Illustr. p. 141.

- a to have borrowed from the Egyptians (F); that they were daring and obstinate, and almost invincible; and in the example of the Gibeonites beneath, we shall see they wanted not craft and policy. The language they spoke was well understood by Abraham, as should seem; for by what appears, he conversed very readily with them upon all occasions; but for their manner of writing, whether they had any originally of their own, which considering all things cannot well be doubted; or whether they had it in common with the other nations than subsisting in that part of the world, who all spoke the same tongue, or very nearly the same, or whether they borrowed it at first from the Israelites, may be considered when we come to speak farther of the Hebrew language<sup>a</sup>.
- b THEY retained the pure religion quite down to the days of Abraham, who acknowledged Melchisedec to be priest of the most high God; and Melchisedec was indisputably a Canaanite, or, at least, dwelt there at that time in high esteem and veneration (G). They never offered to molest Abraham; on the contrary, they were ready to oblige him in every thing, a noble example of which we have in the behaviour and good intentions of Ephron towards him in the affair of the cave of Machpelah. To say no more upon this subject, we must hence allow that there was not a general corruption of religion among the Canaanites at this day; but it must be granted that the very Hittites, so seemingly commendable in the days of Abraham, degenerated apace, since they were become the aversion of Isaac and Rebekah, who could not endure the thoughts of their son Jacob's marrying among the daughters of Heth, as their son Esau had done, to their great grief<sup>b</sup>. So that about this time we must date the rise of (H) those abominations which subjected them to the fierce wrath of God, and made them unworthy of the land of their possession. In the days of Moses they were become incorrigible idolaters, for he commands the Israelites to destroy their altars, and break down their images, statues or pillars, and cut down their groves (I), and burn their graven images with fire. And, lest they should pervert the Israelites, it was as strictly enjoined them not to intermarry with them; but to smite them, and utterly destroy them, nor shew mercy upon them<sup>c</sup>. By this we may form an idea of their horrid wickedness; they were guilty of the cruel custom of d sacrificing men, and are said to have passed their seed through fire to Molech<sup>d</sup>. This inhuman rite they are charged with, as they were the ancestors of the Phœnicians, and therefore we shall not repeat what we have already<sup>e</sup> said on that subject, nor anticipate what we may have to add in our Phœnician history. Their morals were as corrupt as their doctrine; adultery, bestiality of all sorts, profanation, incest, and all manner of uncleanness, are the sins laid to their charge, and being foreigners to that country; though it happened that they also did, in part, fall to the Israelites, as was promised. To conclude, it is not plain that any of these four nations were of the sons of Canaan.

<sup>a</sup> See SHUCKFORD'S Connect. of the sacr. and proph. Hist. vol. I. book 4. p. 110. See before, p. 152. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 306. <sup>c</sup> Deut. vii. 1—5. <sup>d</sup> Levit. xviii. 21. See before, p. 293. <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 138.

(F) This is bishop Cumberland's thought, who supposes a part of them to have abode two hundred years in Egypt; and that the Canaanites and Perizzites, when named together, must be understood of those mingled tribes of all the Canaanites who had been engaged in fierce wars with the Egyptians; and further, that these two bodies are particularly marked down for destruction, as they were the most warlike and skilful in martial affairs, training up their children to the same discipline, and the most likely to give the Israelites trouble (10).

(G) Sir Isaac Newton (11) concludes, that they persevered in the true religion till the death of Melchisedec; but that afterwards they fell away, and began to embrace idolatry, now spreading, as he thinks, from Chaldea. They are said to have been given to the superstition of the ancient Perians (12).

(H) It is the opinion, however, of bishop Cumberland (13), that the Canaanites were idolaters before the congress of Melchisedec and Abraham, which we know not how to allow.

(I) The original word Asharim, which we render groves, is by some understood to mean the wooden images of Astarte; and instance Gideon's throwing down the altar, and cutting down the grove that was by, or, as the Hebrew and LXX has it, upon it; which they urge could not be the grove, but the image upon it (14); but besides, that the original may as well be rendered over it, viz. the grove that was over the altar, we shall shew in the sequel that these groves were not only very common, but designed to conceal their impious rites. Sir Isaac Newton remarks upon the whole passage, that the Canaanites had no temples. Moses commanded Israel to destroy the altars, images, high-places, and groves of the Canaanites, but made no mention of their temples, as he would have done, had there been any in those days (15).

(10) See CUMBERLAND Origen. Gent. Antiq. p. 132, 133.

(11) Chronol. of anc. kingdoms amended, p. 188. (12) See SHUCKFORD'S Connect. of sacr. and proph. Hist. vol. I. book 5. p. 335.

(13) Origen. Gent. Antiquiss. p. 427.

(14) SELDEN de Diis Syriis Syntagm. 2.

(15) Chronol. of anc. Kingd. amended, p. 221.

(15) Chronol.

which brought on the calamities they were doomed to*: and this may serve as a supplement to the character of this people, after their fall from the right way.

Their Government.

CONCERNING their government thus much may be said, That they were comprehended under a great number of states, and under subjection to limited chiefs or kings, as they are called; and transacted all their business in popular assemblies: so Abraham bowed not down to the king of the children of Heib, but to themselves; so Ephron seems to have acted with Abraham with the participation of his whole tribe: so Hamer king of Shechem would not conclude upon what answer he should make to what the sons of Jacob proposed to him, till he had consulted his citizens upon what he should do in the case†; and throughout all their transactions the same tenor of conduct in their princes will be observed by every attentive reader. Nor is it likely that so many petty kingdoms should have been standing when Joshua invaded them, had exorbitant ambition and lust of rule been known among them; but as nature, perhaps, taught them, that every man as an individual, and every state as a collective body, is free and independant, so they may thereby have been restrained from invading each other's rights, or else one or a few must have swallowed up the many; and, though this opinion may be combated by the ambitious cruelty of Adonibezek*, that one example will have no other effect upon this argument than a single exception has to a general rule; that the main body of them thought and acted upon different principles appears pretty plain. This is as much as we need, or can well say concerning their government, laws, and policy. c

Their History.

WE now come to their history, the beginnings of which are too dark and unsettled for us to dwell on them, and too heavily laden with the hypotheses of the great men, who have turned their thoughts towards their antiquities. Wherefore, taking scripture, and the natural lights reflected therefrom, for our principal guides, we shall touch as lightly as may be upon what the learned have advanced, as it were, from their own stock. When we consider the situation and distance of this country, we cannot but think it was at first peopled by Canaan and his descendants upon the first dispersion after the flood (K). What concerns they originally had with Egypt, are rather guessed at than confirmed to us, in respect of the time when they were transacted; but, finding that there was a settled aversion among the Egyptians d in the days of Jacob, against such as fed cattle, it is thought the Phœnician shepherds or Canaanites may have warred upon, and oppressed the Egyptians before Abraham removed into Canaan; though this is liable to some objections (L): Therefore we must here acknowledge, as we did formerly, our great ignorance in this matter, and dissatisfaction with what the learned have advanced upon it. All therefore we can pretend to in this matter, is to mark out as we go along, the times in which the learned have been induced to fix what Manetho tells us of the Phœnician strangers in Egypt. In conformity to this, it is pretended† that some of them, upon the increase of their families, being straitned for want of room, moved southwards, as Moses intimates, whilst others did the same northwards, as the Hama-ibite e and Arvadite; and that the former penetrated far into Egypt, or at least possessed themselves of the Arabian side of that country, which they will have to have been Goshen. Here, say they, did they settle; even under Mizraim himself, erected a separate kingdom, and differing from the pure Egyptians in religious matters, and in way of life, fierce contentions arose between them, which ended in a total expulsion of them in the manner we formerly related in the history of Egypt; and this, say they, was effected in the days of Abraham.

WE have reckoned the vale of Siddim, where Sodom and Gomorrab stood, into the ancient country of Canaan; and it happens to be the scene of the first action we find, for certain, of this people. The inhabitants of this vale were invaded by Cbedorlaomer, f * Levit. xviii. Gen. xxiii. 7, & seq. Id. xxiv. 20, & seq. * Judg. i. 6, & seq. † See CUMBERLAND ON SANCHONIATHO, p. 351, 352, seq. & BEDFORD'S Scripture Chronol. p. 201, 202, 250, 251, 252, 253, 337.

(K) There is an old tradition which says otherwise; for it tells us, that this country did originally belong to the children of Shem, by virtue of a division made among the sons of Noah; but that the children of Canaan dispossessed them (16): whence it is argued, that God did but strict justice in restoring the line of Shem to their rightful possession†.

(L) For we think it is pretty obvious, that the Egyptians must have looked on Abraham as a Phœnician or Canaanitish pastor, when he was among them; but we do not perceive that they had any aversion to him on that account, but rather the contrary (17).

(16) EPIPH. Hæres. 46. n. 94.

† De hoc vid. ALIX. in Pentat.

(17) See Gen. xii.

king

a king of Elam, and reduced to a tribute (M), which they paid for twelve years successively; but in the thirteenth they rebelled, which drew on them a second war, which we shall come to anon.

In the mean time the other parts of the country received Abraham with great hospitality and veneration, two or three years after this invasion; but soon after his arrival, the whole land was oppressed by famine, and the Canaanite is now expressly said to have been in the land (N). The dearth drove Abraham into Egypt: whence we learn that the whole country at this time was in great want<sup>a</sup>. The famine was of no long continuance, and Abraham returned into this country again, and found that the Perizzite was also in the land; whence, it is thought, they are spoken of b as new comers, and that they had lately been expelled from Egypt, or dreading an expulsion, had voluntarily forsaken that kingdom: and the rather because Abraham and Lot seem now to have been straitened for want of room, which caused their separation, as if the country was now become more populous than they at first found it (O). And now was the whole land promised to Abraham<sup>1</sup>.

THE five kings of the vale of Siddim, Bera king of Sodom, Birsba king of Gomorrab, Sbinab king of Admah, Sbemeber king of Zebojim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, rebelled in the thirteenth year after they had been subdued by Chedorlaomer, and been made tributary to him, as we have already observed. Wherefore Chedorlaomer c and his allies marched hither again in the fourteenth year, taking several other nations or tribes in his way; or rather, he fetched a circuit to come at them, reducing, among others, the Horites, the Amalekites, and the Amorites of Hazerontamar. At last he fell on the five kings of Siddim, who were resolved to dispute their rights with him; but they fell under the pressure of the enemy once more; and all the inhabitants were either slain in battle, or carried away captive, or obliged to fly to the mountains or to their cities. Sodom and Gomorrab and the rest were pillaged with the utmost rigour and scrutiny. Among the prisoners was Lot, which roused up Abraham to undertake his rescue, which he effectually did<sup>2</sup>.

At this time Melchisedec (P) was king of Salem, and priest also of the most high <sup>a</sup> Gen. xii. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. i. c. 9.

<sup>1</sup> Gen. xii.

<sup>2</sup> Gen. xiv.

(M) By an old tradition we have already mentioned, this war upon the inhabitants of the vale of Siddim was a very just one; for if it be true that the land of Canaan, of which this was undoubtedly a part, originally belonged to the children of Shem, from whom it was forcibly taken by the children of Ham (18), no wonder that the kings of the east, who were of that descent, laid claim to this country in general, and to this most lovely spot in particular; for Elam descended from Shem (19).

(N) According to what you read in the preceding note, this means no more than that the Canaanites had invaded the country before Abraham came thither. But we must remember, that this is building a superstructure upon a very weak foundation, a tradition: much the same may be said upon the passage afterwards, that the Perizzites were also in the land.

(O) But upon this we may start one question, which in this case cannot be readily answered; How came such a weak prince as Hamer king of Sbechem to have so much ground to spare, as he afterwards talks of, when he hoped to make an union with Jacob (20)?

(P) The Jews will have him to have been Shem, out of a vain reluctance, that their father should have had any superior among the Canaanites; and they are not without their advocates, for this opinion, among the Christian writers, and some of them very eminent: we will give the words of a very learned prelate of our own church upon this point——‘ I am glad that ‘ I can cite Grotius to abet my opinion [That ‘ Melchisedec was the Shem of Moses, and the ‘ just judge of Philo Byblinus] thus far, that he ‘ saith in his notes on Heb. vii. 1. Melchisedec is ‘ the man meant by Sydic in Philo Byblinus. And ‘ that Shem had this title of Melchisedec, or ‘ the just king, as Pompey was ordinarily called ‘ Magnus, and Octavius called Augustus, is the ‘ judgment of the eldest and learnedest Jews, ‘ and of many modern learned men in Jewish ‘ antiquity; to whose judgment herein I sub- ‘ scribe with great satisfaction. And, whereas ‘ others think him some small king of Canaan, ‘ I concur thus far with them, that I believe he ‘ neither had, nor sought any large dominions ‘ for himself’ (21).—This then is a favourite opinion we see, and, no doubt, the great man whose words these are, had perfectly satisfied himself that the thing must have been so. But as eminent a prelate (22) of our own differs so far from the former, whose words we have given above, that he wonders how any Christian can entertain such a notion, so evidently destroyed by the apostle to the Hebrews (23), where it is expressly said, that Melchisedec was not γεννησάμενος ἐξ ἀνδρῶν, his descent or pedigree was not counted from them the [Jews] which is not true of Shem. ‘ Nor could Shem be said to ‘ be without father or mother, whose genealogy ‘ is evident from Adam. Nor was Shem’s priest- ‘ hood, if he had any, of a different order from ‘ Levi’s, who was in his loins, as well as in the ‘ loins of Abraham. And therefore it cannot be ‘ said

A famine in Canaan.

Year of the Flood, 1078.

Year before Christ, 1921

(18) See before in the notes, p. 326. (19) Gen. x. 22. (20) See Gen. xxxiv. 21. (21) CUMBERLAND on SANCTUARY, p. 174. (22) See PATRICK upon Gen. xiv. 18. (23) Ibid. vii. 6.

